RECOMMENDATIONS OF THIS WORK.

TO THE PRINTER AND PUBLISHER.

SIR,

IT was a saying of the famous Dr. South, that "Popery is not only the worst religion, but the greatest evil that can possibly come into any Country." The contents of the following sheets furnish us with ample proof of this. THE ACTS AND MONUMENTS OF THE CHRISTIAN MARTYRS, written by JOHN FOX, a man of rare and excellent endowments, both natural and acquired, I most heartily recommend to persons of both sexes, and of every condition in life. As the author lived at the time when the bloody scenes herein related were exhibited, and his integrity, learning and piety, are equalled by few, (by none exceeded) the credibility of his testimony can be called in question only by those, whose interest or principles lead them to espouse and promote the cause of Popery.

Lock Chapel.

MARTIN MADAN.

SIR,

IT gives me unspeakable Pleasure, to find, that you design to re-publish Fox's Martyrology: which I consider as a faithful and judicious Compendium of the most valuable Ecclesiastical History extant in our Language. We live at a Time, when the Generality of professed Protestants appear to have lost Sight of those grand and essential PRINCIPLES, to which the CHURCH OF ENGLAND was reformed, and in defence of which her MARTYRS bled.

Religious Ignorance, and a general Unconcernedness about Divine things; together with the most profuse Diffipation and a Growing Disregard of Moral Virtue; are the reigning Characteristics of the present Age.

In a Country thus circumstanced, POPERY (ever on the watch for Advantages) will, and must, and does, gain continual Ground. Ignorance, Infidelity, and Licentiousness naturally terminate in Superstition, as their ultimate Refuge; and Rome too often reaps, what Profaneness and Immorality have sown.

To stem so dangerous a Torrent, no means are more likely (under God), than the re-publication of such a Work as this; a Work eminently calculated to display, and to guard us against the Principles and the Spirit of Popery;—to perpetuate the holy Lives, and faithful Testimonies and the triumphant Deaths, of those evangelical Worthys, who resisted Error, even unto Blood;—to exalt the Standard of CHRIST;—to exhibit the Loving-kindness of the HOLY GHOST, who gave such Grace and Power unto Men; and to stand as the best commentary on those inestimable Truths, which (through the good Hand of God upon us) still continue to shine in the Liturgy, Articles, and Homily, of our ESTABLISHED CHURCH.

I wish this Performance much Success, in the Name of the Lord. May its Diffusion be very extensive, and its Usefulness very great. May it prove mighty, through God, to make the Protestant Churches in general, and our own National Church in particular, remember FROM WHENCE they are fallen: stir them up to Doctrinal and Practical Repentance; and bring them back to their first Principles, and to their first Works!—With this Prayer, breathed from the inmost of my Heart,

I remain, Sir,

Your affectionate Well-wisher,

Orange-street, Leicester-Square.

AUGUSTUS MONTAGUE TOPLADY.

SIR,

I AM glad to hear you propose re-printing FOX's BOOK of MARTYRS: it will, no doubt, be received with great acceptance, and very cheerfully encouraged by all who have any sense of the excellency and glory of that religion, for which the noble worthies of which it speaks, suffered and died. It has ever been esteemed one of the most invaluable treasures of human production: it is its own best recommendation; and it need only be known in order to be admired by all who are happily possessed of the power and spirit of the religion of the blessed Jesus. I pray God it may be the means of increasing the highly-favoured number;

And am,

Your humble Servant,

South-Street, Grosvenor-Square.

CHARLES DE COETLOGON.

SIR,

AS I think the BOOK of MARTYRS should be in every body's hands, it gives me pleasure to hear of its being re-publishing. I trust it will be the means of reviving that spirit of genuine Christianity which inspired the noble Martyrs in these lands, and of uniting the hearts of God's children in these decisive times, to the support of their one common cause, and in love to one another.

If you think my name can in the least promote the reading of that valuable work, you are welcome to make use of it;

And I am, Sir,

Your very humble servant,

Swallow-Street.

JOHN TROTTER.

SIR,

THE BOOK of MARTYRS was well calculated to serve the Protestant cause, against the SUPERSTITION and CRUELTY of the Church of Rome. The Editor deserves the thanks of all serious Protestants, for his labour in making so valuable a book easily attainable.—

A book wherein the doctrines of Scripture are clearly represented, and the power of truth exemplified. I cannot but think it speaks its own worth, to every honest and dispassionate reader. I am sure, if it needed any recommendation, it should not want that of

Your humble servant,

Fetter-Lane.

JAMES WEBB.

R E C O M M E N D A T I O N S.

SIR,

I Heartily join in Recommending FOX's BOOK of MARTYRS to the perusal of every Protestant family and English readers.

Eagle-Street, Red-Lion-Square.

ANDREW GIFFORD.

SIR,

THE exceeding great value I entertain for the Doctrines of the Reformation makes me esteem the present general departure from them, a circumstance not a little to be lamented: I therefore most heartily concur with the other respectable Gentlemen, whose names you have sent me, in Recommending the BOOK of MARTYRS; in which not only the characters of the best of men are most excellently set forth, but also those noble principles which enabled them with such uncommon patience to bear the utmost barbarity which tyranny and Popery could invent.

Such merciless sentiments, pregnant with every consequence fatal to the good of mankind, can never be too vehemently, if lawfully opposed, or held in sufficient detestation by the generous mind. And although the mild hand of genuine Christianity would scorn to use the weapons of persecution against the basest error; yet as the very principles of Popery are totally incompatible even with our national as well as religious good, a most strict and guarded connivance is the utmost that even mercy itself must confess she deserves.

'Tis therefore, Sir, a well-timed deed once more to bring to light the horrid scenes exhibited by that bloody tribunal, formerly erected in these kingdoms, that we may learn, ere it be too late, to tremble at the least encroachment of sentiments, only calculated to enslave us in time, and deceive us for eternity.

I am, Sir,

Your friend and servant,

ROWLAND HILL.

SIR,

IT is a clear and undoubted truth, amongst all real Protestants, "That Popery is the grand corruption of Christianity," and this truth may be clearly demonstrated in every view, and in all the parts of Christianity, viz. Its doctrines, worship, laws, morals, and tempers. What doctrine has Popery not corrupted? What branch of worship has Popery not perverted and defiled? What law of God has Popery not trampled on and despised? But on reading this BOOK of MARTYRS, that which strikes us with a peculiar terror and amazement is, the cruel and bloody spirit of Popery. The very essence of the Christian temper are, Love, and Justice, carried to the most noble elevations and exertions. The essence of the spirit and temper of Popery are, Uncharitableness, Cruelty, Bitterness, Injustice, and Blood; it breathes the very spirit of Hell itself. Nothing can be a more lively picture of the cruel devils and the outrageous damn'd, than Popery: nothing ever did approach nearer to the resemblance of the lost spirits in hell, than Popery.

No book in the world is so well adapted to display the cruel and blood-thirsty spirit of Popery in the most striking light as the BOOK of MARTYRS: and this part especially is suited to an English Reader; he is not here led up to the times of Nero, of Dioclesian, or to the martyrdom of Polycarp, Ignatius, Cyprian, but he is shewn the bloody tragedies acted in his own country, and upon his own countrymen: here you see that great and amiable servant of God, lord Cobham, hung up, by the waist, over a dreadful fire, and roasted alive! Here you see an Hooper burned at Gloucester, in so cruel a manner, that his ribs fly open, and you behold his heart beating with life, in the midst of the flames.—Here you see that neither the accurate learning of a Ridley, the godly simplicity of a Latimer, nor the distinguished benevolence of a Cranmer, can be any protection from the outrageous fury of Popery.

English Reader, what thinkest thou of Popery? is it a lovely religion? is it greatly desirable to make a man wise, and good and happy? if it be, let us embrace it! let us bid it welcome into England, let us throw off our Protestantism, and embrace this blessed system, which our reformers despised and abhorred.

If the old scheme of Popery, which was in vogue for a thousand years in England, be better calculated to make the nation wise and happy than the doctrine of the Protestants, let us go back to our holy mother, from whom we have so basely revolted.

Protestant dissenters, shut up your conventicles, and return to the popish chapel with tears of repentance and sorrow, for your ungrateful apostacy; beg pardon for your foul revolt, and reconcile yourself to the bosom of the holy church.

Ye members of the established church of England, what do you think of Popery? Do you think it much preferable to the Protestant system displayed in your Articles, your Homilies, and your Liturgy? If so, join in a petition to the rulers of your church, to abolish and destroy your present principles of Christianity.

But on the other hand, as the true religion of Jesus Christ, contained in the sacred Scriptures, and refined from all the corruptions of Popery, is, most surely, the contrivance of infinite Wisdom, and the gift of infinite Love; let us study to understand it; let us heartily love it, and use the most wise and just means for its propagation, which God has put in our power, and let us leave it pure and uncorrupted to our dear posterity.

I am, Sir,

Your sincere friend and Servant,

JOHN RYLAND.

Northampton.

SIR,

HISTORY being calculated to catch the Attention of Persons of all ranks, many, who cannot without some Reluctance sit down to read other serious Publications, will, we trust, easily be prevailed upon to read that useful and interesting HISTORY contained in FOX's BOOK of MARTYRS; and as the attentive Perusal of it cannot fail being followed with good Effect, I therefore feel a peculiar Pleasure in Recommending the same to sober, sensible and religious Persons of every Description.

May the great Head of the Church, Jesus Christ, bless this and every laudable Endeavour to promote the Cause of God and Truth, and also to counteract that intolerant Spirit of Popish Superstition, Idolatry, Bigotry, and Cruelty, which has so long exercised its Tyranny in the World; but which is now, through Divine Mercy, on the Decline, and will be, it is to be hoped, soon extirpated from the Earth. To this end, may the glorious Sun of Righteousness remove the moral Darkness from the Minds of Men, as the natural Sun, when risen, dispels the gloomy Shades of Night.

T. PRIESTLEY,

Author of the Evangelical Explanation of the Bible.

Recommended by the Rev. Messrs. Madan, Toplady, De Coetlogon, Trotter, Webb, Gifford, Hill, Ryland, Whitfield, Priestley, Wesley, and many other Ministers of the Gospel.

P R E F A C E.

WE can with Truth affirm, that the ACTS and MONUMENTS of the GLORIOUS PROTESTANT MARTYRS is a Work WORTHY of a PLACE in the HEARTS as well as LIBRARIES of ALL serious CHRISTIANS. FOX'S COMPLETE BOOK of MARTYRS has been long Recommended by Protestant Divines of every Denomination; and among the public Testimonies which have appeared, from Time to Time, in favour of this valuable Work, are the Names of a TOPLADY, a WHITFIELD, a WESLEY, a MADAN, a HILL, a RYLAND, and many other Ministers of the Gospel, too numerous here to mention.

The Lives and Sufferings of the Holy Martyrs may be considered, by every candid Person, as a strong presumptive Evidence for the Truth of the Christian Religion; for it is impossible that so many Thousands, of both Sexes, of all Ranks and Professions, rich and poor, learned and simple, should at such distant Times and Places, have conspired, as it were, against their own Lives, to establish a Faith, of whose Truth they were not fully convinced. The greatest Enemies to Christianity cannot deny but that there have been Thousands, among the Sufferers for the Truth of Christ's Doctrine, who were very competent Judges of the Degree of Evidence offered in support of it, and sufficiently Independent to be influenced either by Rewards or Threats. Many of them were also sufficiently learned to inquire into the Stability of the Scripture Proofs brought to prove Jesus Christ to be actually the expected Saviour of Mankind, which entirely sets aside the Adversary's Plea against some few, who they say were ignorant, weak People, who took their Faith upon the Credit of others. We know, on the contrary, from the following History, that Men of the strongest Sense, and brightest Parts, were Converts to Christianity; and having once believed from Conviction, arising from a fair Examination of its internal and external Evidence, were too honest and impartial to deny what they had openly professed to believe.

There is a wide Difference between an intemperate, misguided Zeal, which rushes into Perils without sufficient Reason, and that calm and steady Courage which meets Danger with Temper, when unavoidable. Our Saviour himself gave an Example of this prudential Conduct, by oftentimes retiring from imminent Danger: and he gave it as a Charge to his first Followers, "When they persecute you in one City, flee to another." So that the Holy Martyrs, those brave Men, who unavoidably sealed the Testimony of the Gospel with their Blood, following their Blessed Master's Advice, cannot be ranked with rash and hot-headed Zealots.

The Progress of Popery has so greatly increased of late, that there is now an absolute Necessity for using every Effort to suppress such dangerous and contagious Principles, and to exert ourselves, and carry into Execution every Means that can be concerted for promoting the Cause of Protestantism; and surely nothing can be a better Means to stem the Torrent of Popery, than a Publication of the following Work.

From the Tenets of the Holy Martyrs we may acquire the Principles of the Christian Religion, from their Morals we may learn how to live, from their Fortitude how to suffer, and from their Deaths how to die.

Let us therefore take Example, in various stations of Life, from the Integrity and Resolution of these departed Brethren in Christ; and as a noble Conduct is praise-worthy, let us be ready, in whatever Sense our Lord requires a Sacrifice, to go and do likewise.

We think it needless here to give a tedious Detail of all the Particulars, which will be contained in this Important Undertaking; but it may be necessary to observe to our Readers, that this Work will not (like several imperfect Publications on the Subject) be a trifling Summary of mere Names—not an inaccurate Index or lifeless Abridgment—not a crude indigested Compendium—but a Full and COMPLETE EDITION of FOX'S BOOK of MARTYRS, including the CHRISTIAN MARTYROLOGY, from the most early Age of Persecution to the present Time; and containing a Display, and fuller Account than has hitherto been published in any Book of the Kind, of the Lives, Religious Principles, Cruel Persecutions, Sufferings, Tortures, and Triumphant Deaths, of all those faithful Christians and godly Martyrs, whose Constancy was tried for the Truth of the Gospel, and who have sealed their Faith in our most Holy Religion with their Blood.

This Work is well calculated to serve the PROTESTANT CAUSE. It will teach us how to conquer Sin, our grand Persecutor; to make our Appetites and Passions Martyrs to our Duty, and hence we may learn, that there is not any Thing so difficult, but we may overcome through Divine Help. We have the same Cause, the same Lord and Master on our Side, the same Recompence of Reward to encourage us; and having so great a Cloud of Witnesses, let us press forward, and the same Heaven will be our Portion for ever.

Let PROTESTANT FAMILIES Read, Value, and Recommend the Book of Martyrs to their Friends and Connections; which, next to the Bible, is a most valuable Treasure; for herein you will find exhibited not only the Characters of the best Men, but those noble Principles which enabled them to brave the severest Tortures which Popish Cruelty and Pagan Barbarity could invent. We here see those mournful Tragedies that have been acted in our own Country, upon our own Countrymen; and here, as in a Glass, we see, refined from all Corruptions of Popery, &c. that pure Religion of Jesus Christ, which we are in Duty bound to propagate, and to leave uncorrupted to our dearest Posterity.

In these MONUMENTS of our Illustrious Martyrs, we behold displayed, as they are in the Articles, Homilies, and Liturgy of the established Church, those essential, fundamental Principles, to which the Church was reformed, and for which her glorious Martyrs were Burned. We here meet with a most valuable General History of the Church; and will hence be convinced, how much it is our Duty to check, by such a Publication, the Infidelity and Immoralities of the present Age.

Here are presented to View those Inestimable Truths, and those Splendid Examples of Christian Fortitude, which all Protestants believe, revere, and wish to imitate. That Popery is not only the Worst Religion, but the Greatest Evil that possibly can come into any Country, is an Opinion in which we all uniformly agree, and we see it fully proved in the following Sheets.

MINISTERS of the Gospel have always Recommended the Book of Martyrs. What Doctrine has Popery not corrupted? What Branch of true Worship has Popery not perverted and defiled? What Law of God has Popery not trampled on and despised? Call to Mind the Horrid Scenes exhibited by her bloody Perpetrators of Cruelty. In this COMPLETE BOOK of MARTYRS, they are faithfully related, to prevent the least Incroachments of those erroneous Sentiments, and those Human Inventions, that were artfully framed only to enslave us in Time, and deceive us for Eternity. In order therefore to perpetuate and extend the Usefulness of such an excellent Work as FOX's BOOK of MARTYRS, the present Edition will be handsomely printed on a Fine Paper and New Types; and Embellished with an entire new Arrangement of elegant Copper-Plates, on a larger Scale than those of any other Publication of the Kind.

When we consider the Difficulty attending the preparing and executing a Work of this Magnitude, which must go under the Inspection of so many Eyes, and pass through so many Hands, we are naturally led to crave the Indulgence of our Readers. We shall exert our Endeavours to deserve their Approbation, and may therefore reasonably hope for their Candour. Nevertheless, we must adopt an Observation of Mr. FOX in his Latin Preface, which we have here translated.

“Not to Cæsar, not to Emperors, Kings, or Queens, not to any human Patronage, but to the Aid and Support of Divine Omnipotence we only look; to God alone, as to our best Protector, we dedicate and commend this New and IMPROVED Edition of the Book of Martyrs.”

The Original of this Work, as written by Mr. Fox, who lived at the Time when the Bloody Deeds therein recorded, were transacted, and whose Testimony can be called in Question only by the Emissaries of Rome, as it has been esteemed one of the most Valuable Treasures of human Production, so it is its own best Recommendation; and therefore we flatter ourselves this New and UNIVERSAL HISTORY of MARTYRDOM, by having considerable Additions and Improvements, will be universally approved. It will contain, not only the History of the Glorious Martyrs who suffered in the Reigns of Henry VIII. and Queen Mary, but an History of the Primitive and Modern Martyrs, the Sufferings and Persecutions of the Servants of God in the most Early Ages, including those of the Antient Jews, and of our Blessed Saviour and his Apostles. To which will be added (among a Variety of other additional Matter) a particular Account of the Persecutions of the Quakers, and of the WESTERN MARTYROLOGY, the Subjects of which Persecution suffered under the lawless Tyranny, and inhuman Cruelty of Judge JEFFREYS. Also an Account of the BARTHOLOMEW MASSACRE in FRANCE, and of the GREAT PERSECUTION under LOUIS XIV. which continued till the LATE REVOLUTION in FRANCE: the whole accompanied with Original Notes, Remarks, Reflections, &c. on each Life and Case.

Thus it is evident, and surely must appear plain to all, that we propose a FULL and COMPLETE EDITION of FOX's MARTYROLOGY, with ADDITIONS and great IMPROVEMENTS, faithfully collected from most authentic Records. May we not then reasonably hope, that this Work will experience a cordial Reception from all Christian Protestants and English Readers? a Work which impartially traces Persecution from its Origin, points out the first Beginning of Martyrdom, and carefully follows its Steps to the LATEST PERIOD. May God give his Blessing! that so it may prove, with his Assistance, the Means of preventing our REFORMED CHURCH from falling into gross Errors; and likewise teach all Christians to set a greater Value upon true Religion, whose Doctrines and Constitution are so exactly agreeable to those of the REFORMERS and MARTYRS.

Having said thus much concerning the general Subjects of the COMPLETE BOOK of MARTYRS, permit us to add a few Words on the peculiar Advantages of this Edition.

Several Works of this Kind have already been published, but not one of them on such a desirable, satisfactory, and extensive Plan, as might have been expected from the great Opportunities for Improvement. Some have been greatly objected to, on Account of the Badness of the Paper, the Incorrectness of Printing, and the contemptible Coarseness of the Cuts, which are executed in so despicable a Manner, that they appear rather as a Burlesque than an Embellishment. Others are incomplete for several Reasons, especially because they relate to particular Countries and particular Periods: Such as are of a general Nature, are confused in the Method, and inelegant in the Execution: Some of them particularly have given great Disgust, for after promising great Things, they prove to be little more than mere ABRIDGMENTS, with a List or Index of Names, &c. and not one of them brings down the Martyrology completely to the present Time. To remedy these Defects, against which the Public have so long complained, the Publisher has been solicited to publish the present Work, which, by the laborious Care and Study of several Years, is now perfectly revised, corrected, digested, and improved, with very considerable ADDITIONS. Here the History of Martyrdom is traced from the FIRST AGES of the WORLD, to the PRESENT PERIOD; their excruciating Sufferings and Tortures are described with great Accuracy; all the Narratives are related with an agreeable Simplicity and Candour; a tedious Prolixity is carefully avoided; old, obsolete, and uncouth Expressions in the Style, are exchanged for such as may at this Time be easily understood; and an Elegancy of Expression has been carefully studied, in Order to enforce the Power of Precept by the Beauties of Language.

Mr. JOHN FOX's COMPLETE BOOK of MARTYRS has hitherto been a very Scarce, Dear, and Voluminous Work; but this New and COMPLETE EDITION, by Means of a close and peculiar Mode of Printing, will be published in only One Hundred Numbers, that, by this Accommodation, all Ranks of People may be enabled, through the Weekly Mode of Publication, by one or more Numbers at a time, to purchase it.

The Large Copper-Plates to this Work (every Number of which will contain 1, 2, 3, 4, or more Subjects elegantly engraved on Copper) are executed with such inimitable Skill, that their Effects will at once give Pain and Pleasure; for while the Heart commiserates the Sufferings of the Martyrs, the Eye will be led to admire the Ingenuity of the Artists. If the Work should exceed the One Hundred Numbers proposed, the Publisher by a Note of Hand engages to deliver the Overplus gratis. Our Letter-Press, in the Size of the Pages, is also much longer and wider, and of Course enables us include a much greater Quantity of Matter than any similar Works printed in a SMALLER SIZE, or in a LESS QUANTITY OF NUMBERS, which is likewise another ADDITIONAL RECOMMENDATION of THIS WORK in Preference to any other. So that even those who may be already possessed of imperfect or incomplete Books of this Kind, will notwithstanding make a valuable and necessary Acquisition by the Purchase of this NEW and COMPLETE EDITION of FOX's BOOK of MARTYRS, with considerable ADDITIONS and great IMPROVEMENTS.

PROTESTANT MARTYRS;

During the REIGN of MARY the FIRST, commonly called on Account of her Sanguinary and Persecuting Spirit, BLOODY QUEEN MARY.

I N T R O D U C T I O N :

Being A PRELIMINARY DISCOURSE, giving an ACCOUNT of the PRINCIPAL ERRORS, RITES, CEREMONIES, and SUPERSTITIOUS PRACTICES, of the ROMISH CHURCH.

BEFORE we enter upon those bloody tragedies that were acted in England, during the tyrannical reign of queen Mary, we think it necessary, especially for the information of the younger part of our readers, to give an account of the main errors, superstitious ceremonies, and human inventions, of the Romish church; in abhorrence of which, the first Reformers and blessed Martyrs, who made the sacred scriptures their sole guide, separated from that church, and, resisting popish idolatry, even unto death, sealed the sacred truths of the everlasting gospel with their precious blood. To attempt a formal refutation of the various absurdities belonging to the Roman Catholic religion, would be foreign to the design of this work, and afford little entertainment; we shall however select those that are most material, and prove that they are mere effects of human invention, by contrasting them with passages taken from the word of God, the only true rule by which we can possibly judge in all matters of revealed religion. The Romish church affirms, that out of her communion there is no salvation; yet they receive, profess, and teach, as the true catholic faith, the following strange, unscriptural, and inhuman maxims, tenets, and carnal observances.

TRADITIONS.] The church of Rome, having deprived the laity of the Bible, substitutes in its stead apostolical and ecclesiastical traditions; and obliges her disciples to admit for truth whatever she teaches them.

No: 1.

but what do the holy scriptures say? "Why do ye transgress the commandment of God by your traditions? Matt. xv. 3, 9, &c. They also command us "to call no man master (in spiritual concerns); to try the spirits; and to beware of false teachers."

PRAYERS AND DIVINE SERVICE in LATIN.] The Roman Catholics will not interpret the scriptures, otherwise than according to the sense of holy Mother Church, and the pretended unanimous consent of the fathers: they assert also, that the scriptures ought not to be read publicly, nor indifferently by all; and that the common people may be enslaved by gross ignorance, they perform public worship in an unknown tongue, contrary to the rule laid down by the apostle,
"That all things should be done to edification." St.
Paul says, "If I pray in an unknown tongue, my spirit prayeth, but my understanding is unfruitful." And, writing to Timothy, he reminds him, that "from a child hast thou known the scriptures, which are able to make thee wise unto salvation, through faith, which is in Christ Jesus."

SEVEN SACRAMENTS.] Two only were instituted by Christ, to which the Romish church has added five more, making in all seven, necessary to salvation, namely, the Eucharist, Baptism, Confirmation, Penance, Extreme Unction, Orders, and Matrimony. To those two which Christ instituted, she has added a mixture of her own inventions; for in the sacrament of baptism she uses salt, oil, or spittle; and in the sacrament of the Lord's supper, the laity have only the bread administered to them; and even that not after the manner ordained by Christ, who broke the bread and gave it to his disciples; instead of which, the church of Rome administers to her members not bread, but a wafer, and that not broken, but put whole by the priest into the mouths of the communicants. These wafers are smaller than those made for the priests, who, with them, drink the sacramental wine alone, to which the rest of the congregation have as good a right, from the institution of our blessed Lord, who said, "Drink ye all of this," &c. Matt. xxvi. 27.

THE MASS.] Roman Catholics believe it to be a true, proper, and propitiatory sacrifice, and therefore call it the sacrament of the Altar; whereas the death of Christ was a full and complete sacrifice, "in which he hath, by one offering, perfected for ever them that are sanctified. He himself is a priest for ever; who being raised from the dead, dieth no more; and who, through the eternal Spirit, offered himself without spot to God." See St. Paul's Epistle to the Hebrews, Chap. ix. and x. It was on account of this gross absurdity, and the irreligious application of it, that our first reformers suffered, and so many were put to death in the reign of Mary the Bloody.

TRANSUBSTANTIATION.] Roman Catholics profess, that in the most holy sacrament of the Lord's supper, there is really and substantially, the body and blood, together with the soul and divinity of Christ; and that the whole substance of the bread is turned into his body, and the whole substance of the wine into his blood; which conversion, so contradictory to our senses, they call Transubstantiation, but at the same time they affirm, that under either kind or species only, one whole, entire Christ, and the true sacrament is received. But why are those words, "This is my body," to be taken in a literal sense, any more than those concerning the cup? Our Saviour says, "I am the true vine; I am the door." St. Paul says, "Our fathers drank of the rock that followed them, and that rock was Christ;" and writing to the Corinthians, he affirms, that "he had fed them with milk." Can these passages be taken literally? Why then must we be forced to interpret our Saviour's words in a literal sense, when the meaning is both clearer, and more natural, when taken in a figurative one? "Take, eat; thus, in like manner, shall my body be broken for you, for the remission of sins. This cup represents the signing of the New Testament with my blood; and as often as ye eat this bread, and drink this cup, ye do shew forth the Lord's death till he come," 1 Cor. xi. 23, &c.

PURGATORY.] This, they say, is a certain place, in which, as in a prison, after death, those souls, by the prayers of the faithful, are purged, which in this life could not be fully cleansed; no, not by the blood of Christ: and notwithstanding it is asserted in the scriptures, that "if we confess our sins, he is faithful and just to forgive us, and to cleanse us from all unrighteousness," 1 John i. 9. This place of purgatory is in the power of the pope, who dispenses the indulgence, and directs the treasury of his merits, by which the pains are mitigated, and the deliverance hastened. For the tormented sufferers, in this ideal inquisition, his monks and friars say masses, all of whom must be paid for their trouble; because, No penny, no pater-noster; by which bubble the church of Rome amasses great wealth.

IDOLATROUS and CREATURE-WORSHIP.] In all the Romish worship, the blessed virgin is a principal object of adoration. She is styled Queen of Heaven, Lady of the world, the only Hope of sinners, Queen of angels, Patroness of men, Advocate for sinners, Mother of mercies: under which titles they desire her, by the power of a mother, to command her Son. In some prayers, they invoke God to bring them to heaven by the merits and mediation of the Virgin Mary and all her saints, and that they may enjoy perpetual soundness both of body and mind, by her glorious intercession. Hence it might be imagined by a papist, that the sacred writings were full of encomiums on this pretended mother of God; whereas, on the contrary, we do not find Christ in any part of scripture called the Son of Mary; nor that he at any time calls her mother; and when the woman cried, "blessed is the womb that bare thee, and the paps that thou hast sucked," "Yea (returns our Lord) rather blessed are they that hear the word of God, and keep it." Nor does our Saviour own any relation but that of a disciple: for when his mother and brethren stood without, desiring to speak with him, Jesus answered, "Who are my mother and my brethren?" And looking round upon his disciples, he saith, "Behold my mother and my brethren; for whosoever shall do the will of my Father who is in heaven, the same is my brother, sister, and mother." Of the like strain are also their prayers to other saints and angels, by which they derogate from the honour of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, and transfer his offices to others; though the Scriptures expressly assert, there is but one mediator between God and man, who is sufficiently able to deliver and save, to the uttermost, all who by faith come unto him. Nor must we omit under this head the idolatry of the mass, in the elevation of the host, to which the poor deluded people kneel down, and which they, whatever their artful priests pretend to the contrary, solemnly adore and worship, agreeable to an express article of their creed, and the command of one of their popes, who enjoins that the host is to be worshipped in Latera, whereby the second commandment is infringed, which the Romish church have endeavoured as much as possible to suppress, and in many of their little manuals they leave it quite out.

PAPAL SOVEREIGNTY.] This is politically supported by a pretended Infallibility; Auricular Confession, founded upon the priest's power to forgive sins; Indulgences; Pretended Relicks: Penance; Pardons; Strings of Beads for Ave-Marys and Paternosters; Celibacy; Merits and Works of Supererogations; Restrictions; Monkish Austerities; Religious Vows and Orders; Palms; Candles; decorated Images; Incense; Holy Water, or (as Mr. Fox in the preface to his third volume more properly calls it) Conjuring Water; Chriftening of Bells; hallowed Flowers and Branches; Agnus Dei; Oblations; Consecrations; with a variety of other devices, tricks, and impositions, to which may be added certain.

LUDICROUS FORMS and CEREMONIES.] At the feast of Christmas, in commemoration of the nativity of our blessed Lord, Roman Catholics have exhibited in their churches a cradle, with an image of an infant in it, which is rocked with great seeming devotion; and on Good-Friday they have the figure of our Saviour on the cross, and then they perform the service which they call the Tenebris; having abundance of lighted candles, all of which they extinguish one by one, hereby celebrating the darkness at the time of our Saviour's crucifixion: after which the body is taken down from the cross and put into a sepulchre, and men stand to watch it; with more of the same childish mummary that might be related, as if the Son of God came down from heaven to furnish men with a subject for dramatic representation.

STRANGE and CRUEL MAXIMS.] Papists, hold that heretics (for so they call the Protestants) may not be termed children, or kindred.

By the heresy of the father, the child is freed from all obligations of natural obedience.

When a christian king becomes an heretic, his subjects are forthwith freed from allegiance.

It is not lawful for christians to tolerate any king, who draweth his subjects into heresy.

They ought to endeavour to depose him, and set up another in his place.

They ought to expel him the kingdom as the enemy of Christ. This is the undoubted judgment of the most learned, and agreeable to the apostolic truth.

Faith is not to be kept with heretics, and papists may have a dispensation, for the breach of oaths, or any secret practices against them, for the good of the Romish church; and it is lawful to torture, burn their bodies, or otherwise kill them, for the good of their souls.

Now the above scheme of popery, if duly attended to, will convince every unprejudiced mind, that a mixture of paganism and judaism, absurdity and idolatry, run throughout the whole, and that it is a crafty design to establish a dominion over the consciences, persons, and properties, of it's deluded professors; yet all these false doctrines, and irreligious practices, the wretched slaves of papal tyranny are obliged to swallow down; and to doubt of one single iota is, according to the priest, damnable; for, says a Roman Catholic, at the close of his creed,

I acknowledge the Holy Catholic and Apostolic Roman church to be the mother and mistress of all churches; and I promise and swear true obedience to the pope of Rome who is Christ's vicar, and successor to St. Peter, the prince of the apostles.

I also, without doubt, receive and profess all other things delivered, defined, and declared by the sacred canons and councils, especially by the holy synod of Trent; and all things contrary to them, with all heresies, condemned, rejected, and cursed by the church, I likewise reject, condemn, and curse.

Lastly. This true Catholic Faith, without which no man can be saved, which at present I freely hold and profess, I will (by God's help) constantly retain and confess, intire and inviolable, to my latest breath, and take care, to the utmost of my power, that the same shall be taught, held, and professed by all under me, and whose care shall belong to me in my office; so help me God, and the holy Evangelists.

Having thus given an account of the notorious corruptions and abuses which the Romish church has introduced into her complex system of absurdities and idolatries, we proceed to give a full and faithful display of the intolerant, cruel, and dreadful bloody spirit of popery, as exemplified in the persecutions, sufferings, and martyrdoms, of the persevering, holy, constant, and now blessed martyrs. Our general design is, to open the eyes of the lukewarm, to confirm weak and unlearned christians in their most holy faith, and to guard all who profess the faith of Christ, from the stratagems of those, who seek to draw them from the simplicity and truth of the everlasting gospel; and we submit the whole to the judgment of the candid reader, imploring that divine blessing, which is necessary to crown our labours, and every spiritual attempt, with such success, as may redound to the glory of God, and the eternal welfare of all our fellow christians.

C H A P. I.

The ACCESSION of QUEEN MARY, and the various ALTERATIONS in RELIGION, TROUBLES in the STATE, and PERSECUTIONS in the CHURCH, that happened in ENGLAND, after her CORONATION, and in the FIRST YEAR of Her REIGN.

THE Roman Catholics assert, (and what will they not say to colour over their inhuman practices, and bloody deeds?) "That all those who suffered death, during the reign of Queen Mary, had been adjudged guilty of high treason, in consequence of their having stood up in defence of lady Jane Gray's title to the crown." To disprove this is no difficult matter, seeing every one, conversant in history, must know, that those who are tried on the statute of the 25th of Edward I. Chap. 26, are to be hanged and quartered: but with what assurance can even a Papist affirm, that ever a man in England was burned for high treason? We admit that some few suffered death in the ordinary way of process at common law, for their adherence to lady Jane; but none of those were burned. Why, if they were traitors, take them before the bishops, who have no power to judge in criminal cases? Nay, allowing the bishops to have had power to judge, yet their own bloody statute did not give them power to execute; otherwise, why were they obliged to certify to the chancellor, that the accused person was a heretic, before they could obtain a warrant for his execution? The proceedings against the martyrs are still extant, and they were carried on directly according to the forms prescribed by their own statute. We thought it necessary to premise thus much, that our British youth may not be led away by popish insinuations; for if they will but consider, they will be convinced, that the popish assertion is false. There was not one of those who were burned in England, ever accused of high treason, much less were they tried at common law. And this should teach young persons to value a history of transactions in their own country, particularly of their Blessed Martyrs, in order that they be able to detect the falsehoods advanced by Romish priests, and their numerous emissaries. Having said thus much, by way of caution, we shall, without farther preface, enter upon the narrative; which, as we have promised, shall be a NEW and COMPLETE HISTORY of the Acts and Monuments of our glorious Martyrs.

During the time that king Edward VI. was afflicted by a long illness, a marriage was provided, concluded, and solemnized in the month of May, between the lord Guildford, son to the duke of Northumberland, and the lady Jane, daughter of the duke of Suffolk; whose mother, being then alive, was daughter to Mary, king

Henry's second sister, who was first married to the French king, and afterwards to Charles, duke of Suffolk. The marriage being consummated, and the king growing every day worse, he was prevailed upon to set aside, by his last will and testament, his two sisters, Mary and Elizabeth, and to leave his crown to lady Jane the duke of Suffolk's daughter.

To this order subscribed all the king's council, and the chief of the nobility, the lord mayor and city of London, and almost all the judges and principal lawyers of the realm, except justice Hales of Kent, a true protestant, and upright judge, who, having given his consent to the lady Mary's being queen, would upon no account therefore subscribe to the lady Jane. How he was rewarded for his integrity by Mary, will be seen in the sequel. But the objections made by others in the realm against lady Mary's reigning were, because they feared she would marry with a foreigner, and by that means entangle the crown; and it was generally believed, that she would bring in the pope, and quite alter the religion used both in the days of her father king Henry, and in those of her brother Edward VI. which afterwards came to pass.

What gave rise to this conjecture, was the great stubbornness she shewed and declared in her brother's days, as evidently appears from those letters that passed between her, king Edward, and the council. Not long after this, through the violence of his illness, that most hopeful prince, Edward VI. departed this life; immediately after whose death, lady Jane Gray was, by the consent of the nobles, proclaimed queen, in London and other popular cities, and was there so acknowledged and called.

There was little difference in age between this young lady, and king Edward; but as to learning and knowledge of the languages, she was not only equal, but superior to him, having had the advantage of a man of most excellent learning for her tutor; and had her fortune been equal to her fine wit and education, no doubt she would have been comparable, not only to the most eminent among women, but even to men of the University who had taken several degrees there in the schools.

In the mean time, while those things were upon the anvil, and working in London, lady Mary, having received advice of her brother's death, wrote to the lords of the council in the stile and manner following.

The

The LADY MARY's LETTER to the LORDS of the COUNCIL, claiming the CROWN upon her BROTHER's DECEASE.

My Lords,

WE greet you well, and have received sure advertisement, that our dearest brother the king, our late sovereign lord, is departed to God's mercy, which news how woeful they be unto our heart, he only knoweth, to whose will and pleasure we must and do humbly submit us and our wills. But in this so lamentable a case, that is to wit, now after his majesty's departure and death, concerning the crown and governance of this realm of England, with the title of France, and all things thereto belonging, what hath been provided by act of parliament, and the testament and last will of our dearest father, besides other circumstances advancing our right, you know, the realm, and the whole world knoweth, the rolls and records appear by the authority of the king our said father, and the king our said brother, and the subjects of this realm; so that we verily trust, that there is no good true subject that is, can, or would pretend to be ignorant thereof: and of our part we have of ourselves caused, and, as God shall aid and strengthen us, shall cause our right and title in this behalf to be published and proclaimed accordingly. And albeit this so weighty a matter seemeth strange, that our said brother dying upon Thursday at night last past, we hitherto had no knowledge from you thereof, yet we consider your wisdoms and prudence to be such, that having estoons [quickly] among you debated, pondered, and well weighed this present case with our estate, with your own estate, the commonwealth and all our honours, we shall and may conceive great hope and trust, with much assurance in your loyalty and service, and therefore for the time interpret and take things not to the worst; and that ye will, like noblemen, work the best. Nevertheless, we are not ignorant of your consultations, to undo the provisions made for our preferment, nor of the great bands and provisions forcible, wherewith he be assembled and prepared, by whom, and to what end, God and you know, and nature cannot but fear some evil. But be it that some consideration politic, or whatsoever thing else hath moved you thereto, yet doubt you not, my lords, but we can take all these your doings in gracious part, being also right ready to remit and fully pardon the same, and that freely to eschew bloodshed and vengeance against all those that can or will intend the same, trusting also assuredly you will take and accept this grace and virtue in good part as appertaineth, and that we shall not be enforced to use the service of other our true subjects and friends, which, in this our just and right cause, God, in whom our whole affiance is, shall send us. Wherefore, my lords, we require you, and charge you, and every of you, that of your allegiance which you owe to God and us, and to none other, for our honour and the surety of our person only employ yourselves, and forthwith, upon receipt hereof, cause our right and title to the crown and government of this realm to be proclaimed in our city of London and other places, as to your wisdom shall seem good, and as to this case appertaineth, not failing hereof, as our very trust is in you. And this our letter, signed with our hand, shall be your sufficient warrant on this behalf.

"Given under our signet, at our manor of Kenning-hall, the 9th of July, 1553."

To this Letter of the Lady Mary the Lords of the Council returned the following Answer.

The LORDS ANSWER to the LADY MARY's LETTER.

MADAM, we have received your letters, the 9th of this instant, declaring your supposed titles which you judge yourself to have to the imperial crown of this realm, and all the dominions thereunto belonging. For answer whereof, this is to advertise you, that forasmuch as our sovereign lady queen Jane is, after the death of our sovereign lord king Edward VI. a prince of most noble memory, invested and possessed with the just and right title to the imperial crown of this realm, not only by good order of ancient laws of this realm, but also by our late sovereign lord's letters patent, signed with his own hand and sealed with the great seal of England, in presence of the most part of the nobles, councillors, judges, with divers other grave and sage personages, assenting and subscribing to the same: we must therefore, as of most bound duty and allegiance, assent unto her said grace, and to none other, except we should (which faithful subjects cannot) fall into grievous and unspeakable enormities. Wherefore we can no less do, but, for the quiet both of the realm and you also, to advertise you, that forasmuch as the divorce made between the king of famous memory, king Henry VIII. and the lady Katherine your mother, was necessary to be had both by the everlasting laws of God, and also by the ecclesiastical laws, and by the most part of the noble and learned universities of Christendom, and confirmed also by the sundry acts of parliament remaining yet in their force, and thereby you justly made illegitimate, and unhereditary to the crown imperial of this realm, and the rules, and dominions, and possessions of the same, you will upon just consideration hereof, and of divers other causes lawful to be alledged for the same, and for the just inheritance of the right line; and godly order taken by the late king our sovereign lord king Edward VI. and agreed upon by the nobles and great personages aforeaid, surcease by any pretence to vex and molest any of our sovereign lady queen Jane her subjects, from their true faith and allegiance due unto her grace: assuring you, that if you will for respect shew yourself quiet and obedient (as you ought), you shall find us all and several ready to do you any service that we with duty may, and glad with your quietness to preserve the common state of this realm, wherein you may be otherwise grievous unto us, to yourself, and to them. And thus we bid you most heartily well to fare.

From the Tower of London, in this 9th of July, 1553.

"Your ladyship's friends, shewing yourself an obedient subject,

Thomas Canterbury	R. Rich
The Marquis of Winchester	Huntington
John Bedford	Darcy
Wm. Northampton	Cheyney
Tho. Ely Chancellor	R. Cotton
Northumberland	John Gates
Henry Suffolk	W. Peter
Henry Arundel	W. Cecil
Shrewsbury	John Check

Cobham	Edward North
	R. Bowes."

All these persons, except the duke of Northumberland, and Sir John Gates, were afterwards by a special or general pardon discharged.

Lady Mary, after having received the above answer, and perceiving thereby the lords' minds, made haste privately out of London, relying chiefly upon the good will of the commons, and not destitute altogether of secret advertisements from some of the nobles. When the council heard of her sudden departure, and resolute conduct, and perceived that things went not according to their late expectations, they gathered speedily a body of troops together, and fixed upon the duke of Suffolk for their general; but afterwards changing their minds, they thought it best to let the duke of Suffolk keep the Tower where lord Guildford and lady Jane then lodged, and to send the Duke of Northumberland, with several other lords and gentlemen. In which expedition, notwithstanding the guards were very unwilling to march at first, yet, through the persuasion and importunity of the lord treasurer Cholmeley, and others, they were at length induced to assist the duke, and to set forward with him.

These things thus agreed upon, the duke marched from London after the best manner, having both his times and journey prescribed him by the council, that he might not do any thing but upon warrant. In the mean time, lady Mary, fatigued with travelling up and down, and considering where to fix most for her advantage, withdrew at length into the quarters of Norfolk and Suffolk, where, on account of his having subdued the rebels in her brother's reign, she understood the name of Northumberland was very much hated; and procuring to herself aid and assistance, on every side, as she could, she kept herself close for a time within Fremingham castle.

At this place first resorted to her the men of Suffolk, who being among the number of the most zealous reformers, promised her their support, but with this stipulation, that Mary should not attempt to alter that religion which, by laws and orders publicly enacted, was established in her brother king Edward's days, and which had been generally received by the consent of the whole realm. With this condition she readily complied, and knowing that faith is not to be kept with heretics, she scrupled not to promise them faithfully, upon the word of a queen, that no innovation should be made in religion; which promise had she as religiously kept, as they did willingly engage to protect and preserve her, at the expence of their lives, she had acted worthy of her high descent, and made her reign more stable thro' future tranquillity; for let a king or queen, or any private person, be ever so powerful, yet breach of promise is an ill supporter of peace and quietness, fear worse, cruelty worst of all.

However, lady Mary, thus powerfully guarded and faithfully assisted, for the present, vanquished the duke, and and all lady Jane's adherents. In consideration whereof, when the Suffolk protestants afterwards reminded their most gracious queen Mary of her promise, she made them the following severe and ungrateful reply: "Forasmuch (said she) as you, being but the members, desire to rule your head, you shall one day well perceive, that members must obey their head, and not look to bear rule over the same." And with a view of striking greater terror into others, a certain gentleman, near Windham side, named Dobbe, for advertising her by a humble petition of her promise, was punished with standing three times in the pillory. Many others were likewise imprisoned, for having delivered her books and supplications, collected out of the scriptures, thereby exhorting her to continue in the true reformed religion then established.

But to return to the duke of Northumberland, who having his warrant under the broad seal, proceeded on his march; but his short journeys, assigned him by commission, and the tedious delays in his rout, added an increasing strength to lady Mary's cause, especially as, at this time, the hearts of the people began to be much inclined to her; which, when the council at London perceived, and understood how the common people began to withdraw from them to her, as did also several of the nobility, they forthwith changed their measures, and proclaimed for queen lady Mary, eldest daughter to Henry VIII. appointed by parliament to succeed, king Edward dying without issue. As to the duke of Northumberland, he was left destitute and forsaken at Cambridge. Upon this he proclaimed Mary queen; yet this piece of policy did him no service; for he was arrested, as were likewise some of his sons, and the earl of Huntington, with a few others; who were all sent to the Tower, as traitors to the crown.

Thus was lady Mary seated on the throne of England, who, to a disagreeable person and weak mind, had united bigotry, superstition, and cruelty. She seems to have inherited more of her mother's, than her father's qualities. Henry was fiery, rough, and ungovernable: but Catherine, with a severe and implacable rancour against protestants, assumed the character of a saint. It was the same with her daughter Mary, as appears from a letter in her own hand writing, now in the British Museum. In this letter, which is addressed to bishop Gardiner, she declares her fixed intention of burning every protestant; and it contains an insinuation, that, as soon as circumstances would permit, she would restore back to the church the lands that had been taken from the convents. This was the strongest instance of her weakness that she could shew; for the convents had been demolished, except a few of their churches; and the rents were in the hands of the first nobility, who, rather than part with them, would have overturned the government, both in church and state. But reason and bigotry cannot accord. That narrowness of spirit, which always distinguishes a weak mind from one that has been enlarged by education, pervaded all the actions of this princess. Unacquainted with the constitution of the country, and a slave to superstition, Mary thought to domineer over the rights of private judgment, and to trample on the privileges of mankind.

No sooner had this queen, by the Suffolk protestants, the sword of authority put into her hand, than she began to employ it against those who had supported the title of lady Jane Grey. This devoted victim remained with her husband, lord Guildford, almost five months in the Tower, waiting her pleasure. But the duke of Northumberland, within a month after his confinement there, was condemned, brought to the scaffold, and beheaded, notwithstanding a promise made him of his life, if he would but renounce his religion, and hear mass; which he not only did, but also exhorted the people to return to the Catholic faith. The papists immediately published and spread abroad his recantation: but the duke, in consequence of his crimes arising from a fordid ambition, died unpitied; nay, he was insulted on the scaffold by those who remembered in what manner he had acted to their beloved Somerset. It may be proper to observe, this duke of Northumberland was not of the great Percy family, which at that time was under a cloud; but he was the grandson of that Dudley, who was executed in the year 1509, for having acted inconsistent with the common law.

The execution of this nobleman was followed with that of Sir Thomas Palmer, and Sir John Gates; the former of whom confessed his faith in the reformed religion, and lamented that he had not lived more conformably thereto. Queen Mary, having begun her reign with the blood of these men, and with hearing mass in the Tower, and having also released from thence Stephen Gardiner; were sufficient indications to the protestant part of the nation, that she would not perform what she had promised the Suffolk men; and besides these ill omens, there were other things, which every day more and more discomforted the people, and which plainly declared the queen to bear no good will to the reformation. Gardiner was not only released, but made lord chancellor, and bishop of Winchester, by turning out Dr. Poynt; Bonner was made bishop of London, by displacing good Dr. Ridley; Dr. Day was promoted to the bishopric of Durham, by putting out Scory; Dr. Tonsal to the bishopric of Chichester; Dr. Heath to that of Worcester; Hooper was committed to the fleet; and Dr. Vesie was made bishop of Exeter, by displacing Miles Coverlode: all which changes, and transactions, being particularly noted, occasioned great heaviness to all good men, and, on the other hand, great rejoicing to the wicked. In which discord of minds, and diversity of affections, there was now to be seen a miserable prospect of things throughout the whole nation; for they who could dissemble, cared not how matters went; but such as were conscientious and had any regard to the truth, perceived fires to be already kindled, and which would be the destruction of many a sincere christian; which indeed afterwards came to pass. Mary having thus laid the foundation of her bloody reign, removed to Hampton-court from the Tower, and caused a parliament to be summoned, against the 10th of October next ensuing, of which more hereafter.

Amongst the bishops who were removed, we noticed Dr. Ridley, bishop of London, a learned and pious prelate, who in the time of queen Jane, by order of the council, preached a sermon at Paul's Cross, declaring therein his opinion concerning the lady Mary, and dissuading them by alledging the inconveniences that might arise by admitting her to the crown, prophesying, as it were, before that, which afterwards came to pass, namely that she would bring in a foreign power to reign over them, and subvert the christian religion then happily established; shewing, moreover, that, the lady Mary, being in his diocese, he, according to his duty, as being then her ordinary, had done his endeavours to reform her to this religion, and notwithstanding in all other points of civility she shewed herself gentle and tractable, yet in matters that concerned true faith and doctrine, she appeared perverse and obstinate; that he could conceive no other hopes of her, but that she would disturb and overturn all that had been planted and confirmed with so much industry in the reign of her brother king Edward. Soon after this sermon was preached, the lady Mary was proclaimed queen, whereupon Dr. Ridley forthwith repaired to salute her at Fremingham Castle, where he met with cold entertainment, and being deprived of all his dignity, was sent back upon a lame halting horse to the Tower.

The Sunday following Mr. Rogers preached, discoursing very learnedly on the gospel for the day; whereupon queen Mary, perceiving things not to go forward according to her mind, forthwith devised and consulted with her council how to bring about by other means, what by open law she could not well accomplish: and accordingly directed forth a prohibition by proclamation, that no man should preach or read openly the word of God in churches, with several other things contained in the same proclamation, of which the following is a true copy.

A Prohibition of the Queen from Preaching, Printing, &c.
THE Queen's Highness, well remembering what great inconveniences and dangers have grown to this her highness's realm in times past, through the diversity of opinions in question of religion, and hearing also that now of late, since the beginning of her most gracious reign, the same contentions be again much revived through certain false and untrue reports and rumours spread by some light and evil disposed persons: hath thought good to declare, to all her highness's most loving subjects, her most gracious pleasure in manner following:

"First, her majesty, being presently by the only goodness of God settled in her just possession of the Imperial crown of this realm, and other dominions thereunto belonging, cannot now hide that religion which God and the world knoweth she hath ever professed from her infancy hitherto. Which as her majesty is minded to observe and maintain for herself, by God's grace during her time, so doth her highness much desire, and would be glad the same were of all her subjects quietly and charitably embraced.

"And yet she doth signify unto all her majesty's loving subjects, that of her most gracious disposition and clemency, her highness mindeth not to compel any her said subjects thereunto, until such time as further order by common assent may be taken therein: forbidding nevertheless all her subjects of all degrees, at their perils, to move seditions, or stir unquietness in her people, by interpreting the laws of this realm after their brains and fantasies, but quietly to continue for the time till (as before is said) further order may be taken, and therefore willet and straitly chargeth and commandeth all her said good loving subjects, to live together in quiet fort, and christian charity, leaving those new found devilish terms of Papist or Heretic, and such like, and applying their whole care, study, and travail, to live in the fear of God, exercising their conversations in such charitable and godly doing, as their lives may indeed express that great hunger and thirst of God's glory and holy word, which by rash talk and words many have pretended: and in so doing they shall best please God, and live without danger of the laws, and maintain the tranquillity of the realm. Whereof as her highness shall be the most glad, so if any man shall rashly presume to make any assemblies of people, or at any public assemblies, or otherwise, shall go about to stir the people to disorder or disquiet, she mindeth, according to her duty, to see the same most severely reformed and punished according to her highness's laws.

"And furthermore, forasmuch as it is also well known, that sedition and false rumours have been nourished and maintained in this realm, by the subtilty and malice of some evil disposed persons, which take upon them, without sufficient authority, to preach and to interpret the word of God after their own brain in churches, and other places both public and private, and also by playing of interludes, and printing of false found books, ballads, rhimes, and other lewd treatises in the English tongue, concerning doctrine, in matters now in question and controversy, touching the high points and mysteries of the christian religion; which books, ballads, rhimes, and treatise, are chiefly by the printers and stationers set out to sale to her grace's subjects, of an evil zeal, for lucre and covetousness of vile gain: her highness therefore straitly chargeth and commandeth all and every of her said subjects, of whatsoever state, condition, or degree they be, that none of them presume from thenceforth to preach, or by way of reading in churches, or other public or private places, except in schools of the University, to interpret or teach any scriptures, or any manner of points of doctrine concerning religion, neither also to print any books, matter, ballad, rhyme, interlude, process or treatise, nor to play any interlude, except they have her grace's special licence in writing for the same, upon pain to incur her highness's indignation and displeasure.

"And her highness also further chargeth and commandeth all and every her said subjects, that none of them of their own authority do presume to punish, and to rise against any offender in the causes above-said, or any other offender in words or deeds in the late rebellion committed or done by the duke of Northumberland, or his complices, or to seize any of their goods, or violently to use any such offender by striking, or imprisoning, or threatening the same, but wholly to refer the punishment of all such offenders unto her highness's public authority, whereof her majesty mindeth to see due punishment according to the order of her highness's laws.

"Nevertheless, as her highness mindeth not hereby to restrain and discourage any of her loving subjects, to give from time to time true information against any such offenders, in the causes above-said, unto her grace or council, for the punishment of every such offender, according to the effect of her highness's laws provided in that part: so her said highness exhorteth and straitly chargeth her said subjects to observe her commandment and pleasure in every part aforesaid, as they will avoid her highness's said indignation and most grievous displeasure. The severity and rigour whereof as her highness shall be most sorry to have cause to put in execution; so doth she utterly determine not to permit such unlawful and rebellious doings of her subjects, whereof may ensue the danger of her royal estate, to remain unpunished, but to see her said laws touching these points to be thoroughly executed: which extremities she trusteth, all her said subjects will foresee, dread, and avoid accordingly: her said highness straitly charging and commanding all mayors, sheriffs, justices of peace, bailiffs, constables, and all other public officers and ministers, diligently to see to the observing and executing of her said commandments and pleasure, and to apprehend all such as shall wilfully offend in this part, committing the same to the next jail, there to remain without bail or mainprize, till upon certificate made to her highness, or her privy council, of their names and doings; and upon examination had of their offences, some further order shall be taken for their punishment to the example of others, according to the effect and tenor of the laws aforesaid.

"Given at our manor of Richmond, the 18th day of August, in the first year of our most prosperous reign."

The Tumult at Paul's Cross, occasioned by Mr. Bourn's Sermon.

Near this period, or not long before, Mr. Bourn, a canon of St. Paul's, and who was afterwards made bishop of Bath, being appointed by Bonner, then bishop of London, to preach at Paul's Cross, he took occasion, from the gospel of the day, to speak largely in justification of Bonner, who was then present, by saying, that Bonner, four years ago, had preached from the same text, and in the same place, for which he was most cruelly and unjustly cast into that most vile dungeon the Marshalsea, where he was confined during king Edward's reign. His words had such an ill effect upon his hearers, as to cause them to murmur and stir in such a sort, that the mayor and aldermen then present feared much an uproar; indeed so great was the popular resentment, that one hurled a dagger at Mr. Bourn, but who the person was could not be then ascertained, though he was afterwards discovered. In short, the tumult became so violent, that the preacher was silenced, broke off his discourse, and durst no more appear in that place; for the matter of his discourse tended much to the dispraise of kind Edward, which the people could in no wise endure. Then Mr. Bradford, being in the pulpit, stood forth, at the request of Mr. Bourn's brother, and spoke so mildly and effectually to the people, that with a few words he pacified them. This done, he and Mr. Rogers conducted Mr. Bourn betwixt them to the Grammar-school door, where they left him safe; for which prudent and humane conduct, they were both, shortly after, rewarded with long imprisonment, and at last with fire in Smithfield.

By reason of this tumult at Paul's Cross, there was an order forthwith dispatched from the lords of the council to the mayor and aldermen of London, that they should call a common-council the next day, and thereby charge every householder to cause their children, apprentices, and other servants, to keep their own parish churches upon holy-days, and not to suffer their attempting in the least to violate or disturb the common peace; willing them likewise to signify to the said assembly the queen's determination uttered unto them August 12th, by her highness in the Tower, which was this, that notwithstanding her majesty's conscience was satisfied as to matters of religion, yet she graciously meant not to compel or force the consciences of others, only hoping God, through opening his word to them by godly, virtuous, and learned preachers, would so guide and direct them, as to bring them to be of the like religion with herself. At the same time it was ordered, that every alderman should straightway send for the curates of every parish within their liberties, and warn them not only to forbear preaching themselves, but likewise not to suffer any others to preach, or to make an open or solemn reading of the scriptures in their churches, unless such preachers, and public readers, were severally licensed by the queen: and in order to prevent any future riot, the day after Mr. Bourn had been driven from his pulpit, the queen's guard came to the Cross to attend the preacher; but the people having withdrawn themselves from the sermon, it was ordered by the mayor, that the ancients of all companies should be present, lest the preacher should be discouraged by his small auditory.

August, 1553. On the 5th of this month, one William Rutler was committed to the Marshalsea by the privy council, for speaking against Mr. Bourn, on account of his sermon at Paul's Cross, the Sunday before.

On the 16th, Humphry Paulden was sent to the compter, for the like offence.

A letter was sent to the sheriffs of Buckingham and Bedford, for apprehending one Fisher, minister of Amerham; and another to the bishop of Norwich, not to suffer any preacher, or other, to preach or expound the scripture publicly, without special licence from the queen. And the same day Mr. Bradford, Vernon, and Beacon, preachers, were committed to the charge of the lieutenant of the Tower. Mr. Rogers also, the same day, was ordered to keep himself prisoner in his own house, not being allowed the liberty of conversing with any other but those of his own household.

On the 22d, two letters were sent to Coverdale, bishop of Exeter, and Hooper, bishop of Gloucester, commanding them to repair forthwith to court, and there to attend the council's pleasure. At which time the Rev. Mr. Fisher of Amerham appeared before the council, and was ordered to bring a copy of his sermon the next day.

On the 24th, the Rev. John Melvin, a Scotchman, was sent to Newgate by the council.

On the 28th, a letter was directed to the mayor of Coventry and the corporation, for apprehending Hugh Symonds, vicar of St. Michael's, in Coventry, and for sending him up to the council, with his examinations, and other matters they could charge him with. A commission was likewise inclosed to punish all such, who, by means of his preaching, had at any time talked against the queen's proceedings.

On the 29th, John Hooper, bishop of Gloucester, and on the 31st, Coverdale, bishop of Exeter, appeared before the council, in obedience to the letters of the 22d instant.

September, 1553. On the 1st of this month, the two bishops, Hooper and Coverdale, appeared again before the council, when the former was committed to the Fleet, and the latter ordered to attend the lords' pleasure.

On the 2d, the Rev. Mr. Hugh Symonds attended at the council board, on account of a sermon he had preached, and was ordered to appear again the Monday following.

On the 4th, a citation from the council was directed to Hugh Latimer, archbishop of Canterbury, commanding his appearance before them. And about the 5th, Peter Martyr came to London from Oxford, (where, for a time, he had been commanded to keep his house) and found there the archbishop of Canterbury, who offered to defend the Book of Common Prayer, both by the scriptures and the fathers, assisted by Peter Martyr and others. But while they were in hopes of this event, the archbishop and others were imprisoned, and Peter Martyr permitted to return whence he came. The same day a letter was sent to the mayor of Coventry, with orders to set Hugh Symonds at liberty, if he would recant his sermon, otherwise to detain him, and give notice thereof to the council.

On the 13th, archbishop Latimer appearing before the council, agreeable to their order of the 4th instant, he was by them sent to the Tower, attended by his servant Austin; and commanded to attend them the next day. Accordingly,

On the 14th, the archbishop of Canterbury was brought before the lords, in the Star chamber; where being charged with treason, and with distributing seditious bills to the disturbance of the state, he was immediately committed close prisoner to the Tower of London, there to remain, at the queen's pleasure, till further justice and order.

On the 15th, a letter was sent to the Rev. Mr. Horn, dean of Durham, requiring him to come before the council; and October 7th, another letter was sent to hasten his appearance.

On the 16th instant, orders were sent down to the mayors of Dover and Rye, to suffer all French Protestants to pass out of this realm, except such whose names were to be signified to them by the French ambassador.

October, 1553. The coronation of Mary I. in the usual form, at Westminster, took place on the 1st day of this month, and dreadful were the consequences that followed; for on the 10th, the parliament began with a solemn mass of the Holy Ghost, celebrated with great pomp, after the popish manner, in the palace of Westminster; at which, according to custom, those bishops, not yet deposed, were to be present, namely, the archbishop of York, Dr. Taylor, bishop of Lincoln, and John Harley, bishop of Hereford; but when the bishops, Taylor and Harley, had taken their places among the lords, upon seeing mass begin they withdrew, not enduring the sight of such idolatrous foppery: for which cause the bishop of Lincoln being examined, and protesting his faith, was commanded to attend; who soon after fell sick, and died at Ankerwike; and bishop Harley, for being married, was expelled from parliament, and deprived of his bishopric. Mass being ended, the queen came to the parliament house, where she opened the session in the usual manner. A consultation was then held with the states of the realm, after which, all statutes were repealed, that were made for reformation, in the reign of Henry VIII. and those in the time of Edward VI. for reading the Common Prayer, and administering the sacrament in the English tongue; and in this session, the attainder of the duke of Northumberland was also confirmed.

In the mean time, several persons were very forward in erecting altars for masses, in churches; but such as favoured the reformation, or adhered to the laws made in King Edward's reign, were either marked, or apprehended; among whom was Sir James Hales of Kent, justice of the common-pleas; who, because he had given a charge, at a quarter sessions, upon the statutes of Henry VIII. and Edward VI. for the supremacy and reformation, was therefore imprisoned in the Fleet, where he was so cruelly handled, and terrified by the conversation of the warden in his hearing, of the torments preparing for heretics, that he intended to dispatch himself with a knife; but afterwards, submitting himself to the pleasure of the queen's council, he was willing to say what they desired him; after which compliance, his conscience so troubled him, that he sought for rest from a violent death, and drowned himself in a river, about half a mile from his own house.

While the parliament was employed in paving the way for the introduction of popish superstition, the clergy also had, after their usual manner, a convocation at St. Paul's church, London, where the queen appointed a disputation to be held, on the eighteenth of October. In this convocation, Mr. John Harpsfield, bachelor of divinity, preached a sermon to the clergy; after which, for the sake of order, they proceeded to the choice of a prolocutor or speaker. To this office Dr. Weston, dean of Westminster, was appointed by unanimous consent, and presented to the bishops, Mr. Pie, dean of Chichester, and Mr. Wimbisley, archdeacon of London, delivering at the same time an oration. Dr. Weston then made his gratulatory speech to the house, and was answered with another by bishop Bonner. They next entered upon the disputation, concerning the matter of the sacrament instituted by Christ, at his last supper with his disciples, which disputation continued six days successively, wherein Dr. Weston was chief on the side of popery, who behaved himself outrageously in taunting and checking; in so much, that they who disputed on the other side, in defence of the doctrines of the reformation, were compelled, some to fly, some to deny, some to die; but in the judgment of most men who heard the debate, they had the better in point of argument, as may appear by the report of the said disputation, a true copy, and faithful account whereof, will be the subject of our next chapter.

C H A P. II.

Containing a full and complete Account of a PUBLIC THEOLOGICAL DISPUTATION, about the REAL PRESENCE and TRANSUBSTANTIATION, in (what Papists call) the SACRAMENT of the ALTAR, maintained in the CONVOCATION-HOUSE, at ST. PAUL'S, LONDON, and appointed by the Queen's Special Command, October 18, 1553.

The Report.

WHEREAS divers and uncertain rumours be spread abroad of the disputation had in the convocation house; to the intent that all men may know the certainty of all things therein done and said, as much as the memory of him that was present thereat can bear away, he hath thought good, at request, thoroughly to describe what was said therein of both parties of the matters argued and had in question, and of the entrance thereof.

The First Day.

The subject for debate stated by the Prolocutor, in his address to the Convocation.

On Wednesday, October 18, in the afternoon, the prolocutor, Dr. Weston, certified the house, it was the queen's pleasure, that the learned men there assembled should debate matters of religion, and for that end constitute laws, which her grace and the parliament would ratify. And because (said he) there was a book lately published, called the Catechism (which he produced) bearing the name of this honourable synod, and yet put forth without your consents, as I have learned, being a book very pestiferous, and full of heresies; and likewise an abominable book of Common Prayer; I thought it best, therefore, first to begin with the articles of the Catechism, concerning the sacrament of the altar, for confirming the natural presence of Christ in the same, and also transubstantiation: wherefore, it shall be lawful, on Friday next ensuing, for all men freely to speak their consciences in these matters, that all doubts may be removed, and they fully justified therein.

The Second Day's Act.

On the 20th of October, being Friday, when it was expected they should have entered into disputation of the questions proposed, the prolocutor exhibiting two bills to the house, the one for the natural presence of Christ in the sacrament of the altar, and the other concerning the catechism, that it was not published by the consent of that house, and that they did not agree thereunto, requiring all them to subscribe to the same as he himself had done. Whereunto the whole house accordingly assented, except six, viz. the dean of Rochester, the dean of Exeter, the archdeacon of Winchester, archdeacon of Hereford, archdeacon of Stow, and one more. And whilst the rest were about subscribing to these two articles, John Philpot stood up and spoke first concerning the articles of the catechism, that he thought they were deceived in the title of the catechism, for that it bore the title of the synod before this, although as to publishing thereof several of them then present were not made privy thereunto; and that because this house had granted authority to certain persons appointed by the king's majesty to make ecclesiastical laws; and whatsoever ecclesiastical laws were thereupon published by the authority of them, or the major part of them, according to a statute in that behalf made and provided, it might well be said to be done by the consent of the synod of London, notwithstanding such as were members of this house now had no notice thereof before its promulgation. And therefore in this point he thought the publisher thereof had not in the least slandered the house, as they by their subscriptions were endeavouring to persuade the world, since they had one synodal authority for empowering them to make such spiritual laws, as they thought convenient and necessary.

And moreover he said, that as to the article of the natural presence in the sacrament, it was both contrary to reason and learning, and likewise very prejudicial to truth, for men to be moved to subscribe before the matter was thoroughly examined and discussed. But when he saw his allegations were to no purpose, being like a man astonished at so many ancient learned men being purposely assembled to maintain old traditions, preferable to the truth of God's holy word, he made it his request to the prolocutor, that whereas on that side there were present so many learned men, as the like were not to be found again in the whole realm, and that on the other side, of those that had not subscribed there were not above five or six, and they far inferior to them both in age and learning: in order, therefore, that there might be an equality of persons concerned in this disputation, he desired that the prolocutor would intercede with the lords, that some of those men that were learned, and occasioned the publishing of the catechism aforesaid, might be admitted into the house to shew their learning that moved them to set forth the same, and that Dr. Ridley and Mr. Rogers, with two or three more, might have the liberty of being present at this disputation, and associating with them.

This request was thought reasonable, and was therefore proposed to the bishops, who returned this answer; That it was out of their power to call such persons to the house, since some of them were prisoners; but they said, they would petition the council in this behalf, and in case any of them were absent that ought to be of the house, they were for their being admitted as they desired. After this, they minding to have entered into disputation, there came a gentleman with a message from the lord great master, signifying unto the prolocutor, that the lord great master and the earl of Devonshire would be present at the disputations, and therefore he deferred the time till Monday, at one o'clock in the afternoon.

The Third Day's Debate.

At the time appointed, being Monday, October 23d, in the presence of many earls, lords, knights, and several gentlemen, both of the court and city, the prolocutor made a protestation, that the members of that house had appointed this public disputation, not to call the truth in question, to which they had already subscribed, except five or six, but that gainsayers, and heretics, might be resolved respecting their doubts, by their arguments, which they supposed would be sufficiently convincing to bring them over to their opinion.

The prolocutor then demanded of Mr. Haddon, whether he would reason against the questions that had been proposed; and Mr. Haddon replied, he would not, because they could not have such learned co-adjutors as they desired. To which Mr. Elmar added, that they had done too much prejudice already to the truth, by their subscribing before the subjects to be debated were discussed, nor would it avail much to reason in defence of the true religion, against which they were now fully determined. Mr. Weston then, turning to Mr. Cheyney, desired to know, whether he (who believed with them the real presence) would propose his doubts concerning transubstantiation. Mr. Cheyney answered, "I should be glad my doubts were resolved, that move me to disbelieve transubstantiation."

"The first of these arose from what St. Paul writes to the Corinthians, who, speaking of the body and blood of Christ, calls it bread after consecration."

"The second from a passage out of Origen, who, speaking of this sacrament, saith, that the material part thereof goeth down to the excrements."

"The third is out of Theodoret, who, speaking of the sacramental elements, after consecration, affirmeth, that they go not out of their former substance, form, and shape. These, among several others, are the doubts I require to be resolved."

Then the prolocutor having appointed Dr. Moreman to answer, he began with observing, that the sacrament is called by St. Paul bread indeed, by which he meant the form of bread; but Mr. Cheyney alledged, that Hesychius called the sacrament both bread and flesh.

Yes, replied Moreman, Hesychius calleth it bread, because it was bread, not because it is so. Then, passing over Origen, he said, that men mistook the authority of Theodoret, by interpreting a general into a special, as Peter Martyr had done, taking the Greek word, that signifies substance in its special signification, whereas, in the general, it may be applied to accidents, as well as substance; and therefore (said he) I answer Theodoret thus, that sacramental bread and wine do not go out of their former substance, form, and shape, (that is) not out of their accidental substance and shape.

After this, Mr. Cheyney sat down, and Mr. Elmar, who could not endure to hear so weak and childish an answer to so grave an authority, arose, declaring, that Moreman's answer to Theodoret was only an illusion, or mere subtle evasion, contrary to Theodoret's meaning; for if the Greek word, that signifies substance, should, in the passage quoted, be taken for accident, then it was a superfluous word, especially, where there are two other Greek words, which sufficiently expound the accidents of the bread: and he proved out of the same author, by divers allegations, that the Greek word that signified substance in Theodoret, could not be so generally taken in that place; but Moreman still affirmed, that the Greek word that signified substance, must needs signify accidental substance properly. To whose obstinacy, since he could obtain no better proof, Elmar gave place.

Upon which, Mr. John Philpot stood up, and said, he could make it appear, from the whole subject matter, in the place alledged, and from the similitude Theodoret uses, for proving his purpose, that Moreman's explanation of the Greek word for substance, could by no means be taken in the sense he would interpret it: for, he observed, Theodoret was in that place arguing against the heretic Eutiches, who denied two natures of substance to remain in Christ as one person, and that his humanity, after the accomplishment of the mystery of our salvation, ascending into heaven, and being joined to the divinity, was absorbed thereby; so that, according to his opinion, Christ was no more but of one divine substance only; against which opinion Theodoret writeth, and by the similitude of the sacrament proveth the contrary against that heretic; for like as in the sacrament of the body of Christ, after the consecration, there is the substance of Christ's humanity, with the substance of the bread remaining as before, not being absorbed by the humanity of Christ, but by divine operation joined thereunto, even so, in the person of Christ, being now in heaven, of whom this sacrament is a representation, there being two several substances, his humanity and divinity, united in one hypostasy or person, which is Christ; the humanity not being absorbed by the conjunction of the divinity, but remaining in its former substance: and Theodoret's similitude, continued Mr. Philpot, would prove nothing, if the substance of the sacramental bread remained not as it did before. The heretic therefore, according to Dr. Moreman's interpretation, would have a strong argument to support his error, and to prove himself an orthodox christian, might say to Theodoret thus; Like as thou Theodoret, if thou wert of Dr. Moreman's mind, dost say that, after the consecration in the sacrament, the substance of the bread is changed into the human body of Christ, coming thereunto, so that in the sacrament there is but one substance of the humanity alone, and not the substance of bread as it was before; even so, likewise, may I affirm and conclude from thine own similitude, that the humanity ascending up by the power of God into heaven, and adjoined to deity, was absorbed, and turned into one substance with the deity; so that there remaineth but one divine substance in Christ, no more than in the sacramental signs of the Lord's supper, after the consecration, doth remain any more than one substance, according to your belief and construction. In attempting to answer this, Dr. More-man was so closely pressed, that he began to stagger; which Philpot perceiving spake in this manner, "Well master Moreman, if you have no answer ready at present, consider of one, if you can conveniently, against our next meeting."

At these words the prolocutor was exceedingly offended and troubled, telling him, that he should not brag there, but be fully answered. To which Philpot returned, "It is the only thing I desire, to be answered directly on this point of dispute; and I request of you, and of all the house here present, that I may be sufficiently answered, which I am sure you cannot do, taking Theodoret's authority, and similitude, as they ought to be taken." Whereupon, without any further reply, or answer to his reasoning, Philpot was commanded to be silent.

After he had sat down, the dean of Rochester arose, offering to dispute against the natural presence, wishing that the scriptures, and the ancient doctors, might be weighed, believed, and followed, in this point. And he thought a sufficient argument against it, was that saying of Christ, in St. Matthew, where he says, that the poor we should have always with us, but him we should not have always, which the dean said, was spoken concerning the natural presence of Christ's body, and therefore Christ cannot be naturally present on earth in the sacrament of the altar. To this the prolocutor answered, that we should not have Christ present always to exercise alms deeds, but upon the poor.

The dean then prosecuted his argument, and quoted St. Austin to prove, that the same interpretation of the scripture alledged by Mr. Weston was no sufficient answer; for St. Austin, in the 50th treatise on St. John, speaketh thus on the same sentence; "When Christ said, Me ye shall not have always with you, he spake of the presence of his body. For by his majesty, by his providence, by his unspeakable and invisible grace, that is fulfilled which is said of him, Behold I am with you until the consummation of the world. But in the flesh which the word took upon him, in that which was born of the virgin, in that which was apprehended by the Jews, which was crucified on the cross, which was let down from the cross, which was wrapped in cloths, which was hid in the sepulchre, which was manifested in the resurrection, you shall not have me always with you. And why? For after a bodily presence he was conversant with his disciples forty days, and they accompanying him, seeing and not following him, he ascended and is not here; for there he sitteth at the right hand of the Father; and yet here he is, because he is not departed in the presence of his majesty. After another manner we have Christ always by the presence of his majesty; but after the presence of his flesh it is rightly said, you shall not verily have me always with you. For the church had him in the presence of his flesh a few days, and now by faith it apprehendeth him, and seeth him not with eyes."

To this authority Dr. Watson answered, and said, he would answer St. Augustine by St. Augustine, and having a certain book in his hand of notes, he alledged out of the 70th treatise of St. John, that after that mortal condition and manner we have not now Christ on earth, as he was heretofore before his passion.

Mr. Philpot replied, saying, that Mr. Watson had not fully answered St. Augustine by St. Augustine, for that in the place mentioned by the dean of Rochester, he doth not only treat of the mortal state of Christ's body before his passion, but also the immortal condition of the same after his resurrection: in which mortal body St. Augustine seemeth plainly to affirm, that Christ is not present upon the earth, neither in form visibly, neither in corporal substance invisibly, as in a few lines after the place above alledged, St. Augustine doth more plainly declare by these words, "Now these two manners of Christ's presence declared, which is by his majesty, providence, and grace, now present in the world, which before his ascension was present in the flesh; and which being now placed at the right hand of the Father, is absent from the world, I think there remains no further dispute about the matter."

Therefore,

Therefore if St. Augustin allowed no other presence of Christ here on earth, but only his divine presence, and that his humanity was in heaven, we ought to confess and believe the same. But if we put a third presence of Christ, that is, corporally to be present always in the sacrament of the altar, invisibly, according to your suppositions, whereof St. Augustin maketh no mention in all his works, you seem to judge that which St. Augustin did never comprehend.

Why, said Watson, does not St. Augustin, in the place I alledged, make mention how St. Stephen, being in this world, saw Christ after his ascension?

It is true, said Philpot, but he saw Christ, as the scripture saith, in the heavens, being open, standing at the right hand of God the Father: at which Watson was silent.

The dean proceeded to support his argument, and, to this end, read out of a book of annotations sundry authorities, to which Moreman, who was appointed to answer him, made no direct answer, but desired him to frame an argument, saying, the dean had recited many doctors' words, but had not made one argument. Thus challenged, the dean made the following argument from the institution of the sacrament; "Do this in remembrance of me; and thus ye shall shew forth the Lord's death till he come."

The sacrament is the remembrance of Christ: therefore, the sacrament is not very Christ; for as yet he is not come, for these words, "until he come," do plainly signify the absence of Christ's body. Then the prolocutor went about to shew, that these words, "until he come," did not import any absence of Christ on the earth, by other places of scripture, where the word, "until," was made use of: but directly to the purpose he answered nothing. In fine, the dean questioned Moreman, whether Christ did eat the paschal lamb with his disciples, or not? He answered, Yes. He further demanded, whether upon instituting the sacrament, he did likewise eat the sacrament with them? Moreman answered, Yes. Then he asked what he did eat, and whether he did eat his own natural body, as they imagined it to be, or not? Which when Moreman had affirmed, then, said the dean, it is a great absurdity by you granted; and so he sat down.

Afterwards the prolocutor demanded of Mr. Philpot, whether he would argue against the natural presence, or not? He answered, Yes, if he would hear his argument without interruption, and assign one to answer him, and not many, which occasioned confusion, and especially to him who had but a bad memory. By this time the night approached: on which account the prolocutor put an end to the disputation, and appointed Mr. Philpot to begin the same the next day, concerning the presence of Christ in the sacrament.

The FOURTH DAY'S DEBATE.

On Wednesday, October 25th, Mr. John Philpot was prepared to enter upon the disputation, intending first, to have made an oration in Latin; which being known by the prolocutor, he commanded him to make no declaration or oration in Latin, but to deliver his arguments in English. This is contrary, said Philpot, to your order at the beginning of this disputation; for then you appointed that all the arguments should be made in Latin, and thereupon I have drawn and devised all mine arguments in Latin; and because you Mr. Prolocutor, have said heretofore, openly in this house, that I had no learning, I intended to shew such learning as I have, in a brief oration, and short declaration of the questions now in controversy, thinking it so most convenient also, that in case I should speak otherwise in my declaration than should stand with learning, or than I were able to warrant and justify by God's word, it might the better be reformed by such as were learned of the house, so that the unlearned being present, might take the less offence thereat. But this prevailed nothing with the prolocutor, who still insisted upon his forming an argument in English, or else to hold his peace.

Then, said Philpot, you have much disappointed me, thus suddenly, to go from your former order: but I will accomplish your commandments, leaving mine oration apart, and I will come to my arguments, which, as well as so sudden a warning will serve, I will make in English. But before I bring forth any argument, I will in one word declare what manner of presence I disallow in the sacrament, to the intent the hearers may the better understand to what end and effect mine arguments shall tend; not to deny utterly the presence of Christ in his sacrament, truly ministered according to his institution, but only to deny that gross and carnal presence, which you of this house have already subscribed unto, to be in the sacrament of the altar, contrary to the true and manifest meaning of the scriptures: that by transubstantiation of the sacramental bread and wine, Christ's natural body should, by virtue of the words pronounced by the priest, be contained and included under the forms or accidents of bread and wine. This kind of presence imagined by men, I do deny, and against this I will reason. But before he could make an end of what he was about, he was interrupted by the prolocutor, and commanded to descend to his argument: at whose unjust importunity Philpot being offended, and hoping to find remedy, fell down upon his knees before the earls and lords which were there present, being a great number, whereof some were of the queen's council, beseeching them that he might have liberty to prosecute his arguments without interruption, which was readily granted by the lords. But the prolocutor making use of a point of the practice of prelates, would not condescend to it, but still cried, "Hold your peace, or else make a short argument." "I intend it," said Philpot, "if you will let me alone: but first I must ask a question of my respondent, Dr. Chedsey, concerning a word or two of your supposition, that is, of the sacrament of the altar, what he meaneth thereby." Dr. Chedsey answered, that, in their supposition, they took the sacrament of the altar, and the sacrament of the mass, to be all one. Then, said Mr. Philpot, by Mr. Prolocutor's leave, I will speak plain English, and to be short, I say, that the sacrament of the altar, which ye reckon to be all one with the mass, once justly abolished, but now put in full force again, is no sacrament, neither is Christ in any manner present in it, and this he offered to prove before the queen, the council, or before six of the most learned men of that house, of a contrary opinion, and refused none: If, (said he) I shall not be able, by God's words, to maintain what I have asserted, and confound those six who shall withstand me in this point, let me be burdened with as many faggots as can be found in London, before the court-gate. This he spake with the utmost zeal and courage.

At this the prolocutor, with many others, were very much offended, demanding of him, whether he knew what he said. Yes, replied Mr. Philpot, I know very well what I say, and I desire that no man may be offended at it, for I speak no more than by the word of God I am able to prove; and praised be God, that the queen's grace hath granted us of this house (as our prolocutor hath informed us) the free liberty of declaring our opinions, agreeable to our consciences in these matters of controversy in religion; and therefore I will here freely speak the dictates of my conscience, grounded upon God's holy word for the truth, although some of you here present do not like it.

Then Mr. Weston, with others, taunted and reproved him, for speaking so indecently against the sacrament of the mass. The prolocutor also told him he was mad, and threatened to send him to prison.

Mr. Philpot hearing himself abused, and not permitted the free liberty to speak his mind, thus exclaimed, casting his eyes towards heaven, O Lord! what a world is this, that the truth of thy holy word cannot be spoken and endured! And while he said these words, being full of sorrow, the tears were seen to trickle from his eyes.

The prolocutor, being moved by some that were about him, consented that he should make an argument, provided that he would brief. I will be as short, (said Philpot) as I can conveniently, in uttering all I have to say. And, first, I will lay the foundation of my arguments upon the authority of scripture, whereon all the buildings of our faith ought to be grounded; after which, I intend to confirm the same by the ancient fathers of the church. My first argument is drawn from the 28th chapter of St. Matthew, in which the angel says to Mary, who sought for Christ at the sepulchre, "He is risen, he is not here;" and again, St. Luke, chapter 23d, the angel asketh them, "Why seek ye the living among the dead?" In which places the scripture testifieth, that Christ was risen, ascended into heaven, and now sitteth at the right hand of the Father: all which is spoken of his natural body; therefore it cannot be on earth included in the sacrament. I will confirm this yet more effectually, from the 16th of St. John, where Christ saith, "I came from my Father into the world, and now I leave the world and go to my Father." Which coming and going he meant of his natural body; therefore we may consequently affirm, that it is not found in the world, nor can be in the sacrament.

But I expect here to be answered with a blind distinction; that he is visibly departed in his humanity, but remaineth invisibly in the sacrament; but that no such idle distinction can take away the force of my argument, will appear from the answer which Christ's disciples returned, saying, "Now thou speakest plainly, and utterest no proverb;" which words St. Cyril interpreting saith, that our Saviour spake without any ambiguity, or figure of speech, and therefore I do from thence conclude, that if Christ spake plainly, and without parable, then that obscure, dark, and imperceptible presence of Christ's natural body remaining in the sacrament invisibly upon earth, contrary to the plain words of Christ, ought not to be allowed: for nothing can be more uncertain, parabolical, and absurd, than so to say. I will now give attention to your answer, and then descend to confirm what I have said by ancient writers.

Then Dr. Chedsey, reciting his argument as it was made, took upon him to answer every part thereof severally. First, to the saying of the angel, That Christ is not here: and, Why seek ye the living among the dead? He answered, that these sayings pertained nothing to the presence of Christ's natural body in the sacrament, but that they were spoke of Christ's body being in the sepulchre, when the three Marys thought him to have been in the grave still. And therefore the angel said, Why do ye seek him that liveth, among the dead? And to the authority of St. John, where Christ saith, Now I leave the world and go to my Father; he meant that of his ascension. And so likewise did Cyril, interpreting the saying of the disciples, that knew plainly that Christ would visibly ascend into heaven; but that doth not exclude the invisible presence of his natural body in the sacrament. For St. Chrysostom, writing to the people of Antioch, doth affirm the same, comparing Elias and Christ together, and Elias's cloak, and Christ's flesh. "When Elias (saith he) was taken up in the fiery chariot, he left his cloak behind him unto his disciple Elisæus. But Christ ascending into heaven, took his flesh with him, and left also his flesh behind him." From whence we may justly conclude, that Christ's flesh is visibly ascended into heaven, and abideth still invisibly in the sacrament of the altar.

To this Philpot replied, and said, You have not directly answered to the saying of the angel. Christ is risen, and is not here, because you have omitted that which was the chief point of all. For, said he, I proceed further, as thus, He is risen, ascended, and sitteth at the right hand of God the Father, therefore, he is not remaining on earth. Neither is your answer to Cyril, by me alledged, sufficient. But I will presently return to your interpretation of Cyril and plainly declare it after I have refuted the authority of Chrysostom, which is one of the chief principles that you alledged to make for your gross carnal presence in the sacrament; which being well weighed and understood, pertaineth nothing thereunto.

At this the prolocutor startled, that one of the chief pillars in this point should be overthrown; and therefore he recited the said authority, first in Latin, and afterwards he turned it into English, and desired all that were present to remark that saying of Chrysostom, which he thought invincible on their own side. But I will make it appear (saith Philpot) by and by, that it doth make little for your purpose. And as he was declaring his mind in this particular, the prolocutor interrupted him, as he frequently did. With which Philpot being displeased, said, Mr. Prolocutor, thinketh that he is in a sophistry-school, where he well knoweth the manner is, that when the respondent perceiveth, that he is like to be enforced with an argument which he is not able to answer, he doth what he can, by cavilling, and interruption, to drive him from the same. This saying of Philpot was ill taken by the prolocutor and his adherents; and the prolocutor said, that Philpot could bring nothing to avoid that authority, but his own vain imagination. Hear, said Philpot, and afterwards judge; for I will do in this, as in all other authorities, wherewith you shall take upon you to refute any of my arguments that I have to prosecute, answering the same either by sufficient authorities of scripture, or else by some other testimony of like authority with your's, and not of my own imagination; which if I do, I desire it to be of no credit.

As to your authority from St. Chrysostom, I have two objections against that to propose; one drawn from scripture, the other from the very place of Chrysostom himself here by you alledged.

First, where he seemeth to say, that Christ ascending took his flesh with him, and left his flesh also behind him; it is true; for the flesh Christ took with him was that which he received from the virgin Mary, and the flesh he left behind was not his natural body, but the members of his visible church; as St. Paul doth aptly testify, when he says, Eph. v. "We are flesh of his flesh, and bone of his bones." And if any one will reply, that he there treateth of the sacrament, and that this interpretation cannot so properly be applied to him in that place, then I will explain St. Chrysostom another way by himself; for a few lines before those now quoted, are these words; "That Christ, after he ascended into heaven, left to us, indued with his sacraments, his flesh in mysteries, that is, sacramentally; and that mystical flesh Christ leaveth as well to his church in the sacrament of baptism, as in the sacramental bread and wine." "As many (saith St. Paul) as are baptized in Christ, have put on Christ." Hence you may perceive, that St. Chrysostom makes nothing for your gross carnal presence in the sacrament, as you wrongly interpret him.

Now in the mean time, while Mr. Philpot was speaking, Mr. Pie, whispering the prolocutor in the ear, urged him to silence Philpot, fearing, if he held on longer, he would wholly overthrow their opinion of the carnal presence, seeing he had already given one of it's main supporters such a blow. The prolocutor, therefore, said to Mr. Philpot, that he had reasoned long enough, and that some other should supply his room, at which Mr. Philpot, being much displeased, said, Why, sir, I have a dozen arguments to propose concerning this matter, and I have as yet scarce gone over the first; for being hitherto hindered, through your frequent interruptions, I have not, for confirmation, quoted any ancient writers, though I could a great many. Well, returned the prolocutor, you shall speak no more now, and I command you to be silent. You perceive, said Mr. Philpot, that I am able to controvert your false supposition, and therefore you command me to be silent. If you will not give place, said Mr. Weston, I will send you to prison. This is not, replied Philpot, according to your promise made in this house, nor yet to your brags made at Paul's Cross, that men should be answered in this disputation to whatever they can say, since of a dozen arguments you will not suffer me to prosecute one. Here Mr. Pie took upon him to promise, that he should be answered another day. But Mr. Philpot, seeing he could not proceed as he designed, was justly offended thereat, and concluded with the following words:—"A sort of you here, who hitherto have lurked in corners, and dissembled with God and the world, are now gathered together to suppress the sincere truth of God's holy word, and to set forth every false device, which by the Catholic doctrine of the scripture ye are not able to maintain."

Then

Then stood up Mr. Elmar, chaplain to the duke of Suffolk, whom Mr. Moreman took upon him to answer; but Mr. Elmar's allegations so incumbered his respondent, that he desired a day to overlook them, for at that instant he was without a proper answer.

The prolocutor now called upon Mr. Haddon, dean of Exeter, and chaplain to the duke of Suffolk, who prosecuted Mr. Elmar's argument. Dr. Watson, who attempted to answer him, was so confounded, that he was not able to explain sufficiently the word Mysterium (Mystery). But as he seemed to doubt therein, Mr. Haddon took out of his bosom a Latin author, to confirm what he had advanced, and, shewing the same to Dr. Watson, asked him, whether he thought that translation to be a just one, or that the printer were in fault; to which Watson replied, there may be a fault in the printer, for I am not remembered of this word. Then Mr. Haddon took out of his bosom a Greek book, wherein he pointed to the same word, which Mr. Watson could not deny. The further arguments that were made use of, we shall omit declaring, because they were mostly in Greek, as were those also of Mr. Elmar's.

Then Mr. Perne stood up, and argued against transubstantiation, confirming the authorities alledged by the two former speakers. When the prolocutor, interrupting, said, "I wonder, Mr. Perne, at your speaking thus, for no longer than last Friday you subscribed to the contrary." For which censure Mr. Elmar blamed the prolocutor, telling him, that he ought not to reprehend any man, because, said he, this house is a house of free liberty for every man to speak according to his conscience, and because but yesterday he promised this liberty to any man, notwithstanding he had subscribed.

Night now approaching, and the time being expired, the prolocutor, though he praised them for their learning, concluded with observing, that, all reasoning set apart, the order of Holy Church must be received, and all things ordered thereby.

The FIFTH DAY'S DEBATE.

On Friday, October 27th, the prolocutor opened the debate with observing, that the convocation had spent two days in disputing about one sather, which was Theodoret, and about one Greek word (σῶμα) and now they were assembled to answer all things that could be objected, therefore he desired they would shortly propound their arguments. Upon this, Mr. Haddon, dean of Exeter, requested leave to oppose Mr. Watson, who, with Morgan and Harpsfield, were appointed to answer him. Mr. Haddon then demanded, if any substance of bread and wine remained after consecration? To which Watson replied, by asking another question, namely, whether he thought there was a real presence of Christ's body, or not? Mr. Haddon said, it was not agreeable to order, that one, who was appointed to be respondent should be opponent; nor should he, whose business was to object, answer. Mr. Haddon then proceeded to shew, from the words of Theodoret, that the substance of bread and wine remained: for his words are, "The same they were before the sanctification, which they are after." Mr. Watson said, that Theodoret meant not the same substance, but the same essence. Whereupon they were driven again to a discussion of the Greek word above mentioned; and Mr. Haddon proved it to mean a substance, both by it's etymology, and by the words of Theodoret; for, said he, σῶμα cometh from the participle ῶν, which descendeth to the verb ἐπι, and so cometh the noun σῶμα, which signifieth substance. Mr. Watson said, it had not that signification only: but, in that place, Mr. Haddon proved, it could not signify otherwise. He then asked Watson, when the bread and wine became symbols? Watson answered, After consecration, and not before. Then Mr. Haddon raised out of his author the following syllogism (being an argument of three propositions).

(1) Theodoret saith, that the same thing the bread and wine were, before they were symbols, the same they remain still, in nature and substance, after they are symbols.

(2) Bread and wine they were before.

(3) Therefore, bread and wine they are after.

Mr. Watson, when he could not answer, had recourse to the shameful subterfuge of discrediting the authority of Theodoret, by saying, he was a Nestorian; at the same time, turning to Mr. Cheyney, who stood by, he desired to answer him, intimating, that he was more fit, than Mr. Haddon, to dispute upon this point, because he had granted and subscribed to the real presence. Being thus addressed with an insinuation that required an immediate reply, Mr. Cheyney applied to the house, and requested the patience of those honourable men to hear him, hoping so to open the matter, that the truth should appear; protesting, that he was no obstinate nor stubborn man, but would be conformable to all reason; and if they, by their learning, which he acknowledged to be much more than his, could answer his reasons, then he would be ruled by them, and say as they said; for he would be no author of schism, nor hold any thing contrary to the holy mother, the church, which is the spouse of Christ. Dr. Weston liking this very well, commended him highly, telling him, that he was a very learned and sober man, and well experienced in all good learning, and in the doctors; and finally, a man, for his knowledge, fit to dispute in that place; I pray you hear him, quoth he. Then Mr. Cheyney desired those that were present to pray to God with him in two words, and to say, Vincat veritas, "Let truth take place, and have the victory; and all that were present cried with a loud voice, Vincat veritas, Vincat veritas."

Dr. Weston told them it was hypocritical, and that they had better say, Vicit veritas, "Truth hath gotten the victory." Mr. Cheyney said again, If you will give me leave, I will come to the point, that you may truly say so. Then addressing himself particularly to Mr. Watson, he began after this manner.

You said that Mr. Haddon was not fit to dispute, because he had not granted the natural and real presence; but I say you are much less fit to answer, because you take away the substance of the sacrament. Watson said, that he had subscribed to the real presence, and should not go away from that: so said the prolocutor and the other priests; so that for a long time he could not have leave to proceed, till the lords desired that he should be heard. He now explained what he meant by subscribing to the real presence, far otherwise than they supposed. He then prosecuted Haddon's argument, proving that the Greek word before discussed was a substance, using the same reason that Haddon did; and when he had received the same answer that was made to Haddon, he told them it was but a poor refuge, when they could not answer to deny the author, and proved the author to be a catholic doctor; that being proved, he further confirmed what was said of the nature and substance. The similitude of Theodoret is this, said he, as the tokens of Christ's body and blood, after the invocation of the priest, do change their names, and yet continue the same substance; so the body of Christ after his ascension, changed his name, and was called immortal, yet it had his former fashion, figure, and circumscription, and, to speak in one word, the same substance of his body. Therefore, if in the former part of the similitude you deny the same substance to continue, then in the latter part of the similitude, which agreeth with it, I will deny the body of Christ, after his ascension, to have the former nature and substance. But that were a great heresy; therefore it is also a great heresy to take away the substance of bread and wine after consecration. In answer to this, Watson was obliged to say, that the substance of the body, in the former part of the similitude brought in by him, did signify quantity, and other accidents of the sacramental tokens which are seen, and not the very substance of the same; and therefore Theodoret says, Those things which are seen. For according to philosophy, the accidents of things are seen, and not the substances.

Cheyney then appealed to the nobility, and desired that they would give no credit to them in so saying: for if they think as they teach, after your lordships have ridden forty miles on horseback (as your business sometimes may require) you shall not be able to say at night, that that saw your horses all the day, but only the colour of them: and by this reason Christ must go to school, and learn of Aristotle how to speak. For when he saw Nathaniel under the fig-tree, if Aristotle had stood by, he would have said, No, Christ, thou didst not see him, but the colour of him. Then said Watson, suppose it were granted that Theodoret was on the other side, where there were one of that opinion, there were an hundred on the other.

The prolocutor here perceiving that Mr. Watson was closely attacked, called upon Mr. Morgan to help him out; who said, that Theodoret did no more than what he might lawfully do; for, first, he granted the truth, and then, for fear of such as were not fully instructed in the faith, he spake mystically: he granted the truth, by calling the bread and wine the body and blood of Christ; after which he seems to give somewhat to the senses and to reason: but that Theodoret was of the same opinion with them, will appear from his words that follow, which are the cause of what went before; therefore he says, The immortality, &c: whereby it seemeth, that he meant the divine nature, and not the human. Morgan was then detected in misapplying the text; for the book had not this word [for] and the Greek word did rather signify [truly] from whence it plainly appeared, that it was the beginning of a new matter, and not a sentence rendering a cause of that he had said before.

Watson now repeated what he had before said: "Suppose Theodoret be on your side, of whom we never heard in print, before two or three years ago; yet he is but one; and what is one against the consent of the whole church?" Cheyney affirmed, that not only Theodoret was of his opinion, that the substance of bread and wine do remain, but many others also, particularly Irenæus, who, making mention of this sacrament, says thus: "When the cup which is mingled with wine, and the bread that is broken, do receive the word of God, it is made the Eucharist of the body and blood of Christ, by which the substance of our flesh is nourished, and doth consist." From whence I infer, that if the thanksgiving do nourish our body, then there is some substance besides Christ's body. To this both Watson and Morgan replied, observing, that [by which,] in that sentence of Irenæus, was to be referred to the next antecedent, that is, to the body and blood of Christ; and not to the wine which is in the cup, and the bread which is broken. Mr. Cheyney said, that it was not the body of Christ which nourished our bodies; and granting that the flesh of Christ nourisheth to immortality, yet it doth not make for their argument, although it might be true: no more than that answer which was made to my allegation out of St. Paul. The bread which we break, &c. with many others; whereunto you answered, that bread was not to be taken there in it's proper signification, that is, not for that it was bread, but for that it had been so; any more than the rod of Aaron was taken for a serpent, because it had been a serpent. After this, Mr. Cheyney quoted Hesychius, and used the same reason that he did concerning the burning of symbols; and asked them, what was burnt? Mr. Watson said, we must not enquire nor ask, but if there was any fault, impute it to Christ. Then said Mr. Cheyney, whence came those ashes, if not from substance? or can any substance arise from accidents?

Here Mr. Harpsfield was called in to the assistance of Watson, and to hear what he could say to this matter; who began with a fair preamble about the omnipotency of God, and the weakness of human reason as to the comprehension and attainment of religious matters; and said, that whatsoever we saw, felt, or tasted, it was not convenient to trust our senses.--(The very pith and marrow of popery this.) He also related a curious legend out of St. Cyprian, how a woman saw the sacrament burning in her coffer; and that which burned thus, said Harpsfield, burneth here, and becometh ashes; but what that was which burnt, he could not tell. Mr. Cheyney continued still to force them with this question—What was it that was burnt?—it was either, said he, the substance of bread, or else the substance of the body of Christ, which was too great an absurdity to grant. At length they answered, it was a miracle; at which Mr. Cheyney smiling, said, that he would then say no more.

Then Dr. Weston, the prolocutor, asked the company, whether those men had been sufficiently answered, or not? To which certain priests said, Yes; but as to the great multitude of people, these exclaimed—No, no; they were not heard; and the clamour was so great, that it was heard almost to the end of St. Paul's: whereat Dr. Weston, being much incensed, answered sharply, that he asked not the judgment of the rude multitude, and unlearned people, but such as were members of that house. Having said this with much acrimony, he asked Mr. Haddon and his fellow-disputants, whether they would answer them other three days? Mr. Haddon, Cheyney, and Elmar answered, No. Upon which the archdeacon of Winchester, Mr. Philpot, stood up, and said, they should be answered; and though all others refused to answer, yet he would not; but offered to answer them all in turns: with whose offer the prolocutor being dissatisfied, railed at him, saying that he should go to Bedlam; to whom the archdeacon returned gravely this answer, that he deserved much more to be sent thither, who behaved himself so furiously in the disputation, without any indifferent equality.

To this Dr. Weston made no reply, but rising up addressed the house, saying, All the company here have subscribed, these men whom you see only excepted. What their reasons are you have heard. We have answered them three days, upon promise, (which was a false assertion, for no such promise was made) that they should answer us again, as long as the order of disputation continued, and, if they be able to defend their doctrine, let them do so.

Then stood up Mr. Elmar, and shewed how vain a man Mr. Weston was; for he affirmed they never promised to dispute, but only to declare and testify to the world their consciences. For when they were required to subscribe, they refused, alledging, that they would shew good reasons which moved them, that they could not, agreeable to their consciences, subscribe; as they had partly done already, and were able to do more effectually. Therefore, continued he, it hath been ill called a disputation, and they are much to blame who called it so. We meant not to dispute, nor now intend to answer, before our arguments, which we have to propound, be solved, according as it was appointed: for by answering, we should but incumber ourselves and profit nothing, since the matter is already decreed on, and determined, whatsoever we may prove by dispute to the contrary.

The SIXTH DAY'S DEBATE.

On Monday following, October the 30th, the prolocutor demanded of Mr. Philpot, whether, in the questions, before propounded, he would answer their objections or not? To whom he made this answer; that he would willingly do so, if, according to their former determination and promise, they would first answer fully some of his arguments, of which he had a dozen, not half of the first being decided; and if they would answer but one of his arguments sufficiently, he would reply to all the objections they could bring. The prolocutor bid him state his argument, and it should be resolutely controverted by some of them; whereunto Morgan was appointed. Mr. Philpot then proceeded. On Wednesday last, said he, I was forced to silence before I had prosecuted half my argument, the sum of which was, that the human body of Christ was ascended into heaven, and placed at the right hand of God the Father: wherefore, after the imagination of man, it could not be situated upon earth invisibly in the sacrament of the altar. The argument was denied by Morgan; but for proof hereof, Philpot said, that this was what he had to confirm his first argument with, if they would have suffered him the other day, as he hoped they would now. He thus proceeded with his argument.

(1) One self-same nature receiveth not in itself any thing that is contrary to itself.

(2) But

(2) But the body of Christ is an human nature, distinct from the deity, and is a proper nature of itself.

(3) Therefore it cannot receive any thing that is contrary to that nature, and that varieth from itself.

But bodily to be present, and to be absent bodily, to be on earth, and to be in heaven, and all at one present time, are things contrary to the nature of an human body. Therefore it cannot be said of the human body of Christ, that the self-same body is both in heaven, and also on the earth at one instant, either visibly or invisibly. Morgan denied the first part of the argument, which Philpot supported out of Vigilus, an ancient writer; yet still Morgan cavilled thereat, and said it was no scripture, and desired him to prove the same from scripture. Philpot deduced the same from St. Paul, who says, that "Christ is like unto us in all points, except sin;" therefore, like as one of our bodies cannot receive in itself any thing contrary to the nature of a body, as to be in St. Paul's church and at Westminster in one instant, or to be at London visibly, and at Lincoln invisibly at one time; so, in like manner, the body of Christ cannot be in more places than one, which is in heaven, and consequently is not included or contained in the sacrament of the altar. But, said the prolocutor, it is not true, that Christ was like unto us in all points, since he was not conceived by the seed of man as we are. Philpot replied, that Christ's conception was prophesied before by the angel to be supernatural, but after he had received our nature by the operation of the Holy Ghost in the virgin's womb, he became in all points like unto us, except sin.

Then Morgan affirmed, that these words of St. Paul did not plainly prove his purpose. Well, said Philpot, I perceive you answer only by cavelling, yet I am not destitute of other scriptures, though you refuse the testimony of so ancient and catholic a doctor as Vigilus is. St. Peter, making mention of Christ in the 3d chapter of the Acts, says, "Whom heaven must receive, until the consummation of all things," &c. which words are spoken of his humanity; and if heaven must hold Christ, then can he not be here on earth, in the sacrament, as is pretended. Morgan laughing at this, and giving no direct answer, Harpsfield, one of the bishop of London's chaplains, stood up, and demanded of Mr. Philpot, whether he would of necessity force Christ to any place, or not? Philpot returned, that he would no otherwise force Christ of necessity to any place, than what the words of the Holy Ghost teach, namely, that Christ's human body must abide in heaven until the day of judgment. To which Harpsfield replied, Do you not know that God is a God omnipotent? Yes, said Philpot, I know that right well; but as to Christ's omnipotency, what he can do is not our question, but rather, what he actually doth: he may make more worlds; but doth he therefore so? It were no good consequent to conclude, because he may or can do this or that, therefore he doth it.

SYLLOGISTIC ARGUMENT.

Only so much is to be believed of God's omnipotency, as is in the word expressed.

That Christ's body is both in heaven, and here also really in the sacrament, is not expressed in the word.

Therefore it is not to be believed, that the body of Christ, being in heaven, is here in the sacrament.

Why, returned the prolocutor, then you will put Christ in prison in heaven. To which Philpot answered, Do you reckon heaven to be in prison? God grant us all to come to that prison!

After this, Harpsfield affirmed, that the Latin word oportet, in St. Peter, (in English must) did not import, as Philpot would infer, a necessity, which might be made appear from other places of scripture, as in the first of Timothy, where St. Paul saith, a bishop must be the husband of one wife. Here the word oportet doth not mean necessity, but a possibility, that he, who never was married, may be a bishop. To which Philpot replied, that the two passages he compared were not alike; and that in comparing the scriptures we must not consider the bare words, but rather their import: and in one place quoted by him, St. Paul declares of what quality a bishop ought to be; but in the other St. Peter refers to the place where Christ must necessarily be until the end of the world: which we ought to believe to be true. And this comparison of the Latin word, oportet, is no more an answer to my argument, than if I was to say of you, now being here, you must needs be here, which importeth such a necessity for the time, that you can no otherwise but be there; yet you would endeavour, in words, to avoid this necessity with another oportet in another sense, as for instance, you must be a good man, where must doth not indeed imply any such necessity, but that you may be an evil man. Thus your reasoning is not conclusive, and by no means an answer to my argument.

The prolocutor, to help the matter out, if possible, brought up another oportet, saying, Oportet hereses esse; must heresies need be therefore, because of this word oportet? Certainly, returned Philpot, it cannot otherwise be, if you will add what immediately followeth, ut qui electi sunt manifestentur, meaning, "that such as be the elect of God may be manifest and known." But, said the prolocutor, the time hath been that no such heresies were. I know not of any such time, said Philpot; for since the time of Abel and Cain heresies have been, and then began. Then said the prolocutor, Will you not now answer Morgan an argument or two? I will, said Philpot, if I may have my arguments first answered fairly, according to truth and learning. What! said the prolocutor, will you never be answered? How I am answered, returned Philpot, let all here present judge, especially men of learning, and with what cavilling you have trifled with me. First, to the ancient authority of Vigilus, you have answered nothing, except denying what he saith to be scripture. Secondly, to the words of St. Peter, in the Acts, you have answered, by demanding, whether I would keep Christ in prison, or not? Let men now judge if this be a sufficient answer, or not. Upon this, Morgan stood up again, and asked Philpot, whether he would be ruled by the universal church, or not? Yes, said Philpot, if it be the true catholic church; and since you speak so much of the church, I would have you declare what the church is. The church, said Morgan, is diffused and dispersed throughout the whole world. That is a diffuse definition, said Philpot, for I am yet as uncertain as I was before, what you mean by the church; but is it not what was grounded and founded on the word of God, as St. Paul saith unto the foundation of the apostles and prophets? What! quoth Moreman, was the scripture before the church? Yes, answered Philpot. But I will prove the contrary, returned Moreman; and I will begin at the time of Christ. The church of Christ was before any scripture written: for Matthew was the first who wrote a gospel, about a dozen years after Christ: therefore, the church was before the scripture. Philpot denied his argument; and shewed it to be a fallacy; for he took the scripture to be only that which was written by men in letters; whereas in truth, all prophecy uttered by the Spirit of God, was counted to be scripture, before it was written in paper and ink, for it was written in the hearts, and graven in the minds, yea, and inspired in the mouths of good men, and of the apostles, by the Spirit of Christ. The salutation of the angel was the scripture of Christ, or the word of God, before it was written. Moreman cried, Fie! fie! wondering that the scripture of God should be counted scripture before it was written, and affirmed, he had no knowledge who said so. To whom Philpot replied, that as to knowledge in this matter, for the trial of the truth, about the questions in controversy, he would wish himself no worse matched than with Moreman.

At this the prolocutor was highly offended, saying to Philpot, it was speaking arrogantly, to compare himself with such a worshipful learned man as Mr. Moreman was, being himself a man unlearned, yea, a madman, fitter to be sent to Bedlam, than to be among such learned and grave men as were there, and a man who never would be answered, and one who troubled the whole house; and therefore he commanded him to come no more into that house, of whom he demanding, whether they would agree thereunto, or not, a great company answered, Yes. Philpot returned, he might think himself happy, who was out of their company.

Then Morgan rose up, and whispered the prolocutor in the ear; and the prolocutor spoke to Philpot again, and said, lest thou shouldest slander the house, and say, that we will not suffer you to declare your mind, we are content you shall come into the house as you have done before, so that you be apparelled with a long gown and a rippet, as we be, and that you shall not speak but when I command you. Then said Philpot, I had rather be absent altogether.

Thus they reasoned pro and con, till at length, about the 13th of December, queen Mary took up the matter, and sending to Bonner, bishop of London, commanded him to dissolve and break up the convocation.

The following is a Translation of the QUEEN'S PRECEPT to BONNER, BISHOP of LONDON, for Dissolving the CONVOCATION.

“MARY, &c. To the Rev. Father in God, Edmund, Lord Bishop of London, sendeth greeting. Whereas there is now held at Paul's, London, the convocation of the clergy belonging to the province of Canterbury; we, by and with the advice and consent of our council, and for divers other causes and considerations particularly moving us thereunto, have hereby thought fit the said convocation should be dissolved. And therefore we strictly charge and command you, forthwith to dissolve or cause to be dissolved the said convocation, as shall seem to you most fit and convenient: signifying withal on our part to all and several the bishops, archdeacons, deans, and all other spiritual persons, that they and every of them do obey and comply with this our command, as becometh them so to do.

November, 1553. On the 20th of this month, the mayor of Coventry sent up unto the lords of the council, Baldwin Clark, J. Careless, Thomas Wilcocks, and Richard Estelin, for their behaviour upon Allhallow-days before; whereupon Careless and Wilcocks were committed to the Gate-house, and the other two to the Marshalsea.

The same day, sir Christopher Heydon, and sir William Farmer, were ordered, by a letter from the council, to apprehend the Rev. John Huntingdon, for making a rhyme against Dr. Stokes, and the sacrament, who appearing before the council, on the 3d of December following, was, upon his humble submission, and promise of amendment in doctrine and living, again suffered to depart.

In the days of Henry VIII. and Edward his successor, several noblemen and others were committed to the Tower; some charged with treason, as lord Courtney, and the duke of Norfolk; some for the pope's supremacy, and suspicious letters tending to sedition, as Tonstal, bishop of Durham, and others, who were all continued prisoners there, till queen Mary granted them a pardon, and restored them to their former dignities. Among these was Gardiner, bishop of Winchester, whom she not only set at liberty, but also advanced him to be high chancellor of England. Lord Courtney she created earl of Devonshire, and shewed him so much favour, that it was suspected by some she would marry him. At the same time she also released that bloody persecutor, Bonner, from the Marshalsea, and restored him to the bishopric of London, displacing Dr. Ridley, with divers other good bishops, as Cranmer from Canterbury, also the archbishop of York, with a great number of archdeacons, deans, &c. in short, all those of the clergy who were either married, or would constantly adhere to the reformed religion, were removed from their livings; and others, advocates for popery, put in the same, as cardinal Pool, (who was invited to England) Gardiner, White, Day, Troublefield, &c.

And whereas a rumour was spread abroad, that Cranmer had recanted, and caused mass to be said at Canterbury, in order therefore to clear himself, he published a declaration of his truth and constancy in those particulars, protesting that he neither had done so, nor intended it, adding, that, if the queen pleased, he, with Peter Martyr, and certain others whom he would chuse, would, in public disputation, vindicate the doctrines of the reformation, against all persons whomsoever. But while he expected to obtain leave for such a disputation, he, with other bishops, were laid fast in the Tower. But Peter Martyr was permitted to depart the realm, and he went to Argentine. At length, in this month of November, Dr. Cranmer, notwithstanding he had earnestly refused to subscribe to the king's will in disinheriting his sister Mary, was arraigned in the Guild-hall of London, and attainted of treason, with the lady Jane Gray, and three of the duke of Northumberland's sons, who were remanded back to the Tower, at the intreaty of certain persons, and there kept for a time. But the archbishop, being acquitted of treason, stood only in the action and case of doctrine, which they called heresy, whereat he was very much pleased and joyful.

This being done, the people, and especially the clergy, perceiving the queen so strongly inclined to the old religion, popery, they likewise, to shew their forwardness to comply with the queen's humour, began to set up the pageants of St. Katherine and St. Nicholas, processions in Latin, after their old solemnity, with their gay gar-deviance, gray-amices, or vestments.

December, 1553. About the beginning of this month, the parliament broke up, having first repealed all such statutes as were either made of premunire, or concerned any alteration of religion, and administration of the sacraments, in the reign of Edward VI. And in this session the parliament were acquainted with the queen's intended marriage with king Philip, the emperor's son. In the mean time, cardinal Pool, having been sent for by Mary, was requested by the emperor, to stay with him, to the intent, (as some think) that his presence in England should not be a bar to the marriage between his son and the queen: to accomplish which, he sent a most splendid embassy, with full power; which had such good success, that, after a few days, the marriage of queen Mary, with the emperor's son, Philip, was made up and completed.

RIDLEY and SECRETARY BOURNE.

ON the 13th of January, 1554, Dr. Crome was committed to the Fleet, for preaching without licence, on Christmas-day: and on the 21st, Thomas Wooton, Esq. was committed close prisoner to the Fleet, for matters of religion.

Early in this month the marriage of the queen was made public; but the news of this event was ill received both by the common people, and several of the nobility; and on this account, as also for religion, conspiring among themselves, raised a rebellion, whereof for Thomas Wyat was one of the chief promoters, who said in Kent (what others plainly perceived,) that the queen and council would, by her marriage with a foreigner, bring upon this realm most miserable servitude, and establish the popish religion.

January 25th. Intelligence was received at London, of the insurrection in Kent; and of the duke of Suffolk having fled into Warwickshire and Leicestershire, with a view of raising forces in those counties. The queen, therefore, caused them both, with the Carews of Devonshire, to be proclaimed traitors; and at the same time sent Thomas, duke of Norfolk, into Kent, who being, near Rochester bridge, forsaken of those who went with him, returned to London, no blood having been shed on either side.

The duke of Suffolk having fled into Warwickshire, the earl of Huntington was sent against him, who entering the city of Coventry before the duke, disappointed him of his purpose. In his distress, the duke confided in a servant of his, in Astley park; but the traitor having betrayed him, he was apprehended, sent up to London, and committed to the Tower. In the mean time, sir Peter hearing of this, fled into France, but the other conspirators were taken; and Wyat advanced towards London in the beginning of February. The queen, having heard of his coming, repaired to Guildhall, in the city, where she made a vehement oration against Wyat; the substance and effect whereof here followeth, as near as out of her own mouth could be penned.

An ORATION delivered by QUEEN MARY in GUILDHALL, LONDON.

I AM come unto you in mine own person, to tell you that which already you see and know, that is, how traitorously and rebelliously a number of Kentishmen have assembled themselves against both us and you. Their pretence (as they said at the first) was for a marriage determined for us: to the which, and to all the articles thereof, ye have been made privy. But since we have caused certain of our privy council to go again unto them, and demand the cause of this their rebellion, and it appeared then unto our said council, that the matter of the marriage seemed to be but a Spanish cloak to cover their pretended purpose against our religion, for that they arrogantly and traitorously demanded to have the governance of our person, the keeping of the Tower, and the placing of our counsellors.

Now, loving subjects, what I am, ye right well know; I am your queen, to whom at my coronation, when I was wedded to the realm and laws of the same (the spousal ring whereof I have on my finger, which never hitherto was, nor hereafter shall be left off,) you promised your allegiance and obedience unto me. And that I am the right and true inheritor of the crown of this realm of England, I take all christendom to witness. My father, as ye all know, possessed the same regal state, which now rightly, is descended unto me; and to him always ye shewed yourselves most faithful and loving subjects, and therefore I doubt not, but ye will shew yourselves likewise to me, and that ye will not suffer a vile traitor to have the order and governance of our person, and to occupy our estate, especially being so vile a traitor as Wyat is: who most certainly, as he hath abused mine ignorant subjects which be on his side, so doth he intend and purpose the destruction of you, and spoil of your goods. And I say to you on the word of a queen, I cannot tell how naturally the mother loveth the child, for I was never the mother of any: but certainly, if a prince's and governess may as naturally and earnestly love her subjects, as the mother doth love the child, then assure yourselves, that I, being your lady and mistress, do as earnestly and tenderly love and favour you. And I thus loving you, cannot but think that you as heartily and faithfully love me, and then I doubt not, but we, shall give these rebels a short and speedy overthrow.

As concerning the marriage, ye shall understand, that I enteredprized not the doing thereof without advice, and that by the advice of all our privy council, who so considered and weighed the great commodities that might ensue thereof, that they not only thought it very honourable, but also expedient, both for the wealth of the realm, and also of you our subjects. And as touching myself, I assure you, I am not so bent to my will, neither so precise nor affectionate, that either for mine own pleasure I would chuse where I lust, or that I am so desirous, as needs I would have one. For God, I thank him, to whom be the praise therefore, I have hitherto lived a virgin, and doubt nothing, but with God's grace, I am able so to live still. But if, as my progenitors have done before, it may please God that I might leave some fruit of my body behind me, to be your governor, I trust you would not only rejoice thereat, but also,

I know, it would be to your great comfort. And certainly, if I either did think or know, that this marriage were to the hurt of any of you my commons, or to the impeachment of any part or parcel of the royal state of this realm of England, I would never consent thereunto, neither would I ever marry while I lived. And on the word of a queen, I promise you, that if it shall not probably appear to all the nobility and commons in the high court of Parliament, that this marriage shall be for the high benefit and commodity of the whole realm, then will I abstain from marriage while I live.

And now, good subjects, pluck up your hearts, and like true men, stand fast against these rebels, both our enemies and your's, and fear them not; for I assure you, I fear them nothing at all. And I will leave with you my lord Howard, and my lord treasurer, who shall be assistants with the mayor for your defence.

It is to be observed, that it having been reported, the queen was coming into the city with armed men, this rumour so terrified the Londoners, lest they should be there entrapped, and put to death, that great numbers of them made out of the gate before she entered in. It is also to be noted, that when the queen had ended her oration (which she seemed to have learned perfectly without book,) at the conclusion thereof, Gardiner, bishop of Winchester, who stood by her, cried to the people, with great admiration, "O how happy are we, to whom God hath given such a wife and learned queen!"

Two days after this, on the 3d of February, lord Cobham was committed to the Tower, and sir Thomas Wyat entered Southwark; when, finding no access that way into the city, he marched with his army by Kingston, and came through the Strand to Ludgate. Returning from thence, he was opposed at Templebar, and there surrendered himself to sir Clement Parson, who brought him to court; and, with him, the remains of his army (for sir George Harper, and almost half of his men, had deserted him at Kingston-bridge) were also taken, and about one hundred killed. A great number of the captives were hanged; and Wyat was executed on Tower-hill, and then quartered. His head being set up upon Hay-hill, was taken away from thence, and great search made for the same.

On the 12th of February, the unfortunate Lady Jane Gray was beheaded. Two days before her death, Mr. Feckman, otherwise Howman, was sent to her from the queen, to converse with her, and endeavour to turn her from the doctrine of Christ and the reformation to Mary's popish religion. The substance of their conversation is thus related.

A CONVERSATION between Mr. FECKMAN and Lady JANE GRAY, a short Time before she was beheaded.

Feckman. Madam, I lament your heavy case, and yet I doubt not, but that you bear out this sorrow of your's with a constant and patient mind.

Jane. You are welcome unto me, sir, if your coming be to give christian exhortation. And as for my heavy case (I thank God,) I do so little lament it, that rather I account the same for a more manifest declaration of God's favour towards me, than ever he shewed me at any time before. And therefore there is no cause why either you, or others which bear me good will, should lament or be grieved with this my case, being a thing so profitable for my soul's health.

Feckman. I am here come to you at this present time, sent from the queen and her council, to instruct you in the true doctrine of the right faith: although I have so great confidence in you, that I shall have, I trust, little need to travel with you much therein.

Jane. Forsooth, I heartily thank the queen's highness, which is not unmindful of her humble subject: and I hope likewise, that you no less will do your duty therein both truly and faithfully, according to that you were sent for.

Feckman. What is then required of a christian man?

Jane. That he should believe in God the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost; three Persons and one God.

Feckman. What, is there nothing else to be required or looked for in a christian, but to believe in him?

Jane. Yes, we must love him with all our heart, with all our soul, and with all our mind, and our neighbour as ourself.

Feckman.

Fecknam. Why, then, faith neither justifieth, nor saveth.

Jane. Yes verily, faith (as St. Paul saith) only justifieth.

Fecknam. Why, St. Paul saith, If I have all faith without love, it is nothing.

Jane. True it is: for how can I love him whom I trust not? Or how can I trust him whom I love not? Faith and love go both together, and yet love is comprehended in faith.

Fecknam. How many sacraments are there?

Jane. Two. The one the sacrament of baptism, and the other the sacrament of the Lord's Supper.

Fecknam. No, there are seven.

Jane. By what scripture find you that?

Fecknam. Well, we will talk of that hereafter. But what is signified by your two sacraments.

Jane. By the sacrament of baptism, I am washed with water and regenerated by the Spirit, and that washing is a token to me, that I am the child of God. The sacrament of the Lord's supper offered unto me, is a sure seal and testimony, that I am, by the blood of Christ, which he shed for me on the cross, made partaker of the everlasting kingdom.

Fecknam. Why, what do you receive in that sacrament? Do you not receive the very body and blood of Christ?

Jane. No surely, I do not so believe. I think that at the supper I neither receive flesh nor blood, but bread and wine: which bread when it is broken, and the wine when it is drunk, putteth me in remembrance how that for my sins, the body of Christ was broken, and his blood shed on the cross, and with that bread and wine, I receive the benefits that come by the breaking of his body, and shedding of his blood.

Fecknam. Why, doth not Christ speak these words, Take, eat, this is my body? Require you any plainer words? Doth he not say it is his body?

Jane. I grant he saith so; and so he saith, I am the vine, I am the door; but he is never the more the door, nor the vine. Doth not St. Paul say, He calleth things that are not as though they were? God forbid that I should say, that I eat the very natural body and blood of Christ: for then either I should pluck away my redemption, or else there were two bodies, or two Christs. One body was tormented on the cross, and if they did eat another body, then had he two bodies: or if his body were eaten, then was it not broken upon the cross; or if it were broken upon the cross, it was not eaten of his disciples.

With these and such like persuasions he endeavoured, but to no purpose, to turn her to the popish religion. They reasoned about many other things, but these were the chief.

LETTER

From LADY JANE to Mr. HARDING, (late CHAPLAIN to her Father the DUKE of SUFFOLK,) then fallen from the Truth of GOD'S HOLY WORD.

SO oft as I call to mind the dreadful and fearful saying of God, "That he which layeth hold upon the plough and looketh back, is not meet for the kingdom of heaven;" and, on the other side, the comfortable words of our Saviour Christ to all those that, forsaking themselves, do follow him: I cannot but marvel at thee, and lament thy case, which seemed sometime to be the lively member of Christ, but now the deformed imp of the devil; sometime the beautiful temple of God, but now the stinking and filthy kennel of Satan; sometime the unsported spouse of Christ, but now the unshamed paramour of Antichrist; sometime my faithful brother, but now a stranger and apostate; sometime a stout christian soldier, but now a cowardly run-away. Yea, when I consider these things, I cannot but speak to thee, and cry out upon thee, thou seed of Satan, and not of Judah, whom the devil hath deceived, the world hath beguiled, and the desire of life subverted, and made thee of a christian an infidel. Wherefore hast thou taken the testament of the Lord in thy mouth; Wherefore hast thou preached the law and the will of God to others? Wherefore hast thou instructed others to be strong in Christ, when thou thyself doth so shamefully shrink, and so horribly abuse the testament and law of the Lord? When thou thyself preacheest not to steal, yet most abominably stealest, not from men, but from God, and committing most heinous sacrilege, robbest Christ thy Lord of his right members, thy body and soul, and chusest rather to live miserably with shame in the world, than to die, and gloriously, with honor, reign with Christ, in whom even death is life? Why dost thou now shew thyself most weak, when indeed thou oughtest to be most strong? The strength of a fort is unknown before the assault, but thou yieldest thy hold before any battery be made. O wretched and unhappy man, what art thou but dust and ashes? And wilt thou resist thy Maker that fashioned and framed thee? Wilt thou now forsake him that called thee from the custom-gathering among the Romish antichristians, to be an ambassador and messenger of his eternal word? He that first framed thee, and since thy first creation and birth preserved thee, nourished and kept thee, yea, and inspired thee with the spirit of knowledge (I cannot say of grace) shall he not now possess thee? Darest thou deliver up thyself to another, being not thine own, but his? How canst thou, having knowledge, or how darest thou neglect the law of the Lord, and follow the vain traditions of men; and, whereas thou hast been a public professor of his name, become now a defacer of his glory? Wilt thou refuse the true God, and worship the invention of man, the golden calf, the whore of Babylon, the Romish religion, the abominable idol, the most wicked mass? Wilt thou torment again, rent, and tear the most precious body of our Saviour Christ, with thy bodily and fleshly teeth? Wilt thou take upon thee to offer any sacrifice unto God for our sins, considering that Christ offered up himself (as St. Paul saith) upon the cross, a lively sacrifice once for all? Can neither the punishment of the Israelites (which, for their idolatry, they so oft received,) nor the terrible threatenings of the prophets, nor the curses of God's own mouth, fear thee to honor any other God than him? Dost thou so regard him that spared not his dear and only Son for thee, so diminishing, yea, utterly extinguishing his glory, that thou wilt attribute the praise and honor due unto him to the idols, which have mouths and speak not, eyes and see not, ears and hear not; which shall perish with them that made them?

What saith the prophet Baruch, where he recited the epistle of Jeremy, written to the captive Jews? Did he not forewarn them, that in Babylon they should see gods of gold, silver, wood, and stone, borne upon men's shoulders, to cast a fear before the heathen? "But be ye not afraid of them, (saith Jeremy) nor do as others do. But when you see others worship them, say you in your hearts, It is thou, O Lord, that oughtest only to be worshipped; for as for these gods, the carpenter framed them and polished them, yea, gilded be they, and laid over with silver and vain things, and cannot speak." He sheweth, moreover, the abuse of their dealings, how the priest took off their ornaments, and apparelled their women withal; how one holdeth a sceptre, another a sword in his hand, and yet can they judge in no matter, nor defend themselves, much less any other, from either battle or murder, nor yet from gnawing of worms, nor any other evil thing. These and such like words speaketh Jeremy unto them, whereby he proveth them to be but vain things, and no gods. And at last he concludeth thus, "Confounded be all they that worship them." They were warned by Jeremy, and thou as Jeremy hast warned others, and art warned thyself by many scriptures in many places. God saith, he is a jealous God, which will have all honour, glory, and worship, given to him only. And Christ saith in the fourth of Matthew, to Satan which tempted him, even to the same Beelzebub, the same devil which hath prevailed against thee: "It is written (saith he) thou shalt honour the Lord thy God, and him only shalt thou serve."

These

These and such like do prohibit thee and all christians to worship any other God, than which was before all worlds, and laid the foundations both of heaven and earth: and wilt thou honour a detestible idol, invented by Romish popes, and the abominable college of crafty cardinals? Christ offered himself up once for all, and wilt thou offer him up again daily at thy pleasure? But thou wilt say, thou doest it for a good intent. O sink of sin! Oh child of perdition! Dost thou dream therein of a good intent, where thy conscience beareth thee witness of God's threatened wrath against thee? How did Saul? who, for that he disobeyed the word of the Lord for a good intent, was thrown from his worldly and temporal kingdom. Shalt thou then, that dost deface God's honour, and rob him of his right, inherit the eternal and heavenly kingdom? Wilt thou for a good intent dishonour God, offend thy brother, and danger thy soul, for which Christ hath shed his most precious blood? Wilt thou for a good intent pluck Christ out of heaven, and make his death void, and deface the triumph of his cross by offering him up daily? Wilt thou, either for fear of death, or hope of life, deny and refuse thy God, who enriched thy poverty, healed thy infirmity, and yields to thee his victory, if thou couldst have kept it? Dost thou not consider, that the thread of thy life hangeth upon him that made thee, who can (as his will is) either twine it harder to last the longer, or untwine it again to break the sooner? Dost thou not then remember the saying of David, a notable king, to teach thee a miserable wretch, in his 104th Psalm, where he saith thus: "When thou takest away thy Spirit, O Lord, from men, they die and are turned again to their dust: but when thou lettest thy breath go forth, they shall be made, and thou shalt renew the face of the earth." Remember the saying of Christ in his gospel: "Whosoever seeketh to save his life, shall lose it: but whosoever will lose his life for my sake, shall find it."

Last of all, let the lively remembrance of the last day be always before your eyes, remembering the terror that such shall be in at that time, with the runagates and fugitives from Christ, which setting more by the world than by heaven, more by their life than by him that gave them life, did shrink, yea, did clean fall away from him that forsook not them: and contrariwise, the inestimable joys prepared for them, that fearing no peril, nor dreading death, have manfully fought, and victoriously triumphed over all the powers of darkness, over hell, death, and damnation, through their most redoubted captain Christ, who now stretcheth out his arms to receive you, ready to fall upon your neck and kiss you, and last of all to feast you with the dainties and delicacies of his own precious blood: which undoubtedly, if it might stand with his determinate purpose, he would not scruple to shed again, rather than you should be lost. To whom with the Father and the Holy Ghost, be all honour, praise, and glory everlasting. Amen.

"Be constant, be constant, fear not for any pain:
"Christ hath redeemed thee, and heaven is thy gain."

Which LADY JANE sent to her SISTER, the LADY KATHERINE, the Night before she suffered, written at the End of the New Testament in Greek.

Good Sister Katherine,

I Have here sent you a book, which although it be not outwardly trimmed with gold, yet inwardly is more worth than precious stones. It is the Book (dear sister) of the law of the Lord. It is his testament and last will, which he bequeathed unto us wretches; which shall lead you to the path of eternal joy: and, if you with a good mind read it, and with an earnest mind do purpose to follow it, it shall bring you to an immortal and everlasting life. It shall teach you to live, and learn you to die. It shall win you more than you should have gained by the possession of your woful father's lands. For as, if God had prospered him, you should have inherited his lands; so if you apply diligently this book, seeking to direct your life after it, you shall be an inheritor of such riches, as neither the covetous shall withdraw from you, neither thief shall steal, neither yet the moths corrupt. Desire with David, good sister, to understand the law of the Lord God. Live still to die, that you by death may purchase eternal life. And trust not that the tenderness of your age shall lengthen your life; for as soon (if God call) goeth the young as the old: and labour always to learn to die. Defy the world, deny the devil, despise the flesh, and delight yourself only in the Lord. Be penitent for your sins, and yet despair not: be strong in faith, and yet presume not; and desire with St. Paul to be dissolved and to be with Christ, with whom even in death there is life. Be like the good servant, and even at midnight be waking, lest when death cometh and stealeth upon you as a thief in the night, you be, with the evil servant, found sleeping; and lest, for lack of oil, you be found like the five foolish women, and like him that had not on the wedding garment, and then ye be cast out from the marriage. Rejoice in Christ, as I do. Follow the steps of your master Christ, and take up your cross: lay your sins on his back, and always embrace him. And as touching my death, rejoice as I do, (good sister) that I shall be delivered of this corruption, and put on incorruption. For I am assured, that I shall, for losing of a mortal life, win an immortal life, the which I pray God grant you, and send you of his grace to live in his fear, and to die in the true christian faith, from the which, (in God's name) I exhort you, that you never swerve, neither for hope of life, nor for fear of death. For if you will deny his truth, to lengthen your life, God will deny you, and shorten your days. And if you cleave unto him, he will prolong your days to your comfort and his glory: To which glory God bring me now, and you hereafter, when it pleaseth him to call you. Fare you well, good sister, and put your only trust in God; who only must help you.

The BEHAVIOUR and DYING WORDS of LADY JANE upon the SCAFFOLD.

When she mounted the scaffold, she spake to the spectators in this manner. "Good people, I am come hither to die, and by a law I am condemned to the same. The fact against the queen's highness was unlawful, and the consenting thereunto by me; but touching the procurement and desire thereof by me or on my behalf, I do wash my hands thereof in innocency before God, and the face of you, good christian people, this day:" and therewith she wrung her hands wherein she had her book: "Then (said she) I pray you all good christian people, to bear me witness that I die a true christian woman, and that I do look to be saved by no other means, but only by the mercy of God in the blood of his only Son Jesus Christ: and I confess, that when I did know the word of God, I neglected the same, loved myself and the world, and therefore this plague and punishment is happily and worthily happened unto me for my sins: and yet I thank God that of his goodness he hath thus given me a time and respite to repent: and now, good people, while I am alive, I pray you assist me with your prayers." And then kneeling down, she turned to Fecknam, saying, "Shall I say this psalm?" and he said, Yea, Then she said the psalm of Miserere mei Deus, in English, in a most devout manner throughout to the end; and then she stood up, and gave her maid, Mrs. Ellen, her gloves and handkerchief, and her book to Mr. Bruges: and then she untied her gown, and the executioner pressed upon her to help her off with it, but she desiring him to let her alone, turned towards her two gentlewomen, who helped her off therewith, and also with her frowes, paaft, and neckerchief, giving to her a fair handkerchief to put about her eyes.

Then the executioner kneeled down and asked her forgiveness, whom she forgave most willingly. Then he desired her to stand upon the straw, which doing, she saw the block. Then she said, I pray you dispatch me quickly.

quickly. Then she kneeled down, saying, Will you take it off before I lay me down? and the executioner said, No, madam. Then she tied the handkerchief about her eyes, and feeling for the block, she said, What shall I do? Where is it? Where is it? One of the standers by guiding her thereunto, she laid her head down upon the block, and then stretching forth her body, said, "Lord, into thy hands I commend my spirit;" and so finished her life, in the year of our Lord 1554, the 12th day of February, about the 17th year of her age.

On the 24th day of February, in the same year, Bonner, bishop of London, sent a commission, directed to all the pastors and curates of his diocese, for the taking of the names of all such as should refuse to come to auricular confession of the Lent following, and to the receiving at Easter.

On the 4th of March following, the queen sent a letter to Bonner, bishop of London, with the following articles annexed, to be put into speedy execution.

QUEEN MARY'S LETTER to BONNER, BISHOP of LONDON.

RIGHT reverend father in God, right trusty and well-beloved, we greet you well. And whereas heretofore in the time of the late reign of our most dear brother king Edward the sixth, whose soul God pardon, divers notable crimes, excesses and faults, with sundry kinds of heresies, simony, adultery, and other enormities have been committed within this our realm, and other our dominions, the same continuing yet hitherto in like disorder since the beginning of our reign, without any correction or reformation at all, and the people both of the laity and also of the clergy, and chiefly of the clergy, have been given to much insolency and ungodly rule, greatly to the displeasure of Almighty God, and very much to our regret and evil acceptation, and to no little slander of other christian realms, and in a manner to the subversion and clean defacing of this our realm; and remembering our duty to Almighty God, to be to foresee (as much as in us may be) that all virtue and godly living shall be embraced, flourish and increase; and therewith also that all vice and ungodly behaviour should be banished and put away, or at the leastwise (so nigh as might be) so bridled and kept under, that godliness and honesty might have the upper hand; understanding by very credible report and public fame, to our no small heaviness and discomfort, that within your diocese, as well in not exempted as exempted places, the like disorder and evil behaviour hath been done and used, like also to continue and increase, unless due provision be had and made to reform the same; which earnestly in very deed we do mind and intend to the uttermost all the ways we can possibly, trusting of God's furtherance and help in that behalf. For these causes and other most just considerations us moving, we send unto you certain articles of such special matters as among other things be most necessary now to be put in execution by you and your officers, extending to the end by us desired, and the reformation aforesaid: wherein ye shall be charged with our special commandment, by these our letters, to the intent you and your officers may the more earnestly and boldly proceed thereunto, without fear of any presumption to be noted in your part or danger to be incurred of any such our laws as by our doing of that is in the said articles contained, might any wise grieve you, whatsoever be threatened in any such case. And therefore we straitly charge and command you, and your said officers, to proceed to the execution of the said articles, without all tract and delay, as ye will answer to the contrary.

Given under our signet, at our palace of Westminster, the third day of March, the first year of our reign.

ARTICLES sent from the QUEEN into the ORDINARY.

FIRST, That every bishop and his officers, with all others having ecclesiastical jurisdiction, shall with all speed and diligence, and all manner of ways to them possible, put in execution all such canons and ecclesiastical laws, heretofore in the time of king Henry the eighth used within this realm of England, and the dominions of the same, not being directly and expressly contrary to the laws and statutes of this realm.

Item, That no bishop, or any of his officers, or other person aforesaid, hereafter in any ecclesiastical writing, in process or other extrajudicial acts, do use to put in this clause or sentence, [supported by royal authority.]

Item, That no bishop, or any of his officers, or other person aforesaid, do hereafter exact or demand in the admission of any person to any ecclesiastical promotion, order, or office, any oath touching the primacy of succession, as of late in few years passed hath been accustomed and used.

Item, That every bishop and his officers, with all other persons aforesaid, have a vigilant eye, and use special diligence and foresight, that no person, be admitted or received to any ecclesiastical function, benefice, or office, being a sacramentary, infected or defamed with any notable kind of heresy, or other great crime; and that the said bishop do stay, and cause to be stayed, as much as lieth in him, that benefices and ecclesiastical promotions do not notably decay, or take hindrance, by passing or confirming of unreasonable leases.

Item, That every bishop, and all other persons aforesaid, do diligently travel for the repressing of heresies and notable crimes, especially in the clergy, duly correcting and punishing the same.

Item, That every bishop, and all the other persons aforesaid, do likewise travel for the condemning and repressing of corrupt and naughty opinions; unlawful books, ballads, and other pernicious and hurtful devices, engendering hatred amongst the people, and discord among the same. And that schoolmasters, preachers, and teachers, do exercise and use their offices and duties without teaching, preaching, or setting forth any evil and corrupt doctrine, and that doing the contrary, they may be by the bishop and his said officers punished and removed.

Item, That every bishop, and all other persons aforesaid, proceeding summarily, and with all celerity and speed, may and shall deprive or declare deprived, and remove, according to their learning and discretion, all such persons from their benefices and ecclesiastical promotions, who contrary to the state of their order, and the laudable custom of the church, have married and used women as their wives, or otherwise notably and slanderously disordered or abused themselves: sequestering also, during the said process, the fruits and profits of the said benefice and ecclesiastical promotions.

Item, That the said bishop, and all other persons aforesaid, do use more lenity and clemency with such as have married, whose wives be dead, than with other whose women do yet remain alive. And likewise such priests, as with the consent of their wives or women openly in the presence of the bishop do profess to abstain, to be used more favourably. In which case, after the penance effectually done, the bishop, according to his discretion and wisdom, may upon just consideration receive and admit them again to their former administration, so it be not in the same place, appointing them them such a portion to live upon, to be paid out of their benefice whereof they be deprived, by discretion of the said bishop or his officer, as he shall think may be spared of the said benefice.

Item, That every bishop, and all other persons aforesaid, do foresee that they suffer not any religious man, having solemnly professed chastity, to continue with his woman or wife, but that all such persons, after deprivation of their benefice or ecclesiastical promotion be also divorced every one from his said woman, and due punishment otherwise taken for the offence therein.

Item, That every bishop, and all other persons aforesaid, do take order and direction with the parishioners of every benefice, where priests do want, to repair to the next parish for divine service, or to appoint for a convenient time, till other better provision may be made, one curate to serve in the room of another, in divers parishes, and to allot to the curate for his labour some portion of the benefice that he so serveth.

Item, That all and all manner of processions of the church be used and frequented, and continued after the old order of the church, in the Latin tongue.

Item, That all such holy days and fasting days be observed and kept, as were observed and kept in the latter time of king Henry the eighth.

Item, That the laudable and honest ceremonies which were wont to be used, frequented, and observed in the church, be also hereafter frequented, used, and observed.

Item, That children be christened by the priest, and confirmed by the bishop, as heretofore hath been accustomed and used.

Item, Touching such persons as were heretofore promoted to any orders, after the new sort and fashion of orders: considering they were not ordered in very deed, the bishop of the diocese, finding otherwise sufficiency and ability in those men, may supply that thing which wanted in them before, and then according to his discretion admit them to minister.

Item, That by the bishop of the diocese an uniform doctrine be set forth by Homilies, or otherwise, for the good instruction and teaching of all people: And that the said bishop and other persons aforesaid, do compel the parishioners to come to their several churches, and there devoutly to hear divine service, as of reason they ought.

Item, That they examine all schoolmasters and teachers of children, and finding them suspected in any wise, to remove them, and place catholic men in their rooms, with a special commandment to instruct their children, so as they may be able to answer the priest at the mass, as hath been accustomed.

Item, That the said bishop, and all other the persons aforesaid, have such regard, respect and consideration of and for the setting forth of the premises, with all kind of virtue, godly living, and good example, with repressing also and keeping under of vice and unthriftiness, as they and every of them may be seen to favour the restitution of true religion; and also to make an honest account and reckoning of their office and cure, to the honour of God, our good content and profit of this our realm, and the dominions of the same.

A like charge also, with articles, was sent from queen Mary to the lord Mayor of London, the fourth day of March, in the same year, who, upon receiving the same, directed his commandment to the aldermen.

About the same year and time that Bonner published his prescript or charge, there came from the queen another proclamation, commanding all foreigners and strangers to depart this realm.

Upon this proclamation, not only the strangers who were received into the realm, for the sake of religion, in king Edward's time, (among whom were Peter Martyr, and John Alasco, the king of Poland's uncle) but many Englishmen also fled, some to Friesland, some to Cleveland, some into high Germany; where they were diversly scattered into different companies and congregations, at Wesel, Frankfort, Basil, Zurich, Geneva, and other places; wherein, by the providence of God, near eight hundred persons were all sustained, and entertained, with much greater kindness by strangers abroad, than they could be in their own country at home.

In the month of March likewise, the lord Courtney, earl of Devonshire, and the queen's sister, by a political trick of Stephen Gardiner, bishop of Winchester, were committed to the Tower, under a pretended suspicion of their having been consenting to Wyatt's conspiracy.

Dr. Ridley having been removed from Fermingham to the Tower; being one day invited to the lord lieutenant's table, had a conference, or conversation, with secretary Bourne, Mr. Fecknam, (the queen's commissioners,) and others, concerning the controversies in religion; the sum whereof, as penned by Dr. Ridley himself, is as follows.

A CONVERSATION that passed in the TOWER at the LORD LIEUTENANT's TABLE, between Dr. RIDLEY, SECRETARY BOURNE, and Mr. FECKNAM.

Mr. Thomas Bridges said, at his brother's the lord lieutenant's table, I pray you, doctors, for my information, tell me what an heretic is. Secretary Bourne said, I will tell you who is an heretic; who so stubbornly and stiffly maintaineth an untruth, he is an heretic. You mean, sir, said I, an untruth in matters of religion, and concerning our faith. Yes, that is true, said he; and in this we are soon agreed. Then said Mr. Fecknam, whom they called master dean of Paul's, sitting at the upper end of the table, I will tell you by St. Augustine who is an heretic, "He that either for the sake of princes, or for the sake of filthy lucre, sets on foot or propagates wrong notions, he is an heretic." Sir, said I, I think St. Augustine added the third number, which is, "Or for the sake of vain-glory." You say even true master doctor, said he, and thus far we did agree all three.

Mr. Fecknam began again, saying, Who so doth not believe what the scripture affirmeth, but will obstinately maintain the contrary, he is an heretic; as in the sacrament of the altar, Matthew doth affirm there to be Christ's body, Mark doth affirm it, Luke affirmeth it, Paul affirmeth it, and none denieth it: therefore to hold the contrary, is heresy. It is the same body and flesh that was born of the virgin; and this is confirmed by unity, antiquity, and universality. For none before Berengarius did ever doubt of this, and he was an heretic, as master doctor there knoweth full well; I do take to witness his own conscience, said he.

In truth, said the secretary, Mr. Fecknam hath spoken well. These are great matters, unity, antiquity, and universality. Do not you think so, Dr. Ridley?

Here, while I seemed unwilling to talk, one of the commissioners said, Peradventure Dr. Ridley doth agree with Mr. Fecknam, and in that case there needs not much debating of the matter.

Sir, said I, in some things I do, and shall agree with him; and in some things which he has spoken, to be plain, I do not agree with him at all. Masters, said I, ye are (as I understand) the queen's commissioners here, and if ye have commission to examine me in these matters, I shall declare unto you plainly my faith; if ye have not, then I shall pray you either to give me leave to speak my mind freely, or else to hold my peace.

There is none here, said the secretary, that doth not favour you: and then every man shewed what favour they bare towards me, and how glad they would be of an agreement.

Taking this shew of courtesy for a licence to speak my sentiments freely, I thus proceeded.

To Mr. Fecknam's arguments of the manifold affirmations where no denial was, I answered; Where is a multitude of affirmations in scripture, and where is one affirmation, all is one concerning the truth of the matter; for that which any one of the evangelists spake, inspired by the Holy Ghost, was as true as that which is spoken of them all. It is as true what John saith of Christ "I am the door of the sheep," as if all had said it. For it is not in scripture as in witness of men, where the number is credited more than one, because it is uncertain with what spirit he doth speak. And where Mr. Fecknam spake of so many, affirming, without any negation, &c. Sir, said I, all they do affirm the thing which they meant. Now if ye take their words, to leave their meaning, then do they affirm what ye take, but not what they meant. If in talk with you, I should so utter my mind in words, that ye by the same do, and may plainly perceive my meaning, and could, if you would be captious, cavil at my words, and writhe them to another sense, I would think ye were no gentle companions to talk with, except ye would take my words as ye perceived I did mean.

Mr. Fecknam perceiving whereunto my discourse tended, said, What circumstances can you shew that shall move me to think of any other sense than as the words plainly say, "This is my body which shall be betrayed for you?"

Sir, said I, even the next sentence that followeth, viz. "Do this in my remembrance." And also by what reason ye say the bread is turned into Christ's carnal body, by the same I may say, that it is turned into his mystical body. For as that saith of it, "This is my body which shall be betrayed for you;" so Paul, who spake by Christ's Spirit, saith, "We being many, are all but one bread and one body, inasmuch as we are partakers of one bread."

Here he called one bread, one loaf, said the secretary. Yes, said I, one loaf, one bread, all is one with me. But what say you of the universality, antiquity, and unity, that Mr. Fecknam spoke of?

I assure you, said I, I think them weighty matters, and to be considered well. As for unity, the truth is before God, I do believe it, and embrace it, so it be with verity, and joined to our head Christ, and such an one as St. Paul speaketh of, saying, "One faith, one God, one baptism." And for antiquity, I am also persuaded that to be true which Irenæus saith, That which is first is true. In our religion Christ's faith was first truly taught by Christ himself, by his apostles, and by many good men, that from the beginning did succeed next unto them; and for this controversy of the sacrament, I am persuaded that those old writers, which wrote before the controversy, and the usurping of the see of Rome, do all agree, if they be well understood in this truth.

Now as for universality, it may have two meanings; one to understand that to be universal, which from the beginning in all ages hath been allowed; another to understand universality for the multitude of our age, or of any other singular age.

No, no, said Mr. Secretary, these three do always agree, and where there is one, there is all the rest: and here he and I changed many words: To be short in this matter, we did not agree.

C H A P. IV.

An AUTHENTIC ACCOUNT of a PUBLIC DISPUTATION, appointed by the QUEEN's special Command in a CONVOCATION held at St. MARY's CHURCH, in OXFORD.

ABOUT the tenth of April, Cranmer archbishop of Canterbury, Ridley bishop of London, and Hugh Latimer, sometime bishop of Worcester, were conveyed as prisoners from the Tower to Windsor, and from thence to the university of Oxford, there to dispute with the divines and learned men of both the universities, Oxford and Cambridge, about the presence, substance, and sacrifice of the sacrament. The names of the university doctors, and graduates, appointed to dispute against them were these: of Oxford, Dr. Weston, prolocutor, Dr. Tresham, Dr. Cole, Dr. Oglethorpe, Dr. Pie, Mr. Harpsfield, and Mr. Fecknam. Of Cambridge, Dr. Young, vice-chancellor, Dr. Glin, Dr. Seaton, Dr. Watson, Dr. Sedgewick, Dr. Atkinson, &c. The articles or questions whereupon they should dispute were these:

1. Whether the natural body of Christ be really in the sacrament after the words spoken by the priest, or not?
2. Whether in the sacrament, after the words of consecration, any other substance do remain, than the substance of the body and blood of Christ?
3. Whether in the mass there be a sacrifice propitiatory for the sins of the quick and the dead?

On Saturday the 7th day of April, the heads of the colleges in Cambridge being assembled together, letters coming down from Stephen Gardiner, lord chancellor, were read with articles therewith annexed, that should be disputed upon at Oxford. Whereupon in the said congregation of the aforesaid university of Cambridge, there was granted first a grace in this form, proposed by the senior proctor; "May it please you to have an instrument made, that the doctrine of these aforesaid articles is sound and catholic, and consonant with the verity of the right meaning faith, and that the same may be approved by your consent and voices?" Secondly, in the said congregation, another grace was given and granted, that Dr. Young being vice-chancellor, Dr. Glin, Dr. Atkinson, Dr. Scot, and Mr. Sedgewick, should go to Oxford to defend the said articles against Canterbury, London, and Latimer: also to have letters to the Oxford-men, sealed with their common seal. Item, Another grace was granted to Mr. Sedgewick to be actual doctor, being thereupon immediately admitted. The aforesaid letters being then drawn out, the third day after, (which was the 11th day of April) were read in the aforesaid congregation house, and there sealed.

The day after, being the 12th of the same month, the doctors of that university set forward to Oxford, where they arrived on the 13th of April, and lodged all at the Cross-inn, with one Wakecline, some time a servant to bishop Bonner.

Soon after their coming, Dr. Crooke presented them with wine for their welcome; and shortly after, two of their beadles came from the vice-chancellor of Oxford, and presented the vice-chancellor of Cambridge with a dish of apples and a gallon of wine: after whom Mr. Pie and Fecknam came next to welcome them. Then after consultation concerning the delivery of their letters, and instrument of grace (which was in Dr. Seaton and Dr. Watson's keeping) they all went to Lincoln college to Dr. Weston the prolocutor, and to Dr. Tresham, the vice-chancellor, to whom they delivered their letters, declaring what they had done touching the articles, letters, and graces. Half an hour after eight they returned to their inn again; but first concluded on a procession, sermon, and convocation, on the day following, and that the doctors of Cambridge should be incorporated with the university of Oxford, and that the doctors of Oxford should be incorporated with the university of Cambridge. The same day, the three prisoners were separated, Dr. Ridley to the house of Mr. Irish, Mr. Latimer to another, and Dr. Cranmer remained still in Bocardo, a prison in Oxford.

On Saturday, April 14, at eight o'clock, the vice-chancellor of Cambridge, with the other doctors of the same university, repairing to Lincoln college again, found the prolocutor above in the chapel, with a company of the house singing mass for the dead, and tarried there until the end. Then having consulted together in the master's room, about nine they all came to the university church, called St. Mary's, where, after a short consultation in a chapel, the vice-chancellor, the prolocutor, &c. of Oxford, caused the vice-chancellor of Cambridge, and the rest of the doctors of that university, to send for their scarlet robes brought from Cambridge, Cambridge, save that Dr. Seaton and Watson borrowed of the Oxford-men. By this time the regents, in the congregation-house, had granted all the Cambridge doctors their graces, to be incorporate there; and so they went up and were immediately admitted, Dr. Oglethorpe presenting them, and the proctor reading the statute, and giving them their oaths.

That done, they all came into the quire, and there held the convocation of the university: they had mass of the Holy Ghost solemnly sung before them by the quire-men of Christ's church; but first the cause of the convocation was opened in English, partly by the vice-chancellor, and partly by the prolocutor, declaring that they were sent by the queen, and wherefore they were sent, and caused Mr. Say the register openly to read the commission. That done, the vice-chancellor read the Cambridge letters openly, and then concluded, that three notaries, Mr. Say for the convocation, a beadle of Cambridge for that university, and one Mr. White for Oxford, should testify of their doing, and then ordered the said notaries to provide parchment, that the whole assembly might subscribe to the articles, except those that had subscribed before in the convocation house at London and Cambridge; and so the vice-chancellor began first, the rest of the Oxford men after him, as many as could in the mass time.

Mass being done, they went in procession to Lincoln college, where they dined with the mayor of the town, one alderman, four beades, Mr. Say, and the Cambridge notary. After dinner they all went again to St. Mary's church; and there, after a short consultation in a chapel, all the commissioners came into the quire, and sat on seats before the altar, to the number of thirty-three persons: and first they sent to the mayor, that he should bring in Dr. Cranmer, who within a while was brought to them with a number of trusty bill-men.

The reverend archbishop, when he was brought before the commissioners, paid his respects to them with much humility, and stood with his staff in his hand, who, notwithstanding having a stool offered him, refused to sit.

The prolocutor caused the articles to be read to him, and a copy to be delivered him, assigning him to answer thereunto on Monday next, and so charged the mayor with him again, to be had to Bocardo, where he was kept before; offering moreover unto him, to name what books he would occupy, and he should have them brought to him. The archbishop was greatly commended of every body for his modesty: inasmuch that some masters of arts were seen to weep for him, which in judgment were contrary to him.

Then was Dr. Ridley brought in, who hearing the articles read to him, immediately replied, they were all false, and said further, that they sprang out of a bitter and sour root.

Then he was asked, whether he would dispute or no? He answered, "That as long as God gave him life, he should not only have his heart, but also his mouth and pen to defend his truth; but he required time and books." They said he could not, and that he should dispute on Thursday, and till that time he should have books. He said it was unreasonable that he might not have his own books and time also. Then they gave him the articles, and desired him to write his mind of them that night; after which, they commanded the mayor to have him from whence he came.

Last of all came in Mr. Latimer, with a handkerchief, and two or three caps on his head, his spectacles hanging by a string at his breast, and a staff in his hand, and was set in a chair; for so was he suffered by the prolocutor. After his denial of the articles, when he had appointed Wednesday for disputation, he alleged age, sickness, disuse and lack of books, saying, "That he was almost as meet to dispute, as to be a captain of Calice: but he would, he said, declare his mind either by writing or word, and would stand to all they could lay upon his back;" complaining moreover, "That he was permitted to have neither pen nor ink, nor yet any book but only the New Testament therein his hand, which he said he had read over seven times deliberately, and yet could not find the mass in it, neither the marrow-bones nor sinews of the same." At which words the commissioners were not a little offended: and Dr. Weston said, "That he would make him grant, that it had both marrow-bones and sinews in the New Testament." To whom Mr. Latimer said again, "That you will never do, Mr. Doctor;" and so forth, with they put him to silence; so that when he was desirous to tell what he meant by those terms, he could not be suffered. There was so great a press and throng of people, that one of the beades swooned by reason thereof, and was carried into the vestry. After this, bringing home the prolocutor first, the Cambridge men, viz. Dr. Young, vice-chancellor, Seaton, Glin, Atkinson, Scot, Watson, and Sedgewick, went to the Cross-inn, to supper. And this was on Saturday the 14th day of April.

At nine o'clock, on Sunday morning, Mr. Harpsfield preached at St. Mary's, the university church, where divers of the doctors, in their robes, were placed in due order of precedency. After sermon, they all dined at Magdalen college, and supped at Lincoln college, with the prolocutor Dr. Weston; whither Dr. Cranmer sent his answer upon the articles, in writing.

ON Monday, Dr. Weston, with all the residue of the visitors, censors, and opponents, repairing to the divinity school, each one installed themselves in their places. Dr. Cranmer with a rout of rusty bills was brought thither, and set in the answerer's place, with the mayor and aldermen sitting by him: where Dr. Weston, prolocutor, apparelled in a scarlet gown, after the custom of the university, began the disputation with this oration:

"You are assembled hither, brethren, this day to confound the detestable heresy of the verity of the body of Christ in the sacrament," &c. At which words thus pronounced, unawares, by the prolocutor, several of the learned men there present considering, and well weighing the words by him uttered, burst out into a great laughter, as though, even in the entrance of the disputation, he had betrayed himself and his religion, by terming the opinion of the verity of Christ's body in the sacrament a detestable heresy. The rest of his oration tended all to this effect, "That it was not lawful, by God's word, to call these questions into controversy: for such as doubted of the words of Christ, might well be thought to doubt both of the truth and power of God." Whereunto Dr. Cranmer, desiring leave, thus answered:

"We are assembled (said he) to discuss these doubtful controversies, and to lay them open before the eyes of the world; whereof ye think it unlawful to dispute. It is indeed no reason that we should dispute of that which is determined upon before the truth be tried. But if these questions be not called into controversy, surely my answer then is looked for in vain." This was the sum of his answer; and this done, he prepared himself for disputation.

Then Chedsey the first opponent began in this manner.

Rev. Mr. Doctor, these three conclusions are put forth unto us at present to dispute upon:

1. In the sacrament of the altar, is the natural body of Christ, conceived of the virgin Mary, and also his blood, present really under the forms of bread and wine, by virtue of God's word pronounced by the priest.

2. There remaineth no substance of bread and wine after the consecration, nor any other substance, but the substance of God and man.

3. The lively sacrifice of the church is in the mass propitiatory, as well for the quick as the dead.

These are the arguments whereupon this our present controversy doth rest. Now to the end we might not doubt how you take the same, you have already given up unto us your opinion thereof. I term it your opinion,

The Bones of the Rev. M^{rs}. Bucer & Thagius burnt 9 Years after their Death at Cambridge

The Convocations of the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge going in pompous Procession to St Mary's Church, OXFORD, in order to maintain a public Disputation (appointed by Queen Mary: April 14. 1555) with those Protestant Worthies, Archbishop Crammer, Bishop Ridley, & Bishop Latimer. Pope's Legate, at Cambridge: Feb 16. 1557 — these two German Divines were invited into England by Archbishop Crammer: to be public Instructors and Preachers, in Cambridge, where they died and were buried, the former in St. Mary's Church, and the latter in St. Michaels, but whose bones in that it disagreeeth from the catholic. Wherefore, thus I argue.

Chedsey. Your opinion differeth from scripture. Therefore, you are deceived.

Cranmer. I deny the antecedent.

Chedsey. Christ, when he instituted his last supper, spake to his disciples, "Take, eat, this is my body which shall be given for you."

But this true body was given for us:

Therefore, his true body is in the sacrament.

The right form of this argument is thus to be framed.

The same which was given for us is in the sacrament.

But his true body was given for us:

Therefore, his true body is in the sacrament.

Cranmer. His true body is truly present to them that truly receive him; but spiritually. And so it is taken in a spiritual sense. For when he said, "This is my body," it is all one as if he had said, "This is the breaking of my body, this is the shedding of my blood." As often as you shall do this, it shall put you in remembrance of the breaking of my body, and the shedding of my blood; that as truly as you receive this sacrament, so truly shall you receive the benefit promised by receiving the same worthily.

Chedsey. Your opinion differeth from the church, which faith that the true body is in the sacrament.

Therefore, your opinion therein is false.

Cranmer. I say and agree with the church, that the body of Christ is in the sacrament effectually, because the passion of Christ is effectual.

Chedsey. Christ, when he spake these words, "This is my body," spake of the substance, but not of the effect.

Cranmer. I grant he spake of the substance, and not of the effect after a sort: and yet it is most true that the body of Christ is effectually in the sacrament. But I deny that he is there truly present in bread, or that under the bread is his original body. And because it would be too tedious (he said) to make discourse of the whole, he delivered up there his opinion thereof to Dr. Weston, written at large, with answers to every one of their three propositions; which he desired Dr. Weston, sitting there on high, to read openly to the people; this he promised to do; but it is not the first promise that such papists have broken. But though the copy of this writing was not read by the prolocutor, we have drawn out the contents thereof, which are as follow:

Dr. CRANMER's EXPLICATION of the foregoing CONCLUSIONS, exhibited by him.

Cranmer. IN the assertions of the church and of religion, trifling and new-fangled novelties of words, so much as may be, are to be eschewed, whereof ariseth nothing but contention and brawling about words; and we must follow, so much as we may, the manner of speaking of the scripture.

In the first conclusion, if ye understand by this word [really] re ipsa, that is, in very deed and effectually; so Christ, by the grace and efficacy of his passion, is indeed and truly present to all true and holy members.

But if ye understand by this word [really] corporaliter, that is, corporally; so that by the body of Christ is understood a natural and organical substance, the first proposition doth vary, not only from the usual phrase of scripture, but also is clean contrary to the holy word of God, and christian profession: since both the scripture doth testify by these words, and also the catholic church hath professed from the beginning, that Christ has left the world, and sits at the right hand of the Father, till he come to judgment.

And likewise I answer to the second question; that is, That it swerveth from the accustomed manner and speech of scripture.

The third conclusion, as it is intricate and wrapped in all doubtful and ambiguous words, and differing also much from the true speech of the scripture, so as the words thereof seem to import no open sense, is most contumelious against our only Lord and Saviour Christ Jesus, and a violating of his precious blood, which, upon the altar of the cross, is the only sacrifice and oblation for the sins of all mankind.

Chedsey. By this your interpretation which you have made upon the first conclusion, this I understand, the body of Christ to be in the sacrament only by the way of participation: inasmuch as we communicating thereof, do participate the grace of Christ; so that you mean hereby only the effect thereof. But our conclusion standeth upon the substance, and not the efficacy only, which shall appear by the testimony both of scripture, and of all the fathers a thousand years after Christ.

And first to begin with the scripture, let us consider what is written in Matt. xxvi. Mark xiv. Luke xxii. and 1 Cor. xi. Matthew saith, As they sat at supper, Jesus took bread, &c. In Mark there is the same sense, although not the same words, who also for one part of the sacrament speaketh more plainly, Jesus taking bread, &c. After the same sense also writeth Luke: And when Jesus had taken bread, &c. In the mouth of two or three witnesses, saith the scripture, standeth all truth. Here we have three witnesses together, that Christ said, that to be his body, which was given for many; and that to be his blood which should be shed for many; whereby is declared the substance, and not only the efficacy alone thereof. Therefore, it is not true that you say, there to be not the substance of his body, but the efficacy alone thereof.

Cranmer. Thus you gather upon mine answer, as though I did mean of the efficacy, and not of the substance of the body; but I mean of them both, as well of the efficacy as of the substance. And forasmuch as all things come not readily to memory, to a man that shall speak extempore, therefore for the more ample and fuller answer in this matter, this writing here I do exhibit.

Archbishop CRANMER's EXPLICATION delivered by him to the PROLOCUTOR in writing.

OUR Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, at the time of his Maundy, preparing himself to die for our cause, that he might redeem us from eternal death, to forgive us all our sins, and to cancel out the hand-writing that was against us; that we through ungrateful oblivion should not forget his death, therefore at the time of his holy supper did institute a perpetual memory of this his death, to be celebrated among christians in bread and wine, according as it is said, "Do this in remembrance of me. And so often as you eat this bread and drink this cup, you shall shew forth the Lord's death till he come." And this remembrance or sacrament of his holy passion, that is, of his body slain, and blood shed, he would all christians to frequent and celebrate in bread and wine, according as he said, "Take, eat, and drink ye all of this." Therefore whosoever for man's tradition denieth the cup of Christ's blood to laymen, they manifestly militate against Christ, forbidding that which Christ commandeth to be done, and are like to those scribes and pharisees of whom the Lord spake; "Ye hypocrites, ye have rejected the commandments of God for your traditions. Well did Esaias prophesy of you, saying, This people honoureth me with their lips, but their heart is far from me. Without cause do they worship me, teaching the doctrines and precepts of men." The sacrament and mystical bread being broken and distributed after the institution of Christ, and the mystical wine being likewise taken and received, are not only sacraments of the flesh of Christ wounded for us, and of his blood shedding, but also most certain sacraments for us, and (as a man would say) seals of God's promises and gifts, and also of that holy fellowship which we have with Christ and all his members. Moreover they are to us memorials of that heavenly food and nourishment, wherewith we are nourished unto eternal life, and the thirst of our burning conscience quenched, and finally, whereby the hearts of the faithful are replenished with unspeakable joy, and corroborated and strengthened unto all works of godliness. "We many are (saith St. Paul) one bread, and one body, body, all we which do participate of one bread, and one cup." And Christ saith, "Eat ye, this is my body." And, "Drink ye, this is my blood." And, "I am the living bread which came down from heaven. He that eateth me, shall also live for ever. Not as your fathers did eat manna in the desert, and are dead; he that eateth me, shall also live for ever."

Thus therefore true bread and true wine remain still in the eucharist, untill they be consumed of the faithful, to be signs, and as seals unto us annexed unto God's promises, making us certain of God's gifts towards us. Also Christ remaineth in them, and they in Christ which eat his flesh, and drink his blood, as Christ himself hath promised: "They that eat my flesh, and drink my blood, abide in me, and I in them." Moreover, he abideth also in them which worthily receive the outward sacrament, neither doth he depart so soon as the sacrament is consumed, but continually abideth, feeding and nourishing us so long as we remain bodies of that head, and members of the same. I acknowledge not here the natural body of Christ, which is only spiritual, unintelligible, and insensible, having no distinction of members and parts in it: but that body only I acknowledge and worship, which was born of the virgin, which suffered for us, which is visible, palpable, and hath all the form, and shape and parts of the true natural body of man. Christ spake not these words of any uncertain substance, but of the certain substance of bread, which he then held in his hands, and shewed his disciples when he said, "Eat ye, this is my body:" and likewise of the cup, when he said, "Drink ye, this is my blood;" meaning verily of that bread which by nature is usual and common with us, which is taken out of the fruit of the ground, compacted by the uniting of many grains together, made by man, and by man's hand brought to that visible shape, being of round compass, and without all sense or life, which nourisheth the body, and strengtheneth the heart of man: of this same bread (I say) and not of any uncertain and wandering substance, the old fathers say that Christ spake these words, "Eat ye, this is my body." And likewise also of the wine, which is the creature and fruit of the vine pressed out of many clusters of grapes, and maketh man's heart merry, of the very same wine (I say) Christ spake, "Drink ye, this is my blood." And so the old doctors do call this speaking of Christ, tropical, figurative, anagogical, allegorical, which they do interpret after this sort, that although the substance of bread and wine do remain, and be received of the faithful, yet notwithstanding Christ changed the appellation thereof, and called the bread by the name of his flesh, and the wine by the name of his blood, not that it is so in very deed, but signified in a mystery. So that we should consider, not what they are in their own nature, but what they import to us and signify, and should understand the sacrament not carnally, but spiritually, and should attend not to the visible nature of the sacraments, neither have respect only to the outward bread and cup, thinking to see there with our eyes no other things but only bread and wine; but that lifting up our minds we should look up to the blood of Christ with our faith, should touch him with our mind, and receive him with our inward man, and that being like eagles in this life, we should fly up into heaven in our hearts, where that Lamb is resident at the right hand of his Father, which taketh away the sins of the world, by whose stripes we are made whole, by whose passion we are filled at his table, and whose blood we receiving out of his holy side, do live for ever, being made the guests of Christ, having him dwelling in us through the grace of his true nature, and through the virtue and efficacy of his whole passion, being no less assured and certified, that we are fed spiritually unto eternal life by Christ's flesh crucified, and by his blood-shed, the true food of our minds, than that our bodies are fed with meat and drink in this life: and hereof this said mystical bread on the table of Christ, and the mystical wine, being administered and received after the institution of Christ, are to us a memorial, a pledge, a token, a sacrament, and a seal.

And thereof it is that Christ saith not thus: This is my body, eat ye: but after he had bidden them eat, then he said, This is my body, which shall be given for you. Which is to be understood as tho' he had said, In eating of this bread, consider you that this bread is no common thing, but a mystical matter; neither do you attend that which is set before your bodily eyes, but what feedeth you within: consider and behold my body crucified for you, that eat and digest in your minds, chew you upon my passion, be fed with my death, this is the true meat, this is the drink that moisteneth, wherewith you being truly fed, and replenished, shall live for ever. The bread and wine when set before your eyes are only declarations of me, but I myself am the eternal food. Wherefore whensoever at this my table you shall behold the sacraments, have not regard so much to them, as consider ye what I promise to you by them, which is myself to be meat for you of eternal life.

The only oblation of Christ (wherewith he offered himself to God the Father once to death, upon the altar of the cross, for our redemption) was of such efficacy, that there is no more need of any sacrifice for the redemption of the whole world, but all the sacrifices of the old law he took away, performing that in very deed, which they did signify and promise. Whosoever therefore shall fix the hope of his salvation in any other sacrifice, he falleth from the grace of Christ, and is contumelious against the blood of Christ. For "He was wounded for our transgressions, and was broken for our iniquities. All we like sheep have wandered astray. Every man hath turned after his own way, and the Lord hath laid all our iniquities upon him. For he hath entered once for all into the holy place by the blood, not of goats or calves, but by his own blood, finding eternal redemption: And hath entered into heaven, to appear now in the sight of God for us, not to offer himself oftentimes (for so should he have suffered many times), but now hath he appeared once to put away sin, through his own oblation. And as it is appointed to all men once to die, so also Christ once was offered: who offering up one oblation for sins, sitteth now for ever on the right hand of God. For by one oblation hath he made perfect for ever those that are sanctified. For where is remission of sins, there is now no oblation for sin," but this only sacrifice of Christ; whosoever shall seek any other sacrifice propitiatory for sin, maketh the sacrifice of Christ of no validity, force, or efficacy. For if it be sufficient to remit sins, what need is there of any other? For the necessity of another argueth and declareth this to be insufficient. Almighty God grant that we may truly lean to one sacrifice of Christ, and that we to him again may repay our sacrifices of thanksgiving, of praise, of confessing his name, of true amendment, of repentance, of mercifulness towards our neighbours, and of all other good works of charity. For by such sacrifices we shall declare ourselves nither ingrateful to God, nor altogether unworthy of his holy sacrifice of Christ. And thus you have out of the testimonies of holy scripture, and of the ancient doctors of the church, the true and sincere use of the Lord's holy supper, and the fruit of the true sacrifice of Christ. Which whosoever through captious or wrested interpretations, or by men's traditions, shall go about, otherwise than Christ ordained them, to alter or transubstantiate, he shall answer to Christ in the latter day, when he shall understand (but then too late) that he hath no participation with the body and blood of Christ, but that out of the supper of eternal life he hath eaten and drunken eternal damnation to himself.

Weston. Because we will not consume and spend the time in waste, this your writing which you exhibit, hereafter shall be read in this place. In the mean season let us now fall to the arguments.

Chedsey. The scriptures in many places do affirm, that Christ gave his natural body, Matth. xxvi. Mark xiv. Luke xxii.

Therefore, I do conclude that the natural body is in the sacrament.

Granmer. To your argument I answer: If you understand stand by the body natural [organicum], that is, having such proportion and members as he had living here, then I answer negatively.

Furthermore, concerning the evangelists, this I say and grant, that Christ took bread, and called it his body.

Chedsey. The text of the scripture maketh against you, for the circumstance thereto annexed doth teach us not only there to be the body, but also teacheth us what manner of body it is, and saith, The same body which shall be given.

That thing is here contained, that is given for us.

But the substance of bread is not given for us.

Therefore, the substance of bread is not here contained.

Cranmer. I understand not yet what you mean by this word [contained]: If you mean really, then I deny your major.

Chedsey. The major is the text of scripture. He that denieth the major, denieth the scripture. For the scripture saith, This is my body which is given for you.

Cranmer. I grant he said it was his body which should be given, but he said it was not his body which is here contained; but the body (saith he) that shall be given for you. As though he should say, This bread is the breaking of my body, and this cup is the shedding of my blood. What will ye say then? Is the bread the breaking of his body, and the cup the shedding of his blood really? If you say so, I deny it.

Chedsey. If you ask what is the thing therein contained; because his apostles should not doubt what body it was that should be given, he saith, This is my body which shall be given for you, and my blood which shall be shed for many. Therefore, here is the same substance of the body, which the day after was given, and the same blood which was shed. And here I urge the scripture, which teacheth that it was no phantastical, no feigned, no spiritual body, nor body in faith, but the substance of the body.

Cranmer. You must prove that it is contained, but Christ said not which is contained. He gave bread and called that his body. I stick not in the words of the scripture, but in your word, which is feigned and imagined by yourself.

Chedsey. When Christ took bread and brake it, what gave he?

Cranmer. He gave bread, the bread sacramentally, and his body spiritually; and the bread there he called his body.

Chedsey. This answer is against the scripture, which saith, that he gave his body.

Cranmer. It did signify that which he did eat.

Chedsey. They did not eat the body as the Capernaïtes did understand it, but the self same body which was given for the sins of the world. Therefore, it was his body which should be given, and his blood which should be shed.

In some other copies (says Mr. Fox) I find this argument to be made by Chedsey.

The same body is in the sacrament, which was given for us on the cross.

But bread was not given for us on the cross.

Therefore bread is not given in the sacrament.

Cranmer. I deny the major, which is, that the same natural body is given in the sacrament, which was given on the cross, except you understand it spiritually. And after he denied also the argument as utterly void, as he might well do, the major in the second figure being not universal.

When Mr. Chedsey had put forth his argument, and prosecuted the same, and Dr. Cranmer answered as before is shewed, Dr. Oglethorpe, one of those doctors which the prolocutor called Censores (who sat as arbiters to order the disputation) said on this wise.

Dr. Oglethorpe. You come in still with one evasion or starting hole to flee to. He urgeth the scriptures, saying, that Christ gave his very body. You say, that he gave his body in bread. Quomodo prædicatur corpus? qualis est corpus? qualis est prædicatio? panis est corpus.

Cranmer. You should say, Quale corpus. I answer to the question: it is the same body which was born of the virgin, was crucified, ascended; but tropically and by a figure. And so I say, Panis est corpus, is a figurative speech, speaking sacramentally, for it is a sacrament of his body.

Oglethorpe. This word [body] being prædicatum, doth signify substance.

But substantia is not predicated denominatively.

Therefore, it is an essential predication, and so it is his true body, and not the figure of his body.

Cranmer. Substantia may be predicated denominatively in an allegory, or in a metaphor, or in a figurative locution.

Oglethorpe. It is not a likely thing that Christ hath less care for his spouse the church, than a wise householder hath for his family in making his will or testament.

Cranmer. Your reason is drawn out of the affairs of men, and not taken out of the holy scriptures.

Oglethorpe. But no householder maketh his testament after that sort.

Cranmer. Yes, there are many that so do. For what matter is it so to be understood and perceived? I say, Christ did use figurative speech in no place more than in his sacraments, and specially in this of his supper.

Oglethorpe. No man of purpose doth use tropes in his testament, for if he do, he deceiveth them that he comprehendeth in his testament: therefore Christ useth none here.

Cranmer. Yes, he may use them well enough. You know not what tropes are.

Oglethorpe. The good man of the house hath respect that his heirs, after his departure, may live in quiet and without wrangling.

But they cannot be in quiet if he do use tropes.

Therefore (I say) he useth no tropes.

Cranmer. I deny your minor.

Weston. Augustine, in his book intituled, De Unitate Ecclesiæ, chap. x. hath these words following:

“What a thing is this, I pray you, when the last words of one lying upon his death-bed are heard which is ready to go to his grave, no man saith that he hath made a lye, and he is not accounted his heir which regardeth not those words. How shall we then escape God's wrath, if either not believing, or not regarding, we shall reject the last words both of the only Son of God, and also of our Lord and Saviour, both ascending into heaven, and beholding from thence, who despiseth, who observeth them not, and so shall come from thence to judge all men.”

The argument is thus formed:

Whosoever saith that the testator lyeth, is a wicked heir.

But whosoever saith that Christ spake by figures saith that he did lye.

Therefore, whosoever saith that Christ here spake by figures, is a wicked heir.

Cranmer. I deny the minor. As who say it is necessary, that he which used to speak by tropes and figures should lye in so doing.

Oglethorpe. Your judgment is disagreeing with all churches.

Cranmer. Nay, I disagree with the papistical church.

Oglethorpe. This you do thro' the ignorance of logic.

Cranmer. Nay, this you say through the ignorance of the doctors.

Weston. I will go plainly to work by scriptures. What took he?

Cranmer. Bread.

Weston. What gave he?

Cranmer. Bread.

Weston. What brake he?

Cranmer. Bread.

Weston. What did he eat?

Cranmer. Bread.

Weston. He gave bread, therefore he gave not his body.

He gave not his body, therefore it is not his body verily, and in deed, and in truth.

Cranmer. I deny the argument.

Cole. This argument holdeth, a desperatis. It is bread; therefore it is not the body. And it is such an argument or reason, as cannot be dissolved.

Cranmer. The like argument may be made. He is a rock: Therefore, he is not Christ.

Cole. It is not alike.

Weston. He gave not his body indeed: Therefore, it was not his body indeed.

Cranmer. He gave his death, his passion, and the sacrament of his passion. And in very deed, setting the figure aside, formally it is not his body.

Weston. Why, then, the scripture is false.

Cranmer. Nay, the scripture is most true.

Weston. This faith Chrysostom, Homil. 61. and pop. Antioch. "Needful it is, dear friends, to tell you what the miracle of the mysteries is, and wherofore it is given, and what profit there is of the thing. We are one body, and members of his flesh and of his bones. We that be in the mystery, let us follow the thing which was spoken. Wherofore that we may become this thing, not only by love, but also that we may become one with that flesh indeed, that is brought to pass by this food, which he gave unto us, minding to shew his great good will that he hath towards us: and therefore he mixed himself with us, and united his own body with us, that we should be made all as one thing together, as a body joined and annexed to the head, for this is a token of most ardent and perfect love. And the same thing Job also insinuating, said of his servants, of whom he was desired above measure, insomuch that they, shewing their great desire towards him, said, Who shall give unto us to be filled with his flesh. Therefore also Christ did the same, who to induce us into a great love towards him, and to declare his desire towards us, did not only give himself to be seen of them, but also to be handled, and eaten. Parents many times give their children to others to be fed; but I do not so, faith Christ, but feed you with my own flesh, and set myself before you. I am become your brother; I took flesh and blood for you. Again, my flesh and blood, by the which I am made your kinsman, I deliver unto you.

Out of which words of St. Chrysostom, I make, said Weston, this argument.

(1) The same flesh whereby Christ is made our brother and kinsman, is given of Christ to us to be eaten.

(2) Christ is made our brother and kinsman, by his true, natural, and origanical flesh.

(3) Therefore this true, natural, and origanical flesh is given to us to be eaten.

Cranmer. I grant the consequence and the consequent.

Weston. Therefore we eat it with our mouth.

Cranmer. I deny it, we eat it through faith.

Weston. He gave us the same flesh to eat, whereby he became our brother and kinsman.

But he became our brother and kinsman, by his true, natural, and origanical flesh.

Therefore he gave his true, natural, and origanical flesh to be eaten.

Cranmer. I grant he took and gave the same true, natural, and origanical flesh wherein he suffered, and yet he feedeth us spiritually and that flesh is received spiritually.

Weston. He gave us the same flesh which he took of the virgin.

But he took not the true flesh of the virgin spiritually, or in a figure.

Therefore, he gave his true natural flesh, not spiritually.

Cranmer. Christ gave to us his own natural flesh, the same wherein he suffered, but feedeth us spiritually.

Weston. Chrysostom is against you, who faith, "Let it come into thy remembrance with what honour thou art honoured, and what table thou fittest at: for with the same thing we are nourished, which the angels do behold and tremble at: neither are they able to behold it without great fear, for the brightness which cometh thereof; and we are brought and compact into one heap or mass with him, being together one body of Christ, and one flesh with him. Who shall speak the powers of the Lord, and shall declare forth all his praises? What pastor hath ever nourished his sheep with his own members? Many mothers have put forth their infants after their birth to other nurses; which he would not do, but feedeth us with his own body, and conjoineth and uniteth us to himself."

Whereupon I gather this argument:

Like as mothers nurse their children with milk, so Christ nourisheth us with his body.

But mothers do not nourish their infants spiritually with their milk:

Therefore, Christ doth not nourish those that be his spiritually with his blood.

Cranmer. He gave us the wine for his blood.

Weston. If he gave the wine for his blood as you say, then he gave less than mothers do give.

But Chrysostom affirmeth, that he gave more than mothers give.

Therefore he gave not the wine for his blood.

Cranmer. You prevent mine answer. He gave wine, yet the blood is considered therein. As for example: when he giveth baptism, we consider not the water, but the Holy Ghost, and remission of sins. We receive with the mouth of the sacrament; but the thing and the matter of the sacrament we receive by faith.

Weston. When Christ said, Eat ye, whether meant he by the mouth or by faith?

Cranmer. He meant that we should receive the body by faith, the bread by the mouth.

Weston. Nay, the body by the mouth.

Cranmer. That I deny.

Weston. I prove it out of Chrysostom, writing upon the 50th psalm.

"She that is a mother, shameth sometimes to play the nurse. But Christ our nurse doth not so play with us. Therefore instead of meat he feedeth us with his own flesh, and instead of drink he feedeth us with his own blood." Likewise upon the xxvi. chap. of Matthew, the 83d Homily, he saith, "For it shall not be enough for him to become man, and in the mean time to be whipped; but he doth bring us into one mass or lump with himself (as I may so call it), and maketh us his body, not by faith alone, but also in very deed.

Cranmer. I grant we make one nature with Christ. But that to be done with the mouth I deny.

Weston. Chrysostom, 2 Cor. chap. xiii. Hom. 29. hath these words, "No little honour is given to our mouth, receiving the body of the Lord.

Cranmer. This I say, that Christ entereth into us both by our ears and by our eyes. With our mouth we receive the body of Christ, and tear it with our teeth, that is to say, the sacrament of the body of Christ. Wherofore I say and affirm, that the virtue of the sacrament is much: and therefore Chrysostom many times speaketh of sacraments no otherwise, than of Christ himself, as I could prove if I might have liberty to speak, by many places of Chrysostom, where he speaketh of the sacrament of the body of Christ.

With which word of the sacrament of the body, &c. Dr. Cole being highly offended, denied it to be the sacrament of the body of Christ, save only of the mystical body which is the church.

Cranmer. And why should we doubt to call it the sacrament of the body of Christ, offered upon the cross, seeing both Christ and the ancient fathers do so call it?

Cole. How gather you that of Chrysostom?

Cranmer. Chrysostom declareth himself, "O miracle, O the good will of God towards us, which sitteth above at the right hand of the Father, and is holden in men's hands at the time of sacrifice, and is given to feed upon, to them that are desirous of him! And that is brought to pass by no subtilty or craft, but with the open and beholding eyes of all the standers-by."

Thus you hear Christ is seen here on earth every day, is touched, is torn with the teeth, that our tongue is red with his blood; which no man having any judgment will say or think to be spoken without trope or figure.

Weston. What miracle is it if it be not his body, and if he spake only of the sacrament, as though it were his body

But

But hearken what Chrysostom saith, "I shew forth that thing on earth unto thee, which is worthy the greatest honour. For like as in the palace of kings, neither the walls, nor the sumptuous bed, but the body of kings sitting under the cloth of estate, and royal seat of majesty, is of all things else the most excellent: so is in like manner the King's body in heaven, which is now set before us on earth. I shew thee neither angels nor archangels, nor the heaven of heavens, but the very Lord and Master of all these things. Thou perceivest after what sort thou dost not only behold, but touchest, and not only touchest, but eatest that which on the earth is the greatest and chiefest thing of all other, and when thou hast received the same, thou goest home; wherefore cleanse thy soul from all uncleanness."

Upon this I conclude, that the body of Christ is shewed us upon the earth.

Cranmer. What? upon the earth? He is seen here with the eyes of our mind only, with faith and spirit.

Weston. What is it that seemeth worthy of the highest honour on earth? The sacrament or the body of Christ?

Cranmer. Chrysostom speaketh of the sacrament, and the body of Christ is shewed forth in the sacrament.

Weston. Therefore, the sacrament is worthy greatest honour.

Cranmer. I deny your argument.

Weston. That thing is shewed forth, and is now on the earth, which is worthy highest honour.

But only the body of Christ is worthy highest honour.

Therefore, the body of Christ is now on the earth.

Cranmer. I answer, the body of Christ is on the earth, in the sacrament, only so as the Holy Ghost is in the water of baptism.

Weston. Chrysostom saith, Ostendo, "I shew forth," which noteth a substance to be present.

Cranmer. That is to be understood sacramentally.

Weston. He saith, Ostendo in terra, "I shew forth on earth," declaring the place where.

Cranmer. That is to be understood figuratively.

Weston. He is shewed forth, and is now on the earth, &c. as before.

Cranmer. Your major and conclusion are one and the same.

Weston. But the major is true: Therefore the conclusion is also true.

That thing is on the earth, which is worthy of highest honour.

But no figure is worthy of highest honour.

Therefore, that which is on earth is no figure.

Here Weston called upon Dr. Cranmer, to answer one part, bidding him to repeat his words; which when he went about to do, such was the noise and uproar in the divinity school, that his mild voice could not be heard. For when he went about to declare to the people how the prolocutor did not well English the words of Chrysostom, using for ostenditur in terra, "he is shewed forth on the earth," est in terra, "he is on the earth," whereas Chrysostom hath not est, nor any such word of being on the earth, but only of shewing, as the grace of the Holy Ghost, in baptismo ostenditur, "is shewed forth in baptism:" and oftentimes he did inculcate this word ostenditur. Then the prolocutor stretching forth his hand, set on the rude people to cry out at him, filling all the school with hissing, clapping of hands, and noise, calling him unlearned, unskilful, and impudent. Which impudent and reproachful words this reverend man most patiently and meekly did abide, as one that had been inured with the suffering of such like reproaches. And when the prolocutor, not yet satisfied with rude and unseemly demeanour, did urge and call upon him to answer the argument, then he desired the notary to repeat his words again.

Notary. That which is worthy most high honour, here I shew forth to thee on earth.

The body of Christ is worthy highest honour.

Therefore, he shewed forth the body of Christ here on earth.

No. 4.

Cranmer. That is shewed forth here on earth which may be seen, which may be touched, and which may be eaten; but these things be not true of the body.

Cole. Why should not these things be true of the body of Christ?

Cranmer. The major out of Chrysostom is true, meaning in the sacraments: for, in the sacrament, the true body of Christ, and not the figurative body, is set forth.

Weston. Shew me somewhat on earth worthy greatest honour.

Cranmer. I cannot, but in the sacrament only.

Weston. Therefore, the sacrament is worthy greatest honour.

Cranmer. So it is.

Weston. Judges, let it be written.

Cranmer. I pray you, let my answer be written likewise: I affirm that the body of Christ is shewed forth unto us. It is our faith that seeth Christ.

Weston. Ostendo tibi, "I shew to thee," saith Chrysostom, not to thy faith.

Cranmer. He speaketh sacramentally.

Weston. Therefore Chrysostom lyeth: for he saith, "I Chrysostom do shew;" but he can shew nothing sacramentally.

Chedsey. By force of argument we are brought to this point, that the body of Christ is proved to be on earth, not only sacramentally, but in very deed also, by this reason, that it is worthy of highest honour. The reason is indissoluble.

Cranmer. I never heard a more vain argument, and it is most vain; also it hath my answer unto it.

Chedsey. Will you affirm, that it is absurd which Chrysostom saith, that the body of Christ is touched?

I touch the body of Christ in the sacrament, as Thomas touched Christ.

"Thomas touched Christ, saying, "My Lord and my God!"

Therefore, that which he touched was the Lord, the God.

Cranmer. I deny your argument. He touched not God, but him who was God. Neither is it sound doctrine to affirm, that God is touched.

Chedsey. This is because of the union; so that God is said to be touched, when Christ, who is both God and Man, is touched.

Tertullian, speaking of the resurrection of the body, saith, "Let us consider as concerning the proper form of the christian man, what great prerogative this vain and foul substance of our's hath with God. Although it were sufficient to it, that no soul could ever get salvation, unless it believe while it is in the flesh: so much the flesh availeth to salvation: by the which flesh it cometh, that whereas the soul is so linked unto God, it is the said flesh that causeth the soul to be linked: yet the flesh moreover is washed, that the soul may be cleansed; the flesh is anointed, that the soul may be consecrated; the flesh is signed, that the soul may be defended; the flesh is shadowed by the imposition of hands, that the soul may be illuminated with the Spirit; the flesh doth eat the body and blood of Christ, that the soul may be fed of God." Whereupon I gather this argument.

The flesh eateth the body of Christ.

Therefore, the body of Christ is eaten with the mouth.

Phoceus also, 1 Cor. chapter xi. upon these words, "Is guilty of the body and blood," declareth, "That like as Judas betrayed him, and the Jews were fierce and spiteful against him; so do they dishonour him, who receive his holy body with their impure hands, and as the Jews did hold him then, do now receive him with impure mouths. And whereas he often maketh mention of the body and blood of the Lord, he declareth, that it is not simply man that is sacrificed, but even the Lord himself, being the maker of all things, hereby (as it were) making them afraid."

Therefore, the body of Christ is touched with the hands.

Cranmer. You vouch two authors against me upon sundry things. First, I must answer Tertullian, and then the other.

K

Chedsey.

Chedsey. They tend both to one meaning.

Cranmer. Unto Tertullian I answer, (because our disputation is wandering and uncertain) that he calleth that the flesh which is the sacrament. For although God works all things in us invisibly beyond men's reach, yet they are so manifest, that they may be seen and perceived of every sense. Therefore he setteth forth baptism, unction, and last of all the supper of the Lord unto us, which he gave to signify his operation in us. The flesh liveth by the bread, but the soul is inwardly fed by Christ.

Weston. Stick to those words of Tertullian, "The body eateth, that the soul may be fed."

Chedsey. The flesh eateth the body of Christ, that the soul may be fed therewith.

Weston. Here you see two kinds of food, of the soul and of the body.

Chedsey. He saith, that not only the soul, but the flesh also is fed.

Cranmer. The soul is fed with the body of Christ, the body with the sacrament.

Chedsey. Is the soul fed with the body of Christ, and not with the sacrament?

Cranmer. Read that which followeth, and you shall perceive, that by things external, an operation internal is understood. Inwardly we eat Christ's body, and outwardly we eat the sacrament. So one thing is done outwardly, another inwardly. Like as in baptism, the external element, whereby the body is washed, is one; the internal thing, whereby the soul is cleansed, is another.

Young. This disputation is taken in hand, that the truth might appear. I perceive that I must go another way to work than I had thought. It is a common saying, against those who deny principles, we must not dispute; therefore, that we may agree of the principles, I demand, whether there be any other body of Christ, than his instrumental body?

Cranmer. There is no natural body of Christ, but his organical body.

Young. Again, I demand, whether sense and reason ought to give place to faith?

Cranmer. They ought.

Young. Thirdly, whether Christ be true in all his words?

Cranmer. Yes, he is truth itself.

Young. Fourthly, whether Christ, at his supper, minded to do that which he spake, or no?

Cranmer. In saying he spake, but in saying he made not, but made the sacrament to his disciples.

Young. Answer according to the truth, whether did Christ that as God and Man which he spake, when he said, "This is my body?"

Cranmer. This is sophistical cavilling. There is some deceit in these questions.

Young. I demand, whether Christ by these words wrought any thing, or no?

Cranmer. He did institute the sacrament.

Young. But answer, whether he did work any thing?

Cranmer. He did work in instituting the sacrament.

Young. Now I have you; for before you said, it was a figurative speech.

But a figure worketh nothing.

Therefore, it is not a figurative speech. A liar ought to have a good memory.

Cranmer. I understood your sophistry before. You by working understand converting into the body of Christ: but Christ wrought the sacrament, not in converting, but in instituting.

Young. Woe be to them, who make Christ a deceiver. Did he work any other thing than he spake, or the self-same thing?

Cranmer. He wrought the sacrament, and by these words he signified the effect.

Young. A figurative speech is no working thing.

But the speech of Christ is working.

Therefore, it is not figurative.

Cranmer. It worketh by instituting, not by converting.

Young. The thing signified in the sacrament, is it not the sacrament?

Cranmer. It is. For the thing is ministered in a sign. He followeth the letter that taketh the thing for a sign. Augustine separateth the sacrament from the thing. The sacrament (saith he) is one, and the thing of the sacrament another.

Weston. Stick to this argument.

It is a figurative speech.

Therefore, it worketh nothing.

Young. But the speech of Christ is a working thing.

Therefore, it is not figurative.

Cranmer. Oh how many crafts are in this argument! they are mere fallacies; I said not, that the words of Christ do work, but Christ himself; and he worketh by a figurative speech.

Weston. If a figure work, it maketh of bread the body of Christ.

Cranmer. A figurative speech worketh not.

Weston. A figurative speech, by your own confession, worketh nothing.

But the speech of Christ in the supper (as you grant) wrought somewhat.

Therefore, the speech of Christ in the supper was not figurative.

Cranmer. I answer, these are mere sophisms. The speech doth not work, but Christ by the speech doth work the sacrament.

I look for scriptures at your hands, for they are the foundation of disputations.

This disorderly disputation, concluding with an universal cry of Vincit veritas, continued almost till two o'clock. Which being finished, and the arguments written, and delivered into the hands of Mr. Say; the prisoner, Dr. Cranmer, was had away by the mayor, and the doctors dined sumptuously together, at the university college.

A SECOND DISPUTATION at OXFORD, between Dr. RIDLEY, Dr. SMITH, &c.

THE next day, being April 12th, Dr. Ridley was brought forth to dispute; against whom Dr. Smith was appointed principal opponent. It may be proper to observe of Dr. Smith, that he had often changed his sentiments; but not from a principle of conscience, or real conviction, as will appear from his articles by him recanted.

Besides Dr. Smith, there were other opponents; Dr. Weston, Dr. Tresham, Dr. Oglethorp, Dr. Glin, Dr. Seaton, Dr. Cole, Dr. Watson, Mr. Ward, Mr. Harpsfield, Mr. Pye, Mr. Harding, Mr. Curton, and Mr. Fecknam: all of whom Dr. Ridley answered very learnedly.

The SPEECH of Dr. WESTON, PROLOCUTOR, at the Commencement of the DISPUTATION.

Good Christian People and Brethren!

WE have begun this day our school, by God's good speed I trust, and are entering into a controversy, whereof no question ought to be moved concerning the verity of the body of our Lord Jesus Christ in the Eucharist. Christ is true, which said the words. The words are true which he spake, yea, truth itself that cannot fail. Let us therefore pray unto God to send down unto us his Holy Spirit, which is the true interpreter of his word; which may purge away errors, and give light, that verity may appear. Let us also ask leave and liberty of the church to permit the truth received to be called this day in question without any prejudice to the same. Your parts thereof shall be to implore the assistance of Almighty God, to pray for the prosperity of the queen's majesty, and to give us quiet and attentive ears. Now go to your question.

Dr. Smith. This day (right learned Mr. Doctor) three questions are propounded, whereof no controversy among christians ought to be moved, to wit:

1. Whether the natural body of Christ our Saviour, conceived of the virgin Mary, and offered for man's redemption upon the cross, is verily and really in the sacrament by virtue of God's word spoken by the priests, &c.

2. Whether in the sacrament, after the words of consecration, be any other substance, &c.

3. Whether

3. Whether in the mass be a sacrifice propitiatory, &c.

Touching which questions, although you have publicly declared your judgment on Saturday last: yet I will again demand your answer on the first question; upon which I stand here now to hear what may be answered.

Dr. RIDLEY's INTRODUCTORY DECLARATION, or PROTESTATION.

I Received of you the other day, right worshipful Mr. Prolocutor, and you my reverend masters, commissioners from the queen's majesty and her honourable council, three propositions; whereunto ye commanded me to prepare against this day, what I thought good to answer concerning the same.

Now whilst I weighed with myself how great a charge of the Lord's flock was of late committed unto me, for which I am certain I must once render an account to my Lord God, (and how soon he only knoweth) and that moreover, by the commandment of the apostle Peter, I ought to be ready always to give a reason of the hope that is in me, with meekness and reverence, unto every one that shall demand the same: besides this, considering my duty to the church of Christ, and to your worships, being commissioners by public authority; I determined with myself to obey your commandment, and so openly to declare unto you my mind touching the aforesaid propositions. And albeit, plainly to confess unto you the truth in these things which ye now demand of me, I have thought otherwise in times past than now I do, yet (God I call to record upon my soul, I lye not) I have not altered my judgment, as now it is, either by constraint of any man, or laws, either for the dread of any dangers of this world, either for any hope of commodity; but only for the love of the truth revealed unto me by the grace of God (as I am undoubtedly persuaded) in his holy word, and in the reading of the ancient fathers.

These things I do rather recite at this present, because it may happen to some of you hereafter, as in times past it hath done to me: I mean, if ye think otherwise of the matters propounded in these propositions than I now do, God may open them unto you in time to come.

But howsoever it shall be, I will in a few words do that which I think ye all look I should do; that is, as plainly as I can, I will declare my judgment herein. Howbeit, of this I would ye were not ignorant, that I will not indeed wittingly and willingly speak in any point against God's word, or dissent in any one jot from the same, or from the rules of faith, or christian religion: which rules that same most sacred word of God prescribeth to the church of Christ, whereunto I now and for ever submit myself and all my doings. And because the matter I have now taken in hand is weighty, and ye all well know how unready I am to handle it accordingly, as well for lack of time, as also lack of books; therefore here I protest, that I will publicly this day require of you, that it may be lawful for me concerning all mine answers, explications, and confirmations, to add or diminish whatsoever shall seem hereafter more convenient and meet for the purpose, through more sound judgment, better deliberation, and more exact trial of every particular thing. Having now, by the way of preface and protestation, spoken these few words, I will come to the answer of the propositions propounded unto me, and so to the most brief explication and confirmation of my answers.

The FIRST PROPOSITION.

In the sacrament of the altar, by the virtue of God's word spoken of the priest, the natural body of Christ born of the virgin Mary, and his natural blood, is really present under the forms of bread and wine.

BISHOP RIDLEY's ANSWER.

In matters appertaining to God, we may not speak according to the sense of man, nor of the world: therefore this proposition or conclusion is framed after another manner of phrase, or kind of speech, than the scripture useth. Again, it is very obscure and dark, by means of sundry words of doubtful signification. And being taken in the sense which the schoolmen teach, and at this time the church of Rome doth defend, it is false and erroneous, and plainly contrary to the doctrine which is according to godliness.

The EXPLICATION.

How far the diversity and newness of the phrase in all this first proposition is from the phrase of the holy scripture, and that in every part almost, it is so plain and evident to any one who is but meanly exercised in holy writ, that I need not now (especially in this company of learned men) spend any time therein, except the same shall be required of me hereafter.

First, there is a double sense in these words, "By virtue of God's word," for it is doubtful what word of God this is, whether it be that which is read in the evangelists, or in Paul, or any other. And if it be that which is in the evangelists, or in St. Paul, what that is. If it be in none of them, then how it may be known to be God's word, and of such virtue that it should be able to work so great a matter.

Again, there is a doubt of these words, "of the priest," whether no man may be called a priest; but he which hath authority to make a propitiatory sacrifice for the quick and the dead; and how it may be proved that this authority was committed of God to any man, but to Christ alone.

It is likewise doubted after what order the sacrificing priest shall be, whether after the order of Aaron, or else after the order of Melchisedek. For as far as I know, the holy scriptures doth allow no more.

Moreover, there is ambiguity in this word [really,] whether it be taken as the logicians term it "transcender," that is, most generally, and so it may signify any manner of thing which belongeth to the body of Christ, by any means: after which sort we also grant Christ's body to be really in the sacrament of the Lord's supper, (as in disputation, if occasion be given, shall be declared) or whether it be taken to signify the very same thing, having body, life, and soul, which was assumed and taken of the word of God, into the unity of person. In which sense, seeing the body of Christ is really in heaven, because of the true manner of his body, it may not be said to be here on the earth. There is yet a further doubtfulness in these words, [under the forms of bread and wine,] whether the forms be there taken to signify the only accidental and outward shews of bread and wine; or therewithal the substantial natures thereof, which are to be seen by their qualities, and perceived by the exterior senses.

Now the error and falseness of the proposition, after the sense of the Roman church and schoolmen, may hereby appear, in that they affirm the bread to be transubstantiated and changed to the flesh assumed of the word of God, and that (as they say) by virtue of the word, which they have devised by a certain number of words, and cannot be found in any of the evangelists, or in St. Paul, and so they gather that Christ's body is really contained in the sacrament of the altar. Which position is grounded upon the foundation of the transubstantiation; which foundation is monstrous, against reason, and destroyeth the analogy or proportion of the sacraments: and therefore this proposition also, which is built upon this rotten foundation, is false, erroneous, and to be counted as a detestable heresy of the sacramentaries.

The CONFIRMATION of the aforesaid ANSWER.

There ought no doctrine to be established in the church of God, which dissenteth from the word of God, from the rule of faith, and draweth with it many absurdities that cannot be avoided.

But this doctrine of the first proposition is such.

Therefore, it ought not to be established and maintained in the church of God.

The major, or first part of my argument is plain; and the minor, or second part, is proved thus:

The doctrine maintaineth a real, corporal, and carnal presence of Christ's flesh, assumed and taken of the word, in the sacrament of the Lord's supper, and that not by virtue and grace only, but also by the whole essence and substance of the body and flesh of Christ.

But

But such a presence disagreeeth from God's word, from the rule of faith, and cannot but draw with it many absurdities.

Therefore, the second part is true.

The first part of this argument is manifest, and the second may yet farther be confirmed thus,

The SECOND PROPOSITION.

After the consecration there remaineth no substance of bread and wine, neither any other substance, than the substance of God and man.

The ANSWER.

The second conclusion is manifestly false, directly against the word of God, the nature of the sacrament, and the most evident testimonies of the godly fathers; and it is the rotten foundation of the other two conclusions propounded by you, both of the first, and also of the third. I will not therefore now tarry upon any further explication of this answer, being contented with that which is already added before to the answer of the first proposition.

The CONFIRMATION of this ANSWER.

It is very plain by the word of God, that Christ did give bread unto his disciples, and called it his body.

But the substance of bread is another manner of substance, than is the substance of Christ's body, God and man.

Therefore the conclusion is false.

That which Christ did take, on the which he gave thanks, and the which he brake, he gave to his disciples, and called it his body.

But he took bread, gave thanks on bread, and brake bread.

Therefore, the first part is true. And it is confirmed with the authorities of the fathers, Irene, Tertullian, Origen, Cyprian, Epiphanius, Jerom, Augustin, Theodoret, Cyril, Rabanus, and Bede. Whose places I will take upon me to shew most manifest in this behalf, if I may be suffered to have my books, as my request is.

Bread is the body of Christ.

Therefore, it is bread.

As the bread of the Lord's table is Christ's natural body, so is his mystical body.

But it is not Christ's mystical body by transubstantiation.

Therefore, it is not his natural body by transubstantiation.

We may no more believe bread to be transubstantiate into the body of Christ, than the wine into his blood.

But the wine is not transubstantiate into his blood.

Therefore, neither is that bread therefore transubstantiate into his body.

The words of Christ spoken upon the cup, and upon the bread, have like effect and working.

But the words spoken upon the cup, have not virtue to transubstantiate.

Therefore, it followeth, that the words spoken upon the bread have no such virtue.

The circumstances of the scripture, the analogy and proportion of the sacraments, and the testimony of the faithful fathers, ought to rule us in taking the meaning of the holy scripture touching the sacrament.

But the words of the Lord's supper, the circumstances of the scripture, the analogy of the sacraments, and the sayings of the fathers, do most effectually and plainly prove a figurative speech in the words of the Lord's supper.

Therefore, a figurative sense and meaning is specially be received in these words, "This is my body."

The circumstances of the scripture are, "Do this in remembrance of me. As oft as ye shall eat of this bread, and drink of this cup, ye shall shew forth the Lord's death. Let a man prove himself, and so eat of this bread, and drink of this cup. They came together to break bread; and they continued in breaking of bread. The bread which we break, &c. For we being many, are all one bread and one body," &c.

The THIRD PROPOSITION.

In the mass is the lively sacrifice of the church, propitiatory and available for the sins as well of the quick as of the dead.

The ANSWER to this PROPOSITION.

I answer to this third proposition as I did to the first. And moreover I say, that being taken in such sense as the words seem to import, it is not only erroneous, but withal so much to the derogation and defacing of the death and passion of Christ, that I judge it may and ought most worthily to be counted wicked and blasphemous against the most precious blood of our Saviour Christ.

The EXPLICATION.

Concerning the Romish mass which is used at this day, or the lively sacrifice thereof, propitiatory and available for the sins of the quick and the dead, the holy scripture has not so much as one syllable.

There is ambiguity also in the name of [mass,] what it signifieth, and whether at this day there be any such indeed as the ancient fathers used; seeing that now there be neither Catechists nor Penitentes to be sent away.

Again, touching these words, [the lively sacrifice of the church] there is doubt whether they are to be understood figuratively and sacramentally, for the sacrament of the lively sacrifice, (after which sort we deny it not to be in the Lord's supper) or properly and without any figure; of the which manner there was but one only sacrifice, and that once offered, namely upon the altar of the cross.

Moreover, in these words, [as well as,] it may be doubted whether they be spoken in mockage, as men are wont to say in sport, of a foolish and ignorant person, that he is apt as well in conditions as in knowledge; being apt indeed in neither of them both.

There is also a doubt in the word [propitiatory,] whether it signify here that which taketh away sin, or that which may be made available for the taking away of sin, that is to say, whether it is to be taken in the active, or in the passive signification.

ARGUMENTS confirming his ANSWER.

(1) No sacrifice ought to be done, but where the priest is meet to offer the same.

(2) All other priests are unmeet to offer propitiatory sacrifices, save only Christ.

(3) Therefore, no other priests ought to sacrifice for sin, but Christ alone. See Heb. chap. v.

The second part of my argument is thus proved.

(1) No honour in God's church ought to be taken, where a man is not called, as Aaron was.

(2) It is a great honour in God's church to sacrifice for sin.

(3) Therefore no other priest but Christ ought to sacrifice for sin, who only was called to that honour.

FIRST ARGUMENT.

(1) That thing is in vain, and to no effect, where there is no necessity it should be done.

(2) To offer up any more sacrifice propitiatory for the quick and the dead, there is no necessity: for Christ our Saviour did that fully and perfectly once for all.

(3) Therefore, to do the same in the mass, is in vain.

SECOND ARGUMENT.

(1) After that eternal redemption is found and obtained, there needeth no more daily offering for the same.

(2) But Christ coming an high bishop, &c. found and obtained for us eternal redemption.

(3) Therefore, there needeth now no more daily oblation for the sins of the quick and the dead.

THIRD ARGUMENT.

(1) All remission of sins cometh only by shedding of blood.

(2) In the mass there is no shedding of blood.

(3) Therefore, in the mass there is no remission of sins: and so it followeth also that there is no propitiatory sacrifice.

FOURTH ARGUMENT.

In the mass, the passion of Christ is not in verity, but in a mystery representing the same: yea, even there where the Lord's supper is duly ministered.

But

But where Christ suffereth not, there is he not offered in verity: for the apostle saith, "Not that he might offer up himself often times (for then must he have suffered often times since the beginning of the world:)" now where Christ is not offered, there is no propitiatory sacrifice.

Therefore, in the mass there is no propitiatory sacrifice: "For Christ appeared once in the latter end of the world, to put sin to flight by the offering up of himself. And as it is appointed to all men that they shall once die, and then cometh the judgment; even so Christ was once offered, to take away the sins of many. And unto them that look for him shall he appear again without sin unto salvation." See Heb. chap. ix.

FIFTH ARGUMENT.

Where there is any sacrifice that can make the comers thereunto perfect, there ought men to cease from offering any more expiatory and propitiatory sacrifices.

But in the New Testament there is one only sacrifice now already long since offered, which is able to make the comers thereto perfect for ever.

Therefore, in the New Testament they ought to cease from offering any more propitiatory sacrifices.

SENTENCES of SCRIPTURE, tending to the same END and PURPOSE; from whence also may be gathered other manifest ARGUMENTS.

"By the which will (saith the apostle) we are sanctified, by the offering up of the body of Jesus Christ once for all." And in the same place, "But this man, after that he had offered one sacrifice for sin, sitteth for ever at the right hand of God, &c. For with one offering hath he made perfect for ever them that are sanctified, and by himself hath he purged our sins." I beseech you to mark these words, [by himself,] the which, well weighed, will, without doubt, put an end to all controversy. See Heb. chap. x.

The apostle plainly denieth any other sacrifice to remain for him that treadeth under his feet the blood of the testament, by the which he was made holy. Christ will not be crucified again, he will not his death to be had in derision. "He hath reconciled us in the body of his flesh." Mark, I beseech you, he saith not, in the mystery of his body; but in the body of his flesh." See Coloss. chap. i.

"If any man sin, we have an advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ the righteous, and he is the propitiation for the sins of the whole world," 1 John, chap. ii.

I know that all these places of the scripture are avoided by two manner of subtle evasions: the one is, by the distinction of the bloody and unbloody sacrifice; as though our unbloody sacrifice of the church were any other than the sacrifice of praise and thanksgiving; than a commemoration, a shewing forth, and a sacramental representation of that one only bloody sacrifice, offered up once for all.

The other is, by depraving and wresting the sayings of the ancient fathers unto such a strange kind of sense, as the fathers themselves indeed never meant. For what the meaning of the fathers was, is evident by that which St. Augustine writeth in his epistle to Boniface, and in the 83d chapter of his ninth book against Faustus the Manichee, besides many other places; likewise by Eusebius, Emisene, Cyprian, Chrysostom, Fulgentius, Bertram, and others, who do wholly agree together in this unity in the Lord, that the redemption, once made in verity for the salvation of man, continueth in full effect for ever, and worketh without ceasing unto the end of the world; that the sacrifice once offered cannot be consumed; that the Lord's death and passion is as effectual, the virtue of that blood once shed, as fresh at this day for the washing away of sins, as it was even the same day that it flowed out of the blessed side of our Saviour; and finally, that the whole substance of our sacrifice, which is frequented of the church in the Lord's supper, consisteth in prayers, praise, and giving of thanks, and in remembering and shewing forth of that sacrifice, once offered upon the altar of the cross: that the same might continually be had in reverence by mystery, which once only, and no more, was offered for the price of our redemption.

These are things (right worshipful Mr. Prolocutor, and ye the rest of the commissioners) which I could presently prepare, to the answering of your three propositions, being destitute of all help in this shortness of time, sudden warning, and want of books. Wherefore I appeal to my first protestation, most humbly desiring the help of the same (as much as may be) to be granted unto me. And because ye have lately given most unjust and cruel sentence against me, I do here appeal (so far forth as I may) to a more indifferent and just censure and judgment of some other superior, competent, and lawful judge, and that according to the approved state of the church of England. Howbeit, I confess, that I am ignorant what that is at this present, through the trouble and alteration of the state of the realm. But if this appeal may not be granted to me upon earth, then do I fly (even as to my only refuge and alone haven of health) to the sentence of the eternal judge, that is, of the Almighty God, to whose most merciful justice towards us, and most just mercifulness, I do wholly commit myself and my cause, nothing at all despairing of the defence of mine advocate and alone Saviour Jesus Christ, to whom, with the everlasting Father, and the Holy Spirit, the sanctifier of us all, be now and for ever all honour and glory. Amen.

We shall now proceed to the ARGUMENTS and ANSWERS between Dr. SMITH and BISHOP RIDLEY.

Dr. Smith. You have occasioned me to go otherwise to work with you, than I had thought to have done. Methinks, in your supposition, you did abuse the testimonies of scripture concerning the ascension of Christ, to take away his presence in the sacrament, as though this were a strong argument in your favour.

Christ did ascend into heaven.

Therefore he is not in the sacrament.

Now therefore I will go about to disprove this reason of your's.

Christ's ascension is no bar to his real presence in the sacrament.

Therefore, you are deceived, whereas you do ground yourself upon those places.

Ridley. You import as though I had made a strong argument by Christ's going up into heaven. But howsoever mine argument is made, you collect it not rightly. For it doth not only stay upon his ascension, but upon his abiding there also.

Smith. Christ's going up to heaven, and his abiding there, hinder not his real presence in the sacrament.

Therefore, you are deceived.

Ridley. Of Christ's real presence there may be a double understanding: if you take the real presence of Christ according to the real and corporeal substance which he took of the virgin, that presence being in heaven, cannot be on the earth also. But if you mean a real presence, according to some thing that appertaineth to Christ's body, certainly the ascension and abiding in heaven hinder not at all that presence. Wherefore Christ's body after that manner is here present to us in the Lord's supper; by grace I say, as Epiphanius speaketh it.

Weston. I will cut off from henceforth all equivocation and doubt. For whensoever we speak of Christ's body, we mean that which he took of the virgin.

Ridley. Christ's ascension and abiding in heaven cannot stand with his presence.

Smith. Christ appeared corporally and really on the earth, for all his ascension and continual abode in heaven unto the day of doom.

Therefore, his ascension and abiding in heaven, are no bar to his real presence in the sacrament.

Ridley. Mr. Doctor, this argument is nothing worth, I do not straightly tie Christ up in heaven, that he may not come into the earth at his pleasure. For when he will, he may come down from heaven, and be on the earth, as it liketh himself. Howbeit, I do affirm, That it is not possible for him to be both in heaven and earth at one time.

Smith. Mark, I pray you, my masters that be here, diligently, what he answereth. First he saith, That the sitting of Christ at the right hand of his Father, is a bar to the real presence of his body in the sacrament, and then afterwards he flieth from it again.

Ridley. I would not have you think that I do imagine or dream upon any such manner of sitting, as these men here sit in the school.

Smith. Therefore, it is lawful for Christ then to be here present on the earth, when he will himself.

Ridley. Yea, when he will, it is lawful indeed.

Smith. Therefore, he ascending into heaven, doth not restrain his real presence in the sacrament.

Ridley. I do not gainsay, but that it is lawful for him to appear on the earth when he will: but prove you that he will.

Smith. Then your answer dependeth upon the will of Christ, I perceive: therefore, I will join again with you in that short argument.

Christ, notwithstanding he doth always abide in heaven after his ascension, was seen really and corporally on earth.

Therefore, notwithstanding his ascension and continually sitting at the right hand of his Father, he may be really and corporally in the sacrament.

Ridley. If the notaries should so record your argument, as you have framed it, you peradventure would be ashamed of it hereafter.

Smith. Christ after his ascension was seen really and corporally upon the earth.

Therefore, notwithstanding his ascension and abiding with his Father, he may be corporally in the sacrament.

Ridley. I grant the antecedent, but I deny the consequence.

Smith. Do you grant the antecedent?

Ridley. Yes, I grant the antecedent. I am content to let you have so much. Because I know that there be certain ancient fathers of that opinion. I am well content to let you use that proposition as true. And I will frame the argument for you.

He was seen on earth after his ascension.—

Smith. Nay, nay, I will frame it myself.

Christ after his ascension was seen really and corporally on earth, albeit he do abide in heaven continually.

Therefore, notwithstanding his ascension and continual abiding at the right hand of the father, he may be really and corporally on the earth.

Ridley. Let us first agree about the continual sitting at the right hand of the Father.

Smith. Doth he so sit at the right hand of his Father, that he doth never forsake the same?

Ridley. Nay, I do not bind Christ in heaven so straightly. I see you go about to beguile me with your equivocations. Such equivocations are to be distinguished. If you mean by his sitting in heaven, to reign with his Father, he may be both in heaven and also on earth. But if you understand his sitting to be after a corporal manner of sitting, so is he always permanent in heaven. For Christ to be corporal here on earth, when corporally he is resident in heaven, is clean contrary to the holy scriptures, as Augustine saith; "The body of Christ is in heaven, but his truth is dispersed in every place."

Now, if continually he abide in heaven after the manner of his corporal presence, then his perpetual abiding there stoppeth or hindereth that the same corporal presence of him cannot be in the sacrament.

Smith. Acts iii. we read that Christ shall sit perpetually at the right hand of God until the consummation of the world.

Weston. I perceive you are come here to this issue, whether the body of Christ may be together both on earth and in heaven. I will tell you, that Christ in very deed is both on earth and in heaven together, and at one time, both one and the same natural Christ, after the verity and substance of his very body: therefore, &c.

Ridley. I deny the antecedent.

Weston. I prove it by two witnesses. First by Chrysostom: Do we not offer every day? we do so indeed, but doing it for the remembrance of his death. And this offering is one, and not many. And how is it one and not many, which was offered in the holy place? This sacrifice is a pattern of that: the self same we always offer: not now as offering one lamb to day, and another to morrow; but always one and the same lamb. Wherefore here is but one sacrifice; for else by this means, seeing there be many sacrifices in many places, be there many Christs? Not so, but one Christ in all places, both perfect here, and perfect there, one only body." Now thus I argue.

We offer one thing at all times.

There is one Christ in all places; both here complete and there complete.

Therefore, by Chrysostom there is one body both in heaven and earth.

Ridley. I remember the place well. These things make nothing against me.

Weston. One Christ is in all places, here full and there full.

Ridley. One Christ is in all places; but not one body in all places.

Weston. One body, saith Chrysostom.

Ridley. But not after the manner of bodily substance he is in all places, nor by circumscription of place. For (hic et illic,) "here and there," in Chrysostom, do assign no place, as Augustine saith; "The Lord is above, but the truth of the Lord is in all places."

Weston. You cannot so escape. He saith not the verity of Christ is one: but one Christ is in all places, both here and there.

Ridley. One sacrifice is in all places, because of the unity of him whom the sacrifice doth signify: not that the sacrifices be all one and the same.

Weston. Therefore, by your saying it is not Christ, but the sacrifice of Christ.

But Chrysostom saith, "One body and one Christ is there, and not one sacrifice."

Ridley. I say, that both Christ and the sacrifice of Christ is there: Christ by Spirit, grace and verity; the sacrifice by signification.

Thus much I grant with Chrysostom, that there is one host or sacrifice, and not many: and this our host is called one, by reason of the unity of that one, which one only all our hosts do represent. That only host was never any other but that which was once offered on the altar of the cross, of which all our hosts are but sacramental examples.

And where you alledge out of Chrysostom, that Christ is offered in many places at once, both here full Christ, and there full Christ; I grant it to be true, that is, that Christ is offered in many places at once, in a mystery and sacramentally, and that he is full Christ in all those places, but not after the corporal substance of our flesh which he took, but after the benediction which giveth life; and he is given to the godly receivers in bread and wine, as Cyril speaketh concerning the oblation of Christ, whereof Chrysostom here speaketh, he himself doth clearly shew what he meaneth thereby, in saying by the way of correction, "We always do the self same, howbeit by the recordation, or remembrance of his sacrifice."

Weston. The second witness is Bernard, who saith, in a sermon on the supper of our Lord, "How cometh this to us, most gentle Jesus, that we silly worms creeping on the face of the earth, that we, I say, who are but dust and ashes, may deserve to have thee present in our hands, and before our eyes, who both together, full and whole, dost sit at the right hand of the Father, and who also in the moment of one hour, from the rising of the sun to the going down of the same, art present one and the self same in many and divers places?"

Ridley. These words of Bernard make for you nothing at all. But I know that Bernard was in such a time, that in this matter he may worthily be suspected. He hath many good and faithful sayings; as also in the same place by you alledged. But yet he followed in such an age, as when the doctrine of the holy supper was perverted.

verted. Notwithstanding I will so expound him, rather than reject him, that he shall make nothing for you. He saith, That we have Christ in a mystery, in a sacrament, under a veil or cover, but hereafter shall have him without veil or cover. In the mean time, here now he saith, That the verity of Christ is every-where. The verity of Christ is both here and there, and in all places.

Weston. What do you call verity? He saith not the verity of Christ, but the verity of the body of Christ.

Ridley. The verity of the body of Christ is the true faith of the body of Christ: after that verity he is with them which truly believe upon him.

Weston. Christ is one and the same in divers places. I urge these words, [in divers places,] and yet I am not satisfied.

Smith. Christ was seen really and corporally on the earth after his ascension, and continually sitting at the right hand of the Father.

Therefore, the ascension and perpetual sitting in heaven hinder nothing, but that he may be really and corporally in the sacrament.

Ridley. If by perpetual sitting you mean the residence of his body in heaven, your reason containeth manifest contradiction.

Smith. These two have no contradiction in them at all, both to sit continually at his Father's right hand, and also to be seen here really on earth after his ascension. First, you will allow, that Christ sitteth in heaven at the right hand of his Father. For so it is written, Acts v. "Heaven must needs receive him until the time of the restoring of all," &c. Secondly, He was also seen of Paul here corporally on earth.

Wherefore these two do import, as ye see, no contradiction.

Ridley. What hindereth, but that Christ, if it please him, and when it pleaseth him, may be in heaven and on earth, and appear to whom he will? And yet notwithstanding you have not yet proved that he will so do. And though Christ continually shall be resident in heaven until the judgment, yet there may be some intermission, notwithstanding. But this controversy, as I said, is amongst all the ancient doctors and writers. And that Christ hath been seen, that they grant all: but whether he was then on earth or in heaven, that is doubtful.

Smith. I will prove that he would appear on earth.

He so would, and also did appear here on earth after his ascension: therefore, &c.

Ridley. He appeared I grant: but how he appeared, whether then being in heaven or on earth, that is uncertain. So he appeared to Stephen, being then corporally sitting in heaven. For speaking after, the true manner of man's body, when he is in heaven, he is not the same time on earth; and when he is on earth, he is not the same time corporally in heaven.

Smith. Christ hath been both in heaven and on earth all at one time.

Therefore, you are deceived in denying that.

Ridley. I do not utterly deny Christ here to have been seen on earth. Of uncertain things I speak uncertainly.

Smith. He was seen of Paul, as being born before his time, after his ascending up to heaven, 1 Cor. xv.

But his vision was a corporal vision.

Therefore, he was seen corporally upon the earth after his ascending into heaven.

Ridley. He was seen really and corporally indeed: but whether being in heaven or earth, is a doubt. And of doubtful things we must judge doubtfully. Howbeit, you must prove that he was in heaven at the same time, when he was corporally on earth.

Smith. I would know of you, whether this vision may enforce the resurrection of Christ?

Ridley. I account this a sound and firm argument to prove the resurrection. But whether they saw him in heaven or on earth, I am in doubt: and to say the truth, it maketh no great matter. Both ways the argument is of like strength. For whether he were seen in heaven, or whether he were seen on earth, either of both maketh sufficiently for the matter. Certain it is, he rose again; for he could not have been seen, unless he had risen again.

Smith. Paul saw him as he was here conversant on earth, and not out of heaven, as you affirm.

Ridley. You run to the beginning again: that you take for granted, which you should have proved.

Smith. You make delays for the purpose.

Ridley. Say not so, I pray you. Those that hear us are learned: they can tell both what you oppose, and what I answer well enough, I warrant you.

Tresham. He was seen after such sort, as that he might be heard.

Therefore, he was corporally on the earth, or else how could he be heard?

Ridley. He that found the means for Stephen to behold him in heaven, even he could bring to pass well enough that Paul might hear him out of heaven.

Smith. As others saw him, so Paul saw him.

Others did see him visibly and corporally on earth.

Therefore Paul saw him visibly and corporally on earth.

Ridley. I grant he was seen visibly and corporally: but yet have you not proved that he was seen on earth.

Smith. He was seen of him as of others.

But he was seen of others being on earth, and appeared visibly to them on earth.

Therefore, he was seen of Paul on earth.

Ridley. Your controversy is about [existens in terra] that is, "being on earth:" if [existere,] "to be," be referred as unto the place, I deny that Christ after that sort was on earth. But if it be referred as to the verity of the body, then I grant it. Moreover, I say, that Christ was seen of men on earth after his ascension, is certain: for he was seen of Stephen; he was seen also of Paul. But whether he descended unto the earth, or whether he being in heaven did reveal or manifest himself to Paul, when Paul was wrapt into the third heaven, I know that some contend about it: and the scripture, as far as I have read or heard, doth not determine it. Wherefore we cannot but judge uncertainly of those things which be uncertain.

Smith. We have Egesippus and Linus against you, which testify that Christ appeared corporally on the earth to Peter after his ascension. "Peter overcome with the requests and mournings of the people, which desired him to get him out of the city, because of Nero's lying in wait for him, began without company to convey himself away from thence: And when he was come to the gate, he seeth Christ come to meet him, and worshipping him, he said, Master, whither walk you? Christ answered, I am come again to be crucified." Linus, writing of the passion of Peter, hath the self same story. St. Ambrose hath the same likewise, and also Abdias, scholar to the apostles, which saw Christ before his ascending into heaven. With what face therefore dare you affirm it to be a thing uncertain, which these men do manifestly witness to have been done?

Ridley. I said before that the doctors in that matter did vary.

Smith. Do you think this story is not certain, being approved by so ancient and probable authority?

Ridley. I do so think, because I take and esteem not their words for the words of scripture. And though I did grant you that story to be certain, yet it maketh not against me.

Smith. Such things as are certain, and approved of them, you do reject as things uncertain.

Ridley. The story of Linus is not of so great authority: although I am not ignorant that Eusebius so writeth also in the story of the church. And yet I account not these men's reports so sure as the canonical scriptures. But if at any time he had to any man appeared here on the earth after his ascension, that doth not disprove my saying. For I go not about to tie Christ up in fetters, (as some do untruly report of us; but that he may be seen upon the earth according to his divine pleasure, whensoever it pleaseth him. But we affirm, That it is contrary to the nature of his manhood, and the true manner of his body, that he should be together and at one instant both in heaven and earth, according to his corporal substance. And the perpetual sitting at the right hand of the Father, may (I grant) be taken for the stability of Christ's kingdom, and his continual or everlasting equality with his Father in the glory of heaven.

Smith. Now whereas you boast that your faith is the very faith of the ancient church; I will shew here that it is not so, but that it doth directly strive against the faith of the old fathers. I will bring in Chrysostom for this point. "Eliseus received the mantle as a right great inheritance. For it was indeed a right excellent inheritance, and more precious than any gold beside. And the same was a double Elias: he was both Elias above, and Elias beneath. I know well, you think that just man to be happy, and you would gladly be every one of you as he is. What will you then say, if I shall declare unto you a certain other thing, which all we, that are indued with these holy mysteries, do receive much more than that? Elias, indeed, left his mantle to his scholar: but the Son of God, ascending, did leave here his flesh unto us. Elias left it, putting off the same: but Christ both left it to us, and ascended also to heaven, having it with him."

Ridley. I grant that Christ did both: that is, both took up his flesh with him ascending up, and also did leave the same behind him with us, but after a two-fold manner and respect. For he took his flesh with him, after the true and corporal substance of his body and flesh; again, he left the same in mystery to the faithful in the supper, to be received after a spiritual communication, and by grace. Neither is the same received in the supper only, but also at other times, by hearing the gospel, and by faith. For the bread which we break is the communication of the body of Christ: and generally, unless ye eat the flesh of the Son of Man, and drink his blood, ye shall have no life in you.

Smith. Chrysostom saith, "O miracle, O the good will of God! He that sitteth above at the sacrifice time, is contained in the hands of men." Or else as others have translated it thus, "O miracle, O the gentleness of God! He that sitteth above with the Father, is handled with the hands of all men at the very same moment of time, and doth himself deliver himself to them that are desirous to take and embrace him."

Ridley. He that sitteth there is here present in mystery and by grace, and is holden of the godly, such as communicate him, not only sacramentally with the hand of the body, but much more wholesomely with the hand of the heart, and by inward drinking is received; but by the sacramental signification he is holden of all men.

Seaton. Where is then the miracle, if he be only present through his grace and mystery only?

Ridley. Yes, there is a miracle, good sir; Christ is not idle in his sacraments. Is not the miracle great, when bread, which is wont to sustain the body, becometh food to the soul? He that understandeth not that miracle, understandeth not the force of that mystery. God grant we may every one of us understand his truth, and obey the same.

Smith. Chrysostom calleth it a miracle, that Christ sitteth at the right hand of God in heaven, and at the same time is held in the hands of men: not that he is handled with the hands of men: only in a mystery, and is with them through grace. Therefore while you deny that, you are altogether deceived, and stray far from the truth.

Harpsfield. The former part of Chrysostom is not to be let slip. Let me, before I begin, ask this one question of you. Is it not a great matter that Elias left his cloak or mantle, and the gift of his prophecy to his scholar?

Ridley. Yes, surely, it is a great matter.

Harpsfield. Did not Elias then leave great grace!

Ridley. He did so.

Harpsfield. But Christ left a far greater grace than Elias: for he could not both leave his cloak and take it with him; Christ doth both in his flesh.

Ridley. I am well content to grant, that Christ left much greater things to us than Eliasto Eliseus, although he be said to have left his double spirit with him; for that the strength and grace of the body of Christ, which Christ ascending up here left us, is the only salvation and life of all men which shall be saved: which life Christ hath here left unto us, to be received by faith through the hearing of the word, and the right administration of the sacraments. This virtue and grace Chrysostom, after the phrase and manner of John the evangelist, calleth Christ's flesh.

Harpsfield. But Christ performed a great matter. He carried up, and left behind. You understand not the comparison. The comparison is in this, That Elias left his mantle, and carried it not with him; Christ left his flesh behind him, and carried it with him also.

Ridley. True it is, and I myself did affirm no less before. Now where you seem to speak many things, indeed you bring no new things at all. Let there be a comparison between grace and grace, then Christ gave the far greater grace, when he did insert or graft us into his flesh.

Harpsfield. If you will give me leave, I will ask you this question. If Chrysostom would have meant so, that Christ left his body in the eucharist, what plainer words think you, or more evident, could he have used than these?

Ridley. These things be not of so great force, as they bear a great shew outwardly. He might also have used grosser words, if he had listed to have uttered his mind so grossly, for he was an eloquent man. Now he speaketh after the manner of other doctors, which of mystical matters speak mystically, and of sacraments, sacramentally.

Harpsfield. The comparison lieth in this; That which was impossible to Elias, is possible with Christ.

Ridley. I grant that was possible to Christ, which was to the other impossible. Elias left his cloak: Christ both left his flesh, and took it with him.

Harpsfield. Elias left behind him, and could not take with him: Christ both left behind him, and also took with him: except you will say the comparison here made to be nothing.

Ridley. He took up his flesh with him to heaven, and left here the communion of his flesh on earth.

Weston. You understand in the first place his flesh for very true flesh; and in the second place for grace, and communion of his flesh: and why do you not understand it in the second place also for his true flesh? I will make it evident how blockish and gross your answer is.

Ridley. These be taunts and reproaches, not befitting, as I think, the modesty of this school.

Weston. Elias left his cloak to his disciples: but the Son of God going up to heaven, left his flesh. But Elias certainly left his cloak behind, and Christ likewise his flesh, and yet ascending he carried the same with him too. By which words we make this reason:

Christ left his flesh to his disciples, and yet, for all that, he took the same up with him.

Therefore, he is present here with us.

Here Dr. Weston speaking to the people in English, said unto them, Dr. Ridley answereth it after this manner;

He carried his flesh into heaven, and he left here the communion of his flesh behind. Assuredly the answer is too unlearned.

Ridley. I am glad you speak in English. Surely, I wish that all the whole world might understand your reasons and my answers. He left his flesh. This you understand of his flesh, and I understand the same of grace. He carried his flesh into heaven, and left behind the communion of his flesh unto us.

Weston. Ye judges, what think you of this answer?

Judges. It is a ridiculous and very weak answer.

Ridley. Well, I take your words patiently for Christ's cause.

Weston. Weston here citeth, "We are sprinkled with the blood of Christ."

Ridley. Mr. Doctor, it is the same blood, but yet spiritually received, and, indeed, all the prophets were sprinkled with the same blood, but yet spiritually I say, and by grace. And whosoever they be that are not sprinkled with this blood, they cannot be partakers of the everlasting salvation.

Weston. Here (speaking again to the people) I bring Bernard unto you. "Even from the west unto the east, from from the north unto the south, there is one and the self same Christ in many and divers places."

Ridley. The answer is soon made, that one Christ is here and in divers places. For God, according to his majesty, and according to his providence, as St. Austin saith, is every-where with the godly, according to his indivisible and unspeakable grace. Or else, if ye would understand Bernard according to the corporal presence, how monstrous, or huge, and giant-like a body would you then make Christ's body to be, which would reach even from north to south, from west to east?

Weston. Nay, nay, you make a monstrous answer, and unlearned.

Ward. Before I come in with those reasons which I had purposed to bring against you, I am minded to come again to Mr. Doctor's argument, by which you being brought into the briars, seemed to doubt of Christ's presence on the earth. To the proof of which matter I will bring nothing else, than that which was agreed upon in the catechism of the synod of London, set out not long ago by you.

Ridley. Sir, I give you to understand, before you go any further, that I did set out no catechism.

Weston. Yes, you made one subscribe to it, when you were a bishop in your ruff.

Ridley. I compelled no man to subscribe.

Ward. Yes, truly, you are the very author of that heresy.

Ridley. I put forth no catechism.

Cole. Did you never consent to the setting out of those things which you allowed?

Ridley. I grant that I saw the book; but I deny that I wrote it. I perused it after it was made, and I noted many things for it. So I consented to the book: I was not the author of it.

Judges. The catechism is so set forth, as though the whole convocation house had agreed to it. Cranmer said yesterday, that you made it.

Ridley. I think surely, that he would not say so.

Ward. The catechism hath this clause; "If visibly on the earth."

Ridley. I answer, That those articles were set out, I both knowing and consenting to them. Mine own hand will testify the same, and Mr. Cranmer put his hand to them likewise, and gave them to others afterwards. Now, as for the place which you alledged out of it, that may be easily expounded, and without any inconvenience.

Ward. Christ is the power and virtue of his Father.

Therefore, he was not of so little strength, that he could not bring to pass whatsoever he would himself.

Ridley. Granted.

Ward. Christ was the wisdom of the Father.

Therefore, what he spoke he spoke wisely, and so as every man might understand: neither was it his mind to speak one thing instead of another.

Ridley. All this I grant.

Ward. Christ was likewise the very truth: Therefore, he made and performed indeed that which he intended to make. And likewise it is, that he doth neither deceive, nor could be deceived, nor yet would go about to deceive others.

Weston. Hilarius hath these words, "All God's words or sayings are true, and neither idly placed, nor unprofitably, but fiery, and wonderful fiery, without all doubtfulness of superfluous vanity, that there may be nothing thought to be there, which is not absolute and proper."

Ward. He is the truth of the Father: Therefore, he can neither deceive, nor yet be deceived; especially I mean when he spoke at his latter end, and his testament.

Ridley. Christ is the very truth of the Father: and I perceive well to what scope you drive your reason. This is but a far fetch compass of words. If these words of Christ, "This is my body," which you mean, be rightly understood, they are most true.

Ward. He took, he brake, he gave, &c. What took he?

Ridley. Bread, his body.

Ward. What brake he?

Ridley. Bread.

No. 4.

Ward. What gave he?

Ridley. Bread.

Ward. Gave he bread made of wheat, and material bread?

Ridley. I know not whether he gave bread of wheat; but he gave true and material bread.

Ward. I will prove the contrary by scripture.

(1) He delivered to them that which he bade them take.

(2) But he bade not them take material bread, but his own body.

(3) Therefore, he gave not material bread, but his own body.

Ridley. I deny the minor. For he bade them take his body sacramentally in material bread: and after that sort it was both bread which he bade them take, because the substance was bread, and it was also his body, because it was the sacrament of his body, for the sanctifying and coming of the Holy Ghost, which is always assistant to those mysteries which were instituted of Christ, and lawfully administered.

Harpfield. What is he that so saith, By the coming unto of the Holy Spirit?

Ridley. I have Theophylact for mine author for this manner of speaking. And here I bring him, that ye may understand that phrase not to be mine, upon Matthew xxvi. Furthermore, the said Theophylact writing upon these words, "This is my body," sheweth, that the body of the Lord is bread, which is sanctified on the altar.

Oglethorpe. That place of Theophylact maketh openly against you. For he saith in that place, that Christ said not, This is the figure of my body, but my body. For, saith he, by an unspeakable operation it is transformed, although it seem to us to be bread.

Ridley. It is not a figure, that is to say, "Non tantum est figura;" that is, "It is not only a figure of his body."

Weston. Where have you that word [tantum] "only."

Ridley. It is not in that place, but he hath it in another, and Augustine doth so speak many times, and other doctors also.

Weston. (Here Weston, repeating the words of Theophylact in English, said,) He saith it is no figure, and you say it is a figure.

And the same Theophylact saith moreover, that the converting or turning of the bread is made into the Lord's flesh.

That which Christ gave, we do give.

But that which he gave was not a figure of his body.

Therefore, we give no figure, but his body.

(Concerning the authority of Theophylact, what he thought, and might have spoken of that author, Doctor Ridley did not then speak, nor could conveniently (as he himself afterwards declared, reporting, and writing with his own word the disputations in the prison) because of the uproars and clamours, which were so great, and he of so many called upon, that he could not answer as he would, and what he thought touching the authority of Theophylact, but answered simply to that which is brought out of that author in this manner.)

Ridley. I grant, the bread to be converted and turned into the flesh of Christ, not by transubstantiation, but by a sacramental conversion or turning. It is transformed, saith Theophylact, in the same place, by a mystical benediction, and by the accession or coming of the Holy Ghost unto the flesh of Christ. He saith not, by expulsion or driving away the substance of bread, and by substituting or putting in its place the corporal substance of Christ's flesh. And where he saith, It is not a figure of the body, we should understand that saying, as he himself doth elsewhere add, (only,) that is, it is no naked or bare figure only. For Christ is present in his mysteries, neither at any time, as Cyprian saith, doth the Divine Majesty absent himself from the divine mysteries.

Weston. You put in (only,) and that is one lye. And I tell you farther, Peter Martyr was fain to deny the author, because the place was so plain against him. But mark his words, how he saith, It is no figure, but his flesh.

N

Ridley.

Ridley. To take his words, and not his meaning, is to do injury to the author.

Ward. No other doctor maketh more against you: for his words are, "Turned from one element into another." And shewing the cause why it is in form of bread, he saith, "Because we are infirm, and abhor to eat the raw flesh, especially the flesh of man; therefore it appeareth bread, but it is flesh."

Ridley. That word hath not that strength which you seem to give it. You strain it overmuch, and yet it maketh not so much for your purpose. For the same author hath in another place, "We are transelemented, or transformed into the body of Christ." And so by that word, in such a meaning as you speak of, I could prove as well that we are transformed indeed into the very body of Christ.

Ward. Learned doctor, thus you expound the place, "This is my body;" that is a figure of my body.

Ridley. Although I know there be some that so expound it, yet that exposition is not full to express the whole.

Ward. My sheep hear my voice, and follow me.

But all the sheep of Christ hear this voice, "This is my body," without a figure.

Therefore, the voice of Christ here hath no figure.

Ridley. The sheep of Christ follow the voice of Christ, unless they be seduced and deceived through ignorance.

Ward. But the fathers took this place for no figurative speech.

Ridley. Yet they do all number this place among figurative and tropical speeches.

Ward. Justine Martyr, in his second apology, hath this passage (which place Cranmer hath corrupted), "For we do not take this for common bread and drink, but like as Jesus Christ our Saviour incarnate by the word of God, had flesh and blood for our salvation; even so we are taught, the food wherewith our flesh and blood is nourished by alteration, when it is consecrated by the prayer of his word, to be the flesh and blood of the same Jesus incarnate."

Dr. Cranmer hath thus translated it; "Bread, water, and wine, are not to be taken as other common meats and drinks be, but they are ordained purposely to give thanks to God, and therefore are called Eucharistia, and likewise the body and blood of Christ; and that it is lawful for none to eat and drink of them, but such as profess Christ, and live according to the same; and yet the same meat and drink is changed into our flesh and blood, and nourisheth our bodies."

Ridley. O good Mr. Doctor, go sincerely to work: I know that place, and I know how it is used.

Ridley. O what upright dealing is this! I have the self same place of Justine here copied out. You know yourself who are skillful in Greek, how the words here be removed out of the right place, and without any just cause.

Ward. I stand still upon mine argument. What say you?

Ridley. If you will that I should answer to Justine, then you must hear. I have but one tongue, I cannot answer at once to you all.

Weston. Christ gave us his very and true flesh to be eaten.

But he never gave it to be eaten but in his last supper, and in the sacrament of the altar.

Therefore, there is the very flesh of Christ.

Ridley. If you speak of the very true flesh of Christ, after the substance of his flesh taken in the womb of the virgin Mary, and not by grace and spiritually, I then do deny the first part of your reason. But if you understand it of the true flesh, after grace and spiritual communication, I then grant the first part, and deny the second. For he giveth unto us truly his flesh, to be eaten of all that believe in him. For he is the very and true meat of the soul, wherewith we are fed unto everlasting life, according to his saying, "My flesh is meat indeed," &c.

Ward. "I have desired with my hearty desire to eat

this paschal with you." What paschal, I pray you, desired he to eat? Did he understand by this paschal the Judaical lamb? or that which he gave afterwards in his own supper?

Ridley. I suppose that the first he understood of the Judaical passover, and afterwards of the eucharist.

Ward. Tertullian is against you, who saith, "He desired to eat this passover."

But the Judaical passover was not his, but strange from Christ.

Therefore, he meant not the Judaical passover."

Ridley. The Judaical passover was not strange from Christ, but his own; for he is Lord of all; as well of the Judaical passover, as of his own supper.

Tertullian may here play with an analogical sense. I know Cyprian hath these words, "He began then to institute the holy eucharist, but both were Christ's."

Ward. Augustine, in Psalm xcvi. writing upon these words, "Worship his footstool," &c. "I ask (saith he) what is the foot-stool of his feet? and the scripture telleth me, The earth is the foot-stool of my feet. And I turn myself to Christ, because I seek him here on the earth, and find how, without impiety, the foot-stool of his feet may be worshipped; for he took earth of earth, in that he is flesh and earth; and of the flesh of Mary he took flesh, because in the same flesh he here walked; and he also gave the same flesh to us to be eaten unto salvation. But no man eateth that flesh, except he hath worshipped before. And so it is found, how such a foot-stool of the Lord is to be worshipped, so that not only we sin in not worshipping, but also do sin in not worshipping the same."

He gave to us his flesh to be eaten, the which he took of the earth, in which also here he walked, &c.

But he never gave his flesh to be eaten, but when he gave it at his supper, saying, "This is my body."

Therefore, in the eucharist he gave his flesh.

Ridley. You do alledge the place of Austin, where he, saith, that Christ gave his flesh to be eaten which he took of the earth, and in which here he walked, inferring herefrom, that Christ never gave the same his flesh to be eaten, but only in the eucharist. I deny your minor; for he gave it both in the eucharist to be eaten, and also otherwise, as well in the word, as also upon the cross.

Smith. What if Augustine say, that Christ did not only give himself to us in figure, but gave his own very flesh indeed and really?

Ridley. I never said that Christ gave only a figure of his body. For indeed he gave himself in a real communication, that is, he gave his flesh after a communication of his flesh.

[Here Weston read the place of Augustine in English, and afterwards said thus:]

Weston. You say, Christ gave not his body, but a figure of his body.

Ridley. I say not so; I say he gave his own body verily. But he gave it by a real, effectual, and spiritual communication.

[After this, Dr. Glin began to reason, who, (notwithstanding Dr. Ridley had always taken him for his old friend) made a very contumelious preface against him. This preface Dr. Ridley therefore did the more take to heart, because it proceeded from him. But he thought that Dr. Glin's mind was to serve the time. For, afterwards, he came to the house wherein Dr. Ridley was kept, and as far as Dr. Ridley could call to remembrance, before Dr. Young and Dr. Oglethorp, he desired him to pardon his words. With this Dr. Ridley complied, even from his very heart, and wished earnestly, that God would give not only to him, but unto all others, the true and evident knowledge of God's evangelical sincerity, that all offences put apart, they being perfectly and fully reconciled, might agree and meet together in the house of their heavenly Father.]

Glin. I see that you evade all scriptures and fathers; I will go to work with you after another manner.

Christ hath here his church known on earth, of which you were once a child, although now you speak contumeliously of the sacraments.

Ridley.

Ridley. This is a grievous reproach, that you call me a shifter away of the scripture, and of the doctors: as touching the sacraments; I never yet spake contumeliously of them. I grant that Christ hath here his church on earth: but that church did ever receive and acknowledge the eucharist to be a sacrament of the body of Christ, yet not the body of Christ really, but the body of Christ by grace.

Glin. Then I ask this question; Whether the catholic church hath ever, or at any time, been idolatrous?

Ridley. The church is the pillar and stay of the truth, that never yet hath been idolatrous in respect of the whole: but peradventure in respect of some part thereof, which sometimes may be seduced by evil pastors, and through ignorance.

Glin. That church ever hath worshipped the flesh of Christ in the eucharist.

But the church hath never been idolatrous.

Therefore, it hath always judged the flesh of Christ to be in the eucharist.

Ridley. And I also worship Christ in the sacrament, but not because he is included in the sacrament; like as I worship Christ also in the scriptures, not because he is really included in them. Notwithstanding, I say, that the body of Christ is present in the sacrament; but yet sacramentally and spiritually, according to his grace giving life, and in that respect really, that is, according to his benediction giving life.

Furthermore, I acknowledge, gladly, the true body of Christ to be in the Lord's supper, in such sort as the church of Christ (which is the spouse of Christ, and is taught of the Holy Ghost, and guided by God's word) doth acknowledge the same. But the true church of Christ doth acknowledge a presence of Christ's body in the Lord's supper to be communicated to the godly, by grace, and spiritually as I have often shewed, and by a sacramental signification, but not by the corporal presence of the body of his flesh.

Glin. Austin saith, "some there were which thought us, instead of bread and of the cup, to worship Ceres and Bacchus."

From whence I gather, that there was an adoration of the sacrament among the fathers; and Erasmus, in an epistle to the brethren of Low-Germany, saith, that the worshipping of the sacrament was before Austin and Cyprian.

Ridley. We do handle the signs reverently: but we worship the sacrament as a sacrament, not as a thing signified by the sacrament.

Glin. What is the symbol or sacrament?

Ridley. Bread.

Glin. Therefore, we worship bread.

Ridley. There is a deceit in the word (adoramus). (We worship the symbols when reverently we handle them. We worship Christ wheresoever we perceive his benefits. But we understand his benefit to be greatest in the sacrament.

Glin. So I may fall down before the bench here and worship Christ; and if any may ask me what I do, I may answer, I worship Christ.

Ridley. We adore and worship Christ in the eucharist. And if you mean the external sacrament; I say, that also is to be worshipped as a sacrament.

Glin. So was the faith of the primitive church.

Ridley. Would to God we would all follow the faith of that church.

Glin. Think you that Christ hath now his church?

Ridley. I do so.

Glin. But all the church adoreth Christ, verily and really in the sacrament.

Ridley. You know yourself that the eastern church would not acknowledge transubstantiation, as appeareth in the council of Florence.

Cole. That is false. For in the same they did acknowledge transubstantiation, although they would not intreat of the matter, for that they had not in their commission so to do.

Ridley. Nay, they would determine nothing of the matter, when the article was propounded unto them.

Cole. It was not because they did not acknowledge the same, but because they had no commission so to do.

Curtop. Reverend sir, I will prove and declare, that the body of Christ is truly and really in the eucharist; and whereas the holy fathers, both of the west and east church, have written both many things and no less manifest of the same matter, yet will I bring forth only Chrysostom.

That which is in the cup, is the same that flowed from the side of Christ.

But true and pure blood did flow from the side of Christ.

Therefore, his true and pure blood is in the cup.

Ridley. It is his true blood which is in the chalice, I grant, and the same which sprang from the side of Christ. But how? It is blood indeed, but not after the same manner, in which it sprang from his side. For here is the blood, but by way of a sacrament.

Again, I say, like as the bread of the sacrament and of thanksgiving is called the body of Christ given for us; so the cup of the Lord is called the blood which sprang from the side of Christ. But as the sacramental bread is called the body, because it is the sacrament of his body; even so likewise the cup is called the blood which flowed out of Christ's side, because it is the sacrament of that blood which flowed out of his side, instituted by the Lord himself for our singular advantage; namely for our spiritual nourishment: like as baptism is ordained in water to spiritual regeneration.

Curtop. The sacrament of the blood is not the blood.

Ridley. The sacrament of the blood is the blood, and that is attributed to the sacrament, which is spoken of the thing of the sacrament.

[Here Weston repeateth Curtop's argument in English.]

Weston. That which is in the chalice, is the same which flowed out of Christ's side.

But there came out very blood.

Therefore, there is blood in the chalice.

Ridley. The blood of Christ is in the chalice, indeed, but not in the real presence, but by grace, and in a sacrament.

Weston. That is very well. Then we have blood in the chalice.

Ridley. It is true, but by grace, and in a sacrament.

Ridley. O my masters! I take this for no judgment: I will stand to God's judgment.

Watson. Good sir, I have determined to have respect of the time, and to abstain from those things which may hinder the progress of our disputation: and therefore first I ask this question, when Christ said in the sixth of John, "He that eateth my flesh," &c. doth he signify in those words the eating of his true and natural flesh, or else of the bread and symbol?

Ridley. I understand that place of the very flesh of Christ to be eaten, but spiritually; and further I say, that the sacrament also pertaineth unto the spiritual eating. For without the spirit to eat the sacrament, is to eat it unprofitably. For who so eateth not spiritually, he eateth his own condemnation.

Watson. I ask then, whether the eucharist be a sacrament?

Ridley. The eucharist, taken for a sign or symbol, is a sacrament.

Watson. Is it instituted of God?

Ridley. It is instituted of God.

Watson. Where?

Ridley. In the supper.

Watson. With what words is it made a sacrament?

Ridley. By the words and deeds which Christ said and did, and commanded us to say and do the same.

Watson. It is a thing commonly received of all, that the sacraments of the new law give grace to them that worthily receive.

Ridley. True it is, that grace is given by the sacrament, but as by an instrument. The inward virtue and Christ give grace through the sacrament.

Watson. What is a sacrament?

Ridley. I remember there be many definitions of a sacrament in Augustine; but I will take that which seemeth most fit to this present purpose. A sacrament is a visible sign of invisible grace.

Watson. Therefore, grace is given to the receivers.

Ridley. The union or conjunction with Christ through the Holy Ghost is grace, and by the sacrament we are made members of the mystical body of Christ, for by the sacrament part of the body is grafted in the head.

Watson. But there is a difference between the mystical body, and natural body.

Ridley. There is (I grant you) a difference, but the head of them both is one.

Watson. The eucharist is a sacrament of the New Testament.

Therefore, it hath a promise of grace.

But no promise of grace is made to bread and wine.

Therefore, bread and wine are not the sacraments of the New Testament.

Ridley. I grant that grace pertaineth to the eucharist, according to this saying, "The bread which we break, is it not the communication or partaking of the body of Christ?" And like as he that eateth, and he that drinketh unworthily of the sacrament of the body and blood of the Lord, eateth and drinketh his own damnation; even so he that eateth and drinketh worthily, eateth life, and drinketh life. I grant also, that there is no promise made to bread and wine. But inasmuch as they are sanctified, and made the sacraments of the body and blood of the Lord, they have a promise of grace annexed unto them; namely, of spiritual partaking of the body of Christ to be communicated and given, not to the bread and wine, but to them who worthily receive the sacrament.

Watson. If the substance of bread and wine do remain then the union betwixt Christ and us is promised to them that take bread and wine.

But that union is not promised to bread and wine, but to the receivers of the flesh and blood. John vi. "He that eateth my flesh," &c.

Therefore, the substance of bread and wine remaineth not.

Ridley. The promise undoubtedly is made to the flesh and blood, but the same is to be received in the sacrament through faith.

Watson. Every sacrament hath a promise of grace annexed unto it.

Therefore, the bread and wine are not sacraments.

Ridley. True it is, every sacrament hath grace annexed unto it instrumentally. But there are divers understandings of this word [habet] "hath." For the sacrament hath not grace included in it; but to those that receive it well, it is turned to grace. After that manner the water in baptism hath grace promised, and by that the Holy Spirit is given; not that grace is included in water, but that grace cometh by water.

Watson. This promise is made to the flesh and blood of Christ, and not to the bread and wine.

Therefore, the sacrament is not bread and wine, but the body and blood of Christ.

Ridley. There is no promise made to him that taketh common bread and common wine, but to him that receiveth the sanctified bread, and bread of the communion, there is a large promise of grace made; neither is the promise given to the symbols, but to the thing of the sacrament. But the thing of the sacrament is the flesh and blood.

Watson. Every sacrament of the New Testament giveth grace, promised of God to those that worthily receive it.

Ridley. This sacrament hath a promise of grace made to those that receive it worthily, because grace is given by it, as by an instrument, not that Christ hath transfused grace into bread and wine.

Watson. But this promise which is made, is only to those that worthily receive the flesh and blood; not the bread and wine.

Ridley. That proposition of your's hath a double understanding. There is no promise made to them that receive common bread, as it were; but to those that worthily receive the sanctified bread, there is a promise of grace made, as Origen doth testify.

Watson. Where is that promise made?

Ridley. "The bread which he brake, is it not a communication of the body of Christ?" And, "We being many are one bread, one body of Christ."

Watson. What doth he mean by bread in that place?

Ridley. The bread of the Lord's table; the communion of the body of Christ.

Watson. Hear what Chrysostom saith upon that passage: "The bread which we break, is it not the communication of Christ's body? Wherefore did he not say, participation? Because he would signify some great matter, and that he would declare a great convenience and conjunction betwixt the same. For we do not communicate by participation only, and receiving, but also by co-uniting. For, like as that body is co-united to Christ, so also we by the same bread are united to him."

Ridley. Let Chrysostom have his manner of speaking, and his sentence. If it be true, I reject it not. But let it not be prejudicial to me to name it true bread.

Watson. "All (saith Chrysostom) which sit together at one board, do communicate together of one true body. What do I call (saith he) this communicating? We are all the self-same body. What doth bread signify? The body of Christ. What are they that receive it? The body of Christ. For many are but one body." Chrysostom doth interpret this place against you. "All we be one bread, and one mystical body, which do participate together one bread of Christ."

Ridley. All we be one mystical body, which do communicate of one Christ in bread, after the efficacy of regeneration or quickening.

Watson. Of what manner of bread speaketh he?

Ridley. Of the bread of the Lord's table.

Watson. Is that bread one?

Ridley. It is one, of the church being one, because one bread is set forth upon the table: and so of one bread all together do participate, which communicate at the table of the Lord.

Watson. See how absurdly you speak. Do you say, all which be from the beginning to the end of the world?

Ridley. All, I say, which at one table together have communicated in the mysteries might well so do. But the heavenly and celestial bread is likewise one also, whereof the sacramental bread is a mystery: the which being one, all we together do participate.

Watson. A perverse answer. Which all? Mean you all christian men.

Ridley. I do distribute this word (All:) for all were wont together to communicate of the one bread divided into parts. All, I say, which were one congregation, and which all did communicate together at one table.

Watson. What? Do you exclude then from the body of Christ all them who did not communicate, being present?

Fecknam. But Cyprian saith, "Bread which no multitude doth consume. Which cannot be understood but only of the body of Christ."

Ridley. Also Cyprian in this place, did speak of the true body of Christ, and not of material bread.

Fecknam. Nay, rather he did there treat of the sacrament in that treatise De Cena Domini, writing upon "the supper of the Lord."

Ridley. Truth it is, that I grant he treateth there of the sacrament: but also he doth mix something therewithal of the spiritual eating.

Smith. When the Lord saith, "This is my body," he useth no tropical speech.

Therefore, you are deceived.

Ridley. I deny your antecedent.

Smith. I bring here Augustine in pl. xxxiii. expounding these words, Ferebatur in manibus suis, "He was carried in his own hands." "How may this be understood to be done in man? For no man is carried in his own hands, but in the hands of another. How this may be understood of David after the letter, we do not find; of Christ we find it. For Christ was borne in his own hands, when he saith, "This is my body," for he carried that same body in his hands." &c.

Augustine

Augustine here did not see how this place after the letter could be understood of David, because no man can carry himself in his own hands. Therefore, saith he, this place is to be understood of Christ after the letter. For Christ carried himself in his own hands in his supper, when he gave the sacrament to his disciples, saying, "This is my body."

Ridley. I deny your argument, and will explain the same. Austin could not find, after his own understanding, how this could be understood of David after the letter. Austin differs here from others in this exposition, but I differ not from him. But let this exposition of Austin be granted to you; although I know this place of scripture be otherwise read of other men, after the verity of the Hebrew text, and it is also otherwise to be expounded. Yet to grant to you this exposition of Austin, I say, yet notwithstanding it maketh nothing against my assertion: for Christ did bear himself in his own hands, when he gave the sacrament of his body to be eaten of his disciples.

Smith. Therefore, it is true of Christ after the letter, that he was borne in his own hands.

Ridley. He was borne literally, and after the letter, which was spoken of David: but not after the letter of these words, "This is my body."

I grant, that St. Austin saith, it is not found literally of David, that he carried himself in his own hands, but that it is found of Christ. But this word [ad literam,] "literally," you do not well refer to that which was borne, but rather it ought to be referred to him that did bear it. St. Augustine's meaning is this; that it is not read any where in the Bible, that this carnal David, the son of Jesse, did bear himself in his hands, but of that spiritual David that overthrew Goliath the devil; that is, of Christ our Saviour, the son of the virgin, it may well be found literally, that he bore himself in his own hands after a certain manner, namely, in carrying the sacrament of himself. And not, that St. Austin hath these words, Quodam modo, "after a certain manner;" which manifestly declare how the doctor's meaning is to be taken.

Smith. When then was he borne in his own hands, and after what letter?

Ridley. He was borne in the supper sacramentally, when he said, "This is my body."

Smith. Every man may bear in his own hands a figure of his body.

But Austin denieth that David could carry himself in his hands.

Therefore, he speaketh of no figure of his body.

Ridley. If Austin could have found in all the scripture, that David had carried the sacrament of his body, then he would never have used that exposition of Christ.

Smith. But he did bear himself in his own hands:

Therefore, he did not bear a figure only.

Ridley. He did bear himself, but in a sacrament: and Austin afterwards added Quodam modo, that is, sacramentally.

Smith. You understand not what Austin meant, when he said, Quodam modo; for he meant that he did bear his very true body in that supper, not in figure and in form of a body, but in form and figure of bread.

Therefore, you are holden fast, neither are you able to escape out of this labyrinth.

This place Dr. Weston repeated again in English. Which done, Dr. Tresham began thus to speak, moved (as it seemed to Mr. Ridley) with great zeal, and desired that he might be instead of John Baptist, in converting the hearts of the fathers, and in reducing the said bishop Ridley again to the mother church. Now at the first, not knowing the person, he thought he had been some good old man, which had the zeal of God, although not according to knowledge, and began to answer him with reverence. But afterwards he perceived his art and duplicity.

"God Almighty grant that it may be fulfilled in me, that was spoken by the prophet Malachi of John Baptist, which may turn the hearts of the fathers to the children, and the hearts of the children to their fathers, that you at length may be converted. The wife man faith, Son, honour thy father, and reverence thy mother. But you dishonour your father in heaven, and pollute your mother the holy church here on earth, while ye set not by it."

Ridley. These bye-words do pollute your school.

Tresham. If there were an Arian which had that subtle wit that you have, he might soon shift off the authorities of the scripture and fathers.

Weston. Either dispute, or else hold your peace, I pray you.

Tresham. I bring a place here out of the council of Lateran; the which council representing the universal church, wherein were congregated three hundred bishops, and seventy metropolitans, besides a great multitude of others, decreed, That bread and wine, by the power of God's word, was transubstantiated into the body and blood of the Lord. Therefore, whosoever saith contrary, cannot be a child of the church, but an heretic.

Ridley. Good sir, I have heard what you have cited out of the council of Lateran, and remember that there was a great multitude of bishops and metropolitans, as you said: but yet you have not numbered how many abbots, priors, and friars were in that council, who were to the number of eight hundred.

One of the scribes. What, will you deny then the authority of that council for the multitude of those priors?

Ridley. No, sir, not so much for that cause, as for that especially, because the doctrine of that council agreed not with the word of God, as it may well appear by the acts of that council, which was holden under Innocent the third, a man (if we believe the histories) most pernicious to the church and common-wealth of Christ.

Tresham. What, do you not receive the council of Lateran? Whereupon he with certain others, cried, Write, write.

Ridley. No, sir, I receive not that council; write, and write again.

Tresham. Evil men do eat the natural body of Christ. Therefore, the true and natural body of Christ is on the altar.

Ridley. Evil men do eat the very true and natural body of Christ sacramentally, and no further, as St. Augustine saith: but good men do eat the very true body both sacramentally, and spiritually by grace.

Tresham. I prove the contrary by Augustine, "Like as Judas, to whom the Lord gave the morsel, did offend; not in taking a thing that was evil, but in receiving it after an evil manner," &c. And a little after, "Because some do not eat unto salvation, it followeth not therefore, that it is not his body."

Ridley. It is the body to them, that is, the sacrament of the body: and Judas took the sacrament of the Lord to his condemnation. Austin hath distinguished these things well in another place, where he saith, "The bread of the Lord, the bread the Lord. Evil men eat the bread of the Lord, but not bread the Lord. But good men eat both the bread of the Lord, and bread the Lord."

Weston. Paul saith, the body, and you say, the sacrament of the body.

Ridley. Paul meaneth so indeed.

Watson. You understand it evil concerning the sign: for the fathers say, that evil men do eat him which descended from heaven.

Ridley. They eat him indeed, but sacramentally. The fathers use many times the sacrament for the matter of the sacraments; that same place maketh against you; and here he cited the place.

Weston. I bring Theophylact, who saith, "That Judas did taste the body of the Lord. The Lord did shew the cruelty of Judas, which, when he was rebuked, did not understand, and tasted the Lord's flesh," &c.

Ridley. This phrase to divines is well known, and used of the doctors. He tasted the flesh of the Lord, [insensibly,] that is, the sacrament of the Lord's flesh.

Weston. Chrysostom saith, That the same punishment remaineth to them who receive the body of the Lord unworthily, as to them who crucified him.

Ridley. That is, because they defile the Lord's body:

for evil men do eat the body of Christ sacramentally, but good men eat both the sacrament and the matter of the sacrament.

Watson. You reject the council of Lateran, because (you say) it agreeth not with God's word. What say you then to the council of Nice? The words of the council are these, "Let us not look a-low by the ground upon the bread and drink set before us, but lifting up our mind let us faithfully believe, there upon the holy table to lie the Lamb of God taking away the sins of the world, being sacrificed of the priests."

Ridley. That council was collected out of ancient fathers, and is to me a great authority; for it saith, "That bread is set upon the altar, and having our minds lifted up, we must consider him which is in heaven." The words of the council make for me.

Watson. [Exalta mente,] "with a mind exalted;" that is, not as brute beasts at the rack or manger, having an eye only upon the thing that is set before them. The Lamb of God lieth on the table, saith the council.

Ridley. The Lamb of God is in heaven, according to the verity of the body; and here he is with us in a mystery, according to his power, not corporally.

Watson. But the Lamb of God lieth on the table.

Ridley. It is a figurative speech, for in our mind we understand him which is in heaven.

Watson. But he lieth there, as the Greek word imports.

Ridley. He lieth there, that is, he is there present, not corporally, but he lieth there in his operation.

Watson. He lieth, but his operation lieth not.

Ridley. You think very grossly of the sitting or lying of the celestial Lamb on the table of the Lord. For we may not imagine any such sitting or lying upon the table, as the reason of man would judge: but all things are here to be understood spiritually. For that heavenly Lamb is (as I confess) on the table, but by a spiritual presence, by grace, and not after any corporal substance of his flesh taken out of the virgin Mary.

And indeed the same canon doth plainly teach, that the bread which is set on the table is material bread; and therefore it (the canon I mean) commandeth that we should not creep on the ground in our thoughts, to those things which are set before us; as who should say, what other things are they (as much as pertaineth to their true substance) than bread and wine! but rather, saith the canon, lifting up our minds unto heaven, let us consider with faith the Lamb of God which taketh away the sins of the world, sitting or lying upon the table. For a lifted up faith, saith he, seeth him which sitteth on the right hand of God the Father, after the true manner of a body set by grace on the Lord's table, and taking away the sins of the world. For I think you mean not so, as though the Lamb did lie there prostrate with his members spread upon the table.

Smith. I bring another place out of the council of Nice: None of the apostles said, this is a figure of the body of Christ: none of the reverend elders said, the unbloody sacrifice of the altar to be a figure."

Therefore, you are deceived.

Ridley. This canon is not in the council of Nice. For I have read over this council many times.

Another then came in, whom Mr. Ridley knew not, and said, "The universal church both of the Greeks and Latins, of the east and of the west, have agreed in the council of Florence, uniformly, in the doctrine of the sacrament, that there is the true and real body in the sacrament of the altar.

Ridley. I deny the Greek and the east church to have agreed either in the council at Florence, or at any time else, with the Romish church, in the doctrine of transubstantiation of bread into the body of Christ. For there was nothing in the council of Florence, wherein the Greeks would agree with the Romanists; however I confess, it was left for every church to use, as they were wont, leavened or unleavened bread.

Dr. Cole now cried out, and said, they agreed together concerning transubstantiation of bread into the body of Christ. Dr. Ridley said that was not possible.

Here another started up, unknown to Dr. Ridley, but thought to be one of the scribes, who affirmed with him, that indeed there was nothing decreed concerning transubstantiation; the council left that as a matter not meet nor worthy to disturb the peace and concord of the church. To whom Dr. Ridley answered again, that he said what was true.

Pye. What say you to that council, where it is said, that the priest doth offer an unbloody sacrifice of the body of Christ?

Ridley. I say, it is well said, if it be rightly understood.

Pye. But he offered an unbloody sacrifice.

Ridley. It was called unbloody, and is offered after a certain manner, and in a mystery, and as a representation of that bloody sacrifice, and he doth not lye, which saith Christ to be offered.

Weston. I with one argument will throw down to the ground your opinion, out of Chrysostom, Hom. xxiv. in 1 Cor. And I will teach, not only a figure and a sign, or grace only; but the very same body, which was here conversant on the earth, to be in the eucharist.

(1) We worship the self-same body in the eucharist, which the wise men did worship in the manger.

(2) But that was his natural and real body, not spiritual.

(3) Therefore, the real body of Christ is in the eucharist.

Again, the same Chrysostom saith, "We have not here the Lord in the manger, but on the altar. Here a woman holdeth him not in her hands, but a priest."

Ridley. We worship, I confess, the same true Lord and Saviour of the world, which the wise men worshipped in the manger; howbeit we do it in a mystery, and in the sacrament of the Lord's supper, and that in spiritual liberty, as saith St. Augustin, l. 3. De Doctrina Christiana: not in carnal servitude; that is, we do not worship servilely the signs for the things: for that should be as he also saith, a part of a servile infirmity. But we behold with the eyes of faith him present after grace, and spiritually set upon the table; and we worship him which sitteth above, and is worshipped of the angels. For Christ is always assistant to his mysteries, as the said Augustine saith. And the Divine Majesty, as Cyprian saith, doth never absent himself from the divine mysteries; but this assistance and presence of Christ, as in baptism it is wholly spiritual, and by grace, and not by any corporal substance of the flesh, even so it is here in the Lord's supper, being rightly and according to the word of God duly administered.

Weston. That which the woman did hold in her womb, the same holdeth the priest.

Ridley. I grant, the priest holdeth the same thing, but after another manner. She did hold the natural body; the priest holdeth the mystery of the body.

Now Weston again repeated this argument out of Chrysostom in English.

Ridley. I say that the author meant it spiritually.

Dr. Weston, the prolocutor, now put an end to the disputation with these words: You see the stubborn, the boasting, the crafty, the inconstant mind of this man. Here you see, this day, that the strength of the truth is without foil. Therefore, I beseech you all most earnestly to blow the note of triumph: having said this, he began, and they followed, exclaiming, "Truth bath the victory, Truth bath the victory."

In the course of the debate, Dr. Ridley displayed great accuteness of understanding, strength of reasoning, and extent of learning, though he had fourteen opponents to encounter; but he was determined to support his opinions, and declared that as long as God gave him life, he should not only have his heart, but also his mouth and pen to defend his truth. He would, however have done more justice to his cause, if he had not so readily admitted the authority of the fathers, on which his adversaries had laid great stress. The tumultuous, and disorderly manner in which the disputation was carried on, justifies Dr. Ridley in what he alledged, "That they who should have given good examples in words and gravity, above all others, gave worst example, whence it manifestly appears that they never sought for truth, but for the glory of the world and a bragging victory.

The

The time was vainly spent in opprobrious taunts, hissings, clapping of hands and triumphs, more than could be borne even in stage plays, and that in English, to prejudice the common people. I never yet since I was born, saw or heard any thing done or handled more vainly or tumultuously than the disputation which was with me in the schools at Oxford. I could never have thought that it had been possible to have found amongst men; accounted to be of knowledge and learning in this realm, any so brazen-faced and shameless, so disorderly, and vainly to behave themselves, more like stage-players in interludes, to set forth a pageant, than grave divines in schools to dispute. The clamours of the far-bonne, which at Paris I have seen in times past, when popery most reigned, might be worthily thought (in comparison of this thraasonical ostentation) to have had much modesty. When with godly grief I protested openly, that such outrageous disorder was unbecoming those of schools, I was so far, by my humble remonstrance, from doing any good, that I was forced to hear reproaches and taunts for my labour."

A THIRD DISPUTATION at OXFORD, between the REV. DR. HUGH LATIMER, BISHOP of WORCESTER, and others, his OPPONENTS, April 18th, 1554.

ON Wednesday the 18th of April, bishop Latimer was brought out to dispute. This disputation began at eight o'clock, and was conducted in much the same manner as those preceding, except that most part of it was in English: for the bishop alledged, that he was out of use with the Latin, and unfit for that place.

Mr. Smith, of Oriel college, Dr. Cartwright, Mr. Harpsfield, and others, replied to him, with many cruel insinuations and bitter taunts. The old bishop escaped no hissings, and scornful laughings, which those who went before had patiently endured. Being very faint, he desired that he might not long tarry; nor durst he drink for fear of vomiting. The disputation ended before eleven of the clock. Dr. Latimer was not suffered to read what he had, as he observed, painfully written: but it was exhibited up, and the prolocutor, after having read part thereof, proceeded unto the disputation.

A Translation of the EXORDIUM, or PREFACE, delivered in Latin by DR. WESTON, Prolocutor, to the following DISPUTATION.

MEN and brethren, we are come together this day (by the help of God) to vanquish the strength of the arguments, and dispersed opinions of adversaries, against the truth of the real presence of the Lord's body in the sacrament. And therefore, you father, if you have any thing to answer, I do admonish that you answer in short and few words.

Latimer. I pray you good master prolocutor, do not exact that of me, which is not in me; I have not these twenty years much used the Latin tongue.

Weston. Take your ease, father.

Latimer. I thank you sir, I am well; let me here protest my faith, for I am not able to dispute; and afterwards do your pleasure with me.

Upon this he took a paper out of his pocket and began to read it. He had in this committed to writing, his reasons against assenting to the articles which he had been required to subscribe, and his protestation against them.

Scarce had he proceeded in the reading, when a murmur arose on every hand, increasing by degrees into a clamour, and which was rather encouraged than checked by the prolocutor. Surprized at this sudden tumult of ill manners, Mr. Latimer paused in admiration of it, but presently recovering himself, he turned to the Prolocutor and said with some vehemence:

"In my time I have spoken with two kings, and have been heard for some hours together without interruption, but here I cannot be permitted one quarter of an hour.---Dr. Weston, I have frequently heard of you before, but I think I never saw you till I came before you on this occasion. I perceive you have great wit and great learning; God grant that you may make a right use of these gifts."

He then delivered the paper, which contained his protestation, to the prolocutor.

A COPY of BISHOP LATIMER'S PROTESTATION, as delivered in writing to Dr. WESTON.

The conclusions whereunto I must answer are these:

1. The first is, That in the sacrament of the altar, by the virtue of God's word pronounced by the priest, there is really present the natural body of Christ, conceived of the virgin Mary, under the kinds of the appearance of bread and wine; in like manner his blood.

2. The second is, That after consecration there remaineth no substance of bread and wine, nor any other substance, but the substance of God and Man.

3. The third is, That in the mass there is the lively sacrifice of the church, which is propitiable, as well for the sins of the quick, as of the dead.

Concerning the first conclusions, I think it is set forth with certain new found terms that are obscure, and do not sound according to the speech of the scripture. But however I understand it, this I do answer plainly, (though not without peril) that to the right celebration of the Lord's supper, there is no other presence of Christ required, than a spiritual presence: and this presence is sufficient for a Christian man, as a presence by which we abide in Christ, and Christ abideth in us, to the obtaining of eternal life, if we persevere. And this same presence may be called most fitly a real presence, that is, a presence not feigned, but a true and faithful presence. Which thing I here rehearse, lest some sycophant, or scorner, should suppose me, with the Anabaptists, to make nothing else of the sacrament, but a naked and a bare sign. As for that which is feigned of many concerning their corporal presence, I for my part take it but for a papistical invention; therefore think it utterly to be rejected.

Concerning the second conclusion, I dare be bold to say, that it hath no ground in God's word, but is a thing invented and found out by man, and therefore to be taken as false; and I had almost said, as the mother and nurse of the other errors. It were good for my lords and masters of the transubstantiation, to take heed lest they conspire with the Nestorians, for I do not see how they can avoid it.

The third conclusion (as I understand it) seemeth subtilly to sow sedition against the offering which Christ himself offered for us in his own proper person, according to those words of St. Paul, Heb. i. where he saith, "That Christ his ownself hath made purgation of our sins." And afterwards, "That he might (said he) be a merciful and faithful bishop, concerning those things which are to be done with God, for the taking away of our sins." So that the expiation or taking away of our sins may be thought rather to depend on this, that Christ was an offering bishop, than that he was offered, were it not that he was offered of himself: and therefore it is needless that he should be offered of any other. I will speak nothing of the wonderful presumption of man, to dare to attempt this thing without a manifest vocation, especially in that it tendeth to the overthrowing and making fruitless (if not wholly, yet partly) of the cross of Christ; for truly it is no base or mean thing to offer Christ. And therefore well may a man say to my lords and masters, the offerers, By what authority do ye this? and who gave you this authority? Where? When? A man cannot (saith the baptist) take any thing, except it be given him from above: much less then may any man presume to usurp any honour, before he be thereto called.

Again, If any man sin, (saith St. John) we have, not a master, or offerer at home, which can sacrifice for us at mass, but we have, (saith he) an advocate, Jesus Christ, which once offered himself long ago; of which offering the efficacy and effect is for ever, so that it is needless to have such offerers.

What meaneth Paul, when he saith, "They that serve.

serve at the altar, are partakers of the altar?" and so addeth; "So the Lord hath ordained, that they that preach the gospel, shall live of the gospel." Whereas he should have said, The Lord hath ordained, that they that sacrifice at mass, should live of their sacrificing, that there might be living assigned to our sacrificers now, as was, before Christ's coming, to the Jewish priests. For now they have nothing to alledge for their living, as they that be preachers have. So that it appeareth, that the sacrificing priesthood is changed by God's ordinance into a preaching priesthood, and the sacrificing priesthood should cease utterly, saving inasmuch as all christian men are sacrificing priests.

The supper of the Lord was instituted to provoke us to thanksgiving, for the offering which the Lord himself did offer for us, much rather than that our offerers should do there as they do.

"Feed (saith Peter) as much as ye may the flock of Christ:" nay, rather let us sacrifice as much as we may for the flock of Christ. If the matter be as men now make it, I can never wonder enough, that Peter would or could forget this office of sacrificing, which at this day is in such a price and estimation, that to feed is almost nothing with many. If thou cease from feeding the flock, how shalt thou be taken? Truly catholic enough. But if thou cease from sacrificing and massing, how will that be taken? At the least, I warrant thee, thou shalt be called an heretic.

And whence, I pray you, come these papistical judgments? Except perchance they think a man feedeth the flock in sacrificing for them: and then what needeth there any learned pastors? For no man is so foolish, but soon he may learn to sacrifice and mass it.

Thus I have taken the more pains to write, because I refused to dispute, in consideration of my debility thereunto: that all men may know, how that I have so done not without great pains, having not any man to help me, as I have never before been debarred to have.

O sir, you may chance to live till you come to this age and weakness that I am of. I have spoken in my time before two kings more than once, two or three hours together, without interruption: but now, that I may speak the truth, (by your leave) I could not be suffered to declare my mind before you, no, not by the space of a quarter of an hour, without revilings, checks, rebukes, taunts, such as I have not felt the like, in such an audience all my life long. Surely it cannot but be an heinous offence that I have given. But what was it? Forsooth, I had spoken of the four marrow-bones of the mass. The which kind of speaking I never read to be a sin against the Holy Ghost.

I could not be allowed to shew what I meant by my metaphor: but, sir, now by your favour I will tell you what I mean.

The first is the popish consecration, which hath been called a God's body-making.

The second is transubstantiation.

The third is massal oblation.

The fourth, adoration.

These chief and principal portions, parts, and points, incident to the mass, and most esteemed in the same, I call the marrow-bones of the mass; which indeed you, by force, might, and violence intrude, in sound of words, in some of the scripture, with racking and cramping, injuring and wronging the same; but else, indeed, plain out of the scripture, as I am thoroughly persuaded, although in disputation I now could nothing do to persuade the same to others, being both unapt to study, and also to make a shew of my former study in such readiness as should be requisite to the same.

I have heard much talk of Dr. Weston in my time; but I never knew your person to my knowledge, till I came before you, as the queen's majesty's commissioner. I pray God send you so right judgment, as I perceive you have great wit, great learning, with many other qualities. God give you grace ever well to use them, and ever to have in remembrance, that he that dwelleth on high, looketh on the low things on the earth; and that there is no council against the Lord; and also that this world hath been, and yet is a tottering world.

And again, that though we must obey the princes, yet that hath this limitation, namely in the Lord. For whosoever obey them against the Lord, they be most pernicious to them, and the greatest adversaries that they have: for they so procure God's vengeance upon them, if God be the only ruler of things.

There are some so corrupt in mind, the truth being taken from them, that they think gain to be godliness; great learned men, and yet men of no learning, but of railing, and raging, about questions, and strife of words. I call them men of no learning, because they know not Christ, how much else soever they know. And on this sort we are wont to call great learned clerks, being ignorant of Christ, unlearned men; for it is nothing but plain ignorance, to know any thing without Christ: whereas whoso knoweth Christ, the same hath knowledge enough, although in other knowledge he be to seek.

The apostle Paul confesseth of himself to the Corinthians, that he did know nothing but Jesus Christ crucified. Many men babble many things of Christ, who yet know not Christ; but, pretending Christ, do craftily colour and darken his glory. Depart from such men, saith the apostle Paul to Timothy.

It is not out of the way to remember what St. Augustine saith. The place where, I do not now remember, except it be against the epistles of Petilian; "Whosoever (saith he) teacheth any thing necessarily to be believed, which is not contained in the Old and New Testament, the same is accursed." Oh! beware of this curse, if you be wise.

I am much deceived if Basilus have not such like words; "Whatsoever (saith he) is besides the holy scripture, if the same be taught as necessarily to be believed, that is sin." Oh, therefore, take heed of this sin!

There are some that speak many false things more probable, and more like to the truth, than the truth itself. Therefore Paul giveth a watch-word; "Let no man (saith he) deceive you with probability and persuasions of words."

But what mean you, saith one, by this talk so far from the matter? Well, I hope, good masters, you will suffer an old man a little to play the child, and to speak one thing twice. O Lord God! you have changed the most holy communion into a private action; and you deny to the laity the Lord's cup, contrary to Christ's commandment: and you do blemish the annunciation of the Lord's death till he come: for you have changed the common prayer, called the divine service, with the administration of the sacraments, from the vulgar and known language, into a strange tongue, contrary to the will of the Lord revealed in his word. God open the door of your heart, to see the things you should see herein.

I would as fain obey my sovereign as any in this realm: but in these things I can never do it with an upright conscience.

God be merciful unto us. Amen.

The prolocutor, on receiving this paper, thus addressed bishop Latimer, artfully leading him by a train of familiar questions into an argument:

Weston. Then refuse you to dispute? Will you here then subscribe?

Latimer. No, good master, I pray be good to an old man. You may, if it please God, be once old, as I am: you may come to this age, and to this debility.

Weston. You said upon Saturday last, that you could not find the mass, nor the marrow bones thereof, in your book: but we will find a mass in that book.

Latimer. No, good Mr. Doctor, you cannot.

Weston. What find you then there?

Latimer. A communion.

Weston. Which communion, the first or the last?

Latimer. I find no great diversity in them; they are one supper of the Lord: but I like the last very well.

Weston. The first you do not approve of?

Latimer. I do not well remember wherein they differ.

Weston. Then cake bread, and loaf bread, are all one?

You

You call it the supper of the Lord; but you are deceived in that; for they had done the supper before, and therefore the scripture saith, "After they had supped." St. Paul findeth fault with the Corinthians, that some of them were drunken in this supper; and you know, no man can be drunken at your communion.

Latimer. The first was called [Cena Judaica] "The Jewish Supper," when they did eat the paschal lamb together; the other was called [Cena Dominica] "The Lord's Supper."

Weston. That is false; for Chrysostom denieth that. St. Ambrose on the x. chap. of the 1 Cor. saith, "The mystery of the sacrament, given as they were at supper, is not the supper of the Lord." Also Gregory Nazianzene saith the same. And that first supper was called Agapee: can you tell what that is?

Latimer. I understand not Greek: yet I think it meaneth charity.

Weston. Mr. Opponent, begin.

Smith. Because I perceive that this charge is laid upon my neck to dispute with you; to the end that the same may go forward after a right manner and order, I will propose three questions, so as they are put forth unto me. And first I ask this question of you, although the same indeed ought not to be called in question: but such is the condition of the church, that it is always vexed of the wicked. I ask, I say, whether Christ's body be really in the sacrament?

Latimer. I trust I have obtained of Mr. Prolocutor, that no man shall exact that thing of me which is not in me. And I am sorry that this worshipful audience should be deceived of their expectation for my sake. I have given up my mind in writing to Mr. Prolocutor.

Smith. Whatsoever you have given up, it shall be registered among the acts.

Latimer. Disputation requireth a good memory; my memory is gone, and marvellously weakened, and never the better, I think, for the prison?

Weston. How long have you been in prison?

Latimer. Three quarters of this year.

Weston. And I was in prison six years.

Latimer. The more pity, sir.

Weston. How long have you been of this opinion?

Latimer. It is not long, sir, that I have been of this opinion.

Weston. The time hath been when you said mass full devoutly.

Latimer. Yes, I crave God's mercy heartily for it.

Weston. Where learned you this new fangleness.

Latimer. I have long sought for the truth in this matter of the sacrament, and have not been of this mind more than seven years: and my lord of Canterbury's book hath especially confirmed my judgment herein. If I could remember all therein contained, I would not fear to answer any man in this matter.

Tresh. There are in that book six hundred errors.

Weston. You were once a Lutheran.

Latimer. No, I was a papist: for I never could perceive how Luther could defend his opinion without transubstantiation. The Tygurines once did write a book against Luther, and I often desired God, that he might live so long to answer them.

Weston. Luther in his book, "Of private mass," says, "That the devil reasoned with him, and persuaded him that the mass was not good," fol. 14. So that Luther said mass, and the devil dissuaded him from it.

Latimer. I do not take in hand to defend Luther's sayings or doings. If he were here, he would defend himself well enough. I told you before that I am not meet for disputations. I pray you, read mine answer, wherein I have declared my faith.

Weston. Do you believe this, as you have written?

Latimer. Yes.

Weston. Then have you no faith?

Latimer. Then would I be sorry, sir.

Tresh. It is written, "Except you shall eat the flesh of the Son of Man, and drink his blood, ye shall have no life in you." Which when the Capernaïtes, and many of Christ's disciples heard, they said, "This is a hard saying," &c. Now that the truth may the better appear, here I ask of you, Whether Christ, speaking these words, did mean of his flesh to be eaten with the mouth; or of the spiritual eating of the same?

Latimer. I answer (as Augustine understandeth) that Christ meant of the spiritual eating of his flesh.

Tresh. Of what flesh meant Christ, his true flesh, or no?

Latimer. Of his true flesh, spiritually to be eaten in the supper by faith; and not corporally.

Tresh. Of what flesh meant the Capernaïtes?

Latimer. Of his true flesh also; but to be eaten with the mouth.

Tresh. They, as you confess, did mean his true flesh to be eaten with the mouth. And Christ also (as I shall prove) did speak of the receiving of his flesh with the mouth.

Therefore, they both did understand it of the eating of one thing, which is done by the mouth of the body.

Latimer. I say, Christ meant not of the bodily mouth; but of the mouth of the spirit, mind, and heart.

Tresh. I prove the contrary, that Christ understandeth it of the eating with the bodily mouth. For whereas custom is a good interpreter of things, and whereas the acts put in practice by Christ, do certainly declare those things which he first spake; Christ's deeds in his supper, where he gave his body to be taken with the mouth, together with the custom which hath been ever since that time of that eating which is done with the mouth, doth evidently intimate that Christ did understand his words, here cited by me, out of the vi. of John, of the eating with the mouth.

Latimer. He gave not his body to be received with the mouth, but he gave the sacrament of his body to be received with the mouth: he gave the sacrament to the mouth, his body to the mind.

Tresh. But my reason doth conclude, That Christ spoke concerning his flesh to be received with the corporal mouth: for otherwise (which God forbid) he had been a deceiver, and had been offensive to the Capernaïtes and his disciples, if he had not meant in this point as they thought he meant: for if he had thought as you do feign, it had been an easy matter for him to have said, Ye shall not eat my flesh with your mouth, but the sacrament of my flesh; that is to say, Ye shall receive with your mouth not the thing itself, but the figure of the thing, and thus he might have satisfied them: but so he said not, but continued in the truth of his words, as he was wont. Therefore Christ meant the self same thing that the Capernaïtes did, I mean concerning the thing itself to be received with the mouth, namely, that his true flesh is truly to be eaten with the mouth. Moreover, forasmuch as you do expound [Corpus Christi], "The body of Christ," [Sacramentum corporis Christi], "The sacrament of the body of Christ," and hereby do suppose that we obtain but a spiritual union, or union of the mind between us and Christ, plain it is, that you are deceived in this thing, and do err from the mind of the fathers: for St. Hilary affirmeth, by plain and express words, that we are corporally and carnally joined together. To be short, I myself have heard you preaching at Greenwich before king Henry the eighth, where you did openly affirm, That no christian man ought to doubt of the true and real presence of Christ's body in the sacrament, forasmuch as he had the word of scripture on his side, "This is my body," whereby he might be confirmed. But now there is the same truth; the word of scripture hath the self same thing which it then had; therefore why do you deny at this present that, whereof it was not lawful once to doubt before when you taught it?

Latimer. Will you give me leave to speak?

Tresh. Speak Latin, I pray you, for you can do it, if you will, readily enough.

Latimer. I cannot speak Latin so long and so largely. Mr. Prolocutor hath given me leave to speak English. And as for the words of Hilary, and other fathers, I think they make not so much for you. But he that shall answer the doctors, had not need to be in my case, but should have them in readiness, and know their purpose.

pose. Melancthon saith, If the doctors had foreseen that they should have been so taken in this controversy, they would have written more plainly.

Smith. I will reduce the words of Hilary into the form of a syllogism.

(1) Such as is the unity of our flesh with Christ's flesh, such (yea greater) is the unity of Christ with the Father.

(2) But the unity of Christ's flesh with our's, is true and substantial.

(3) Therefore the unity of Christ with the Father is true and substantial.

Latimer. I understand you not.

Seaton. I know your learning well enough, and how subtle you be: I will use a few words with you, and that out of Cyprian on the Lord's supper. The Old Testament doth forbid the drinking of blood; the New Testament doth command the drinking and tasting of blood: but where doth it command the drinking of blood?

Latimer. In these words, "Drink ye all of this."

Seaton. Then we taste true blood.

Latimer. We do taste true blood, but spiritually; and this is enough.

Seaton. Nay, the Old and New Testaments in this do differ; for the one doth command, and the other doth forbid to drink blood.

Latimer. It is true as touching the matter, but not as touching the manner of the thing.

Seaton. Then there is no difference between the drinking of blood in the New Testament, and that of the Old; for they also drank spiritually.

Latimer. And we drink spiritually also, but a more precious blood.

Weston. Augustine upon the xlv. Psalm, saith, "Drink boldly the blood which ye have poured out."

Therefore it is blood.

Latimer. I never denied it, nor ever will I go from it, but that we drink the very blood of Christ indeed, but spiritually: for the same St. Augustine saith, "Believe, and thou hast eaten."

Weston. Nay, to believe, is not to drink or eat. You will not say, I pledge you, when I say, I believe in God.

Latimer. Is not [Manducare] "To eat," in your learning put for [Credere] "To believe?"

Weston. I remember, my lord chancellor demanded Mr. Hooper to answer these questions, Whether [Edere] "To eat," were [Credere] "To believe," and [Altare] "An altar," were Christ in all the scripture, &c. And he answered, Yes.

The Lord Chancellor then said, "We have an altar, of which it is not lawful to eat," is as much as to say, "We have a Christ, in whom we may not believe."

Tresham. "Believe, and thou hast eaten, is spoken of the spiritual eating.

Latimer. It is true, I do allow your saying; I take it so also.

Weston. We are commanded to drink blood in the new law.

Therefore it is very blood.

Latimer. We drink blood, so as appertaineth to us to drink to our comfort, in sacramental wine. We drink blood sacramentally: he gave us his blood to drink spiritually: he went about to shew, that as certainly as we drink wine, so certainly we drink his blood spiritually.

Weston. Do not you seem to be a papist, which do bring in new words, not found in scripture? Where find you that, "sacramentally," in God's book.

Latimer. It is necessarily gathered from scripture.

Weston. The Old Testament doth forbid the tasting of blood, but the New doth command it.

Latimer. It is true, not as touching the thing, but as touching the manner thereof.

Weston. Hear, ye people, this is the argument.

That which was forbidden in the Old Testament, is commanded in the New.

To drink blood was forbidden in the Old Testament, and commanded in the New.

(As this argument, because the major thereof is not universal, is not formal, it may be well retorted against Weston thus.

No natural or moral thing, forbidden materially in the Old Testament, is commanded in the New.

To drink man's natural blood is forbidden materially in the Old Testament.

Therefore to drink man's natural blood materially is not commanded in the New.

Latimer. It is commanded spiritually to be drunk; I grant it is blood drunk in the New Testament, but we receive it spiritually.

Pye. It was not forbidden spiritually in the old law.

Latimer. The substance of blood is drunk, but not in one manner.

Pye. It doth not require the same manner of drinking.

Latimer. It is the same thing, not the same manner. I have no more to say.

Weston. Here Weston cited the place of Chrysostom, of Judas's treason: "O the madness of Judas! He made bargain with the Jews for thirty pence to sell Christ, and Christ offered him his blood which he sold."

Latimer. I grant he offered to Judas his blood which he sold, but in a sacrament.

Weston. Because you can defend your doctors no better, you shall see what worshipful men ye hang upon, and one that hath been of your mind shall dispute with you. Mr. Cartwright, I pray you dispute.

Cartwright. Reverend father, because it is given me in commandment to dispute with you, I will do it gladly. But first understand, before we go any further, that I was in the same error that you are in: but I am sorry for it, and do confess myself to have erred: I acknowledge mine offence, and I wish and desire God that you may also repent with me.

Latimer. Will you give me leave to tell what hath caused Mr. Doctor here to recant? It is merely "The pain of the law," which hath brought you back, and converted you, and many more; which hindereth many from confessing God. And this is a great argument; there are few here can dissolve it.

Cartwright. That is not my case, but I will make you this short argument, by which I was converted from mine errors.

(1) If the true body of Christ be not really in the sacrament, all the whole church hath erred from the apostles' time.

(2) But Christ would not suffer his church to err.

(3) Therefore it is the true body of Christ.

Latimer. The popish church hath erred, and doth err. I think for the space of six or seven hundred years, there was no mention made of any eating but spiritually: for, before these five hundred years, the church did ever confess a spiritual eating. But the Romish church began the error of transubstantiation. My lord of Canterbury's book handleth that very well, and by him I could answer you if I had him.

Cartwright. Linus and all the rest do confess the body of Christ to be in the sacrament: and St. Augustine also upon the 99th Psalm, upon this place, "Worship his footstool," &c. granteth that it is to be worshipped.

Latimer. We do worship Christ in the heavens, and we do worship him in the sacrament: but the massing worship is not to be used.

Smith. Do you think that Cyril was of the ancient church?

Latimer. I do think so.

Smith. He saith, That Christ dwelleth in us corporally: these are Cyril's words of the mystical benediction.

Latimer. That [corporally] hath another understanding, than you do grossly take it.

It is urged by Cyril, that Christ dwelleth corporally in us, but he saith not that Christ dwelleth corporally in the bread. Which dwelling of Christ in us, is as our dwelling is also in Christ, not local or corporal, but spiritual and heavenly. Corporally therefore is to be taken in the same sense, as St. Paul saith, the fulness of divinity to dwell in Christ corporally, that is, not lightly nor accidentally, but perfectly and substantially, with all his virtue and power, &c. And so also dwelleth Christ corporally in us.

Hereupon Smith repeated these words of Cyril,
"By

"By the communicating of the body of Christ, Christ dwelleth in us corporally."

Latimer. The solution of this is in my lord of Canterbury's book.

Smith. Cyril was no papist, and yet these are his words, "Christ dwelleth in us corporally? But you say, he dwelleth in us spiritually."

Latimer. I say both, that he dwelleth in us corporally and spiritually, according to his meaning: spiritually by faith, and corporally by taking our flesh upon him. For I remember, I have read this in my lord of Canterbury's book.

Weston. Because your learning is let out to a farm, and shut up in my lord of Canterbury's book, I will recite unto you a place of St. Ambrose, concerning the preparation for the mass, where he saith, "We see the chief priest coming unto us, and offering blood," &c.

Likewise both Augustine in the 38th Psal. and Chrysostom concerning the incomprehensible nature of God, vol. 3. say, "Not only men," &c.

Latimer. I am not ashamed to acknowledge mine ignorance, and these testimonies are more than I can bear away.

Weston. Then you must leave some behind you for lack of carriage.

Latimer. But as to Chrysostom, he hath many figurative speeches, and emphatical phrases in many places; as in that which you have now recited: but he saith not, For the quick and the dead; he taketh the celebration for the sacrifice.

Weston. You shall hear Chrysostom again, upon the 9th chapter of the Acts, "What say you? The host in the hands of the priest," &c. He doth not call it a cup of wine.

Latimer. You have mine answer there in a paper; and yet he calleth it not a propitiatory sacrifice.

Weston. You shall hear it to be so: and I bring another place of Chrysostom out of the same treatise, "It was not rashly instituted by the apostles," &c.

Latimer. He is too precious a thing for us to offer; he offereth himself.

Weston. Here in another place of Chrysostom to the people of Antioch, and also to the Philippians, he saith, "There should be a memory and sacrifice for the dead."

Latimer. I do say, that the holy communion beareth the name of a sacrifice, because it is a sacrifice memorable.

Weston. What say you to the sacrifice of the dead?

Latimer. I say that it needeth not, and it availeth not.

Weston. Augustine in his Enchiridon, saith, "We must not deny that the souls of the dead are relieved by the devotion of their friends which are living, when the sacrifice of the Mediator is offered for them." Where he proveth the verity of Christ's body, and praying for the dead. And it is said, that the same Augustine said mass for his mother.

Latimer. But that mass was not like yours, which thing doth manifestly appear in his writings, which are against it in every place. And Augustine is a reasonable man, he requireth to be believed no further than he bringeth scripture for his proof, and agreeth with God's word.

Weston. In the same place he proveth a propitiatory sacrifice, and that upon an altar, and no oyster-board.

Latimer. It is the Lord's table, and no oyster-board. It may be called an altar, and so the doctors call it in many places: but there is no propitiatory sacrifice, but only Christ. The doctors might be deceived in some points, though not in all things; I believe them when they say well.

Cole. Is it not a shame for an old man to lye? You say, you are of the old fathers' faith where they say well, and yet you are not.

Latimer. I am of their faith when they say well; I refer myself to my lord of Canterbury's book wholly herein.

Smith. Then are not you of Chrysostom's faith, nor of St. Augustine's faith.

Latimer. I have said, when they say well, and bring scripture, I am of their faith; and further Augustine requireth not to be believed.

Weston. Origin, Hom. xiii. upon Leviticus.

Latimer. I have but one word to say; The sacramental bread is called a propitiation, because it is a sacrament of the propitiation. What is your vocation?

Weston. My vocation is at this time to dispute; otherwise I am a priest, and my vocation is to offer.

Latimer. Where have you that authority given you to offer?

Weston. (Hoc facite) "Do this," for (facite) in that place is taken for (offerte) that is, "offer ye."

Latimer. Is (facere) nothing but (sacrificare) "to sacrifice? Why, then no man must receive the sacrament, but priests only: for there may none other offer but priests.

Therefore there may none receive but priests.

Weston. Your argument is to be denied.

Latimer. Did Christ then offer himself at his supper?

Pye. Yes, he offered himself for the whole world.

Latimer. Then if this word (facite) "do ye," signify (sacrificate) "sacrifice ye," it followeth, as I said, that none but priests only ought to receive the sacrament, to whom it is only lawful to sacrifice: and where find you that, I pray you?

Weston. Forty years ago, whither could you have gone to have found your doctrine?

Latimer. The more cause we have to thank God, that hath now sent the light into the world.

Weston. The light? Nay, light and lewd preachers; for you could not tell what you might have. Ye altered and changed so often your communions and altars, and all for this one end, to spoil and rob the church.

Latimer. These things pertain nothing to me, I must not answer other men's deeds, but only for mine own.

Weston. Well, Mr. Latimer, this is our intent, to wish you well, and to exhort you to come to yourself, and remember, that without Noah's ark there is no health. Remember what they have been that were the beginners of your doctrine; none but a few flying apostates, running out of Germany for fear of the faggot. Remember what they have been which have set forth the same in this realm: a sort of fling-brains and light heads, which were never constant in any one thing, as it was to be seen in the turning of the table, where like a sort of apes they could not tell which way to turn their tails, looking one day west, and another day east; one that way, and another this way. They will be like (they say) to the apostles; they will have no churches; a hovel is good enough for them. They come to the communion with no reverence. They get them a tankard, and one saith, I drink, and I am thankful; the more joy of thee, saith another. And in them was it true that Hilary saith, "We make every year and every month a faith." A runagate Scot did take away the adoration or worshipping of Christ in the sacrament, by whose procurement that heresy was put into the last communion-book; so much prevailed that one man's authority at that time. You never agreed with the Tygurines, or Germans, or with the church, or with yourself. Your stubbornness cometh of a vain glory, which is to no purpose: for it will do you no good when a faggot is in your beard. And we see all, by your own confession, how little cause you have to be stubborn, for your learning is in scoffers hold. The queen's grace is merciful, if you will turn.

Latimer. You shall have no hope in me to turn. I pray for the queen daily, even from the bottom of my heart, that she may turn from this religion.

Weston. Here you all see the weakness of heresy against the truth: he denieth all truth, and all the old fathers.

Our readers may likewise see whether this boasting prolocutor obtained a glorious victory or not, over his insulted opponents, and how slender his pretensions for a triumph on that account. But no wonder he should claim the victory, disputing as he did, not without his tipping cup at his elbow; nor without frequent smiles from those who applauded the strength of his arguments; especially at that time, in the course of Dr. Ridley's disputation, when Weston, holding the cup, or beer-pot, in his hand, said to the opponent, "Urge this, urge this; for this makes for us; which words provoked the auditors to much laughter.

We have given now a full account of those disputations, that were maintained against three worthy confessors and martyrs of the Lord, wherein may be seen the disorderly usage of the university men, their unmannerly deportment in the divinity school, the tumult of a rude multitude, the passion, fierceness, and interruption of the grave doctors, the full ground of the reasonings, the censure of the partial judges, the foul language, and indecent railing of the prolocutor, with his vain blast of triumph at the conclusion of each debate, by which he shewed himself both actor, moderator, and judge. We need not wonder then that this victorious conqueror, having the law in his own hands, should say of himself, Vicit veritas, though throughout the several disputations he said not one true word, nor ever made a true conclusion.

On the 19th of April, the day after those disputations were closed, it happened that Mr. Harpsfield was called upon to dispute for his form, to be made a doctor of divinity; on which occasion Dr. Cranmer was again brought forth, and permitted, among the rest, to deliver an argument or two in defence of his cause, as the sequel will prove.

A DISPUTATION with Mr. HARPSFIELD, BACHELOR of DIVINITY, when answering for his FORM, to be made DOCTOR.

Harpsfield. I AM not ignorant what a weighty matter it is to intreat of the whole order and trade of the scriptures: and most hard it is too, in the great contention of religion, to shew the ready way whereby the scriptures may be best understood; for the often reading of them doth not bring the true understanding of them. What other thing is there then? Verily this is the ready way, not to follow our own heads and senses, but to give over our judgment unto the holy catholic church, who hath had of old years the truth, and always delivered the same to her posterity; but if the often reading of scriptures, and ever so painful comparing of places, should bring the true understanding, then divers heretics might prevail even against whole general councils. The Jews did greatly brag of their knowledge of the law, and of the Saviour that they waited for. But what availed it them? Notwithstanding, I know right well, that divers places of the scripture do much warn us of the often reading of the same, and what fruit doth thereby follow; as, "Search the scriptures, for they do bear witness of me," &c. "The law of the Lord is pure able to turn souls." And that saying of St. Paul, "All scripture inspired from above, doth make that a man may be instructed to all good works." Howbeit, doth the law of the Jews convert their souls? Are they by reading instructed to every good work? The letter of the Old Testament is the same that we have.

The heretics also have ever had the same scriptures, which we have that be catholics. But they are served as Tantalus that the poets speak of, who, in the plenty of things to eat and drink, is said to be oppressed with hunger and thirst. The swifter that men do seek the scriptures without the catholic church, the deeper they fall, and find hell for their labour. St. Cyprian, never swerving from the catholic church, saith, "He that doth not acknowledge the church to be his mother, shall not have God to his Father." Therefore it is true divinity to be wise with the church, where Christ saith, "Unless ye eat my flesh, and drink my blood, ye have no life in you."

If he had meant of only eating bread and drinking wine, nothing had been more pleasant to the Capernaïtes, neither would they have forsaken him. The flesh profiteth nothing to them that do so take it. For the Capernaïtes did imagine Christ to be given in such sort as he lived. But Christ spake high things; not that they should have him as flesh in the market, but to consider his presence with the spirit, under the forms whereby it is given. As there is an alteration of bodies by courses and times of ages, so there is no less variety in eating of bodies.

These things which I have recited briefly, Mr. Harpsfield did set out with many more words; and hereupon Dr. Weston disputed against him.

Weston. Christ's real body is not in the sacrament. Therefore, you are deceived.

Harpsfield. I deny the antecedent.

Weston. John xvi. "I speak the truth unto you: it behoveth me that I go away from you. For unless I do depart, the comforter cannot come," &c.

I will make this argument.

(1) Christ is so gone away, as he did send the Holy Ghost.

(2) But the Holy Ghost did verily come into the world.

(3) Therefore, Christ is verily gone.

Harpsfield. He is verily gone, and yet remaineth here.

Weston. St. Augustine saith, that these words, "I will be with you even to the end of the world," are accomplished, [secundum majestatem] "according to his majesty:" but [secundum presentiam carnis non est hic] "By the presence of his flesh he is not here." The church hath him not in flesh, but by belief.

Harpsfield. We must diligently weigh that there are two natures in Christ; the divine nature, and human nature. The divine nature is of such sort, that it cannot chuse but be in all places. The human nature is not such, that of force it must be in all places, although it be in divers after divers manner. So where the doctors do intreat of his presence by majesty, they do commend the majesty of the divine nature, not to hinder us of the natural presence here in the sacrament.

Weston. He saith further, "Ye shall not have me always with you," is to be understood in the flesh.

Harpsfield. The presence of the flesh is to be considered, that he is not here as he was wont to live in conversation with them, to be seen, talked withal, or in such sort as a man may give him any thing: after that sort he is not present.

Weston. But what say you to this of Augustine, "He is not here?"

Harpsfield. I do answer out of St. Augustine upon John, Tractat. 25, upon these words, "I go to the Father, ye shall not see me;" that is, "such as I am now." Therefore, I do deny the manner of his presence.

Weston. I will overthrow St. Augustine with St. Augustine, who saith this also, "How may a man hold Christ? send thy faith, and thou holdest him."

So he sheweth, that by sending our faith, we do hold Christ.

Harpsfield. Indeed no man holdeth Christ, unless he believe in him; but it is another thing to have Christ merciful and favourable unto us, and to have him present in the sacrament.

There St. Augustine speaketh of holding him by faith, as he is favourable unto us.

Weston. Nay, he speaketh there how the fathers had him in the flesh, and teacheth that we have him not so in the flesh, as they had him long time, saying, "Your fathers did hold Christ present in the flesh: do you hold him in your heart?" What words can be more plain? Further he saith, "He is gone and is not here: he hath left us, and yet hath not forsaken us. He is here in majesty, and gone touching the flesh."

Harpsfield. I do understand Augustine thus, that Christ is here in his flesh to them that receive him worthily: to such as do not worthily receive him, to them he is not present in the flesh. I judge, St. Augustine meaneth so. We have him, and have him not. We have him in receiving him worthily, otherwise not.

Weston. I will prosecute another argument. Cyril doth say, "By the majesty of his divinity he is ever here, but the presence of his flesh hath he taken away."

Harpsfield. The sense of Cyril is thus to be understood. The most true flesh of Christ is at the right hand of the Father. Thus the fathers taught, and so they believed. Thus said Cyril; thus said Augustine: and because this is the foundation of our faith, they did often times teach it. Therefore, when they prove this, (the body to be in heaven) they do not make against the presence in the sacrament.

So unless ye can plainly shew, that the fathers do directly say he is not in the sacrament, you make nothing against me: for I have shewed why the fathers so spake.

They

They did teach the great difference between the divine nature, and the human nature, as I have before said.

Weston. I will then prove, that he is not in the sacrament. Vigilius against the heretic Eutiches, upon these words, "Ye shall not have me always with you," saith, "The Son of God, as touching his humanity, is gone from us; by his divinity he remaineth with us." And the same Vigilius in his fourth book saith, "He that is in heaven, is not on earth;" speaking of Christ.

Harpsfield. I will shew you the reason of these words. The heretic Eutiches did believe that the divine nature of Christ was fastened on the cross, and believed that Christ had no natural body. To this Vigilius said, "That the human nature was taken up and ascended, which could not so have done, unless he had a body. This he said not, to take away the presence in the sacrament."

For what had he to refer this sentence to the sacrament? He never did so much as dream of the sacrament.

Weston. Cyril saith, "Although he be absent from us in body, yet are we governed by his Spirit."

Harpsfield. By these words he gave us a cheerfulness to aspire upwards, seeking from thence our help. For as touching his conversation, he is not so in the sacrament as one meet to be lived withal. But let him not teach us, that he is not there to feed us: for after that sort he is there.

Weston. You have satisfied me with your answers, in doing the same learnedly, and catholicly. But now to another argument.

(1). Christ is now so absent from the earth by his body, as he was absent from heaven when he lived here.

(2) But when he did live bodily on earth, the same natural body was out of heaven.

(3) Therefore, now whilst this natural body is in heaven, it is not on the earth.

Harpsfield. I deny the major.

Weston. These are Fulgentius's words, touching his human substance: "He was absent from heaven, when he descended from heaven: and touching the same substance, now he is in heaven, he is not on the earth: but concerning the divine nature, he never forsook either heaven or earth."

After these words, not waiting Harpsfield's answer, he offered Mr. Cranmer to dispute; who began in this wise.

Cranmer. I have heard you right learnedly and eloquently treat of the dignity of the scripture, which I do both commend, and wonder thereat. But whereas you refer the true sense and judgment of the scriptures to the catholic church, you are herein much deceived; especially, since, under the name of the church, you appoint such judges as have judged corruptly, and contrary to the true sense of scripture. I wonder, likewise, why you attribute so little to the diligent reading of the scriptures and comparing of passages, seeing the scriptures do so much commend the same, in divers places, as also in those which you yourself have already alledged. And as touching your opinion of these questions, it seemeth to me neither to have any ground of the word of God, nor of the primitive church. And, to say the truth, the schoolmen have spoken differently of them, nor do they agree concerning them among themselves. Wherefore, minding here to shew my judgment also, I must first desire you to answer a few questions: which being done, we shall the better proceed in our disputation. Moreover I must desire you to bear with my mistakes in the Latin tongue, which, through long disuse, is not now so familiar with me as it hath been. My first question, having chiefly a regard to the truth above all things, is this: "How Christ's body is in the sacrament, according to your mind or determination?"

To which a certain doctor answered: He is there as touching his substance, but not after the manner of his substance.

Harpsfield. He is there in such sort or manner, as he may be eaten.

No. 6.

Cranmer. My next question is, "Whether he hath his quantity and qualities, form, figure, and such like properties?"

Harpsfield. Are these your questions? I may likewise ask you, "When Christ passed through the virgin's womb, An ruperit necne?"

Upon these questions there were various opinions. A buzzing was heard among the doctors who knew not what to answer. Some thought one way; some another; nor could these learned doctors agree on this matter. After they had contended a-while, Dr. Cranmer said, "You put off questions with questions. I ask one thing, and you answer another. Again I ask, 'Whether he have those properties, which he had on earth?'"

Tresham. No, he hath not all the quantities and qualities belonging to a body.

Smith. Stop, Mr. Tresham; I will answer you, doctor, in the words of Damascene, "The bread is transformed," &c. But if thou wilt inquire how? "The manner is impossible to be described."

[Then two or three other disputants endeavoured to answer this question, but somewhat doubtfully. A great hurly-burly was among them, some affirming one thing, some another.]

Cranmer. Do you appoint me a body, and cannot tell what manner of body? Either he hath not his quantity, or else you are ignorant how to answer it.

Harpsfield. These are vain questions, and it is not meet to spend the time on them.

Weston. Hear me a-while: Lanfrancus, sometime bishop of Canterbury, doth answer in this wise unto Berengarius upon such like questions, Salubriter credi possunt, fideliter queri non possunt; i. e. "They may be well believed, but never faithfully asked."

Cranmer. If you think good to answer it, some of you declare it.

Harpsfield. He is there as pleaseth him to be there.

Cranmer. I would be best contented with that answer, if that your appointing a carnal presence had not driven me of necessity to have inquired for disputation's sake, how you place him there, since you will have a natural body.

[Again he was answered by several speaking at the same time; whereupon Mr. Ward, a great sophister, thinking the matter not fully answered, did declare his sentiments at large; how learnedly, and truly, I cannot tell; nor, I think, he himself, nor yet the best learned there; for it has been said since, that men, far better learned, could by no means perceive to what end his discourse tended. Indeed he told a formal tale about quantum & quantificum; and were we to rehearse the sum of his words, our readers would not be one jot the wiser.]

Weston. But I say, Christ's body was passible and not passible at one instant.

Scaton. You may ask as well other questions, how he is in heaven? whether he sit or stand? and whether he be there as he lived here?

Cranmer. You yourself, by putting a natural presence, do force me to question, "How he is here?" Therefore next I do ask this question, "Whether good and evil men do eat the body in the sacrament?"

Harpsfield. Yes, they do so, even as the sun doth shine upon kings' palaces, and on dung-heaps.

Cranmer. Then do I inquire, "How long Christ tarrieth in the eater?"

Harpsfield. These are curious questions, not proper to be asked.

Cranmer. I have taken them out of your schools and schoolmen, which you yourselves do most use: and there also do I learn to ask, "How far he goeth into the body?"

Harpsfield. We know that the body of Christ is received to nourish the whole man, both body and soul.

Cranmer. How long doth he abide in the body?

Scaton. St. Augustine saith, our flesh goeth into his flesh. But after he is once received into the stomach, it

maketh no matter for us to know how far he doth pierce, or whither he is conveyed.

[Here Mr. Tresham and one Mr. London answered, that Christ being given there under such form and quantity as pleased him, it was not to be inquired of his tarrying, or of his descending into the body.]

Harpsfield. You were wont to lay to our charge, that we added to the scripture, saying always, that we should fetch the truth out of the scripture; and now you yourself bring questions out of the schoolmen, which you have disallowed in us.

Crammer. I say, that I am constrained to ask these questions, because of this carnal presence which you imagine: and yet I know right well, that these questions are answered out of the scriptures. As to my last question, "How long he abideth in the body?" &c. the scripture answereth plainly, that Christ doth so long dwell in his people, as they are his members. Whereupon I make this argument.

(1) They which eat the flesh of Christ, do dwell in him, and he in them.

(2) But the wicked do not remain in him, nor he in them.

(3) Therefore, the wicked do not eat his flesh, nor drink his blood.

Harpsfield. I will answer unto you as St. Augustine saith, not that howsoever a man do eat, he eateth the body: but he that eateth after a certain manner.

Crammer. I cannot tell what manner ye appoint, but I am sure that evil men do not eat the flesh and drink the blood of Christ, as Christ speaketh in the sixth of John.

Harpsfield. In the sixth of John, some things are to be referred to the godly, and some to the ungodly.

Crammer. Whatsoever he doth treat of there concerning eating, doth pertain unto good men.

Harpsfield. If you do mean only of the word [eating,] it is true; if concerning the thing, it is not so; and if your meaning be of that which is contained under the word [eating,] it may be so taken, I grant.

Crammer. Now to the argument: "He that eateth my flesh, and drinketh my blood, dwelleth in me, and I in him." Doth not this prove sufficiently, that evil men do not eat what the good do?

Tresham. You must add, He that eateth worthily.

Crammer. I speak of the same manner of eating that Christ speaketh of.

Weston. Augustine, to the brethren in the wilderness, says, "There is a certain manner of eating." Augustine speaketh of two manners of eating; the one of them that eat worthily, the other that eat unworthily.

Harpsfield. All things in the sixth of John are not to be referred to the sacrament, but to the receiving of Christ by faith. The fathers do agree, that there is no reference made to the supper of the Lord, before they come unto, "The bread which I give, is my flesh," &c.

Crammer. Nay, but manna is treated of both before and after.

Harpsfield. I will apply another answer. This argument hath a kind of poison in it, which must be thus bitten away; that manna and this sacrament are not both one. Manna hath not it's efficacy of itself, but of God.

Crammer. But they that did take manna worthily, had fruit thereby: and so by your assertion, he that doth eat the flesh of Christ worthily, hath his fruit by that. Therefore the like doth follow of them both, and so there should be no difference between manna and this sacrament, by your reason.

Harpsfield. When it is said, that they which did eat manna are dead, it is to be understood, that they did want the virtue of manna.

Crammer. They then which do eat either of them worthily, do live.

Harpsfield. They do live which do eat manna worthily, not by manna, but by the power of God given by it. The other which do eat this sacrament, do live by the same.

Crammer. Christ did not treat of the cause, but the effect which followed: he doth not speak of the cause whereof the effect proceedeth.

Harpsfield. I do say, the effects are divers, life, and death, which do follow the worthy and unworthy eating thereof.

Crammer. Since you will needs have an addition to it, we must use both in manna and in the sacrament, indifferently, either worthily or unworthily. Christ spake absolutely of manna and of the supper; so that, after that absolute speaking of the supper, wicked men can in no wise eat the flesh of Christ, and drink his blood.

Further, Augustine upon John, Tractat. xxvi. upon these words, "He that eateth," &c. saith, "There is no such virtue in common meats, as in the Lord's body. For whoso eateth other meats, hath still hunger, and needeth to be satisfied daily; but he that doth eat the flesh of Christ, and drinketh his blood, doth live for ever." But you know, wicked men do not so.

Therefore, wicked men do not receive.

Harpsfield. St. Augustine meaneth, that he who eateth Christ's flesh, &c. after a certain manner, should live for ever. Wicked men do eat, but not after that manner.

Crammer. Only they which participate Christ are of the mystical body.

But evil men are not of the mystical body.

Therefore, they do not participate Christ.

Weston. Your wonderful gentle behaviour and modesty, good Dr. Crammer, is worthy much commendation: and that I may not deprive you of your right and just deserving, I give you most hearty thanks in my own name, and in the name of all my brethren. At which saying all the doctors gently put off their caps. Then Dr. Weston did oppose the respondent on this wise.

Weston. Tertullian doth call the sacrament the sign and figure of the Lord.

St. Augustine to Dardanus, saith, "The Lord did not sicken to say, This is my body, when he gave a sign of his body."

Besides this, he giveth rules how to understand the scriptures, saying, if the scriptures seem to command some heinous thing, then it is figurative, as by example, "To eat the flesh, and drink the blood, is a tropical speech."

Harpsfield. Tertullian did write in the place against Marcion an heretic, who denied Christ to have a true body, and said, he had only a fantastical body. He went about to shew, that we had Christ both in heaven and on earth; and though we have the true body in the sacrament, yet he would not go about so to confound him, as to say, that Christ was truly in the sacrament: for that heretic would have thereat rather marvelled, than believed it. Therefore he shewed him, that it was the figure of Christ: and a figure cannot be but of a thing that is or hath been extant.

To the text of Augustine, the church hath never taught the contrary. There is an outward thing in the sacrament, which sometimes hath sundry names. For it may be called a figure in this declaration, That body which is in the sacrament, is a figure of Christ dwelling in heaven.

To the third, That which is wrought by Augustine, for example, about the understanding of the scriptures, is thus to be understood, as tending to a general manner of eating; so, To eat the flesh, and drink the blood, may be a figurative speech to exclude Anthropophagium, that is, "The eating of man's flesh." The which is, when we eat man's flesh, cut in morsels, as we eat common meat; so as we neither have, nor eat Christ in the sacrament.

Weston. I understand your short and learned answer, which doth sufficiently satisfy me. But now to the second question, which is of transubstantiation.

The scripture calleth it bread.

Therefore, it is bread.

Harpsfield. In the name of bread all is signified which we do eat.

Weston. Theodoret, an ancient writer, in his first dialogue, says, "That Christ changed not the nature, but called it his body."

Harpsfield. He doth there speak of a symbol, which is the the outward form of the sacrament. He meaneth, that doth tarry in it's own nature.

Weston. Theodoret also, in his second dialogue of those kinds of bread and wine, saith, "They go not out of their own nature, but they tarry in their own substance."

Harpfield. They are understood to be of the same substance, into which they are turned.

Weston. But what say you to this? "They remain in their former substance."

Harpfield. Symbola manent, that is, "The outward signs do tarry."

Weston. But what is meant here by this word, [a symbol?]

Harpfield. The outward form or shape only of the nature.

Weston. Then you cannot call them a substance.

Harpfield. Yes, sir, every thing hath a certain substance in it's kind.

Weston. That is true, but accidents are not substances in their kind.

Harpfield. They are something in their kind.

Weston. Chrysostom to Cæsarius the monk, saith, "Like as before it is consecrated, it is bread; so after it is consecrated, it is delivered from the name of bread, and is endued with the name of the Lord's body, whereas the nature doth remain."

Harpfield. Where read you this place, I pray you?

Weston. Here in Peter Martyr I find it; I have his book in my hand.

Harpfield. The author shall be of more credit, before I make so much of him as to frame an answer unto it.

Weston. Indeed I know not well where he findeth it. But Gelasius saith, That the nature of bread and wine do tarry.

Harpfield. What is that Gelasius?

Weston. A bishop of Rome.

Harpfield. Then he allowed the mass.

Weston. Yes, and oftentimes said it; and purgatory he also allowed, and prayer for the dead, relicks, and invocation to the saints.

Harpfield. Then he meant nothing against transubstantiation.

Weston. It doth appear so indeed. But Origen saith, "That the material bread doth tarry, and is conveyed into the privy, and is eaten of worms."

Harpfield. Tush, tush, this place appertaineth unto holy bread.

Weston. What, doth it appertain to holy bread?

Harpfield. Yes, unto holy bread.

Weston. By what means can you shew how this miraculous work bringeth Christ into the sacrament?

Harpfield. By the scriptures I prove it, which say, "This is my body."

Weston. It doth rejoyce us all not a little, that you have so well maintained the sound doctrine of the sacrament of the altar, wherein you have faithfully cleaved to the catholic church, as an only stay of our religion: by which means you have proved yourself meet to be authorised further towards the practising of the scripture.

And here, I do openly witness, that I do thoroughly consent with you, and have, for disputation's sake only, brought these arguments against you, which you have right learnedly satisfied: and now all things being done, alter our form and manner, we will end this disputation, saying, In oppositum est sacra theologia. In oppositum est, &c.

Thus have ye heard, in these disputations about the holy supper of the Lord, the reasons and arguments of the doctors, the answers and resolutions of the bishops, and the vanity of the prolocutor, triumphing before the victory, with, "The truth hath overcome;" who rather should have exclaimed, "Power hath overcome;" as it happeneth always, where the greater part overcometh the better. For else, if power had not helped the prolocutor more than truth, there had been a small victory. But so it is, where judgments be partial, there all things turn to victory, though it be ever so mean and simple, as in this disputation doth well appear. For, on the side of the opponent, scarce any argument was rightly framed in true mood and figure; neither could the respondents be permitted to speak for themselves; and when they answered any thing, it was condemned as soon as they began to speak. Besides, such disturbance, tumults, and confusion, (more like a conspiracy, than a fair debate, without form and order) were in the school, during the whole time, that the respondents could not utter their minds; neither would the opponents be satisfied with any reasons, which they constantly opposed with evasive delusions. Concerning the disturbance that prevailed, it will plainly appear, from what Bishop Ridley has reported in the following narrative.

The REPORT and NARRATIVE of DR. RIDLEY, sometime BISHOP of LONDON, concerning the irregular and misconducted DISPUTATION with him and his Fellow-Prisoners, BISHOP CRANMER and BISHOP LATIMER.

I Never yet, since I was born, saw or heard any thing done or handled more vainly and tumultuously, than the disputation which was with me in the schools at Oxford. Yea, verily, I could never have thought that it had been possible to have found amongst men accounted to be of knowledge and learning in this realm, any so brazen-faced and shameless, so disorderly and vainly to behave themselves, more like stage-players in interludes to set forth a pageant, than to grave divines in schools to dispute. The sorbonical clamours (which at Paris I have seen in times past, when popery most reigned) might be worthily thought (in comparison of these ostentatious proceedings) to have had much modesty. And no great marvel, seeing they which should have been moderators, and overseers of others, and which should have given good examples in words and gravity; they themselves, above all others, gave worst example, and did, as it were, blow the trumpet to the rest, to rave, roar, rage, and cry out. By reason whereof, (good christian reader) manifestly it may appear, that they never sought for any truth or verity, but only for the glory of the world, and their own bragging victory. But lest, by the innumerable railings and reproachful taunts, wherewith I was baited on every side, our cause, yea rather God's cause and his church's, should be evil spoken of, and slandered to the world through false reports, and untrue examples given out of disputation, and so the verity might sustain some damage, I thought it no less than my duty to write mine answers; to the intent, that whosoever is desirous to know the truth thereof, may by this perceive as well those things which were chiefly objected, as summarily that which was answered of me unto each of them. Howbeit (good reader) I confess this to be most true, that it is impossible to set forth either all that was, God knoweth, tumultuously and confusedly objected of their parts, being so many, speaking many times all together so thick, that one could not well hear another, neither all that was answered on my behalf to them so sundry and divers opponents.

Moreover, a great part of the time appointed for the disputations, was vainly consumed in opprobrious checks and reviling taunts, with hissing and clapping of hands, and that in the English tongue, to procure the people's favour withal. All which things, when I with great grief of heart did behold, protesting openly, that such excessive and outrageous disorder was unseemly for those schools, and men of learning and gravity, and that they which were the doers and stirrers of such things, did nothing else but betray the slenderness of their cause, and their own vanities; I was so far off, by this humble complaint, from doing any good at all, that I was enforced to hear such rebukes, checks, and taunts for my labour, as no person of any honesty, without blushing, could abide to hear the like spoken of a most vile varlet, against a most wretched ruffian.

At the first beginning of the disputation, when I should have first confirmed mine answer to the first proposition, in few words, and that, (after the manner and law of schools) before I could make an end of my first probation, which was not very long, even the doctors themselves cried out, "He speaketh blasphemies, he speaketh blasphemies." And when I on my knees besought them, and that heartily, that they would vouchsafe to hear me to the end, (whereat the prolocutor, being moved, cried out on high, "Let him read it, let him read it,") yet, when I began to read again, there followed immediately such shouting, such a noise and tumult, such confusion of voices, crying, "Blasphemies, blasphemies," as to my remembrance I never heard or read the like, except it be that one, which was in the Acts of the Apostles, stirred up of Demetrius the silversmith, and others of his occupation, crying out against Paul, "Great is Diana of the Ephesians, Great is Diana of the Ephesians:" and except it be a certain disputation which the Arians had against the orthodox, and such as were of godly judgment in Africa, where it is said, that such as the president and rulers of the disputation were, such was the end of the disputations.

disputations. All were in a hurly-burly, and so great were the slanders which the Arians cast out, that nothing could quietly be heard. So writeth Victor in the second book of his history.

The which cries and tumults of them against me so prevailed, that I was absolutely forced to leave off reading of my probations, although they were short. If any man doubt of the truth hereof, let the same ask any one that was there, and utterly perverted in popery, and I am assured, he will say, I speak the least. But to complain of these things further, I will cease.

And further, speaking of this disputation, he concludeth with these words: "And thus was ended this most glorious disputation of the most holy fathers, sacrificers, doctors, and masters, which fought most manfully, as ye may see, for their God and goods, for their faith and felicity, for their country and kitchen, for their beauty and belly, with triumphant applauses and favour of the whole university."

After the disputation of Mr. Latimer was ended, on the Friday following, April 20th, the commissioners sat in St. Mary's church, as they did the Saturday before, and Dr. Weston used particular dissuasions with every one of them, and would not suffer them to answer in any wise, but directly and peremptorily, as his words were, to say whether they would subscribe or no. And first to Dr. Cranmer he said, He was overcome in disputations. To whom the bishop answered, That whereas Dr. Weston said, he hath answered and opposed, and could neither maintain his own errors, nor overturn the truth; all that he said was false: for he was not suffered to oppose as he would, nor could answer as he was required, unless he would have brawled with them, so thick their reasons came one after another, four or five frequently interrupting him, that he could not speak. Mr. Ridley and Mr. Latimer were asked what they would do: they replied, that they would stand to what they had said. Then they were all called together, and sentence read over them, that they were no members of the church: and therefore they, their favourers, and patrons, were condemned as heretics. And in reading of it, they were asked, Whether they would turn or no? But they bade them read on in the name of God, for they were not minded to turn. So they were all three condemned.

After which sentence of condemnation being awarded against them, they answered again each in his turn; in manner and effect of words as followeth; the archbishop speaking first.

Bp. Cranmer. "From this your judgment and sentence I appeal to the just judgment of God Almighty, trusting to be present with him in heaven, for whose presence in the altar I am thus condemned."

Bp. Ridley. "Although I be not of your company; yet doubt I not but my name is written in another place, whither this sentence will send us sooner, than we should by the course of nature have come."

Bp. Latimer. "I thank God most heartily, that he hath prolonged my life to this end, that I may in this case glorify God by that kind of death."

Dr. Weston's answer unto Latimer. "If you go to heaven in this faith, then I will never come thither, as I am thus persuaded."

After sentence was pronounced, they were separated one from another; namely, the archbishop was returned to Bocardo, Dr. Ridley to the sheriff's house, Mr. Latimer to the bailiff's.

On Saturday following, they had a mass with a general procession and great solemnity. Dr. Cranmer was caused to behold the procession out of Bocardo, Dr. Ridley out of the sheriff's house. Latimer also being brought to see it from the bailiff's house, thought that he should have gone to burning, and spake to one Augustine, a catchpole, to make a quick fire: but when he came to Carfax, (Oxford market place, where four ways meet) he ran as fast as his old bones would carry him, to one Spencer's shop, and would not look towards it. Dr. Weston carried the host; and four doctors supported the canopy over him, and his bread-eaten God.

Immediately after the sentence, Bishop Ridley wrote to Dr. Weston in the following manner.

MR. Prolocutor, you remember, I am sure, how you promised me openly in the schools, after my protestation, that I should see how my answers were there taken and written of the notaries, whom you appointed (for I objected not to any) to write what should be said, and to have had licence to have added unto them, or to have altered them, as upon more deliberation should have seemed me best. You granted me also, at the delivery of my answer unto your first proposition, a copy of the same. These promises are not performed. If your sudden departure be any part of the cause thereof, yet, I pray you, remember that they may be performed; for performance of promise is to be looked for at a righteous judge's hands. Now I send you here my answers in writing to your second and third propositions, and do desire and require earnestly a copy of the same, and I shall by God's grace procure the pains of the writer to be paid for, and satisfied accordingly. Mr. Prolocutor, in the time of my answering in the schools, when I would have confirmed my sayings with authorities and reasons, you said then openly, that I should have time and place to say and bring whatsoever I could, another time; and the same your saying was then and there confirmed by others of the commissioners: Yes, and (I dare say) the audience also thought then that I should have had another day, to have brought and said what I could for the declaration and confirmation of mine assertions. Now that this was not done, but so suddenly sentence given before the cause was perfectly heard, I cannot but marvel, &c.

On Monday next ensuing, April 23, Dr. Weston took his journey up to London, with the letters certificatory from the university to the queen, by whom the archbishop (Dr. Cranmer) directed his letters supplicatory unto the council; which letters, after the prolocutor had received, and had carried them well near half-way to London, by the way he opened the same, and seeing the contents thereof, sent them back again, refusing to carry them. Likewise Bishop Ridley, hearing of the prolocutor's going to London, wrote to him his letters, wherein he desired him to carry his answers up to certain bishops in London; the form of which letters, first of Dr. Ridley, then of the archbishop, and lastly, another letter of Dr. Ridley to the archbishop, here in order followeth.

BISHOP RIDLEY'S LETTER to DR. WESTON, the PROLOCUTOR.

MR. Prolocutor, I desire you, and in God's name require you, that you truly bring forth and shew all mine answers, written and subscribed with mine own hand, unto the higher house of the convocation, and especially to my lord chancellor, my lords of Durham, Ely, Worcester, Norwich, and Chichester; and also to shew and exhibit this my writing unto them, which in these few lines here I write unto you: and that I did make this request unto you by this my writing, know you, that I did take witness of them by whom I send you this writing, and also of those which were then with them present, viz. the two bailiffs of Oxford, and of Mr. Irish, alderman, then there called to be a witness.

By me, NICHOLAS RIDLEY.
April 13, 1554.

Written by DR. CRANMER, Archbishop of CANTERBURY, to the COUNCIL, which DR. WESTON refused to deliver.

IN right humble wise sheweth unto your honourable lordships, Thomas Cranmer, late archbishop of Canterbury, beseeching the same to be a means for me unto the queen's highness for her mercy and pardon. Some of you know by what means I was brought and trained unto the will of our late sovereign lord king Edward the sixth, and what I spake against the same, wherein I refer me to the reports of your honours and worship. Furthermore, this is to signify unto your lordships, that upon Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday last past, were open disputations here in Oxford against me, Mr. Ridley, and Mr. Latimer, in three matters concerning the sacraments: First, of the real presence. Secondly, of transubstantiation. And thirdly, of the sacrifice of the mass. Upon Monday against me; upon Tuesday against Dr. Ridley; and upon Wednesday against Mr. Latimer. How the other two were ordered, I know not, for we were separated, so that none of us knoweth what the other said, nor how they were ordered. But as concerning myself, I can report: Dr. Chedsey was appointed to dispute against me; but the disputation was so confused that I never knew the like, every man bringing forth what he liked without order: and such haste was made, that no answer could be suffered to be taken fully to any argument, before another brought a new argument. And in such weighty matters the disputation must needs be ended in one day, which so scantily be ended in three months. And when we had answered them, they would not appoint us one day to bring forth our proofs, that they might answer us, being required by me that unto, whereas I myself have more to say, than can be well discussed, as I suppose in twenty days. The means to resolve the truth, had been to have suffered us to answer fully to all that they could say, and then they again to answer us fully to all that we can say. But why they would not answer us, what other cause can there be, but that either they feared their matter, that they were not able to answer us, or else for some consideration they made such haste, not to seek the truth, but to condemn us, that it must be done in post-haste before the matters could be thoroughly heard: for in haste we were all three condemned of heresy. Thus much I thought good to signify unto your lordships, that you may know the indifferent handling of matters, leaving the judgment thereof unto your wisdoms. And I beseech your lordships to remember me, a poor prisoner, unto the queen's majesty, and I shall pray, as I do daily unto God, for the long preservation of your good lordships, in all godliness and felicity. April 23.

From DR. RIDLEY, Bishop of LONDON, to DR. CRANMER, Archbishop of CANTERBURY.

I With you might have seen these mine answers before I had delivered them, that you might have corrected them. But I trust, in the substance of the matter we do agree fully, both led by one spirit of truth, and both walking after one rule of God's word. It is reported, that serjeant Morgan, the chief justice of the common pleas, is gone mad. It is said also, that justice Hales hath recanted, perverted by Dr. Moreman. Item, That Mr. Rogers, Dr. Crome, and Mr. Bradford shall be had to Cambridge, and there be disputed with, as we were here; and that the doctors of Oxford shall go likewise thither, as Cambridge men came hither. When you have read mine answers, send them again to Austen, except you will put any thing to them. I trust, the day of our delivery out of all miseries, and of our entrance into perpetual rest; and unto perpetual joy and felicity, draweth nigh: the Lord strengthen us with his mighty spirit of grace. If you have nothing to write with, you must make your man your friend. And this bearer deserveth to be rewarded; so he may, and will do your pleasure. My man is trusty, but it grieveth both him and me, that when I send him with any thing to you, your man will not let him come up to see you, as he may to Mr. Latimer, and your's to me. I have a promise to see how my answers were written in the schools, but as yet I cannot come by it. Pray for me, I pray for you, and so I shall continue to do. The Lord have mercy on his church, and enlighten the eyes of the magistrates, that God's extreme plagues light not on this realm of England. TURN, OR BURN.

HAVING finished our account of the disputations, between the Roman catholics and protestant divines of the reformed religion, at Oxford, we shall now prosecute the historical narration, respecting various transactions in this tumultuous time of queen Mary. And because so many things happened in different parts of the realm, that it is difficult to preserve the due order of time in reciting them all, we shall therefore return again to the month of July, 1553, in which month, as we have before shewed, the duke of Northumberland was brought to London, by the earl of Auren-del, on St. James's day, July 25th; and these are the names of those who were committed with the duke to the Tower.

The earl of Warwick, the earl of Huntington, lord Ambrose, and lord Henry Dudley, lord Hastings, who was delivered again the same night; sir John Gates, sir Henry Gates, Andrew Dudley, sir Thomas Palmer, and Dr. Sands, chancellor of Cambridge.

July 26, the lord marquis of Northampton, the bishop of London, lord Robert Dudley, and sir Richard Corbet, were brought and committed to the Tower.

July 27, the lord chief Justice of England, and the lord Mountacute, chief justice of the common pleas, were committed to the Tower.

July 28, the duke of Suffolk and sir James Cheek, were committed to the Tower.

July 30, the lord Russel was committed to the sheriff of London's custody.

July 31, the earl of Rutland was committed to the Fleet: and on the same day the duke of Suffolk was delivered out of the Tower again.

Upon Thursday, August 3, the queen entered into the city of London at Aldgate, and so to the Tower, where she remained seven days, and then removed to Richmond.

August 4, Dr. Day was delivered out of the Fleet, and the day after, the lord Ferris was committed to the Tower, and Dr. Bonner delivered out of the Marshalsea. The same day at night Dr. Cocks was committed to the Marshalsea, and one Mr. Edward Underhill to Newgate. Also the same day Dr. Tonstal and Stephen Gardiner were delivered out of the Tower, and Gardiner received into the queen's privy council, and made lord chancellor.

No. 6.

August 7. Henry Dudley, Captain of the guard at Guines, who before had been sent to the French king by his cousin the duke of Northumberland, after the dispatch of his ambassage with the French king, returned to Guines, and was this day brought to the Tower.

August 7, Dirige in Latin was sung within the Tower by all the king's chapel, and the bishop of Winchester was chief minister, the queen being present and most of the council.

August 8, the king's body was brought to Westminster, and there buried; where Dr. Day, bishop of Winchester preached. The same day a mass of Requiem was sung within the Tower by the bishop of Winchester, who had on his mitre; and did all things as in times past was done; the queen being present.

Upon Thursday the duke of Norfolk came out of the Tower, with whom the duchess of Somerset was also delivered.

August 11, Dr. Bourne preached at Paul's Cross; of which mention has been made.

In the week following, commandment was given throughout the city, that no apprentices should come to the sermon, nor bear any knife or dagger.

August 16, Mr. Bradford, Mr. Bacon, and Mr. Vernon, were committed to the Tower; with whom also Mr. Samson should have been committed, and was sought for the same time, at Mr. Elsing's house in Fleet Street, where Mr. Bradford was taken: and because he was not found, the bishop of Winchester was greatly displeased with the messenger.

August 18, the duke of Northumberland, the marquis of Northampton, and the earl of Warwick, were arraigned at Westminster, and condemned the same day, the duke of Norfolk that day being the high judge.

August 19, sir Andrew Dudley, sir John Gates, sir Henry Gates, and sir Thomas Palmer, were arraigned at Westminster, and condemned the same day, the lord marquis of Winchester being high judge.

Upon which day a letter was sent unto sir Henry Tirril, Anthony Brown, and Edmund Brown, esquires, praying them to commit to ward all such as shall condemn the queen's order of religion, or shall keep themselves from church, there to remain until they be conformable, and to signify their names to the council.

August

August 20, Dr. Watson, the bishop of Winchester's chaplain, preached at St. Paul's Cross, at whose sermon were present the marquis of Winchester, the earl of Bedford, the earl of Pembroke, the lord Rich, and 200 of the guard with their halberds, lest the people should have made any stir against the preacher.

August 21, the duke of Northumberland, the marquis of Northampton, sir Andrew Dudley, sir John Gates, and sir Thomas Palmer, heard mass within the Tower, and after mass they all five received the sacrament in one kind only, as in the popish time was used. On which day also queen Mary set forth a proclamation, signifying to the people, that she could not hide any longer the religion which she from her infancy had professed, &c. prohibiting, in the said proclamation, printing and preaching; the tenor of which has been given before.

August 22, the duke of Northumberland, sir John Gates, and sir Thomas Palmer, were beheaded at Tower-hill. The same day certain noble personages heard mass within the Tower, and likewise after mass received the sacrament in one kind.

August 27, Dr. Chedsey preached at Paul's Cross, and the same day the archbishop of Canterbury, sir Thomas Smith, and the dean of St. Paul's, were cited to appear the week following before the Queen's commissioners, in the bishop's consistory within St. Paul's.

In the mean time it was noised abroad by running rumours falsely and craftily devised, either to establish the credit of the mass, or else to bring Thomas Cranmer, archbishop of Canterbury; out of credit, that he, to curry favour with queen Mary, should promise to say mass, after the old custom, for king Edward, and that he had already said mass at Canterbury, &c. Wherefore, to stop the slanders of those rumours, the said Thomas, archbishop of Canterbury, the seventh day of September, set forth a letter, which was also printed, in behalf of himself, the copy of which letter here followeth.

A DECLARATION of DR. THOMAS CRANMER,
Archbishop of CANTEBURY, wherein he clears himself from the stain of certain Calumnies falsely raised upon him.

AS the devil, Christ's ancient adversary, is a liar, and the father of lies, even so hath he stirred up his servants and members to persecute Christ and his true word and religion with lying: which he ceaseth not to do most earnestly at this present time. For whereas the prince of famous memory, king Henry VIII. seeing the great abuses of the Latin mass, reformed some things therein in his life time; and after our late sovereign lord king Edward VI. took the same wholly away, for the manifold and great errors and abuses of the same, and restored in the place thereof Christ's holy supper, according to Christ's own institution, and as the apostles used the same in the primitive church, the devil goeth about now by lying to overthrow the Lord's supper again, and to restore his Latin satisfactory mass, a thing of his own invention and device. And to bring the same more easily to pass, some have abused the name of me Thomas archbishop of Canterbury, reporting abroad, That I have set up the mass at Canterbury, and that I offered to say mass at the burial of our late sovereign prince king Edward VI. and that I offered to say mass before the queen's highness, at St. Paul's church, and I know not where. And although I have been well exercised these twenty years, to suffer and bear evil reports and lies, and have not been much grieved thereat, but have borne all things quietly; yet when untrue reports and lyes turn to the hindrance of God's truth, they are in no wise to be suffered. Wherefore these be to signify unto the world, That it was not I that set up the mass at Canterbury, but it was a false, flattering, lying, and dissembling monk, (one Dr. Thornton,) which caused mass to be set up there without mine advice or counsel. (The Lord recompence him in that day!) And as for offering myself to say mass before the queen's highness, or in any other place, I never did it, as her grace well knoweth. But if her grace will give me leave, I shall be ready to prove, against all that will say the contrary, that all that is contained in the holy communion, set out by the most innocent and godly prince king Edward VI. in his high court of Parliament, is conformable to that order, which our Saviour Christ did both observe, and command to be observed, and which his apostles and the primitive church used many years; whereas the mass, in many things, not only hath no foundation of Christ, his apostles, nor the primitive church, but is manifestly contrary to the same, and containeth many horrible abuses in it. And although many, either unlearned or malicious, do report, that Peter Martyr is unlearned; yet, if the queen's highness will grant thereunto, I, with the said Peter Martyr, and other four or five, which I shall chuse, will, by God's grace, take upon us to defend, not only the common prayers of the church, the ministration of the sacraments, and other rites and ceremonies, but also all the doctrine and religion set out by our sovereign lord king Edward VI. to be more pure, and according to God's word, than any other that hath been used in England these thousand years: so that God's word may be judge, and that the reasons and proofs of both parties may be set out in writing, to the intent, as well that all the world may examine and judge thereon, as that no man shall start back from his writing. And where they boast of the faith, that hath been in the church these fifteen hundred years, we will join with them in this point; and that the same doctrine and usage is to be followed which was in the church fifteen hundred years past: and we shall prove, that the order of the church, set out at this present, in this realm, by act of parliament, is the same that was used in the church fifteen hundred years past; and so shall they never be able to prove their's.

On Thursday, September 7, lord Mountacute, chief justice, and lord chief baron were delivered out of the Tower.

September 13, the reverend father, Hugh Latimer, bishop of Worcester, was committed to the Tower.

September 14, the archbishop of Canterbury, Mr. Cranmer, was committed to the Tower.

September 26, one Mr. Gray of Cambridge, called before him one Mr. Garth, for that he would not suffer a boy of Peter-house to help him say mass in Pembroke-hall, which was before any law was established for that behalf.

On Thursday, September 28, the queen came to the Tower of London, and upon the Saturday following, she rode from the Tower through the city, where were made many pageants to receive her, and so she was triumphantly brought to Whitehall. Among these pageants stood a certain man upon the top of the eagle, on St. Paul's steeple, with a flag in his hand.

Upon Sunday, October 1, the queen's highness went from Whitehall to Westminster-Abbey, accompanied with most part of the nobility of the realm, namely, the duke of Norfolk, the earl of Arundel, the earl of Shrewsbury, the marquis of Winchester, the earls of Derby, Bedford, Worcester, Cumberland, Westmoreland, Oxford, Suffex, Devonshire, Pembroke, the lord Dacres of the north, lord Ferris, lord Cobham, lord Abergavanny, lord Wentworth lord Scroope, lord Rich, lord Vaus, lord Howard, lord Conias, lord Morley, lord Paget, and the lord Willoughby; with other nobles, and all the ambassadors of divers countries, the mayor of London, with all the aldermen. Also out of the Abbey, to receive her coming, came three silver crosses, and to the number of about fourscore singing men, all in very rich and gorgeous copes. Amongst whom was the dean of Westminster, and divers of the queen's chaplains, which bare every one some ensign in their hands, and after them followed ten bishops, all mitred, and their crozier staves in their hands, and rich copes upon them every one. And in this order they returned from Westminster-hall, before the queen to the Abbey, where she was crowned by Stephen Gardiner, bishop of Winchester, and lord Chancellor of England. At the time of the coronation, Dr. Day, bishop of Chichester, made a sermon to the queen's majesty, and to the rest of the nobility.

Also there was a general pardon proclaimed within the Abbey at the time of her coronation, out of which proclamation all the prisoners of the Tower and of the Fleet were excepted, and 62 more: whereof Mr. Whitchurch and Mr. Grafton were two.

October 3, the vice chancellor of Cambridge did challenge one Mr. Pierfon, for that he ministered still the communion in his own parish, and did receive strangers of other parishes to the same, and would not say mass. Whereupon, within two days after, he was clean discharged from farther ministering in his cure.

Upon the Wednesday following, the archbishop of York was committed to the Tower.

Upon Thursday, October 5, 1553, the queen rode to the parliament in her robes; and all the nobility with her; and when they were set in the parliament-house, the bishop of Winchester made to them a solemn oration, and serjeant Pollard was chosen speaker. The same same day the bishops of Lincoln, Hereford, and Westchester, were discharged from the parliament and convocation.

Also October 10, the earl of Huntington was delivered out of the Tower.

Upon Sunday after, October 15, Mr Laurence Saunders preached at Allhallows in Bread-street, in the morning: where he fully declared the abomination of the mass, with divers other matters: whereof more shall be heard by God's leave hereafter, when we come to his story. In doing which, as he shewed himself to be God's faithful minister, so is he sure not to be defrauded of God's faithful promise, who saith, Matt. x. "Who-soever shall confess me before men, him will I confess also before my Father which is in heaven." But about noon of the same day, he was sent for by the bishop of London, and committed to the Marshalsea.

Upon the Sunday following, October 22, Dr. Weston preached at Paul's-Cross, who in the beginning of his sermon desired the people to pray for the souls departed; on this wise: "You shall pray for all them that be departed, that be neither in heaven nor hell, but in a place not yet sufficiently purged to come to heaven, that they may be relieved by your devout prayers." He named the Lord's table an oyster board. He said, that the catechism in Latin, lately published, was abominable heresy, and likened the setters out of the same to Julian the Apostate, and the book to a dialogue written by the said Julian, wherein Christ and Pilate were the speakers; with many others things. This sermon Mr. Coverdale learnedly confuted in writing, which (says Mr. Fox) remaineth yet in my hands to be seen.

In the week following began the public disputations at St. Paul's, whereof sufficient hath been said.

October 26, the vice-chancellor of Cambridge went to Clare-hall, and in the presence of Dr. Walker, displaced Dr. Madew, and placed Mr. Swyborne in the mastership there, by virtue of the lord chancellor's letters, for that he was married.

October 28, the papists in King's college, Cambridge, had their whole service again in the Latin tongue, contrary to the law, then not repealed.

October 31, the vice-chancellor of Cambridge did sharply reprove and threaten one Mr. Thrackold, for that he challenged the said vice-chancellor, who had suffered master Bovell (contray to the statutes then in force) quietly without punishment to depart, notwithstanding that he refused to swear to the supremacy of the queen, and the abrogation of the bishop of Rome.

November 3, the vice-chancellor sent for the curate of the round parish in Cambridge, commanding him not to minister any more in the English tongue, saying, he would have one uniform order of service throughout the town, and that in Latin, with mass, which was established the twelfth day of this month.

November 6, Mr. Pollard preached at St. Michael's, and in his sermon approved purgatory.

November 28, the archdeacon's official visited in Hinton, where he gave in charge to imprison all such as did disturb the queen's proceedings, in hindering the Latin service, the setting up of their altars, and saying of mass, or any part thereof: whereby it was easy to see how these good fellows meant to proceed, having the law once on their side, who thus readily, against a manifest law, would attempt the punishment of any man.

December 15, there were two proclamations at London; the one for repealing of certain acts made by king Edward, and for the setting up of the mass the 20th of December following. The other was, that no man should interrupt any of those who would say mass.

The parliament beginning about the 5th of October, continued till the 5th of December. In which parliament were dissolved, as well all the statutes made of Præmunire in the time of king Henry VIII. &c. as also other laws and statutes concerning religion and administration of sacraments, decreed under King Edward VI. In which parliament was appointed, that on December 20, then next ensuing, the same year 1553, the old form and manner of church-service, used in the last year of king Henry, should again be restored.

December 31, the lord marquis of Northampton was delivered out of the Tower.

About this time, a priest of Canterbury said mass on one day; and the next day after, he came into the pulpit, and desired all the people to forgive him; for he said he had betrayed Christ, not as Judas did, but as Peter did, and there made a long sermon against the mass.

January 2, 1554, four ambassadors came into London, from the emperor, and were honourably received. Their names were, Le Countie de Egmont, Le Countie de Lalen, Monsieur Corire, Le Chancellor Nigre.

About this time a great number of new bishops, deans, &c. were chose, more than were made at one time since the conquest; namely, Dr. Holyman, bishop of Bristol; Dr. Coates, bishop of Westchester; Dr. Hopron, bishop of Norwich; Dr. Bourne, bishop of Bath; Dr. White, bishop of Lincoln; Dr. Mores, bishop of Rochester; Dr. Morgan, bishop of St. David's; Dr. Poole, bishop of St. Asaph; Dr. Brooks, bishop of Gloucester; Dr. Moreman, coadjutor to the bishop of Exeter, and after his decease bishop of Exeter; Dr. Glin, bishop of Bangor; Mr. Fecknam, dean of St. Paul's; Dr. Reynolds, dean of Bristol, with others.

January 12, the vice-chancellor of Cambridge called a congregation general, wherein amongst other things, he shewed, that the queen would have there a mass of the Holy Ghost upon the 18th of February then next following, for that it was her birth-day; which was fulfilled the day appointed, and that very solemnly.

Saturday, January 13, Dr. Crome was committed to the Fleet: also, the Sunday following, one Mr. Addington was committed to the Tower. The same Sunday likewise, the bishop of Winchester declared openly in the court, that the marriage between the queen's majesty and the king of Spain was concluded; and the day following, January 15, the mayor with the aldermen and certain commons were at the court, and there they were commanded by the lord chancellor to prepare the city ready to receive the said king of Spain; who declared unto them what a catholic, mighty, prudent, and wise prince the said king was, with many other commendations of him.

Saturday, January 20, the court of the first-fruits and tenths was dissolved.

Thursday night, January 25, the lord marquis of Northampton was again committed to the Tower, and sir Edward Warner with him; who were brought to the Tower by the mayor.

On Saturday following, January 27, justice Hales was committed to the Marshalsea; and the same day Mr. Rogers was committed to Newgate. Saturday, Sunday, and Monday following, the Londoners prepared a number of soldiers, by the queen's command, to go into Kent against the commons; whereof were chief captains, the duke of Norfolk, the earl of Wornwood, sir Henry Jennings, sir George Howard, and ten other captains; which soldiers, when they came to Rochester-bridge, where they should have set upon their enemies, most of them (as it is said) left their own captains, and came wholly to the Kentish men; and so the aforesaid captains returned to the court both void of men and victory, leaving behind them six pieces of ordnance and treasure.

About the latter end of January the duke of Suffolk, with his brethren, departed from his house at Shene, and went into Leicestershire; after whom the earl of Huntington was sent, to take him and bring him to London, who proclaimed the said duke traitor by the way as he rode.

Upon the 15th day of February, being Thursday, within the city of London, about nine o'clock in the forenoon, strange sights were seen. Two suns both shining at once, the one a good way distant from the other; at the same time was also seen a rainbow, with the arch reversed. Both these sights were seen as well at Westminster, in Cheapside, on the south side of St. Paul's, as in many other places, and that by a great number of honest men. Also certain aldermen went out of Guildhall to behold the sight.

Concerning the rising of Mr. Wyat, with sir William Cobham, Cobham, and others in Kent, and their coming to London in the month of February; also of the queen's coming to Guild-hall, and her oration there made; and of the taking of the said Wyat and his company; likewise the apprehension of the duke of Suffolk, with his brother lord John Gray; and the next day after, of the beheading of the lord Guildford, and lady Jane, which was February 12; and how, the day before, lord William Howard, and sir Edward Hastings, were sent for the lady Elizabeth; and how, the same Sunday, sir Henry Iseley, Mr. Culpepper, and Mr. Winter, were committed to the Tower; the bishop of Winchester, the same day, February 11th, peaching before the queen, and persuading her to use no mercy towards these Kentish men, but severe execution; all which was in the month of February: because most of these matters have been briefly touched before, or else may be found in other chronicles, I will cease to make any further mention of them: having somewhat notwithstanding to declare touching the arraignment and death of the duke of Suffolk.

Saturday February 17, the duke of Suffolk was arraigned at Westminster, and the same day condemned to die by his peers; the earl of Arundel was chief judge for this day.

Sunday the 18th, sessions was held in London, which had not been before on a Sunday.

Monday 19th, lord Cobham's three sons, and four other men, were arraigned at Westminster: of which sons the youngest was condemned, whose name was Thomas; the other two came not to the bar; and the other four men were condemned.

Tuesday 20th, lord John Gray was arraigned at Westminster, and condemned the same day, and other three men, whereof one was named Nailer.

Wednesday 21st, lord Thomas Gray, and sir James Croft, were brought through London to the Tower, with a number of horsemen.

Thursday 22d, sir Nicholas Throgmorton was committed to the Tower.

Friday 23d, 1554, the duke of Suffolk was beheaded on Tower-hill, the order of whose death here followeth.

The devout BEHAVIOUR of the DUKE of SUFFOLK, on the DAY of his EXECUTION.

ABOUT nine o'clock in the forenoon, Henry Gray, duke of Suffolk, was brought forth from the Tower, unto the scaffold on Tower-hill, and in his coming thither, there accompanied him Dr. Weston as his spiritual father, notwithstanding, as it seemed, against the will of the said duke. For when the duke went up to the scaffold, the said Weston, being on the left hand, pressed to go up with him; the duke with his hand put him down again off the stairs; and Weston taking hold of the duke, forced him down likewise. And as they ascended the second time, the duke again put him down. Then Weston said, That it was the queen's pleasure he should do so. Where-with the duke casting his hands abroad, ascended up the scaffold, and paused a long time after. And then he said, "Masters, I have offended the queen, and her laws, and thereby am justly condemned to die, and am willing to die, desiring all men to be obedient, and I pray God that this my death may be an example to all men, beseeching you all to bear me witness, that I die in the faith of Christ, trusting to be saved by his blood only, and by no other trumpery, the which died for me, and for all them that truly repent, and stedfastly trust in him. And I do repent desiring you all to pray to God for me; and that when you see my breath depart from me, you will pray to God that he may receive my soul." And then he desired all men to forgive him, saying that the queen had forgiven him.

Then Dr. Weston declared with a loud voice, that the queen's majesty had forgiven him. With that several of the standers by said with good and audible voices, Such forgiveness God send thee! (meaning Dr. Weston.) Then the duke kneeled down upon his knees, and said the Psalm, Miserere, mei Deus, unto the end, holding up his hands, and looking up to heaven. And when he had ended the Psalm, he said, "Into thy hands, O Lord, I commend my spirit," &c. Then he arose and stood up, and delivered his cap and his scarf unto the executioner. Then the said executioner kneeled down, and asked the duke forgiveness. And the duke said, "God forgive thee, and I do: and when thou doest thine office, I pray thee do it well, and send me out of this world quickly, and God have mercy on thee." Then stood there a man and said, "My lord, how shall I do for the money that you do owe me?" And the duke said, "Alas, good fellow, I pray thee, trouble me not now, but go thy way to my officers." Then he tied a handkerchief about his face, and kneeled down and said, "Our Father which art in heaven," &c. unto the end. And then he said, "Christ have mercy upon me," and laid down his head on the block, and the executioner took the ax, and at the first blow struck off his head, and held it up to the people, &c.

The same day several prisoners had their pardon, and came through the city with their halters about their necks, in number about two hundred and forty.

Saturday, February 24th, sir William Bentlow was committed as prisoner to the master of the horse. This sir William was at this time one of lady Elizabeth's gentlemen.

Sunday 25th, Sir John Rogers was committed to the Tower.

In this week, all such priests, within the diocese of London, as were married, were divorced from their livings, and commanded to bring their wives within a fortnight, that they might be likewise divorced from them; this the bishop did of his own power.

February 27th, certain gentlemen of Kent were sent into that country to be executed, among whom we find the two Mantels, two Knevets, and Bret. Mr. Rudstone also, and others were condemned, and would have been executed, but they had their pardon.

As to Mr. Mantel, senior, it is to be noted, that, when under the gallows, upon his being turned off, the rope broke. Upon which they urged him to recant, and receive the sacrament, of the altar, promising him the queen's pardon; but this worthy gentleman rejected their insidious counsel, and chose rather to die, than to live, by dishonouring God.

It was reported of this Mr. Mantel, but falsely, that he had recanted; to clear himself from which aspersion, he wrote the following apology.

The APOLOGY of Mr. MANTEL, senior, March 20th, 1554.

PERCEIVING that already certain false reports are raised of me concerning my answer in the behalf of my belief, while I was prisoner in the Tower of London, and considering how sore a matter it is to be an occasion of offence to any of those little ones that believe in Christ; I have thought it the duty of a christian man, as near as I can (with the truth, to take away this offence. It pleased the queen's majesty to send unto me Dr. Bourne, unto whom at the first meeting I acknowledged my faith in all points to agree with the four creeds, that is the common creed, the creed of Nicene, Quicunque vult, and Te Deum laudamus.

Further, as concerning confession and penance, I declared that I could be content to shew unto any learned minister of Christ's church any thing that troubled my conscience, and of such a man I would most willingly hear absolution pronounced.

Touching the sacrament of the altar (as he termed it), I said, that I believed Christ to be there present as the Holy Ghost meant, when these words were written, "This is my body."

Further, when this would not satisfy, I desired him to consider, that I was a man condemned to die by law, and that it was more meet for me to seek a readiness and preparation for death. And in as much as I dissented not from him in any article of the christian faith necessary to salvation, I desired him for God's sake no more to trouble me with such matters, as which to believe, is neither salvation; nor not to believe, damnation. He answered, that if I dissented but in the least matter from the catholic church, my soul was in great danger; therefore much more in this great matter, alledging this text, "He that offendeth in the least of these, is guilty of them all." Yes, said I, "It is true of these commandments of God." To this I desired him to consider it was not my matter, nor could I in these things hold disputation, nor minded so to do; and therefore to take these few words for a full answer, that I not only only in the matter of the sacrament, but also in all other matters of religion, believe as the holy catholic church of Christ (grounded upon the prophets and apostles) believeth. But upon this word [Church] we agreed not; for I took exception at the antichristian popish church.

Then fell we in talk of the mass, wherein we agreed not; for I, both for the occasion of idolatry, and also the clear subversion of Christ's institution, thought it naught; and he, on the contrary, upon certain considerations, supposed it good. I found fault that it was accounted a sacrifice propitiatory for sin, and at certain other applications of it. But he said that it was not a propitiatory sacrifice for sin (for the death of Christ only was the sacrifice,) and this but a commemoration of the same. Then, if you think so, (certain blasphemous collects left out) I could be content (were it not for offending my poor brethren that believe in Christ, which know not so much) to hear your mass. See, said he, how vain-glory toucheth you. Not so, sir, I am not now I thank God, in case to be vain-glorious.

Then I found further fault with it, that it was not a communion. Yes, saith he, one priest saying mass here, and another there, and the third in another place, &c. is a communion. This agreeth not, said I, with these words of Paul, "Ye come not after a better manner, but after a worse." Yes, and it is a communion too, said he, when they come together. Now draweth on the time, said he, that I must depart from you to the court, to say mass before the queen, and must signify unto her in what case I find you, and methinks I find you sore seduced. Then I said, I pray you report the best: for I trust you find me not obstinate. What shall I say? are you content to hear mass, and to receive the sacrament of the mass? I beseech you, said I, signify unto her majesty, that I am neither obstinate nor stubborn; for time and persuasion may alter me, but as yet my conscience is such, that I can neither hear mass, nor receive the sacrament after that sort. Thus, after certain requests made to the queen's majesty concerning other matters, he departed.

The next day he came to me again, and brought with him St. Cyprian's works; for so I had required him to do the day before, because I would see his sermon on mortality. He had in this book turned and interlined certain places both concerning the church and the sacrament, which he asked me to read. I read as much as my time would serve, and at his next coming I said, that I was wholly of Cyprian's mind in the matter of the sacrament. Dr. Weston and Dr. Mallett came after to me, whom I answered much after that sort as I did the other. Dr. Weston brought in the place of St. Cyprian, another book on the same subject. I asked of him how the word [Nature] was taken in the convocation-house, in the disputation upon the place of Theodore.

To be short, Dr. Bourne came often unto me, and I always said unto him, that I was not minded, nor able to dispute in matters of religion: but I believed as the holy catholic church of Christ, grounded upon the prophets and apostles, doth believe: and namely in the matter of the sacrament, as the holy fathers, St. Cyprian and St. Augustine, do write, and believed; and this answer and none other they had of me in effect; what words soever have been spread abroad of me, that I should be conformable to all things, &c. The truth is, I never heard mass, nor received the sacrament during the time of my imprisonment.

One time he asked me to be confessed. I said, I am content. We kneeled down to pray together in a window. I began without Benedicite, desiring him not to look at my hand for any superstitious particular enumeration of my sins. Therewith he was called away to the council; and I was set at liberty. Thus much I bear only for my life, as God knoweth. If in this I have offended any christian, from the bottom of my heart I ask them forgiveness. I trust God hath forgiven me, who knoweth that I durst never deny him before men, lest he should deny me before his heavenly Father.

Thus I have left behind me written with my own hand the effect of all the talk, especially of the worst that ever I granted unto, to the uttermost I can remember, as God knoweth. All the whole communication I have not written; for it were both too long and too foolish so to do. Now I beseech the living God, which hath received me to his mercy, and brought to pass, that I die steadfast and undefiled in his truth, at utter defiance and detestation of all papistical and antichristian doctrine; I beseech him, I say, to keep and defend all his chosen, for his name's sake, from the tyranny of the bishop of Rome, that antichrist, and from the assault of all his satellities. God's indignation is known: he will try and prove who are his. Amend your lives. Deny not Christ before men, lest he deny you before his heavenly Father. Fear not to lose your lives for him; for ye shall find them again. God hold his merciful hand over this realm, and avert the plagues imminent from the same. God save the queen, and send her knowledge in his truth, Amen. Pray, pray, ye christians, and comfort yourselves with the scriptures.

Written the 2d of March, ann. 1554, by me WALTER MANTEL, prisoner, whom God and the world hath forgiven his offences. Amen

TRANSACTIONS in the Second Year of QUEEN MARY'S REIGN.

SATURDAY, March 3d; sir Gawein Carew and M. Gibbes, were brought through London to the Tower with a company of horsemen.

March 17th, every householder in London was commanded to appear before the aldermen of their ward, and there were commanded, that they, their wives, and servants should prepare themselves for confession, and receive the sacrament at Easter, and that neither they, nor any of them should depart out of the city until Easter was past.

The Sunday following; March 18th, lady Elizabeth, the queen's sister, of whom mention was made before, was brought to the Tower.

Upon Easter eve, March 24th, the lord marquis of Northampton, the lord Cobham, and sir William Cobham, were delivered out of the Tower.

March 25, being Easter-day, in the morning, at St. Pancrase in Cheap, the crucifix with the pyx [the vessel in which the host was kept] were taken out of the sepulchre, before the priest rose to the resurrection: so that when, after his accustomed manner, he put his hand into the sepulchre, and said very devoutly, "He is risen, he is not here," he found his words true, for he was not there indeed. Whereupon being half disinayed, they consulted among themselves, whom they thought to be the likeliest to do this thing: in which consultation they remembered one Marsh, who a little before had been put from that parsonage, because he was married, to whose charge they laid it. But when they could not prove it, being brought before the mayor, they then burthened him to have kept company with his wife, since that they were by commandment divorced. Whereunto he answered, That he thought the queen had done him wrong, to take from him both his living and his wife: which words were then noted; and taken very grievously, and he and his wife were both committed to separate compters, notwithstanding that he had been very sick.

April 8, a cat was hanged upon a gallows, at the cross, in Cheapside, apparelled like a priest ready to say mass, with a shaven crown: her two fore-feet were tied over her head, with a round paper like a wafer-cake, put between them: whereon arose great ill will against the city of London. For the queen and the bishops were very angry; and the same afternoon there was a proclamation issued, that whosoever could bring forth the party that did hang up the cat, should have twenty nobles, which was afterwards increased to twenty marks, but none could, or would earn them.

As to the first occasion of setting up this gallows in Cheapside, here is to be understood; that after the bishop of Winchester's sermon above-mentioned, made before the queen, for the speedy execution of Wyat's soldier's, immediately upon the same, February 13, there were several gibbets set up in divers parts of the city; namely, two in Cheapside, one at Leadenhall, one at Billingsgate, one at St. Magnus' church, one in Smithfield, one in Fleet-street, four in Southwark, one at Aldgate, one at Bishopsgate, one at Aldersgate, one at Newgate, one at Ludgate, one at St. James's-park corner, one at Cripplegate: all which remained for the terror of others, from February 13, to June 4: and then at the coming in of king Philip they were taken down.

April 11, sir Thomas Wyat was beheaded and quartered on Tower-hill, where he spoke these words concerning the lady Elizabeth, and the earl of Devonshire: "Concerning, said he, what I have said of others in my examination, to charge any others as partakers of my doings, I accuse neither my lady Elizabeth's grace, nor my lord of Devonshire. I cannot accuse them, neither am I able to say, that to my knowledge they knew any thing of rising." And when Dr. Weston told him, that his confession was otherwise before the council, he answered: "That which I said then, I said; but that which I say now, is true."

Tuesday, April 17, sir James Croft and Mr. Winter

were brought to Guildhall, with whom also was brought sir Nicholas Throgmorton, and there arraigned of treason, for that he was suspected to be of the conspiracy with the duke of Suffolk and the rest, against the queen: where he so learnedly and wisely behaved himself, (as well in clearing his own case, as also in opening such laws of the realm as were then alledged against him) that the jury which were charged with this matter, could not in conscience but find him not guilty; for which, the said twelve persons of the quest, being substantial men of the city, were each bound in the sum of 500 pounds, to appear before the queen's council at a day appointed, there to answer such things as should be said against them. Which jury appeared accordingly before the council in the Star-chamber, upon Wednesday, April 25, from whence, after certain questioning, they were committed to prison, Emanuel Lucar and Mr. Whetstone to the Tower, and the other ten to the Fleet.

Concerning the condemnation of Dr. Cranmer, Dr. Ridley, and Mr. Latimer, which was the 20th of this month, and also of their disputations, having said enough before, we need not here rehearse the same.

On Friday after their condemnation, April 27, the lord Thomas Gray, brother to the late duke of Suffolk, was beheaded on Tower-hill.

Saturday, April 28, sir James Croft and Mr. Winter were again brought to Guildhall, where sir James Croft was arraigned and condemned; and because the day was far spent, Mr. Winter was not arraigned.

Thursday, May 17, William Thomas was arraigned at Guildhall, and the same day condemned, who the next day after was hanged, drawn, and quartered. His accusation was, for conspiring the queen's death; which how true it was I have not say. This is certain, that he made a godly end, and wrote many fruitful exhortations, letters, and sonnets, in the prison, before his death.

In the month of May it was given out, that a solemn disputation should be held at Cambridge, between Mr. Bradford, Mr. Saunders, Mr. Rogers, and others of that side, and the doctors of both universities on the other side, like as had been before in Oxford. Whereupon the godly preachers who were in prison, having notice thereof, notwithstanding they were destitute of their books, and not ignorant of the purpose of their adversaries, and how the cause was prejudged before, also how the disputations were confusedly handled at Oxford; nevertheless, they ought not to refuse the offer of disputation, so that they might be quietly heard; and therefore wisely pondering the matter with themselves, by a public consent, directed out of prison a declaration of their mind by writing, the 8th of May. Wherein first, as touching the disputation, although they knew that they should do no good, because all things were pre-determined before; yet, nevertheless, they would not deny to dispute, if the disputation might be either before the queen, or before the council, or before the parliament, or if they might dispute by writing; for else, if the matter were brought to the doctors' handling in their own schools, they had sufficient proof, they said, by the experience of Oxford, what little good would be done at Cambridge; and consequently, declaring the faith and doctrine of their religion, and exhorting the people withal to submit themselves with all patience and humility, either to the will or punishment of the higher powers, they appealed, in the end, from them to be their judges in this behalf, and so ended their protestation: the copy and contents whereof I thought not unfit here to be inserted.

A COPY of the DECLARATION drawn up by MR. BRADFORD, MR. SAUNDERS, and several Others.

BECAUSE we hear that it is determined of the magistrates, and such as be in authority, especially of the clergy, to send us speedily out of the prisons of the King's Bench, the Fleet, the Marshalsea, and Newgate, where at this present we are, and of long time some of us have been, not as rebels, traitors, seditious persons, thieves, or transgressors of any laws of this realm, inhibitions, proclamations, or commandments of the queen's highness, or of any of the councils, (God's name be praised therefore!) but only for the conscience we have to God, and his most holy word and truth, upon most certain knowledge: because, we say, we hear that it is determined, we shall be sent to one of the universities of Cambridge or Oxford, there to dispute with such as are appointed in that behalf; in that we purpose not to dispute otherwise than by writing, except it may be before the queen's highness and her council, or before the parliament-houses; and therefore perchance it will be noised abroad, that we are not able to maintain, by the truth of God's word, and the consent of the true and catholic church of Christ, the doctrine we have generally and severally taught, and some of us have written and set forth, whereby the godly and simple may be offended, and somewhat weakened; we have thought it our bounden duty, now whilst we may by writing, to publish and notify the causes why we will not dispute otherwise than is above said, to prevent the offences which might come thereby.

First, Because it is evidently known unto the whole world, that the determinations of both the universities in matters of religion, especially wherein we should dispute, are directly against God's word, yea, against their own determination in the time of our late sovereign lord and most godly prince, king Edward: and further it is known, they are our open enemies, and have already condemned our causes, before any disputation had of the same.

Secondly, Because the prelates and clergy do not seek either us or the truth, but our destruction and their glory. For if they had sought us, (as charity requireth) then would they have called us forth hereabouts before their laws were so made, that frankly and without peril we might have spoken our consciences. Again, If they had sought for the truth, they would not have concluded of controversies before they had been disputed; so that it easily appeareth, that they seek their own glory and our destruction, and not us and the truth: and therefore we have good cause to refuse disputation, as a thing which shall not further prevail than to the setting forth of their glory, and suppression of the truth.

Thirdly, Because the censors and judges (as we hear who they be) are manifest enemies to the truth, and that which is worse, obstinate enemies, before whom pearls are not to be cast, by the commandment of our Saviour Jesus Christ, and by his own example. That they be such, their doings of late at Oxford, and in the convocation house in October last past, do most evidently declare.

Fourthly, Because some of us have been in prison these eight or nine months, where we have had no books, no paper, no pen, no ink, or convenient place for study, we think we should do evil, thus suddenly to descend into disputation with them, which may alledge, as they list, the fathers and their testimonies, because our memories have not that which we have read, so readily as to reprove, when they shall report and wrest the authors to their purpose, or to bring forth what we may have there for our advantage.

Fifthly, Because in disputation we shall not be permitted to prosecute our arguments, but be stopt when we should speak; one saying this, another that, the third his mind, &c. as was done to the godly learned fathers, especially Dr. Ridley at Oxford, who could not be permitted to declare his mind and meaning of the propositions, and had oftentimes half a dozen at once speaking against him, always hindering him to prosecute his argument, and to answer accordingly: we will not speak of the hissing, scoffing, and taunting, which wonderfully then was used. If on this sort, and much worse they handled these fathers, much more will they be shamelessly bold with us, if we should enter into disputation with them.

Sixthly, Because the notaries, that shall receive and write the disputations, shall be of their appointment, and such as either do not or dare not favour the truth, and therefore must write either to please them, or else they themselves, (the censors and judges we mean) at their pleasure will put to, and take from that which is written by the notaries; who cannot, or must not have in their custody that which they write, longer than the disputation endureth, as their doings at Oxford declare. No copy nor scroll could any man have by their good will. For the censors and judges will have all delivered into their hands. Yea, if any man was seen there to write, as the report is, the same man was sent for, and his writings taken from him: so must the disputation serve only for the glory, not of God, but of the enemies of his truth.

For these causes we all think it so necessary not to dispute with them, as if we did dispute we should do that which they desire and purposely seek, to promote the kingdom of Antichrist, and to suppress (as much as may be) the truth. We will not speak of the offence that might come to the godly, when they should hear, by the report of our enemies, our answers and arguments framed (you may be sure) for their fantasies, to the slandering of the truth.

Therefore we publish, and by this writing notify unto the whole congregation and church of England, that for these afore-said causes we will not dispute with them, otherwise than with the pen, unless it be before the queen's highness and her council, or before the houses of the parliament, as is above said. If they will write, we will answer, and by writing confirm and prove out of the infallible truth, even the very word of God, and by the testimony of the good and most ancient fathers in Christ's church, this our faith, and every piece thereof, which we, in a summary way, do write and send abroad purposely, that our good brethren and sisters in the Lord may know it: and to seal up the same, we are ready, through God's help and grace, to give our lives to the halter or fire, or otherwise, as God shall appoint: humbly requiring, and in the bowels of our Saviour Jesus Christ, beseeching all that fear God, to behave themselves as obedient subjects to the queen's highness and the superior powers, which are ordained of God under her, rather after our example to give their heads to the block, than in any point to rebel, or once to mutter against the Lord's anointed; we mean our sovereign lady queen Mary, into whose heart we beseech the Lord of mercy plentifully to pour the wisdom and grace of his Holy Spirit, now and for ever. Amen.

First, We confess and believe all the canonical books of the Old Testament, and all the books of the New Testament, to be the very true word of God, and to be written by the inspiration of the Holy Ghost, and are therefore to be heard accordingly, as the judge in all controversies and matters of religion.

Secondly, We confess and believe, that the catholic church, which is the spouse of Christ, as a most obedient and loving wife, doth embrace and follow the doctrine of these books in all matters of religion, and therefore is she to be heard accordingly; so that those which will not hear this church, thus following and obeying the word of her husband, we account as heretics and schismatics, according to this saying, "If he will not hear the church, let him be to thee as a heathen."

Thirdly, We believe and confess all the articles of faith and doctrine set forth in the symbol of the apostles, which we commonly call the creed, and in the symbols of the council of Nice, kept in the year 324, of Constantinople, in the year 384, of Ephesus, in the year 432, of Chalcedon, in the year 451, of Toletum the first and fourth. Also in the symbols of Athanasius, Ireneus, Tertullian, and of Damasus, which was about the year of our Lord 376, we confess and believe (we say) the doctrine of the symbols generally and particularly: so that whosoever doth otherwise, we hold the same to err from the truth.

Fourthly, We believe and confess concerning justification, that as it cometh only from God's mercy through Christ, so it is perceived and had of none, which be of years of discretion, otherwise than by faith only: which faith is not an opinion, but a certain persuasion wrought by the Holy Ghost in the mind and heart of man, whereby as the mind is illuminated, so the heart is ready to submit itself to the will of God unfeignedly, and so sheweth forth an inherent righteousness, which is to be discerned, in the article of justification, from the righteousness which God endueth us withal, justifying us, although inseparably they go together. And this we do not for curiosity or contention sake, but for conscience sake, that it might be quiet, which it can never be, if we confound without distinction forgiveness of sins, and Christ's justice imputed to us, with regeneration and inherent righteousness. By this we disallow the papistical doctrine of free-will, of works of supererogation, of merits, of the necessity of auricular confession, and satisfaction towards God.

Fifthly, We confess and believe concerning the exterior service of God, that it ought to be according to the word of God; and therefore in the congregation all things public ought to be done in such a tongue as may be most to edify, and not in Latin, where the people understand not the same.

Sixthly, We confess and believe that God only by Christ Jesus is to be prayed unto and called upon; and therefore we disallow invocation, or prayer to saints departed this life.

Seventhly, We confess and believe, that as a man departeth this life, so shall he be judged in the last day generally, and in the mean season is entered either into the state of the blessed for ever, or damned for ever, and therefore is either past all help, or else needs no help of any in this life. By reason whereof we affirm purgatory, masses of Scala cæli, trentals, and such suffrages as the popish church doth obtrude as necessary, to be the doctrine of Antichrist.

Eighthly, We confess and believe of the sacraments of Christ, which are baptism and the Lord's supper, that they ought to be ministered according to the institution of Christ, concerning the substantial parts of them; and that they be no longer sacraments, that they be had in use, and used to the end for which they were instituted.

And here we plainly confess, that the mutilation of the Lord's supper, and the subtraction of the one kind from the lay people, is antichristian. And so is the doctrine of transubstantiation of the sacramental bread and wine, after the words of consecration, as they are called.

Item, The adoration of the sacrament with honour due unto God, the reservation and carrying about of the same.

Item, The mass to be a propitiatory sacrifice for the quick and dead, or a work that pleaseth God.

All these we believe and confess to be Antichrist's doctrine: as is the prohibition of marriage, as unlawful to any state. And we doubt not, by God's grace, but we shall be able to prove all our confessions here to be most true, agreeable to God's word, and consent of the catholic church, which followeth, and hath followed, the governance of God's Spirit, and the judgment of his word

And this through the Lord's help we will do, either in disputation by word before the queen's highness and her council, or before the parliament houses; of whom we doubt not but to be indifferently heard, or else with our pens, whensoever we shall be thereto, by them that have authority, required and commanded.

In the mean season, as obedient subjects, we shall behave ourselves towards all that be in authority, and not cease to pray to God for them, that he would govern them all, generally and particularly, with the Spirit of wisdom and grace. And so we heartily desire, and humbly pray all men to do, in no point consenting to any kind of rebellion or sedition against our sovereign lady the queen's highness: but where they cannot obey, without offending God, there to submit themselves with all patience and humility to suffer as the will and pleasure of the higher powers shall adjudge; as we are ready, through the goodness of the Lord, to suffer whatsoever they shall adjudge us unto, rather than we will consent to any doctrine contrary to this which we here confess, unless we shall be justly convinced thereof, either by writing or by word, before such judges as the queen's highness and her council, or the parliament houses shall appoint. For the universities and clergy have condemned our causes already by the bigger, but not by the better part, without all disputation of the same; and therefore most justly we may, and do appeal from them to be our judges in this behalf, except it may be in writing, that to all men the matter may appear. The Lord of mercy endue us all with the Spirit of truth and grace, and of perseverance therein unto the end. Amen.

To these things abovesaid, I Miles Coverdale, late of Exon, do consent and agree; with these mine afflicted brethren being prisoners, signed with my own hand.

And thus much concerning this present declaration subscribed by these preachers, which was on the 8th day of May.

On the 19th of the said month, lady Elizabeth, the queen's sister, was brought to the Tower, and committed to the custody of sir John Williams, afterwards lord Williams of Tame, by whom her highness was gently and courteously treated: who afterwards was had to Woodstock; and there committed to the keeping of sir Henry Benifield, knight, of Oxborough, in Norfolk: who, on the other side, both forgetting her estate, and his own duty, as it is reported, shewed himself more hard and straight unto her, than either cause was given on her part, or reason of his own should have led him; of which we shall treat more at large hereafter, the Lord willing.

Friday, July 20, king Philip arrived at Southampton. The prince himself was the first that landed; who immediately as he set foot upon the land, drew out his sword, and carried it naked in his hand. A little without the town the mayor of Southampton, with certain commoners, met him, and delivered the keys of the town unto the prince, who removed his sword, naked as it was, out of his right hand into his left, and so received the keys of the mayor without any word speaking, or countenance of thankfulness, and after a while delivered the keys to the mayor again. At the town-gate the earl of Arundel and the lord Williams met him, and so he was brought to his lodging.

Wednesday following, July 25, being St. James's day, Philip prince of Spain, and Mary queen of England, were solemnly married in the cathedral church at Winchester, by the bishop of Winchester, in the presence of a great number of noblemen of both realms. At the time of this marriage, the emperor's ambassador being present, openly pronounced, that, in consideration of that marriage, the emperor had granted and given unto his son the kingdom of Naples, &c.

Whereupon the first of August following, there was a proclamation, that from that time forth the stile of all manner of writings should be altered, and this following used:

" Philip

"Philip and Mary, by the grace of God, king and queen of England, France, Naples, Jerufalem, and Ireland, defenders of the faith, princes of Spain and Sicily, archdukes of Austrich, dukes of Milan, Burgundy, and Brabant, Counties of Haspurge, Flanders, and Tyrol."

Of this marriage as the papists chiefly seemed to be very glad, so several of them, after divers studies to shew forth their inward affections, made interludes and pageants; some drew forth genealogies, deriving his pedigree from Edward the Third, and John of Gaunt. Among others, Mr. White, then bishop of Lincoln, (his poetical vein being drunk with joy of the marriage) made certain verses; a translation whereof we have here inserted.

The GENEALOGY of PHILIP and MARY, whereby both Princes are shewn to have descended from JOHN OF GAUNT, Son of EDWARD III. King of ENGLAND and FRANCE.

JOHN of Gaunt, father of princes, did beget
John the puissant earl of Somerset:
From him John, duke of Somerset, did spring,
Whose daughter Marg'ret brought forth England's king,
Henry the seventh, who of life bereft,
The throne unto his son prince Henry left:
His daughter Mary, England's scepter bears,
And may she bear it long, exempt from cares.

Other VERSES of Mr. WHITE, Bishop of LINCOLN, concerning the MARRIAGE of PHILIP and MARY.

THE devil, that old enemy of mankind,
Strives to prevent, though to it God's inclin'd,
That Mary, England's queen, should join her hands
To Spanish Philip in hymeneal bands.
Against the match, with the dark prince of night,
The helpless Scots and tim'rous French unite.
With these hell's prelates join, Caiaphas's race,
Eight married fathers, void of heav'nly grace,
* John Dudley, Wyat, and rebellious Kent,
With † Gray, conspire the marriage to prevent,
But that the nuptials should performed be, ‡ Cæsar and Flanders would, and Italy,
Catholic bishops, and with these comply
Five holy fathers, for their sanctity
In fetters bound, the senate of the nation,
And all true catholics in every station,
Lords, commons, learned, ignorant, and we,
'Cause God himself doth thereunto agree.
When Philip to queen Mary shall be join'd,
Their blood it's wonted course shall be refin'd.

* Duke of Northumberland.

† Duke of Suffolk.

‡ Charles V. Emperor of Germany.

ANSWER to Mr. WHITE, Bishop of LINCOLN, by the Bishop of NORWICH.

THAT Mary should to Spanish Philip wed,
And England's glory be extirpated,
The devil wills; jointly with him agree,
All Flanders, Italy, and Germany,
Caiaphas's race, the mitred company
Of popish bishops, five for impiety
In prison cast: but God's extended arm
Kindly support us, and averts the harm:
He nills the match, gives England liberty,
With him the warlike Scots and French agree,
Eight married in the Lord: and Dudley you,
Forebiding dismal things, the marriage view,
The senate nills; brave Wyat doth espouse
With pious zeal his country's injur'd cause;
With him Gray, and the Kentish folk comply,
Either to gain their liberty, or die.
Then say, what profits will the Spanish king,
Having wedded Mary, to the English bring?

Another ANSWER by the same AUTHOR.

SATAN, your all confounding fire, 'tis plain,
Would have queen Mary wed the prince of Spain;
That so he may Britannia's noble race
Eradicate, and suddenly deface.
But God, the Father of the English still,
Resents the rancour of his wicked will.

Nor do the warlike French, nor Scots agree;
Though Flanders, Italy, and Germany,
Conspire and jointly strive that this may be.
The mitred prelates all the match proclaim;
Our holy fathers all decry the same.
The Eight, who sacred nuptial ties revere,
Courageous, and unmov'd by slavish fear,
Will not, although the factious Five agree,
That were imprison'd for impiety.
Dudley the brave Northumbrian hero stands,
Prompt to oppose the matrimonial bands:
And so will all prepar'd and ready be,
That lov'd their country, laws, and liberty.
Wyat the brave this generous mind doth shew
The nobles, commons, and the clergy too.
Ye will the match, who are by nature prone
To banish truth, and piety dethrone:
But Gray, and all the Kentish folk declare Their just resentment at the married pair.
What glory then from such a marriage springs?
What splendor does it add unto the ancient kings?

Other VERSES answering to Bishop WHITE, made by J. C.

THOUGH Philip to the English line did pretend,
And Mary from the Spanish did descend;
Yet for an English queen of * mongrel breed,
To wed a Spanish prince, (as 'tis decreed)
Is to her sire and nation a disgrace indeed.
Th' admirers of old England's valour see,
With truth and justice this can ne'er agree;
But God the same does for our sins permit,
And therefore patiently they suffer it.
The people, if they are not strangely bent Against our welfare, never will consent
To this unhappy match, foreboding ill:
What's it to us, if th' adverse nation will?
All pious men against the match contend;
For they are mad indeed who it defend.
The Eight, who sacred wedlock do revere,
Than the imprison'd Five more wise appear;
For this pernicious marriage they oppose,
To save the nation from insulting foes.
The hero of Northumberland withstands
These inauspicious and illegal bands:
O dire, infernal counsellors, who will Promote this fatal match, prefaging ill!
Wyat, in war unhappily engag'd,
Was at the marriage generously enrag'd:
None for it was; but all the same withstood,
Except th' unthinking popish multitude.
Gray, and the Britons all, will not agree That this unhappy match should ever be:
We, 'cause th' Almighty wills it so, submit,
And patiently endure and suffer it:
But worse things we shall bear, if Mary be
In sacred wedlock, Philip, join'd to thee.

* Being daughter of Henry VIII. and Katharine of Spain.

Other VERSES answering likewise.

SAY, White, whom can you find that will agree,
That Mary should to Philip married be?
It matters not what the vain multitude
Do will or nill (they're ignorant and rude).
To will and nill is God's chief property:
The question then is, What he wills to be?
'Cause God hath will'd the match, (you say) the same
Ye will, and loudly every-where proclaim:
You ought indeed to know what God doth will,
Because, dull fool, thou'rt ignorant of it still.
This he hath will'd, that in his augury
White should a lying pseudo-prophet be.
A king, though not the * king the weds indeed,
Herself an English queen, though not of English breed.
She's pregnant and not pregnant, yet pretends,
Her teeming womb a joyful offspring sends:
This ye with hearts exulting wish to see;
But lo! no offspring comes: this God would have to be.
He for a season weds, and then forsakes her:
One day a bride, the next a widow makes her:
This God would have (whose vengeance overtakes her).
So vain the prayers of wicked men are made,
Who for their country's ruin have destruction laid.

Blessed be the name of the Lord.

* Of England.

After the consummation of the marriage, the king and queen removed from Winchester to several other places, and by easy journies came to Windsor-castle, where where he was installed with the order of the garter, on Sunday August 12; at which time, an herald took down the arms of England at Windsor, and in the place of them would have set up the arms of Spain, but he was commanded to set them up again by certain lords. From thence they both removed to Richmond, and, by water, to London, and landed at the bishop of Winchester's house, through which they passed both into Southwark-park, and so to Southwark-house, called Suffolk-place, where they lay that night, being the 18th of August.

The next day the king and queen rode from Suffolk-place (accompanied with a great number, as well of noblemen as gentlemen) through the city of London to Whitehall; and at London-bridge, as he entered at the draw-bridge, was a vain great spectacle set up, two images representing two giants, one named Corineus, and the other Gogmagog, holding between them certain Latin verses, which for the vain ostentation of flattery I overpass.

As they passed over the bridge, there was a number of ordnance shot off at the Tower, such, as by old men's report, the like hath not been heard or seen these hundred years.

From London-bridge they passed the conduit in Gracechurch-street, which was finely painted, and among other things, the nine worthies, whereof king Henry VIII. was one. He was painted in harness, having in one hand a sword, and in the other hand a book, whereon was written Verbum Dei, "The word of God," delivering the same book, as it were, to his son king Edward, who was painted in a corner by him.

But this gave great offence: for the bishop of Winchester, lord Chancellor, sent for the painter, and not only called him knave for painting a book in king Henry's hand, and especially for writing thereupon Verbum Dei, but also rank traitor and villain, saying to him that he should rather have put the book into the queen's hand, who was also painted there, for that she had reformed the church religion, with other things according to the pure and sincere word of God indeed. The painter answered, and said, That if he had known that had been the matter, wherefore his lordship sent for him, he could have remedied it, and not troubled his lordship. The bishop answered, That it was the queen's majesty's will and commandment that he should send for him: and so commanding him to wipe out the book and Verbum Dei too, he sent him home. The painter departed, but fearing lest he should leave some part either of the book, or of Verbum Dei in king Henry's hand, he wiped away a piece of his fingers withal.

Here I pass over other pageants shewed to him in passing through London, with the flattering verses in Latin, wherein were blazed out in one place the five Philips, as the five worthies of the world, Philip of Macedon, Philip the emperor, Philip the bold, Philip the good, Philip prince of Spain, and king of England.

In another poetry, king Philip was resembled by an image representing Orpheus, and all English people resembled to brute and savage beasts, following after Orpheus's harp, and dancing after king Philip's pipe. Not that I reprehend the art of the Latin verses, which was fine and cunning, but that I pass over the matter, having weightier things in hand; and also the sight at St. Paul's church side, of him that came down upon a rope tied to the battlements, with his head before, neither staying himself with his hand nor foot; which shortly after cost him his life.

But one thing by the way I cannot let pass, touching the rood newly set up against this time, to welcome king Philip into St. Paul's church. The setting up of which rood was this, and may make as good a pageant as the best.

In the 2d year of Mary, Bonner, bishop of London, in his royalty, and all his prebendaries about him, in St. Paul's quire, the rood (or cross) laid along upon the pavements, and also the doors of St. Paul's being shut, the bishop, with others, said and sung divers prayers by the rood: that being done, they anointed the rood with oil in divers places, and after anointing, crept unto it, and kissed it.

No. 6.

After that, they took the said rood and weighed it up, and set it in its old accustomed place, and all the while they were doing thereof, the whole quire sang Te Deum and when that was ended, they rang the bells, not only for joy, but also for the notable and great fact they had done therein.

Not long after this, a merry fellow came into St. Paul's, and spied the rood, with Mary and John now set up; whereto, among a great sort of people, he made low courtesy, and said, Sir, your mastership is welcome to town. I had thought to have talked further with your mastership, but that you be here clothed in the queen's colours. I hope that you be but a summer's bird, in that you are dressed in white and green.

The prince, being in the church of St. Paul's, after Dr. Harpsfield had finished his oration in Latin, set forward through Fleet-street, and so came to Whitehall, where he with the queen remained four days after, and from thence removed unto Richmond.

After this, all the lords had leave to depart into their countries, with strait commandment, to bring all their harness and artillery into the Tower of London with all speed. Now remained there no English lord at the court, but the bishop of Winchester. From Richmond they removed to Hampton court, where the hall-door within the court was continually shut, so that no man might enter.

About the 8th of September, bishop Bonner began his visitation, who charged six men, in every parish, to inquire (according to their oaths) and to present before him, the 30th of September, all such persons as either had or should offend in any of his articles, which he had set forth, to the number of 37. Of the which visitation of Bonner, I have somewhat more largely to treat.

September 17, was a proclamation in London, that all vagabonds and masterless men, as well strangers as Englishmen, should depart the city within five days; and straitly charging all innholders, victuallers, taverners, and alehouse-keepers, with all others who sell victuals, that they (after the said five days) should not sell any meat, drink, or any kind of victuals to any serving man whatsoever, unless he brought a testimonial from his master, to declare whose servant he was, and were in continual household with his said master, upon pain of the law if they offended herein.

Upon the Sunday following, the bishop of Winchester, lord chancellor of England, preached at St. Paul's Cross, at whose sermon were present all the council that were at the court; namely, the marquis of Winchester, the earl of Arundel, lord North, sir Anthony Brown, Mr. Rochester, Mr. Walgrave, Mr. Englefield, lord Fitzwater, and secretary Peter, and the bishops of London, Durham, and Ely, which three sat under the bishop's arms. The gospel whereof he made his sermon, is written in the xxii. chapter of Matthew, where the Pharisees came unto Christ, and among them one asked Christ which was the greatest commandment; Christ answered, "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, &c. and thy neighbour as thyself, in these two is comprehended the law and the prophets."

After his long declaration of these words, speaking very much of love and charity, at last he had occasion upon St. James's words, to speak of the true teachers, and of the false teachers; saying, that all the preachers almost in king Edward's time, preached nothing but voluptuousness, and filthy and blasphemous lies, affirming their doctrine to be that false doctrine whereof St. James speaketh in his third chapter, saying, that it was full of perverse zeal, earthly, full of discord and dissension, that the preachers afore-named would report nothing truly, and that they taught that it was lawful for a man to put away his wife for adultery, and marry another, and that if a man vowed to-day, he might break it to-morrow at his pleasure, with many other things which I omit. And when he spake of the sacrament, he said, that all the church from the beginning have confessed Christ's natural body to be in heaven, and here to be in the sacrament, and so concluded that matter: and then willed all men to say with Joseph's brethren, brethren, "We have all sinned against our brother;" and said he, have I too. Then he declared what a noble king and queen we have, saying, that if he should go about to shew that the king came hither for no necessity or need, and what he had brought with him, it would be superfluous, seeing it is evidently known, that he hath ten times as much as we are in hope and possession of, affirming him to be as wise, sober, gentle, and temperate a prince as ever was in England, and if it were not so proved, then to take him for a false liar for his so saying: exhorting all men to make much of him, and to win him whilst we had him, and so should we also win all such as he hath brought with him: and so concluded.

Tuesday, October 7, twenty carts came from Westminster, laden (as it was noised) with gold and silver, and certain of the guard with them through the city to the Tower, and it was received in by a Spaniard, who was the king's treasurer, and had custody of it within the Tower. It was matted about with mats, and mailed in little bundles about two feet long, and almost half a foot thick, and in every cart were six of those bundles. What it was indeed, God knoweth, for it is to us uncertain.

About the same time, or a little before, upon Corpus-Christi day, the procession being made in Smithfield, where, after the manner, the priest, with his box, went under the canopy, by chance there came by the way a certain simple man, named John Street, a joiner, of Coleman-street, who having some haste in his business, and finding no other way to pass through, by chance went under the canopy by the priest. The priest seeing the man to presume to come under the canopy, being belike afraid, and worse feared than hurt, let his pyx fall down. The poor man, being straightway apprehended, was had to the compters, the priest accusing him before the council, as though he had come to slay him; whereas the poor man, as himself hath since declared unto us, had no such thought ever in his mind. Then from the compters, he was had unto Newgate, where he was cast into the dungeon, there chained to a post, where he was cruelly and miserably handled, and so extremely dealt withal, that being but simple before, he was now out of his wits altogether, and so upon the same had to Bedlam. Whereupon the brief chronicle of London in this point is not to be credited, which untruly reported that he feigned himself in Newgate to be mad: which thing we in writing of this history, by due inquisition of the party, have found to be contrary.

About the 5th of October, divers, as well householders, as servants, and apprentices, were apprehended and taken, and committed to sundry prisons, for having and selling of certain books, which were sent into England by the preachers that fled into Germany and other countries; which books touched a great number so near, that within one fortnight there were little less than threescore imprisoned for this matter: among whom was Mr. Brown, a goldsmith, Mr. Spark, a draper, Randal Tirer, a stationer, Mr. Beston, a merchant, with many others.

Sunday, October 14, the old bishop of Durham preached in the shrouds.

October 18, the king came from Westminster to St. Paul's church, accompanied with a great number of noblemen, and there he was received under a canopy, at the west door, and so came into the chancel, where he heard mass, which a Spanish bishop and his own chapel sung; and that done, he returned to Westminster to dinner.

Friday, October 26, certain men, whereof I speak before, which were of Mr. Throgmorton's jury, being in number eight (for the other four were delivered out of prison, having submitted themselves), whereof Mr. Emanuel Lucas, and Mr. Whetstone were chief, were called before the council in the Star-chamber: where they all affirmed that they had done all things in that matter according to their knowledge, and with good consciences, even as they should answer before God at the day of judgment. When Mr. Lucas said openly before all the lords, that they had done in the matter like honest men, and true and faithful subjects, and therefore they humbly besought the lord chancellor, and the other lords, to intercede with the king and queen, that they might be discharged and set at liberty, and said that they were all contented humbly to submit themselves to their majesties, saving and reserving their truth, consciences, and honesty. Some of the lords said, that they deserved to pay 1000l. a piece, and others said, that Mr. Lucas and Mr. Whetstone deserved to pay 1000 marks a piece, and the rest 500l. a piece. At last, sentence was given by the lord chancellor, that they should pay a thousand marks a piece, and that they should go to prison again, and there remain till further orders were taken for their punishment.

Tuesday, October 30, the lord J. Gray was delivered out of the Tower, and set at liberty.

Sunday, November 4, five priests did penance at Paul's Cross, who were content to put away their wives, and take upon them again to minister. Each of them had a taper in his hand, and a rod, wherewith the preacher did dispel them.

Wednesday, November 7, the lord Paget, and sir Edward Hastings, master of the horse, were sent as ambassadors, I know not whither, but, as it was judged, to Cardinal Poole, who lay all that summer before at Brussels: and it was thought they were sent to accompany and conduct him into England, where at that time he was nominated and appointed bishop of Canterbury.

Friday, November 9, Mr. Barlow, late bishop of Bath, and Mr. Cardmaker, were brought before the council, in the Star-chamber, where after communication, they were commanded to the Fleet.

Saturday, November 10, the sheriffs of London had orders to take an inventory of every one of their goods, which were of Mr. Throgmorton's jury, and to seal up their doors, which was done the same day. Mr. Whetstone, Mr. Lucas, and Mr. Kytely, were adjudged to pay 1000l. a piece, and the rest 1000 marks a piece, to be paid within one fortnight after. From this payment were exempted only four, who submitted themselves, whose names are these, Mr. Loe, Mr. Poynter, Mr. Beswike, and Mr. Carter.

Mention has been made of the visitation of Edmund Bonner, bishop of London, which begun (as it is said) about the month of September; for the better preparation whereof were set forth certain articles, to the number of 37; which articles, partly for the tediousness of them, partly for that Mr. Bale in a certain treatise hath sufficiently painted out the same in proper colours, partly also, because I will not infect this book with them, I pass them over, proceeding in the progress of this bishop in his visitation in the county of Essex; who passing through the said county of Essex, being attended with divers worshipful of the shire, (for so they were commanded) arrived at Sterford in Hertfordshire, where he rested certain days, solacing himself after that painful peregrination, with no small feasting and banqueting with his attendants, at the house of one Parson's, his nephew, whose wife he commonly called his fair niece; (fair she was indeed) and he took there great pleasure to hear her play upon the virginals, wherein she excelled, insomuch that every dinner (sitting by his sweet side) she arose and played three several times at his request, of his good and spiritual devotion towards her. After some days were passed in this fashion, he proceeded in his popish visitation toward Hadham, his own house and parish, not more than two miles from Sterford, being there most solemnly rung out, as in all other places where he passed. At length drawing near unto Hadham, when he heard no stirring there in honour of his holiness, he grew into some choler; and the nearer he approached, the hotter was his fit; and the quieter the bells were the quieter was his mood. Thus rode he on, chafing and fuming with himself: "What meaneth (saith he) that knave the clerk, that he ringeth not? and the parson, that he meeteth me not?" with other passionate expressions. There this patient prelate, coming to the town, alighted, calling for the key of the church, which was then all unready, since, as they pretended, he had come two hours before his time; whereupon he grew from choler to plain melancholy, so as no man willingly would deal with him to qualify the raging humor so far incorporated porated in his breast. At last, the church door being opened, the bishop entered, and finding no sacrament hanged up, no rood-loft decked after the popish precept, (which had commanded about the same time a well-favoured rood, cross, or image, and of tall stature, universally in all churches to be set up) curtailed his small devotions, and fell from choler and melancholy to madness in the greatest degree, swearing and raging with an hunting oath or two, (and by no small oaths) that in his own church, where he hoped to have seen best order, he found most disorder; to his honour's most heavy discomfort, as he said, calling the parson (whose name was Dr. Bricket) knave and heretic; who there humbled himself, and yielded, as it were, to his fault, saying, He was sorry his lordship was come before that he and his parish looked for him, and therefore could not do their duties to receive him accordingly: and as for those things which were lacking, he trusted in short time hereafter he should compass that which hitherto he could not bring about. Therefore if it pleased his lordship to come to his poor house, where his dinner was prepared, he would satisfy him in those things, which his lordship thought amiss. Yet this reasonable answer neither could satisfy, nor assuage his unreasonable passion. For the catholic prelate utterly defied him and his cheer, commanding him out of his sight, saying, as his bye-word was, "Before God thou art a knave, avaunt heretic" and therewithal, whether thrusting, or striking at him, so it was, that with his hand he gave sir Thomas Josselin (who then stood next to the bishop) a good blow upon the ear; whereat, being somewhat astonished, sir Thomas said, What meaneth your lordship? have you been trained in Will Somer's school, to strike him who standeth next you? The bishop, still in a rage, either heard not, or would not hear. Upon which Mr. Fecknam, dean of St. Paul's, addressing the knight, said, "O Mr. Josselin, you must bear with my lord, for truly his long imprisonment in the Marshalsea, and the misusing of him there hath altered him, that in these passions he is not master of himself, nor will it avail to give him counsel until his heat be passed, and then assure yourself Mr. Josselin, my lord will be sorry for those abuses, and that misconduct which he cannot now see in himself." To whom sir Thomas merrily replied, "So it seems, Mr. Fecknam, that now he is come forth from the Marshalsea, he is ready to go to Bedlam." At which conceit some laughed, and more smiled, because the nail was hit so truly upon the head. The bishop appeared not in the least abashed at his own folly; and it is no wonder he was not ashamed to strike a stranger, who spared not the burning of so many good men.

This combat being finished, the martial prelate presently taketh him to his horse again, notwithstanding he at first intended to tarry at Hadham three or four days, and had made provisions in his own house accordingly; but leaving his dinner, he rode that night with a small company of his household to Ware, to the great wonder of all the country, who looked not for his coming till three days after.

But though the bishop posted hastily away, his retinue thought it most prudent to tarry behind; and his doctors and chaplains, a few excepted, dined at Dr. Bricket's, as merrily as the bishop rode to Ware chafing-ly. Now the causes which induced him to leave a good dinner, were supposed to be, that his lordship was offended at not receiving those solemnities he was accustomed to be saluted withal in other places, and because his wooden god was not elevated seemly in the rood-loft to entertain strangers; on which account he took occasion to quarrel with Dr. Bricket; for the bishop had issued out his precept, that in every parish a rood, (a cross, crucifix, and other images) should be erected, both well favoured, and tall in stature: which brings to my mind (says Mr. Fox) what happened in a certain town in Lancashire, near to Lancaster, called Cockram, where the parishioners and church-wardens, having at the same time a like charge for the erecting of a rood in their parish church, had made their bargain, and were at a price with one that could cunningly carve and paint such idols, for the framing of their rood; who, according to his promise, made them one, and set it up in their church. This done, he demanded his money: but they misliking his workmanship, refused to pay him, whereupon he arrested them, and the matter was brought before the mayor of Lancaster, who was a very fit man for such a purpose, and an old favourer of the gospel, which is rare in that country. Then the carver began to declare how they covenanted with him for the making of a rood with the appurtenances, ready carved and set up in their church, which he according to his promise had done; and now demanding his money, they refused to pay him. Is this true? quoth the mayor to the wardens. Yes, sir, said they. And why do you not pay the poor man his due? quoth he. May it please you, master mayor, quoth they, because the rood we had before was a well-favoured man, and he promised to make us such another; but this that he hath set us up now, is the worst favoured thing that ever you set your eyes on, gaping and grinning in such sort, that none of our children dare once look him in the face, or come near him. The mayor thinking that it was good enough for that purpose, if it had been worse, My masters, quoth he, howsoever you like the rood, the poor man's labour hath been never the less, and it is a pity that he should have any hindrance, or loss thereby. Therefore I will tell you what you shall do: pay him the money you promised him, and go your ways home and look on it, and if it will not serve for a god, make no more ado, but clap a pair of horns on his head, and so he will make an excellent devil. This the parishioners took exceeding well; the poor man had his money, and divers laughed well thereat: but so did not the Babylonish priests.

This mayor continued a protestant almost 50 years, and was the only reliever of Mr. March, the Martyr, (whose story followeth hereafter) with meat, drink, and lodging, while he lay in Lancaster-castle, the space of three quarters of a year, before he was had to Chester to be burned, &c.

BISHOP BONNER'S MANDATE.—The QUEEN'S supposed PREGNANCY.—CARDINAL POOLE'S ORATION.—The SUBMISSION of the LORDS and COMMONS to the QUEEN.—A LETTER to the POPE from CARDINAL POOLE.—ORDERS and PRAYERS on Account of MARY'S CONCEPTION.—LETTERS of MR. HOOPER, BISHOP of WORCESTER.—TRANSACTIONS of the PRIVY COUNCIL, &c. in 1555.—A SUPPLICATION of the Persecuted MINISTERS to the KING and QUEEN.

ABOUT this time came forth a precept, or mandate, from Bonner, bishop of London, to all bishops and curates within his diocese, for abolishing of such scripture passages and writings as had been painted upon church walls in king Edward's days; the copy whereof is inserted here, that the present generation may see the wicked proceedings of their impious zeal, or rather their malicious rage against the Lord and his word; as also against the edifying of christian people; and hence will appear, not only how blasphemously they spake against the holy scriptures, but likewise how studiously they sought by all manner of means to keep the people still in ignorance.

A MANDATE of BISHOP BONNER, to abolish the SCRIPTURE and WRITINGS painted upon CHURCH-WALLS.

EDMUND, (by God's permission) bishop of London, to all and every parsons, vicars, clerks, and lettered, within the parish of Hadham, or within the precinct of our diocese of London, wheresoever being, sendeth greeting, grace, and benediction.

Because some children of iniquity, given up to carnal desires and novelties, have by many ways enterprized to banish the ancient manner and order of the church, and to bring in and establish sects and heresies; taking from thence the picture of Christ, and many things besides instituted and observed of ancient time laudably, in the same, placing in the room thereof such things, as in such a place it behoved them not to do, and also have procured as a stay to their heresies (as they thought) certain scriptures wrongly applied to be painted upon the church-walls, all which persons tend chiefly to this end; that they might uphold the liberty of the flesh, and marriage of the priests, and destroy, as much as lay in them, the reverent sacrament of the altar, and might extinguish and enervate holy days, fasting-days, and other laudable discipline of the catholic church, opening a window to all vices, and utterly closing up the way unto virtue: wherefore we being moved with a christian zeal, judging that the premises are not to be longer suffered, do, for discharge of our duty, commit unto you jointly and severally, and by the tenor hereof do straitly charge and command you, that at the receipt hereof, with all speed convenient, you do warn, or cause to be warned, first, second, and third time, and peremptorily, all and singular church-wardens and parishioners whosoever within our foresaid diocese of London, wheresoever any such scriptures or paintings have been attempted, that they abolish and extinguish such manner of scriptures, so that by no means they be either read or seen, and therein to proceed moreover as they shall see good and laudable in this behalf. And if, after the said monition, the said church-wardens and parishioners shall be found remiss and negligent, or culpable, then you jointly and severally shall see the foresaid scriptures to be razed, abolished and extinguished forthwith: citing all and singular those church-wardens and parishioners, (whom we also for the same do cite here by the tenor hereof) that all and singular the church-wardens and parishioners being slack and negligent, culpable therein, shall appear before us, our vicar general and principal official, or our commissary special in our cathedral church of St. Paul at London, in the consistory there, at the hour appointed for the same, the sixth day next after their citation, if it be a court-day, or else at the next court-day after ensuing, where either we or our official or commissary shall sit; there to say and alledge for themselves some reasonable cause, if they have or can tell of any, why they ought not to be excommunicated, or otherwise punished for such their negligence, slackness, and fault, to say and to alledge, and further to do and receive, as law and reason requireth. And what you have done in the premises, do you certify us, or our vicar, principal official, and such our commissary, diligently and duly in all things, and through all things, or let him among you thus certify us, which hath taken upon him to execute this mandate. In witness whereof we have set our seals to these presents. Dated in the bishop's palace at London, the 25th day of the month of October, in the year of our Lord 1554, and of our translation the 18th.

About this time Lord Chancellor sent M. Christopheron unto the university of Cambridge, with these three articles, which he enjoined them to observe.

The first, that every scholar should wear his apparel according to his degree in the schools.

The second was touching the pronunciation of the Greek tongue.

The third, that every preacher there should declare the whole stile of the king and queen in their sermons.

In this university of Cambridge, and also of Oxford; by reason of introducing these things, and especially for the alteration of religion, many wise and learned men departed from the universities: of whom, some of their own accord gave over, some were thrust out of their fellowships, some were miserably handled: insomuch that in Cambridge, in the college of St. John, there were 24 places void together, in whose rooms were taken in 24 others, which neither in virtue nor religion were to be compared to those that were before. And no less miserable was the estate of Oxford, by reason of the time, and the strait-dealing of the visitors, who for setting forward their papistical proceedings, had no regard or respect to the forwardness of good wits, and the maintenance of good letters, beginning then more and more to flourish in that university.

Nor must we pass over in silence the famous exhortation of Dr. Treshan, who supplying the room of the sub-dean in Christ-church, after he had called the students of the college together, with great eloquence and art, began to commend the dignity of the mass unto them, declaring, that there was stuff enough in the scripture to prove the mass good. Then to allure them to the catholic service of the church, he used these reasons, declaring that there were a goodly company of copes, that were appointed to Windsor, but he had found the queen so gracious unto him, that they should come to Christ's-church. Now, if they like honest men would come to church, they should wear them on holy days. And besides all this, he would get them the lady bells of Bampton, and that should make the sweetest ring in all England. And as for holy water to sprinkle, he had already the fairest that was within the realm. Wherefore he thought that no man would be so mad to forego these commodities, &c.

Hence appeareth what want of discretion is in the fathers of popery, and into what idle follies such men do fall, whom, if it be his pleasure, may the Lord convince, and open their eyes to see their gross ignorance. But to proceed with our narrative.

On Monday, November 22d, the parliament met; at the opening whereof, both the king and queen rode to the house of lords in their robes, having two swords borne before them; the earl of Pembroke bore the king's sword, and the earl of Westmoreland the queen's. They had also two caps of maintenance borne before them, whereof the earl of Arundel bore one, and the earl of Shrewsbury the other.

Wednesday, 21st, Cardinal Poole landed at Dover, on which day an act passed for his restitution in blood, utterly repealing, as false and most slanderous, that act made against him in the reign of Henry VIII: and on the next day, November 22d, the king and queen came to the parliament-house to give the royal assent to this act, and to establish the same against his coming.

Saturday, 24th, the cardinal came by water to London, and so to Lambeth-house, which was ready prepared against his coming.

Wednesday, 18th, there was a general procession in St. Paul's, for joy that the queen was conceived and quick with child, as was declared in the letter sent from the council to the bishop of London. At this procession, ten bishops, and all the prebendaries of St. Paul's were present, and also the lord mayor with the aldermen, and a great number of the commons of the city in their best array. The following is a copy of the council's letter.

A L E T T E R.

From the COUNCIL to EDMUND BONNER, BISHOP of LONDON, concerning QUEEN MARY'S CONCEPTION.

AFTER our hearty commendations unto your good lordship: whereas it hath pleased Almighty God amongst other his infinite benefits of late most graciously poured upon us and this whole realm, to extend his benediction upon the queen's majesty in such sort, as she is conceived and quick of child: whereby her majesty (being our natural liege lady, queen and undoubted inheritor of this imperial crown) good hope of certain succession in the crown is given unto us, and consequently the great calamities (which for want of such succession might otherwise have fallen upon us and our posterity) shall by God's grace be well avoided, if we thankfully acknowledge this benefit of Almighty God, endeavouring ourselves with earnest repentance to thank, honour and serve him, as we are most bounden: these are not only to advertise you of these good news, to be by you published in all places within your diocese, but also to pray and require you, that both yourself do give God thanks with us for this his especial grace, and also give order that thanks may be openly given by singing of Te Deum in all the churches within your said diocese, and that likewise all priests and other ecclesiastical ministers, in their masses, and other divine services, may continually pray to Almighty God so to extend his holy hand over her majesty, the king's highness, and this whole realm, as this thing, being by his omnipotent power graciously thus begun, may by the same be well continued and brought to good effect, to the glory of his name. Whereunto, albeit we doubt not, ye would of yourself have had special regard without these our letters, yet for the earnest desire we have to have this thing done out of hand, and diligently continued, we have also written these our letters, to put you in remembrance : and so bid your lordship most heartily well to fare. From Westminster, the 27th of November, 1554.

The same day, in the afternoon, cardinal Poole came to the parliament house, which at that time was kept in the great chamber of the court at Whitehall, for that the queen was then sick, and could not go abroad: where the king and queen's majesty sitting under the cloth of state, and the cardinal sitting on the right hand, with all the other estates of the parliament being present, the bishop of Winchester, being lord chancellor, began in this manner :

MY lords of the upper house, and you the masters of the nether house, there is present the right reverend father in God my lord cardinal Poole, come from the apostolic see of Rome, as ambassador to the king and queen's majesties, upon one of the weightiest causes that ever happened in this realm, and which pertaineth to the glory of God, and your universal benefit. The which ambassage their majesties' pleasure is to be signified unto you all by his own mouth, trusting that you will receive and accept it in as benevolent and thankful wise as their highnesses have done, and that you will give an attentive and inclinable ear unto him.

The lord chancellor having ended, the cardinal began his oration, wherein he declared the causes of his coming, and what were his desires and requests. In the mean time, the court gate was kept shut until he had made an end of his oration.

The ORATION of CARDINAL POOLE, in the PARLIAMENT HOUSE

MY lords all, and you that are the commons of this present parliament assembled, which in effect is nothing else but the state and body of the whole realm : as the cause of my coming hither hath been most wisely and gravely declared by my lord chancellor, so, before I enter upon the particularities of my commission, I have somewhat touching myself; and to give most humble and hearty thanks to the king and queen's majesties, and after them to you all, which of a man exiled and banished from this commonwealth, have restored me to be a member of the same, and of a man having no place either here, or elsewhere, within this realm, have admitted me in a place, where to speak and to be heard. This I protest unto you all, that though I was exiled my native country without just cause, as God knoweth, yet the ingratitude could not take from me the affect and desire that I had to profit and do you good. If the offer of my service might have been received, it was never to seek; and where that could not be taken, you never failed of my prayer, nor ever shall.

But leaving the rehearsal thereof, and coming more near to the matter of my commission, I signify unto you all, that my principle travel is for the restitution of this noble realm to the ancient nobility, and to declare unto you, that the see apostolic, from whence I come, had a special respect to this realm above all other, and not without cause, seeing that God himself, as it were by providence, hath given this realm prerogative of nobility above others : which to make more plain unto you, it is to be considered that this island first of all islands received the light of Christ's religion. For as stories testify, it was the first that embraced the christian faith.

Now the Britons being first inhabitants of this realm (notwithstanding the subjection of the emperors and heathen princes) did receive Christ's faith from the apostolic see universally, and not in parts as other countries, nor by one and one, as clocks increase their hours by distinction of times, but altogether at once, as it were, in a moment. But after that their ill merits and forgetfulness of God had deserved expulsion, and that strangers being infidels had possessed this land, yet God of his goodness, not leaving where he once loved, so illuminated the hearts of the Saxons, being heathen men, that they forsook the darkness of heathen errors, and embraced the light of Christ's religion : so that within a small space idolatry and heathen superstition were utterly abandoned in this island.

This was a great prerogative of nobility, the benefit whereof, though it be to be ascribed to God, yet the mean occasion of the same came from the church of Rome. In the faith of which church we have ever since continued and consented with the rest of the world in unity of religion. And to shew further the fervent devotion of the inhabitants of this island towards the church of Rome, we read that divers princes in the Saxons' time with great travel and expences went personally to Rome, as Offa and Adulphys, who thought it not enough to shew themselves obedient to the said see, unless that in their own persons they had gone to that same place from whence they had received so great a grace and benefit.

In the time of Carolus Magnus, who first founded the university of Paris, he sent into England for Alcuinus, a great learned man, who first brought learning to that university, whereby it seemeth that the greatest part of the world derived the light of religion from England.

Adrian the Fourth, being an Englishman, converted Norway from infidelity, which Adrian afterwards, upon great affection and love that he bare to this realm, being his native country, gave to Henry II. king of England, the right and seignory of the dominion of Ireland which pertaineth to the see of Rome.

I will not rehearse the manifold benefits, that this realm hath received from the apostolic see, nor how ready the same hath been to relieve us in all our necessities. Nor will I rehearse the manifold miseries and calamities that this realm hath suffered by swerving from that unity. And even as in this realm, so also in all other countries, which, refusing the unity of the catholic faith, have followed fantastical doctrine, the like plagues have happened. Let Asia and the empire of Greece be a spectacle unto the world, who, by swerving from the unity of the church of Rome, are brought into captivity and subjection of the Turks. All stories are full of the like examples. And to come unto the later time, look upon our neighbours in Germany, who, by swerving from this unity, are miserably afflicted with diversity of sects, and divided into factions.

Why should I rehearse unto you the tumults and effusion of blood that hath happened there of late days; or trouble you with the rehearsal of those plagues that have happened since this innovation of religion, whereof you have felt the bitterness, and I have heard the report? Of all which matters I can say no more, but such was the misery of the time. And see how far forth this fury went. For those that live under the Turks, may freely live after their conscience, and so was it not lawful here.

If men examine well upon what grounds these innovations began, they shall well find the root of this, as of many other mischiefs, was avarice, and that the lust and carnal affection of one man confounded all laws both divine and human. And notwithstanding all these devices and politics, practised within this realm against the church of Rome, they needed not to have lost you, but that they thought rather as friends to reconcile you, than as enemies to infect you. For they wanted not great offers of the most mighty potentates in all Europe to have aided the church in that quarrel. Then mark the sequel: there seemed by these changes to rise a great face of riches and gain, which in proof came to great misery and lack. See how God then can confound the wisdom of the wise, and turn unjust policy to mere folly, and that thing which seemed to be done for relief, was cause of plain ruin and decay. Yet see that goodness of God, which at no time failed us, but most benignly offered his grace, when it was of our parts least sought and worse deserved.

And when all light of true religion seemed utterly extinct, the churches defaced, the altars overthrown, the ministers corrupted; even like as in a lamp the light being covered, yet it is not quenched, even so in a few remained the confession of Christ's faith, namely, in the breast of the queen's excellency, of whom, to speak without adulation, the saying of the prophet may be verified, "Behold, she is as one forsaken!"

And see how miraculously God of his goodness preserved her highness, contrary to the expectation of man, that when numbers conspired against her, and policies were devised to destroy her, yet she being a virgin helpless, naked, and unarmed, prevailed and had the victory over tyrants; which is not to be ascribed to any policy of man, but to the almighty great goodness and providence of God, to whom the honour is to be given. And therefore it may be said, Give glory to God. For in man's judgment, on her grace's part was nothing in appearance but despair.

And yet for all these practices and devices of ill men, here you see her grace established in her estate, being your lawful queen and governess, born among you, whom God hath appointed to reign over you, for the restitution of true religion, and extirpation of all errors and sects. And to confirm her grace the more strongly in this enterprise, lo! how the providence of God hath joined her in marriage with a prince of like religion; who being a king of great might, armour, and force, yet useth towards you neither armour nor force, but seeketh you by the way of love and amity; in which respect great cause you have to give thanks to almighty God, that hath sent you such a catholic governess. It shall be therefore your part again to love, obey, and serve them.

And as it was a singular favour of God to conjoin them in marriage, so it is not to be doubted but that he shall send them issue, for the comfort and surety of this common wealth.

Of all Princes in Europe, the emperor hath travelled most in the cause of religion, as it appeareth by his acts in Germany; yet happily, by some secret judgment of God, he hath not achieved the end. With whom in my journey hitherwards I had conference touching my ambassy; whereof, when we had understanding, he shewed a great appearance of most earnest joy and gladness, saying, "That it rejoiced him no less of the reconciliation of this realm unto christian unity, than that his son was placed by marriage in the kingdom; and most glad he was of all, that the occasion thereof should come by me being an Englishman born, which is (as it were) to call home ourselves. I can well compare him to David, who, though he were a man elect of God, yet, for that he was contaminate with blood and war, could not build the temple of Jerusalem, but left the finishing thereof to Solomon, who was a peace-making king. So may it be thought, that the appeasing of controversies of religion in christianity, is not appointed to this emperor, but rather to his son, who shall perform the building that his father had begun. Which church cannot be perfectly built, unless universally in all realms we adhere to one head, and do acknowledge him to be the vicar of God, and to have power from above: for all power is of God, according to the saying, "There is no power, but comes from God." And therefore I consider that all power being in God, yet for the conservation of quiet and godly life in the world, he hath derived that power from above into the parts here in earth; which is, into the imperial and ecclesiastical. And these two powers, as they be several and distinct, so have they two several effects and operations. For secular princes, to whom the temporal sword is committed, are ministers of God to execute vengeance upon transgressors and evil livers, and to preserve the well doers and innocent from injury and violence. Which power is represented in these two most excellent persons, the king and queen's majesties here present, who have this power committed unto them immediately from God, without any superior in that behalf.

The other power is of ministration, which is the power of the keys, and order in the ecclesiastical state, which is by the authority of God's word, examples of the apostles, and of all old holy fathers from Christ hitherto, attributed and given to the apostolic see of Rome, by special prerogative. From which see I am here deputed legate and ambassador, having full and ample commission from thence; and have the keys committed to my hands: I confess to you that I have the keys, not as mine own keys, but as the keys of him that sent me, and yet cannot open: not for want of power in me to give, but for certain impediments in you to receive, which must be taken away before my commission can take effect. This I protest before you, my commission is not of prejudice to any person. I come not to destroy, but to build; I come to reconcile, not to condemn; I am not come to compel, but to call again; I am not come to call any thing in question already done, but my commission is of grace and clemency to such as will receive it. For as touching all matters that are past, they shall be as things cast into the sea of forgetfulness.

But the means whereby you shall receive this benefit, is to revoke and repeal those laws and statutes, which are impediments, blocks, and bars to the execution of my commission. For like as I myself had neither place nor voice to speak here among you, but was in all respects a banished man, till such time as ye had repealed those laws that lay in my way, even so cannot you receive the benefits and grace offered from the apostolic see, until the abrogation of such laws, whereby you have disjoined and dislevered yourselves from the unity of Christ's church.

It remaineth therefore that you, like true christians, and provident men for the weal of your souls and bodies, ponder what is to be done in this so weighty a cause; and so to frame your acts and proceedings; as they may first tend to the glory of God, and next to the conservation of your commonwealth, surety and quietness.

The next day the three estates assembled again in the great chamber of the court at Westminster: where the king, queen, and the cardinal being present, they did exhibit (all kneeling) a supplication to their highnesses; the tenor whereof followeth:

The SUPPLICATION and SUBMISSION of the LORDS and COMMONS, assembled in PARLIAMENT, to their MAJESTIES MARY and PHILIP.

WE the lords spiritual and temporal, and the commons of this present parliament assembled, representing the whole body of the realm of England and dominions of the same, in our own names particularly, and also of the said body universally, in this supplication directed to your majesties with most humble suit, that it may, by your gracious intercession and means, be exhibited to the most reverend father in God, the lord cardinal Poole, legate, sent specially hither from our most holy father pope Julius the third, and the see apostolic of Rome, do declare ourselves very sorry and repentant for the schism and disobedience committed in this realm and dominions of the same, against the said see apostolic, either by making, agreeing or executing any laws, ordinances or commandments against the supremacy of the said see, or otherwise doing or speaking that might impugn the same: offering ourselves, and promising by this our supplication, that for a token and knowledge of our said repentance, we are, and shall be always ready, under and with the authority of your majesties, to the uttermost of our power, to do that which shall be in us for the abrogation and repealing of the said laws and ordinances in this present parliament; as well for ourselves, as for the whole body whom we represent.

Whereupon we most humbly beseech your majesties, as persons undefiled in the offence of this body towards the said see, which nevertheless God by his providence hath made subject unto your majesties, so to set forth this our most humble suit, that we may obtain from the see apostolic, by the said most reverend father, as well particularly as universally, absolution, release and discharge from all danger of such censures and sentences; as by the laws of the church we be fallen in; and that we may, as children repentant, be received into the bosom and unity of Christ's church; so as this noble realm, with all the members thereof, may in unity and perfect obedience to the see apostolic, and pope for the time being, serve God and your majesties, to the furtherance and advancement of his honour and glory. Amen.

The supplication being read, the king and queen delivered the same unto the cardinal, who, (perceiving the effects thereof to answer his expectation) did receive the same most gladly from their majesties: and after he had in few words given thanks to God, and declared what great cause he had to rejoice above all others, that his coming from Rome into England had taken such happy success, he, by the pope's authority, did give them this absolution following:

OUR Lord Jesus Christ, who with his most precious blood hath redeemed and washed us from all our sins and iniquities, that he might purchase unto himself a glorious spouse without spot or wrinkle, and whom the Father hath appointed head over all his church, he by his mercy absolve you. And we by apostolic authority given unto us (by the most holy lord pope Julius the third, his vicegerent on earth) do absolve and deliver you, and every of you, with the whole realm and dominions thereof, from all heresy and schism, and from all and every judgment, censures, and pains, for that cause incurred; and also we do restore you again unto the unity of our mother the holy church, as in our letters more plainly it shall appear: in the name of the Father, of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost.

Having finished this business, they went into the chapel, and there singing Te Deum, with great solemnity, declared the joy that for this reconciliation was pretended.

The report of which was with great speed sent unto Rome; as well by the king and cardinal's letters, which hereafter follow, as also otherwise. Whereupon the pope caused three processions to be made at Rome, and thanks to be given to God, with great joy, for the conversion of England to his church; and therefore praising the cardinal's diligence, and the devotion of the king and queen, on Christmas-eve, by his bulls he set forth a general pardon to all such as did truly rejoice for the same.

KING PHILIP'S LETTER to POPE JULIUS.

MOST holy father, I wrote yesterday unto Don John Maurice, that he should declare by word of mouth, or else write to your holiness, in what good state the matter of religion stood in this realm, and of the submission to your holiness, as to the chief. As this day, which is the feast of St. Andrew, late in the evening, we have done God that service (to whose only goodness we may impute it, and to your holiness, who have taken so great pains to gain these souls) that this realm with full and general consent of all them that represent the state, being very penitent for what was past, and well bent for that they come to do, submitted themselves to your holiness, and to that holy see; whom, at the request of the queen and me, your legate did absolve. And forasmuch as the said Don John shall signify unto your holiness all that passed in this matter, I will write no more thereof, but only that the queen and I, as most faithful and devout children of your holiness, have received the greatest joy and comfort thereof, that may be expressed with tongue; considering that besides the service done to God hereby, it hath chanced in the time of your holiness, to place as it were in the lap of the holy catholic church such a kingdom as this is. And therefore I think I cannot be thankful enough for that it is done this day. And I trust in him, that your holiness shall always understand, that the holy see hath not had a more obedient son than I, nor more desirous to preserve and increase the authority of the same. God guide and prosper the most holy personage of your holiness as I desire.

Your holiness's most obedient son the king, &c.
London. Nov. 30th, 1554.

CARDINAL

CARDINAL POOLE'S LETTER to the POPE.

THOSE things which I wrote unto your holiness of late, of that hope which I trusted would come to pass, that in a short space this realm would be reduced to the unity of the church, and obedience of the apostolic see, though I did write then not without great cause; yet nevertheless I could not be void of all fear; not only for that difficulty which the minds of our countrymen did shew, being so long alienated from the see apostolic, and for the old hatred which they had borne so many years to that name: but much more I feared, lest the first entry into the cause itself, should be put off by some other matter or convention coming betwixt.

For the avoiding whereof I made great means to the king and queen, which little needed, for their own godliness, forwardness, and earnest desire to bring the thing to pass, far surmounted my great and earnest expectation. This day in the evening, being St. Andrew's day, (who first brought his brother Peter to Christ) it is come to pass, by the Providence of God, that this realm is reclaimed to give due obedience unto Peter's seat and your holiness, by whose means it may be conjoined to Christ the head, and his holy body, which is the church. The thing was done and concluded in parliament (the king and queen being present) with such full consent and great rejoicing, that incontinently, after I had made my oration, and given the benediction, with a great joy and shout there was divers times said, Amen, Amen. Which doth evidently declare, that that holy seed, although it had been long oppressed, yet was not utterly quenched in them; which chiefly was declared in the nobility. Returning home to my house, these things I wrote unto your holiness, upon the sudden rejoicing that I had so luckily brought to pass so weighty a matter by the divine providence, thinking to have sent my letters by the king's post, who (as it was said) should have departed shortly; but afterwards changing my purpose, when I had determined to send one of mine own men, I thought good to add thus much to my letters, for the more ample gratulation and rejoicing at that good chance: which thing as it was right great gladness to me, through the event of the same (being itself very great and so holy, so profitable to the whole church, so healthful to this my country which brought me forth, so honourable to the same which received me) so likewise I took no less rejoicing of the princes themselves, through whose virtue and godliness the matter did take success and perfection. Of how many, and how great things may the church (which is the spouse of Christ, and our mother) make her account through those her children? Oh notable zeal of godliness! Oh ancient faith! which undoubtedly doth so manifestly appear in them both, that whoso seeth them, must needs (whether he will or no) say the same which the prophet spake of the first children of the church: "These are the seed which the Lord hath blessed. This is the Lord's planting to glory in." How holily did did your holiness with all your authority and earnest affection favour this marriage? which truly seemeth to express a great similitude of the highest king, which being heir of the world, was sent down by his Father from the regal seat, to be spouse and sone of the virgin, and by this means to comfort all mankind: for even so this king himself, the greatest heir of all men which are in the earth, leaving his father's kingdoms that are most great, is come into this little kingdom, and is become both the spouse and son of this virgin, (for he so behaved himself as though he were a son, whereas indeed he is a husband) that he might, as he hath in effect already performed, shew himself an aider and helper to reconcile this people to Christ and his body, which is the church. Which things, seeing they are so, what may not our mother the church herself look for at his hands, that hath brought this to pass, to convert the hearts of the fathers towards their sons, and the unbelievers to the wisdom of the righteous? which virtue truly doth wonderfully shine in him. But the Queen, which at that time, when your holiness sent me legate unto her, did rise up as a rod of incense springing out of the trees of myrrh, and as frankincense out of the desert: she, I say, which a little before was forsaken of all men, how wonderful doth she now shine? What a favour of myrrh and frankincense doth she give forth unto her people? which (as the prophet saith of the mother of Christ) brought forth before she laboured; before she was delivered, brought forth a man-child: who ever heard of such a thing? and who hath seen the like of this? Shall the earth bring forth in one day, or shall a whole nation be brought forth together? But she hath now brought forth a whole nation before the time of that delivery, whereof we are in most great hope.

How great cause is given to us to rejoice? how great cause have we to give thanks to God's mercy, your holiness, and the emperor's majesty, which have been causes of so happy and so godly a marriage; by which we being reconciled, are joined to God the Father, to Christ, and to the church? Of the which although I cannot comprehend in words the joy that I have taken, yet I cannot keep silence of it. And to this my rejoicing this also was joined, (which when I had perceived by the letters of the reverend archbishop of Constance, your holiness's nuncio with the emperor's majesty, brought me marvellous great gladness) that your said holiness began to restore to the ancient beauty those things, which in the church of Rome, through the corruption of times were deformed, which truly, when it shall be finished, then indeed may we well cry out with the prophet, and speak unto your holiness with these words: "Put off the stole of sorrow and vexation, and put on comeliness, which thou hast of God in everlasting glory. For thy name shall be named of God everlasting, peace of righteousness, and honour of godliness; and then it shall be said, Look about and see thy sons gathered together from the sun-rising, to the going down of the same, rejoicing in the holy word." There is nothing truly (to speak of thy children gathered together in the west, which prepare themselves to meet their mother) which they had rather see, than her apparelled (that I may use the words of the prophet) in the garment of righteousness, wherewith God adorned her in times past. This one thing remaineth, that your holiness's joy, and the joy of all the universal church may be perfected, which, together with us her unworthy children, cease not to pray to God for it. The Almighty God preserve your holiness long to continue in health for the prophet of his church. From London, the last of November, 1554.

Your most humble servant,

REGINALD POOLE, Cardinal.

On Sunday, December 2, Gardiner, bishop of Winchester, and lord chancellor of England, preached at Paul's-Cross, at which sermon the king and cardinal Poole were present. He took for his text the xliith chapter of the epistle of St. Paul to the Romans, "This also we know the season, brethren, that we should now awake out of sleep, for now is our salvation nearer than when we believed," &c.

First, He shewed how the saying of St. Paul was verified upon the gentiles, who had a long time slept in dark ignorance, not knowing God: therefore St. Paul, said he, to stir up their heavy dulness, willed them to awake out of their long sleep, because their salvation was nearer, than when they believed. In amplifying this matter, and comparing our times with theirs he took occasion to declare what difference the Jewish sacraments had from these of christians, wherein he used these words:

"Even as the sacrament of the Jews did declare Christ to come, so do our sacraments declare Christ to be already come: but Christ to come, and Christ to be come is not all one. For now that he is come, the Jews' sacraments are done away, and our's only remain, which declared that he is already come, and is nearer us, than he was to the fathers of the old law: for they had him but in signs, but we have him in the sacrament of the altar, even his very body. Wherefore now also it is time that we awake out of our sleep, who have slept, or rather dreamed these twenty years past, as shall more easily appear by declaring at large some of the properties and effects of a sleep or a dream. And first, As men intending to sleep, do separate themselves from company, and desire to be alone; even so have we separated ourselves from the see apostolic of Rome, and have been alone, unlike any other realm in Christendom.

Secondly, As in sleep men dream sometimes of killing, sometimes of maiming, sometimes of drowning or burning, sometimes of such beastliness as I dare not name, but will spare your ears; so we have in this our sleep, not only dreamed of beastliness, but we have done it indeed. For in this our sleep hath not one brother destroyed another; Hath not half our money been wiped away at one time? And again, those that would defend their conscience, were slain, and others also otherwise troubled; besides infinite other things, which you all know, as well as I, whereof I appeal to your own consciences. Further, in a man's sleep all his senses are stopped, so that he can neither see, smell, nor hear: even so, whereas the ceremonies of the church were instituted to move and stir up our senses, they being taken away, were not our senses (as ye would say) stopped, and we fast asleep? Moreover, when a man would gladly sleep, he will put out the candle, lest peradventure it may hinder his sleep, and awake him: so of late all such writers as did hold any thing with the apostolic see, were condemned and forbidden to be read; and images (which were laymen's books) were cast down and broken.

The sleep hath continued with us these twenty years, and we all that while without a head. For when king

Henry

Henry did first take upon him to be head of the church, it was then no church at all. After whose death, king Edward (having over him governors and protectors, which ruled as they listed) could not be head of the church, but was only a shadow or sign of a head, and at length it came to pass, that we had no head at all; no, not so much as our two archbishops. For on the one side, the queen being a woman, could not be head of the church; and on the other side, they both were convicted of one crime, and so deposed. Thus while we desired to have a supreme head among us, it came to pass, that we had no head at all. When the tumult was in the north, in the time of king Henry VIII. (I am sure) the king was determined to have given over the supremacy again to the pope; but the hour was not then come, and therefore it went not forward, lest some would have said, that he did it for fear.

After this, Mr. Knevet and I were sent ambassadors unto the emperor, to desire him that he would be a means between the pope's holiness and the king, to bring the king to the obedience of the see of Rome, but the time was not yet come. For it might have been said, that it had been done for a civil policy. Again, in the beginning of king Edward's reign, the matter was moved, but the time was not yet: for it would have been said, that the king (being but a child) had been bought and sold. Neither in the beginning of the queen's reign was the hour come; for it would have been said, that it was done in a time of weakness. Likewise when the king first came, if it had been done, they might have said it had been by force and violence. But now, even now, the hour is come, when nothing can be objected, but that it is the mere mercy and providence of God. Now hath the pope's holiness, pope Julius III. sent unto us this most reverend father, cardinal Poole, an ambassador from his side. What to do? not to revenge the injuries done by us against his holiness, but to give his benediction to those that defamed and persecuted him.

And that we may be the more meet to receive the said benediction, I shall desire you that we may always acknowledge ourselves offenders against his holiness; I do not exclude myself from the number; I will "weep with them that weep, and rejoice with them that rejoice." And I shall desire you, that we may defer the matter no longer, for now the hour is come. The king and queen's majesties have already restored our holy father the pope to his supremacy; and the three estates assembled in the parliament, representing the whole body of the realm, have also submitted themselves to his holiness, and his successors for ever; wherefore let us not any longer stay. And even as St. Paul said to the Corinthians, that he was their father, so may the pope say, that he is our father: for we received our doctrine first from Rome, therefore he may challenge us as his own. We have all cause to rejoice, for his holiness hath sent hither and prevented us, before we sought him: such care hath he for us. Therefore let us say, "This is the day which the Lord hath made, we will rejoice and be glad in it." Rejoice in this day, which is of the Lord's working, that such a noble birth is come, yea, such a holy father (I mean my lord cardinal Poole) which can speak unto us as unto brethren, and not as unto strangers, who hath a long time been absent. And let us now awake, who so long have slept, and in our sleep have done so much mischief to the sacraments of Christ, denying the blessed sacrament of the altar, and pulled down the altar, which thing Luther himself would not do, but rather reproved them that did, examining them of their belief in Christ."

This was the sum of his sermon before his prayers, wherein he prayed first for pope Julius the third, with all his college of cardinals, the bishop of London, with the rest of that order; then for the king and queen, and the nobility of this realm; and lastly, for the commons of the same, with the souls departed, lying in the pains of purgatory. This ended, the time being late, they began in St. Paul's to ring to their evening song, whereby the preacher could not be well heard, which caused him to make an end of his sermon.

About this time a messenger was sent from the parliament to the pope, to desire him to confirm and establish the sale of abbey-lands and chauntry-lands: for the lords and the parliament would grant nothing in the pope's behalf, before their purchases were fully confirmed.

Thursday, December 6, the whole convocation, both bishops and others, were sent for to Lambeth to the cardinal, who the same day forgave them all their perjuries, schisms, and heresies, and they all there knelt down, and received his absolution; and after an exhortation and gratulation for their conversion to the catholic church, made by the cardinal, they departed.

Wednesday, December 12, five of the eight men which lay in the Fleet, that were of Mr. Throgmorton's jury, were discharged, and set at liberty upon paying a fine of 220l. a-piece: and the other three put up a supplication, therein declaring, that their goods did not amount to the sum that they were appointed to pay, upon which declaration, paying 40l. a-piece, they were delivered out of prison on the 21st of December.

Saturday, December 22, the parliament had a strict command, that none of them should depart into the country this Christmas, nor before the parliament were ended. Which command was very contrary to their expectations; for as well many of the lords, as also many of the commons, had sent for their horses, and had them brought hither.

Friday, December 28, the prince of Piedmont came to the court at Westminster.

On New-year's-day, 1555, at night, several honest men and women of the city, to the number of thirty, and Mr. Rose, a minister, were taken as they were in a house in Bow-church-yard, at the communion, and the same night were all committed to prison. And on the third of January following, Mr. Rose was before the bishop of Winchester, the lord chancellor, and from thence the same day committed to the Tower, after some communication between the bishop and him.

The same day the act of supremacy passed in the parliament, and at night a great tumult was at Westminster, between some Spaniards and Englishmen, whereof a great mischief had like to have ensued, by means of a Spanish friar, who got into the church, and rung the alarum. The occasion was about two prostitutes then in the cloister at Westminster, with a sort of Spaniards, whereof whilst some played the knave, with them, others kept the entry of the cloyster with dogs in harness. In the mean time some of the dean's men came into the cloyster, and the Spaniards discharged their dogs, and hurt some of them. By and by the noise of this came into the streets, so that the whole town was up almost, but never a stroke was stricken. Notwithstanding, the noise of this doing with the dean's men, and also the ringing of the alarum, made much ado, and a great number to be sore afraid.

We have before mentioned the council's letter sent to bishop Bonner, signifying the good news of queen Mary to be not only conceived, but also quick with child, which was the 28th of November. Of this child great talk at this time began to rise in every man's mouth, especially amongst such as seemed to carry Spanish hearts in English bodies. In which number here is not to be forgotten, nor defrauded of his commendation for his worthy affection towards his prince and her issue, one sir Richard Southwell, who being the same time in the parliament-house, when, as the lords were occupied in other affairs and matters of importance, suddenly starting up, for fulness of joy burst out in these words following: "Tush, my masters, said he, why talk ye of these matters? I would have you take some order for our master that is now coming into the world apace, lest he find us unprovided," &c. By which words, and also by the aforesaid letters of the council, and the common talk abroad, it may appear what an assured opinion was then conceived in men's heads, of queen Mary to be conceived and quick with child. Inasmuch that at the same time, and in the same parliament, there was a bill exhibited, and the following act made upon the same.

The WORDS of the ACT.

ALBEIT, we the lords spiritual and temporal, and the commons in the present parliament assembled, have firm hope and confidence in the goodness of Almighty God, that like as he hath hitherto miraculously preserved the queen's majesty from many great imminent perils and dangers; even so he will of his infinite goodness give her highness strength; the rather by our continual prayers, to pass well the danger of deliverance of child, wherewith it hath pleased him (to all our great comforts) to bless her: yet forasmuch as all things of this world be uncertain, and having before our eyes the dolorous experience of this inconstant government, during the time of the reign of the late king Edward the sixth, do plainly see the manifold inconveniences, great dangers and perils that may ensue in this whole realm, if foresight be not used to prevent all evil chances, if they should happen: for the eschewing hereof, we the lords spiritual and temporal, and the commons in this present parliament assembled, for and in consideration of a most special trust and confidence that we have and repose in the king's majesty, for and concerning the politic government, order, and administration of this realm, in the time of the young years of the issue or issues of her majesty's body to be born, if it should please God to call the queen's highness out of this present life, during the tender years of such issue or issues, (which God forbid) according to such order and manner, as hereafter in this present act his highness's most gracious pleasure is, should be declared and set forth, have made our humble suit, by the assent of the queen's highness, that his majesty would vouchsafe to accept and take upon him the rule, order, education, and government of the said issue or issues to be born, as is afore-said: upon which our suit, being of his said majesty most graciously accepted, it hath pleased his highness not only to declare, That like as for the most part his majesty verily trusteth that Almighty God (who hath hitherto preserved the queen's majesty, to give this realm so good an hope of certain succession in the blood royal of the same realm) will assist her highness with his graces and benedictions, to see the fruit of her body well brought forth, live, and able to govern; (wherefore neither all this realm, nay all the world besides, should or could receive more comfort than his majesty should or would) yet if such chance should happen, his majesty at our humble desires is pleased and contented, not only to accept and take upon him the care and charge of the education, rule, order, and government of such issues as of this most happy marriage shall be born between the queen's highness and him; but also, during the time of such government, would by all ways and means, study, travel, and employ himself to advance the weal both public and private of this realm and dominion thereunto belonging, according to the said trust in his majesty reposed, with no less good will and affection, than if his highness had been naturally born amongst us. In consideration whereof, be it enacted by the king and the queen's most excellent majesties, by the assent of the lords spiritual and temporal, and the commons in this present parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, &c. [As it is to be seen in the act more at large ratified and confirmed by the same parliament, to the same intent and purpose.]

Thus we see how man doth purpose, but God disposeth as pleaseth him. For all this great labour, provision, and order, taken in the parliament-house for their young master long-looked for, coming so surely into the world, in the end, appeared neither young master, nor young mistress, that any man yet to this day can hear of. Furthermore, as the labour of the lay-fort was herein deluded; so no less ridiculous was it to behold, what little effect the prayers of the papists had with Almighty God, who travelled no less with their processions, masses, and collects, for the happy deliverance of this young master to come, as what follows will shew.

A PRAYER by DR. WESTON, DEAN of WESTMINSTER, to be daily said for the QUEEN's DELIVERANCE.

O Most righteous Lord God, which for the offence of the first woman, hath threatened unto all women a common, sharp, and inevitable malediction, and hath enjoined them that they should conceive in sin, and being conceived, should be subject to many and grievous torments; and finally, be delivered with the danger and jeopardy of their lives; we beseech thee for thine exceeding great goodness and bottomless mercy, to mitigate the strictness of that law. Assuage thine anger for a while, and cherish in the bosom of thy favour and mercy our most gracious queen Mary, being now at the point of being delivered. So help her, that without danger of her life she may overcome the sorrow, and in due season bring forth a child, in body beautiful and comely, in mind noble and valiant. So that afterwards, she, forgetting the trouble, may with joy laud and praise the bountifulness of thy mercy, and, together with us, praise and bless both thee and thy holy name world without end. This, O Lord, we desire thee, we beseech thee, and most heartily crave of thee. Hear us, O Lord, and grant us our petition: let not the enemies of thy faith, and of thy church say, Where is their God?

Another solemn PRAYER for KING PHILIP and QUEEN MARY's CHILD, that it may be a MALE-CHILD; WELL-FAVoured, WITTY, &c.

O Most mighty Lord God, who regardest the prayer of the humble, and despisest not their request; bow down from thine high habitation of the heavens, the eyes of thy mercy unto us wretched sinners, bowing the knees of our hearts, and with many and deep sighs bewailing our sins and offences humbly with eyes intent, and hands displayed, praying and beseeching thee, with the shield of thy protection, to defend Mary thy servant, and our queen, who hath none other helper but thee, and whom, through thy grace, thou hast willed to be conceived with child: and at the time of her travail graciously with the help of thy right hand deliver her, and from all danger, with the child in her conceived, mercifully preserve.

It hath seemed good in thy sight, merciful Father, by thy servant Mary to work these wonders; that is to say, in her hands to vanquish and overthrow the stout enemy, and to deliver us thy people, out of the hands of heretics, infidels, enemies to thee, and to the cross of thy beloved Son Jesus Christ; that of thy servant thou mightest speak in far countries. Therefore for these wonderful works, which thou dost to thy servants, thou art magnified, Lord God, for ever; and we thy people bless thee the God of heaven, which hath wrought upon us this great mercy, and hath excluded from us the heretic, the enemy of truth, the persecutor of thy church. We know, we know, that we have grievously, Lord, sinned, that we have been deceived by vanity, and that we have forsaken thee our God. Our iniquities are multiplied on our heads and our sins are increasing up to heaven: and we ourselves having offended, and our princes and our priests, for these our sins, have deserved an hypocrite to our prince, our sins have deserved a tyrant to our governor, that should bring our life to bitterness. We are not worthy to have so gentle and merciful a queen, so godly a ruler, and finally, so virtuous a prince; at the very beginning of whose reign, a new light, as it were, of God's religion seemed to us for to spring and rise. The Jews did bless the widow Judith with one voice, saying, Thou art the glory of Jerusalem, thou art the joy of Israel, thou art the honour of our people, for that thou hast loved chastity, and thou shalt be blessed for ever.

And we the English people with one agreeable consent do cry, Thou Mary art the glory of England, our joy, the honour of thy people, for that thou hast embraced chastity; thine heart is strengthened, for the hand of our Lord hath comforted thee, and therefore thou shalt be blessed for ever. But bow down, O most merciful Father, thine ear, and open thine eyes, and behold our affliction, and our humble confession. Thou knowest, Lord, that against Philip, not by human, but by thy ordinance our king, and against thy servant Mary, by thy providence our queen, the restorers and maintainers of thy testament of the faith, and most constant defenders of thy church; thou knowest, I say, that against these our two governors, the enemies of thy holy testament, and the church, thy spouse, be most rank rebels and spiteful murmurers, walking after their lusts, whose mouth speaketh words of pride, to the end they may set up the kingdom of heretics and schismatics. By the power of their hands they would change thy promises, and destroy thine inheritance, and stop and shut up the mouths of them that praise thee, and extinguish the glory of thy catholic church and altar.

It is manifest and plain, how many contentions, how many conspiracies and seditions, how great wars, what tumults, how many, and how great troublesome vexations, how many heresies and schisms, (for these are the most ready devices, and evident tokens of heretics) for our sins do hang over us, if thy servant be taken from this life: for we acknowledge that our Lord is omnipotent, who hath pitched his dwelling-place in the midst of his people, to the intent to deliver us out of the hands of our enemies. Turn therefore thy countenance unto us; shew unto us, O Lord, thy face. Punish us for our sins according to thy will and pleasure, only now deliver us. We bowing the knees of our heart, beseech thee, that thou wilt not reserve unto us punishment for ever, and we shall praise thee all the days of our life. Hear our cry, and the prayer of thy people, and open to them the treasure of thy mercy, thy gracious favour, the spring of lively water. Thou that hast begun, make in the hand of thy servant a perfect work. Suffer not, we pray thee, the faithless rebels to say of thy servant and her counsellors, that they have devised matters which they cannot perform. And grant unto thy servant an happy and an easy travail. For it is not impossible to thy power, nor indecent to thy justice, nor unwonted to thy mercy.

It is well known unto us how marvellously thou didst work in Sarah of the age of 90 years, and in Elizabeth the barren, and also far stricken in age: for thy council is not in the power of men. Thou Lord that art the searcher of hearts and thoughts thou knowest that thy servant never lusted after man, never gave herself to wanton company, nor made herself partaker with them that walk in lightness: but she consented to take an husband with thy fear, and not with her lust. Thou knowest that thy servant took an husband not for carnal pleasure, but only for the desire and love of posterity, wherein thy name might be blessed for ever and ever. Give therefore unto thy servants, Philip our king, and Mary our queen, a male issue, which may sit in the seat of thy kingdom. Give unto our queen thy servant, a little infant, in fashion and body comely and beautiful, in pregnant wit, notable and excellent.

Grant the same to be in obedience like Abraham, in hospitality like Lot, in chastity and brotherly love like Joseph, in meekness and mildness like Moses, in strength and valour like Sampson. Let him be found faithful as David after thy heart. Let him be wise among kings as the most wise Solomon. Let him be like Job, a simple and an upright man, fearing God, and eschewing evil. Let him finally be garnished with the comeliness of all virtuous conditions, and in the same let him wax old and live, that he may see his children's children to the third and fourth generation. And give unto our sovereign lord and lady, king Philip and queen Mary, thy blessings and long life upon earth; and grant that of them may come kings and queens, which may steadfastly continue in faith, love, and holiness. And blessed be their seed of our God, that all nations may know, thou art only God in all the earth, which art blessed for ever and ever. Amen.

Another PRAYER for QUEEN MARY, and her SUPPOSED CHILD.

O Almighty Father, who didst sanctify the blessed virgin and mother Mary in her conception, and in the birth of Christ our Saviour thine only Son; also by thine omnipotent power didst safely deliver the prophet Jonas out of the whale's belly: defend, O Lord, we beseech thee, thy servant Mary, our queen, with child conceived, and so visit her in and with thy godly gift of health, that not only the child thy creature, within her contained, may joyfully come from her into this world, and receive the blessed sacraments of baptism and confirmation, enjoying therewith daily increase of all princely and gracious gifts both of body and soul; but that also she the mother, through thy special grace and mercy, may in time of her travail avoid all excessive grief and pains, and abide perfect and sure from all peril and danger of death, with long and prosperous life, through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

Tuesday, January 10th, nineteen members of the lower-house, with their speaker, came to Whitehall to the king, and offered him the government of the realm, and of the issue, if the queen should fail, which was confirmed by act of parliament within ten days after.

Wednesday, 26th, the parliament was dissolved. In this parliament the bishop of Rome was established, and all such laws as were made against him since the twentieth year of king Henry the VIII. were repealed, and cardinal Poole, bishop Pates, Lilly, and others, were restored to their blood. Also an act was made, that whoever should speak any thing against the king or queen, or that might move any sedition or rebellion, at the first time to have one of his ears cut off, or to forfeit an hundred marks; and at the second time, to have both his ears cut off, or else to forfeit an hundred pounds; and whosoever should write, cypher, or print any of the premises, to have their right hand cut off.

Likewise in this parliament three statutes were revived for trial of heresy: one made in the fifth year of Richard II. another in the second year of Henry IV. and the third in the second year of Henry V. Also the affair of Mr. Rose, and others that were with him, was communed of in this parliament, and upon that occasion an act was made, that certain evil prayers should be treason against the queen's highness. The prayers of these men were thus: "God turn the heart of queen Mary from idolatry, or else shorten her days."

At the apprehending of Mr. Rose, and his companions, word was brought thereof to bishop Hooper, being then in the Fleet; whereupon the bishop sent a letter of consolation to the said prisoners; the copy whereof is as follows:

The ANSWER of BISHOP HOOPER, to a LETTER sent unto him, concerning certain PRISONERS, taken in Bow Church Yard.

THE grace of God be with you, Amen. I perceive by your letter, how that upon New-year's-day at night, there were taken a godly number of christians, whilst they were praying. I do rejoice in that men can be so well occupied in this perilous time, and flee unto God for remedy by prayer, as well for their own lacks and necessities, as also charitably to pray for them that persecute them. So doth the word of God command all men to pray charitably for them that hate them, and not to revile any magistrate with words; or to mean him evil by force or violence. They also may rejoice that in well-doing they were taken to the prison. Wherefore I have thought it good to send them this little writing of consolation; praying God to give them patience, charity, and constancy in the truth of his most holy word. Thus fare you well, and pray to God to send his true word into this realm again amongst us which the ungodly bishops have now banished.

January 4th, 1555.

BISHOP HOOPER's LETTER of CONSOLATION to the aforesaid PRISONERS.

THE grace, favour, and consolation, and aid of the Holy Ghost be with you now and ever. Amen. Dearly beloved in the Lord, ever since your imprisonment I have been marvellously moved with great affections and passions, as well of mirth and gladness, as of heaviness and sorrow. Of gladness in this, that I perceived how ye be bent and given to prayer and invocation of God's help in these dark and wicked proceedings of men against God's glory. I have been sorry to perceive the malice and wickedness of men to be so cruel, devilish, and tyrannical, to persecute the people of God for serving of God, saying and hearing of the holy Psalms, and the word of eternal life. These cruel things do declare, that the papist's church is more bloody and tyrannical, than ever was the sword of the heathens and gentiles.

When I heard of your taking, and what ye were doing wherefore and by whom ye were taken, I remembered how the christians in the primitive church were used by the cruelty of unchristened heathens, in the time of Trajan the emperor, about seventy seven years after Christ's ascension into heaven: and how the christians were persecuted very sore, as though they had been traitors and movers of sedition. Whereupon the gentle emperor Trajan required to know the true cause of christian men's trouble. A great learned man, called Pliny, wrote unto him, and said, "It was because the christians said certain Psalms before day unto one called Christ, whom they worshipped for God." When Trajan the emperor understood it was for nothing but for conscience and religion, he caused by his commandments every where, that no man should be persecuted for serving of God. But the pope and his church hath cast you into prison, being taken even doing the work of God, and one of the most excellent works that is required of christian men; that is to wit, whilst ye were in prayer, and not in such wicked and superstitious prayers as the papists use, but in the same prayer that Christ hath taught you to pray. And in his name only ye gave God thanks for that ye have received, and for his sake ye asked for such things as ye want. O glad may ye be, that ever ye were born, to be apprehended whilst ye were so virtuously occupied. Blessed be they that suffer for righteousness' sake. For if God had suffered them that took your bodies, then to have taken your life also, now had you been following the Lamb in perpetual joys, away from the company and assembly of wicked men. But the Lord would not have you so suddenly so to depart, but reserveth you gloriously to speak and maintain his truth to the world.

Be ye not careful what ye shall say, for God will go out and in with you, and will be present in your hearts. and in your mouths to speak his wisdom, although it seemeth foolishness to the world. He that hath begun this good work in you, continue you in the same unto the end; and pray unto him that ye may fear him only, that hath power to kill both body and soul, and to cast them into hell-fire. Be of good comfort. All the hairs of your head are numbered and there is not one of them can perish, except your heavenly Father suffer it to perish. Now ye are in the field, and placed in the front of Christ's battle. Doubtless it is a singular favour of God, and a special love of him towards you, to give you this forward and pre-eminence, a sign that he trusteth you before others of this people. Wherefore dear brethren and sisters continually fight this fight of the Lord. Your cause is most just and godly, ye stand for the true Christ (who is after the flesh in heaven) and for his true religion and honour, which is amply, fully, sufficiently, and abundantly contained in the Holy Testament, sealed with Christ's own blood. How much are ye bound to God, who puts you in trust with so holy and just a cause!

Remember what lookers-on you have to see and behold you in your fight, God and all his angels, who are ready always to take you up in heaven, if ye be slain in his fight. Also you have standing at your backs all the multitude of the faithful, who shall take courage, strength, and desire to follow such noble and valiant christians as you are. Be not afraid of your adversaries: for he that is in you, is stronger than he that is in them; shrink not, although it be in pain to you; your pains are not now so great, as hereafter your joys shall be. Read the comfortable chapters to the Romans viii. x. xv. Hebrews xi. xii. And upon upon your knees thank God that ever ye were accounted worthy to suffer any thing for his name's sake. Read the second chapter of St. Luke's Gospel, and there you shall see how the shepherds that watched upon their sheep all night, as soon as they heard that Christ was born at Bethlem, by and by went to see him. They did not reason nor debate with themselves, who should keep the wolf from the sheep in the mean time, but did as they were commanded, and committed their sheep unto him, whose pleasure they obeyed. So let us do now we are called, commit all other things to him that calleth us. He will take heed that all things shall be well. He will help the husband, he will comfort the wife, he will guide the servants, he will keep the house, he will preserve the goods; yea, rather than it should be undone, he will wash the dishes, and rock the cradle. Cast therefore all your care upon God, for he careth for you. Besides this, you may perceive by your imprisonment, that your adversaries' weapons, against you are nothing but flesh, blood, and tyranny. For if they were able, they would maintain their wicked religion by God's word: but for lack of that, they would violently compel us, as they cannot by holy scripture persuade, because the holy word of God and all Christ's doings, are contrary unto them. I pray you pray for me, and I will pray for you. And although we be asunder after the world, yet in Christ (I trust) for ever joining in the spirit, and so shall meet in the palace of the heavenly joys, after this short and transitory life is ended. God's peace be with you. Amen.

January 14th, 1555.

Upon Friday, January 18th, all the council went to the Tower, and set at liberty most part of the prisoners, among whom were the late duke of Northumberland's sons, Ambrose, Robert, and Henry, sir Andrew Dudley, sir John Rogers, sir James Crofts, sir Nicholas Throgmorton, sir Nicholas Arnal, sir George Harper, sir Edward Warner, sir William Sentlow, sir Gaven Carew, Mr. Gibbes, Cuthbert Vaughan, with many others.

Tuesday, 22d, all the preachers, who were in prison, were called before the bishop of Winchester, lord chancellor, and certain others, at the bishop's house, in St. Mary Overy's. From whence (after communication, being asked whether they would convert, and enjoy the queen's pardon, or else stand to that they had taught; they all answered, that they would stand to that they had taught) they were committed to straighter prison than before, with charge that none should speak with them: of whom, one James George, the same time, died in prison, being there in bonds for religion and righteousness' sake; who therefore being exempted burial in the popish church-yard, was buried in the fields.

Wednesday, 23d, all the bishops, with the rest of the convocation-house, were before the cardinal at Lambeth, where he desired them to repair every man where his cure and charge lay, exhorting them to treat their flock with all mildness, and to endeavour to win the people rather by gentleness, than by extremity and rigour, and so let them depart.

Friday, 25th, being the day of conversion of St. Paul, there was a general and solemn procession through London, to give God thanks for their conversion to the catholic church: wherein (to set out their glorious pomp) there were fourscore and ten crosses, one hundred and sixty priests and clerks, who had every one of them copes upon their backs, singing loudly. There followed also, for the better estimation of the fight, eight bishops; and last of all came Bonner, bishop of London, carrying the popish pyx under a canopy.

There were also present the mayor, and aldermen, and all the livery of every occupation. Moreover the king also himself, and the cardinal, came to St. Paul's church the same day. From whence after mass they returned to Westminster again. As the king was entering the church, at the steps going up to the choir, all the gentlemen that of late were set at liberty out of the Tower, knelt before the king, and offered unto him themselves and their services.

After the procession, there was also commandment given to make bonfires at night. Whereupon did rise among the people a doubtful talk why all this was done: some saying it was; that the queen, being with child, might have a safe delivery; others thought, that it was for joy that the realm was joined again to the see of Rome.

Monday, 28th, the bishop of Winchester, and the other bishops, had commission from the cardinal to sit upon, and order, according to the laws; all such preachers and heretics (as they termed them) as were in prison; and according to this commission, the same day the bishop of Winchester, and the other bishops, with certain of the council, sat in St. Mary Overy's church, and called before them bishop Hooper, Mr. Rogers, and Mr. Cardmaker, who were brought thither by the sheriffs; from whence, after communication, they were committed to prison till the next day, but Cardmaker submitted himself.

Tuesday, 29th, Hooper, Rogers, Dr. Taylor, and Bradford, were brought before them, where sentence of excommunication, and judgment ecclesiastical, were pronounced upon bishop Hooper, and Mr. Rogers, by the bishop of Winchester, who sat as judge in Caiaphas's seat, and drove them out of the church, according to their law and order. Dr. Taylor and Bradford were committed to prison till the next day.

Wednesday, 30th, Dr. Taylor, Dr. Crome, Mr. Bradford, Mr. Saunders, and Dr. Ferrar, sometime bishop of St. David's, were before the said bishops, when Dr. Taylor, Mr. Saunders, and Mr. Bradford, were likewise excommunicated; and, sentence being pronounced upon them, they were committed to the sheriffs. Dr. Crome desired two months respite, which was granted him; and Mr. Ferrar was again committed to prison till another time. All these men shewed themselves to be learned, as indeed they were: but what availeth either learning, reason, or truth itself, where arbitrary will alone beareth rule?

After the examination and condemnation of these good men and preachers, commissions and inquisitors were sent abroad into all parts of the realm: by reason whereof, a great number of most godly and true christians (out of all the quarters, but especially Kent, Essex, Norfolk, and Suffolk) were apprehended, brought up to London, cast into prison, and afterwards (most of them) either consumed cruelly by fire, or else through evil handling died in prisons, and were buried on the dung-hills, in the fields, or in some back-side of the prison.

The following record is a general supplication of those unhappy prisoners, presented to the king and queen, during the sitting of parliament.

Unto the KING and QUEEN's Most Excellent MAJESTIES, and to their Most Honourable and HIGH COURT of PARLIAMENT.

IN most humble and lamentable wise complain unto your majesties, and to your high court of parliament, your poor desolate and obedient subjects, H. F. T. B. P. R. S. &c. That whereas your said subjects living under the laws of God, and of this realm, in the days of the late most noble king Edward the Sixth, did in all things shew themselves true, faithful, and diligent subjects, according to their vocation, as well in the sincere ministering of God's most holy word, as in due obedience to the higher powers, and in the daily practice of such virtues and good demeanor, as the laws of God at all times, and the statutes of the realm did then allow: your said subjects nevertheless, contrary to all laws of justice, equity, and right, are in very extreme manner, not only cast into prison (where they have remained now these 15 or 16 months) but their livings also, their houses and possessions, their goods and books, taken from them, and they slandered to be most heinous heretics, their enemies themselves being both witnesses, accusers, and judges, belying, slandering, and misreporting your said subjects at their pleasure; whereas your said subjects, being straitly kept in prison, cannot yet be suffered to come forth, and make answer accordingly.

In consideration whereof, may it please your most excellent majesties, and this your high court of parliament, graciously to tender the present calamity of your said poor subjects, and to call them before your presence, granting them liberty, either by mouth or writing in the plain English tongue, to answer before you, or before indifferent arbiters to be appointed by your majesties, unto such articles of controversy in religion as their said adversaries have already condemned them of, as of heinous heresies: provided, that all things may be done with such moderation and quiet behaviour, as becometh subjects and children of

of peace, and that your said subjects may have the free use of all their own books, and conference together among themselves.

Which thing being granted, your said subjects doubt not but it shall plainly appear, that your said subjects are true and faithful christians and neither heretics, neither teachers of heresy, nor cut off from the true catholic universal church of Christ: yea, that rather their adversaries themselves be unto your majesties as were the charmers of Egypt to Pharaoh, Zedechias and his adherents unto the king of Israel, and Barjesus to the proconsul Sergius Paulus. And if your said subjects be not able by the testimony of Christ, his prophets, apostles, and godly fathers of his church; to prove, that the doctrine of the church, homilies, and service taught and set forth in the time of our late most godly prince and king, Edward the sixth, is the true doctrine of Christ's catholic church, and most agreeable to the articles of the christian faith; your said subjects offer themselves then to the most heavy punishment, that it shall please your majesties to appoint.

Wherefore, for the tender mercy of God in Christ, (which you look for at the day of judgment) your said poor subjects in bonds most humbly beseech your most excellent majesties and this your high court of parliament, benignly and graciously to hear and grant this their petition, tending so greatly to the glory of God, to the edifying of his church, to the honour of your majesties, to the commendation and maintenance of justice; right, and equity, both before God and man. And your said subjects, according to their bounden duty, shall not cease to pray unto Almighty God for the gracious preservation of your most excellent majesties long to endure.

What the cruel sufferings, persecutions, tortures, and agonizing deaths were, which these, and numberless other subjects of the bloody queen Mary, endured from her hands, and those of her no less bloody instruments, the bishops Bonner and Gardiner, shall (God willing) be the substance of the next book; but before we enter upon this mournful recital, we think, a short sketch of the death and character of the principal actor in the horrid tragedy, will be acceptable to our readers, and this we shall take from Barnard's History of England,* whose authority we prefer to others, on account of his justly established character for candour, moderation, and a scrupulous impartiality.

"It was not long (says this modern historian, p. 324) before Mary felt the effect of public hatred, excited by her malevolence and cruel disposition. She had flattered herself with an imaginary conception, and, finding her mistake, she fell into a profound melancholy. Her health (p. 327) had been, for some time in a declining state; and on mistaking her dropsy for a pregnancy, she had used an improper regimen, which daily increased her disorder. Every reflection was now a subject of torment begun in this world, and struck a dagger in her heart. The corroding worm, that never dies began to gnaw it's vital strings. The consciousness of having incurred the hatred of her subjects; the idea of Elizabeth's succeeding to the crown; her fear that the catholic religion would be exposed to danger; her dejection for the loss of Calais with which she was deadly affected; and above all, her grief for the loss of her husband, whom, she knew, intended soon to return to Spain, to settle there during the remainder of his life: these melancholy reflections, preying upon her mind, with the greatest violence, threw her into a complication of disorders, attended with lingering fever, of which she died, November 17th, 1558, in the forty-third year of her age, after a short, cruel, and unhappy reign of five years, four months, and eleven days. She was interred at Westminster, in the chapel of her grandfather Henry VII. Some writers have been of opinion, that this unworthy queen had a serious sense of religion, but can we call that profession, however distinguished, by the sacred, peaceful name of religion, which prompts men to be guilty of savage cruelty, and destitute of all the social virtues? There are, we acknowledge, a few devout pieces extant, composed by Mary. Styrpe has preserved three of her meditations and prayers; and at the desire of queen Catharine Parr, she began to translate Erasmus's paraphrase on St. John; but after she had made a small progress in it, she left the rest to Dr. Mallet, her chaplain. Erasmus says, that she wrote very good Latin letters, but her French ones are poor performances. Styrpe has printed one from the Cotton library, in answer to a haughty mandate from her husband, on his resolving to marry the lady Elizabeth to the duke of Savoy, against the inclinations of the queen, and that princess: in which he bids the former examine her conscience, whether her repugnance does not proceed from obstinacy; and insolently tells her, that if any parliament went contrary to his request, he should lay the blame on her. The mortified Mary, in a most abject manner, the most wretched stile, submitting intirely to his will, professes to be more bounden to him than any wife to a husband, notwithstanding his ill usage of her. Other letters of this queen are preserved in Hayne's state papers: we wish we could add also a few of her virtues: but we shall here drop the curtain, her true portrait having been faithfully delineated in the history of her reign.

This curtain it is our duty, as faithful witnesses of Jesus Christ, to draw up; and our protestant readers will see exhibited a tragedy of the most crimson hue; God's faithful professors murdered in cold blood; women and infants put to the most cruel tortures; a faithful company of martyrs sealing the truth with their blood; all under the reign of a popish, bigotted, and obstinate queen, who was a disgrace to her sex, a dishonour to the English nation; and who, on account of her savage inhumanity, was justly branded by her subjects with the infamous epithet of Bloody Queen Mary.

CONTAINING

An HISTORICAL ACCOUNT of the LIVES, ACTS, MONUMENTS, PERSECUTIONS, SUFFERINGS, and TRIUMPHANT DEATHS, of the PROTESTANT REFORMERS;

With the particular Processes, and Names of all those Good, Pious, and Faithful Martyrs, both Men and Women, who were Imprisoned, Tortured, and who sealed the Faith of our Most High Religion with their Blood, in the Cruel Reign of MARY I. commonly called BLOODY QUEEN MARY.

CHAP. I.

The LIFE, EXAMINATIONS, WRITINGS, and CONDEMNATION, of the Rev. Mr. JOHN ROGERS, and also the LIFE and MARTYRDOM of the Rev. Mr. LAURENCE SAUNDERS; who were burned, the former in SMITHFIELD, February 4th, the latter at COVENTRY, February 8th, 1555.

THE Rev. Mr. John Rogers, vicar of St. Sepulchre's, and reader of St. Paul's London, was educated in the university of Cambridge, and at length was chosen chaplain to the English factory at Antwerp, in Brabant; there he became acquainted with Mr. William Tindal, whom he assisted in his translation of the New Testament, and with Miles Coverdale, who, with several other worthy protestants, had been driven out of England on account of the persecutions for five articles, in the latter end of the reign of Henry VIII. By means of conversing with these worthy and pious servants of God, Mr. Rogers came to the knowledge of the scriptures, and finding, according to those sacred oracles, that matrimony was both honest and honourable, he entered into that state, and went with his wife to Wittenberg, in Saxony, where, through indefatigable study and application in a short time he attained to such a knowledge of the Dutch language as to be capable of taking charge of a christian congregation in that part of Europe.

Having cast off all popish superstitions idolatry and restrictions, this aged minister served his cure faithfully and diligently for many years, until such time that it pleased God to dispel the mists of popish darkness from his native country, and restore the glorious light of the pure Gospel of Christ, by the introduction of his chosen servant Edward VI. to the throne of England.

No. 7.

Mr. Rogers then, being orderly called, left his living in Saxony, and came into England to preach the gospel without any previous condition, appointment, or establishment whatever: but after having laboured in the vineyard of his master for a time, with great success, Dr. Ridley, then bishop of London, gave him a prebend in his cathedral church of St. Paul's: of which he was afterwards chosen by the dean and chapter, one of the divinity-lecturers, or a reader of divinity in that church. Here he continued till queen Mary soon after her accession, banished the true religion, and again introduced the superstition and idolatry of the church of Rome with all the horrid cruelties of blood-thirsty Antichrist.

When queen Mary was in the Tower of London imbibing Gardiner's pernicious counsels, Mr. Rogers preached at Paul's Cross, confirming those doctrines which he and others had there taught in king Edward's days, and exhorted the people, with peculiar energy, to continue steadfast in the same, and to beware of the false tenets of pestilent popery. For this sermon the preacher was summoned before the council, then filled with popish and bloody bishops; before whom he pleaded his own cause in so pious, bold, and yet prudent a manner, as to obviate their displeasure for that time, and he was dismissed. But after Mary's proclamation, to prohibit the preaching of the doctrines of the reformed religion, Mr. Rogers, for a contempt of the same, was again again summoned before a council of bishops, who, after having debated upon the nature of his offence, ordered him to keep close prisoner in his own house, from which he never departed, though he had many fair opportunities to escape. He saw the recovery of the true religion, at that time, desperate; he knew he should not want a living in Germany, sufficient for the wants of a large family, consisting of a wife and ten children; but all these considerations could not move him: he determined resolutely, after he had been called to answer for Christ's cause, not to desert it; and resolved to hazard his life in the support of the truth.

In this state of confinement he remained a considerable time, till at the instigation of the cruel Bonner, bishop of London, he was removed from his own house to Newgate, and placed among the common felons. What passed between him and the adversaries of Christ, during the time of his imprisonment, is not certainly known; but the following examinations he left in his own hand-writing: and it is the will of God they should be handed down to us, and remain a perpetual testimony in the cause of true religion.

The FIRST EXAMINATION of the Rev. Mr. JOHN ROGERS, before the LORD CHANCELLOR, GARDINER, BISHOP of WINCHESTER, and OTHERS of the COUNCIL of BISHOPS, January 22d, 1555.

FIRST, the lord chancellor said unto me thus: Sir, you have heard the state of the realm in which it standeth now.

Rogers. No, my lord, I have been kept in close prison, and except there have been some general things said at the table, when I was at dinner or supper, I have heard nothing; and there have I heard nothing, whereupon any special thing might be grounded.

Then said the lord chancellor, General things, mockingly: you have heard of my lord cardinal's coming, and that the parliament hath received his blessing, not one resisting it, except one man which did speak against it. Such an unity, and such a miracle hath not been seen. And all they, of which there are eight score in one house, (said one that was by, whose name I know not) have with one assent received pardon of their offences, for the schism that we have had in England, in refusing the holy father of Rome to be head of the catholic church. How say you? are you content to unite yourself to the faith of the catholic church with us, in the state in which it is now in England? will you do that?

Rogers. The catholic church I never did nor will dissent from.

Lord Chancellor. Nay, but I speak of the state of the catholic church, in that wise in which we stand now in England, having received the pope to be supreme head.

Rogers. I know none other head but Christ of his catholic church, neither will I acknowledge the bishop of Rome to have any more authority than any other bishop hath by the word of God, and by the doctrines of the old and pure catholic church, four hundred years after Christ.

Lord Chancellor. Why didst thou then acknowledge king Henry the eighth to be supreme head of the church, if Christ be the only head?

Rogers. I never granted him to have any supremacy in spiritual things, as are the forgiveness of sins; giving of the Holy Ghost; authority to be a judge above the word of God.

Lord Chancellor. Yea, said he and Tonstall bishop of Durham, and N. bishop of Worcester, if thou hadst said so in his days, (and they nodded the head at me with a laughter) thou hadst not been alive now.

Rogers. Which thing I denied, and would have told how he was said and meant to be supreme head. But they looked and laughed one upon another, and made such a business, that I was constrained to let it pass. There lieth also no great weight thereupon; for all the world knoweth what the meaning was. The lord chancellor also said to the lord William Haward, that there was no inconvenience therein, to have Christ to be supreme head, and the bishop of Rome also; and when I was ready to have answered, that there could not be two heads of one church, and have more plainly declared the vanity of that his reason, the lord chancellor said, What sayest thou? make us a direct answer whether thou wilt be one of this catholic church or not, with us in that state in which we are now?

Rogers. My lord, without fail I cannot believe, that ye yourselves do think in your hearts that he is supreme head in forgiving of sins, &c. (as is before said) seeing you and all the bishops of the realm have now twenty years long preached, and some of you also written to the contrary, and the parliament hath so long ago condescended unto it. And there he interrupted me thus:

Lord Chancellor. Tush, that parliament was with most great cruelty constrained to abolish and put away the primacy from the bishop of Rome.

Rogers. With cruelty? why then I perceive that you take a wrong way with cruelty to persuade men's consciences. For it should appear by your doings now, that the cruelty then used hath not persuaded you consciences. How would you then have our consciences persuaded with cruelty?

Lord Chancellor. I talk to thee of no cruelty, but that they were so often and so cruelly called upon in that parliament, to let the act go forward; yea, and even with force driven thereunto, whereas in this parliament it was uniformly received.

Rogers. Here my lord Paget told me more plainly, what my lord chancellor meant. Unto whom I answered: My lord, what will you conclude thereby? that the first parliament was of less authority, because but few condescended unto it? And this last parliament of great authority, because more condescended unto it? It goeth not my lord, by more or lesser part, but by the wiser, truer, and godlier part: and I would have said more, but the lord chancellor interrupted me with his question, willing me once again to answer him. For, said he, we have more to speak with than thee, which must come in after thee. And so there were indeed ten persons more out of Newgate, besides two that were not called. Of which ten, one was a citizen of London, who granted unto them, and nine were contrary: who all came to prison again, and refused the cardinal's blessing, and the authority of his holy church, saying that one of these nine was not asked otherwise than thus, whether he would be an honest man as his father was before him: he answering yes, was discharged by the friendship of my lord William Haward, as I have understood. He bade me tell him what I would do; whether I would enter into the one church with the whole realm as it is now, or not? No, said I, I will first see it proved by the scriptures. Let me have pen, ink, and books, &c. and I shall take upon me plainly to set out the matter, so that the contrary shall be proved to be true, and let any man that will, confer with me by writing.

Lord Chancellor. Nay, that shall not be permitted thee; thou shalt never have so much proffered thee as thou hast now, if thou refuse it, and will not now condescend and agree to the catholic church. Here are two things, mercy and justice: if thou refuse the queen's mercy now, then shalt thou have justice ministered unto thee.

Rogers. I never offended, nor was disobedient unto her grace, and yet I will not refuse her mercy. But if this shall be denied me to confer by writing, and to try out the truth, then it is not well, but too far out of the way. Ye yourselves (all the bishops of the realm) brought me to the knowledge of the pretended primacy of the bishop of Rome, when I was a young man twenty years past; and will ye now without collation have me to say and do the contrary? I cannot be so persuaded.

Lord Chancellor. If thou wilt not receive the bishop of Rome to be supreme head of the catholic church, then thou shalt never have her mercy, thou mayest be sure. And as touching conferring and trial, I am forbidden by the scriptures to use any conferring and trial with thee. For St. Paul teacheth me, that I should thus and eschew an heretic after one or two monitions, knowing that such an one is overthrown, and is faulty, inasmuch as he is condemned by his own judgment.

Rogers.

Rogers. My lord, I deny that I am an heretic : prove you that first, and then alledge the aforesaid text. But still the lord chancellor played on one string, saying :

Lord Chancellor. If thou wilt enter into one church with us, &c. tell us that ; or else thou shalt never have so much proffered thee again as thou hast now.

Rogers. I will find it first in the scripture, and see it tried thereby, before I receive him to be supreme head.

Worcester. Why, do you not know what is in your creed : " I believe in the holy catholic church ? "

Rogers. I find not the bishop of Rome there. For [catholic] signifieth not the Romish church : it signifieth the consent of all true teaching churches of all times, and all ages. But how should the bishop of Rome's church be one of them, which teacheth so many doctrines that are plainly and directly against the word of God ? Can that bishop be the true head of the catholic church, that doth so ? That is not possible.

Lord Chancellor. Shew me one of them, one ; let me hear one.

Rogers. I remembered myself, that amongst so many I were best to shew one ; and said, I will shew you one.

Lord Chancellor. Let me hear that ; let me hear that.

Rogers. The bishop of Rome and his church, say, read, and sing, all that they do in their congregations, in Latin, which is directly and plainly against the 1st. to the Corinthians, the xiv. chapter.

Lord Chancellor. I deny that ; I deny that is against the word of God. Let me see you prove that : how prove you that ?

Rogers. Thus I began to say the text from the beginning of the chapter, " He that speaketh in an unknown tongue, " &c. To speak with tongues, is to speak with a strange tongue, as Latin or Greek &c. and so to speak, is not to speak unto men, but to God. But ye speak in Latin, which is a strange tongue, wherefore ye speak not unto men, but unto God (meaning God only at the most). This he granted, that they spake not unto men, but unto God.

Lord Chancellor. Well, then it is in vain unto men.

Rogers. No, not in vain. For one man speaketh in one tongue, and another in another tongue ; and all well.

Lord Chancellor. Nay, I will prove then, that he speaketh neither to God nor to man, but unto the wind.

Rogers. I was willing to have declared how and after what sort these two texts do agree (for they must agree, they are both the sayings of the Holy Ghost, spoken by the apostle Paul), as to wit, to speak not to men, but unto God, and to speak unto the wind ; and so to have gone forward with the proof of my matter begun : but here arose a noise and confusion. Then said the lord chancellor :

Lord Chancellor. To speak unto God, and not unto God, were impossible.

Rogers. I will prove them possible.

Lord Haward. No, said my lord Haward to my lord Chancellor : now will I bear you witness that he is out of the way : for he granted first, that they which speak in a strange speech, speak unto God : and now he saith the contrary, that they speak neither to God nor to man.

Rogers. I have not granted nor said (turning me to my lord Haward) as you report. I have alledged the one text, and now I come to the other. They must agree, and I can make them agree. But as for you, you understand not the matter.

Lord Haward. I understand so much, that that is not possible.

This is a point of sophistry, quoth secretary Bourne, Then the lord chancellor began to tell the lord Haward, that when he was in High-Dutchland, they at Hale, which had before prayed and used their service all in Dutch, began then to turn part into Latin, and part into Dutch.

Worcester. Yes, and at Wittenberg ; too.

Rogers. Yes, (but I could not be heard for the noise) in an university, where men for the most part understand the Latin, and yet not all in Latin. And I would have told the order, and have gone forward both to have answered my lord, and to have proved the thing that I had taken in hand ; but perceiving their talk and noise to be too clamorous, I was fain to think this in my heart, suffering them in the mean while to talk one of them one thing, and another another. Alas ! neither will these men hear me if I speak, neither yet will they suffer me to write. There is no remedy, but let them alone, and commit the matter to God. Yet I began to go forward, and said, that I would make the text to agree, and prove my purpose well enough.

Lord Chancellor. No, no ; thou canst prove nothing by the scripture. The scripture is dead ; it must have a lively expositor.

Rogers. No, the scripture is alive. But let me go forward with my purpose.

Worcester. All heretics have alledged the scriptures for them ; and therefore we must have a lively expositor for them.

Rogers. Yes, all heretics have alledged the scripture for them ; but they were confuted by the scriptures, and by none other expositor.

Worcester. But they would not confess that they were overcome by the scriptures ; I am sure of that.

Rogers. I believe that : and yet were they overcome by them, and in all councils they were disputed with, and overthrown by the scriptures. And here I would have declared how they ought to proceed in these days and so have come again to my purpose, but it was impossible : for one asked one thing, another said another ; so that I was fain to hold my peace, and let them talk. And even when I would have taken hold on my proof, the lord chancellor ordered me to prison again ; and away, away, said he, we have more to talk withal ; if I would not be reformed (so he termed it) away, away. Then up I stood, for I had kneeled all the while.

Then sir Richard Southwell, who stood by in a window, said to me, Thou wilt not burn in this cause when it cometh to the purpose ; I know well that.

Rogers. Sir, I cannot tell, but I trust in my Lord God, yes, lifting up mine eyes unto heaven.

Then my lord of Ely told me much of the queen's majesty's pleasure and meaning, and set out with large words, saying, That she took them that would not receive the pope's supremacy, to be unworthy to have her mercy, &c.

Rogers. I said I would not refuse her mercy ; and yet I never offended her in all my life : and that I besought her grace, and all their honours, to be good to me, reserving my conscience.

Divers spake at once. No ? quoth they then a great many of them, and especially secretary Bourne, a married priest, and have not offended the law ?

Rogers. I said, I had not broken the queen's law, nor yet any point of the law of the realm therein : for I married where it was lawful.

Divers at once. Where was that ? said they : thinking that to be unlawful in all places.

Rogers. In Dutchland. And if ye had not here in England made an open law that priests might have had wives, I would never have come home again : for I brought a wife and eight children with me : which thing ye might be sure that I would not have done if the laws of the realm had not permitted it before.

Then there was a great noise, some saying that I was come too soon with such a sort ; I should find a sour coming of it : and some one thing, and some another. And one said (I could not well perceive who) that there was never a catholic man or country, that ever yet granted that a priest might have a wife.

Rogers. I said, the catholic church never denied marriage to priests, nor yet to any other man : and therewith was I going out of the chamber, the serjeant which brought me thither, having me by the arm.

Then the bishop of Worcester turned his face towards me, and said, that I knew not where that church was or is.

Rogers. I said, yes, that I could tell where it was, but therewith the serjeant went with me out of the door.

This

This was the very true effect of all that was spoken unto me, and of all that I answered thereunto.

And here would I gladly make a more perfect answer to all the former objections, as also a due proof of that which I had taken in hand; but at this present I was informed; that I should to-morrow come to further answer. Wherefore I am compelled to leave out that which I would most gladly have done, desiring here the hearty and unfeigned help of the prayers of all Christ's true members, the offspring of the true unfeigned catholic church, that the Lord God of all consolation will now be my comfort, aid, strength, buckler, and shield: as also of all my brethren that are in the same case and distress, that I and they all may dispise all manner of threats and cruelty, and even the bitter burning fire, and the dreadful dart of death, and stick like true soldiers to our dear and loving captain Christ, our only Redeemer and Saviour, and also the only true head of the church, that doth all in us all, which is the very property of an head (and is a thing that all the bishops of Rome cannot do), and that we do not traiterously run out of his tents, or out of the plain field from him, in the most jeopardy of the battle, but that we may persevere in the fight (if he will not otherwise deliver us) till we be most cruelly slain of his enemies. For this I most heartily, and at this present with weeping tears, most instantly and earnestly desire and beseech you all to pray: and also if I die, to be good to my poor and most honest wife, being a poor stranger, and all my little souls, her's and my children. Whom, with all the whole faithful and true catholic congregation of Christ, the Lord of life and death, save, keep, and defend in all the troubles and assaults of this vain world, and bring at the last to everlasting salvation, the true and sure inheritance of all sincere christians. Amen. Amen.

January 27, at night.

BEING asked again by the lord chancellor, whether I would come into one church, with the bishops and whole realm, as now was concluded by parliament (in which all the realm was converted to the catholic church); I answered, that I had and would be able, by God's grace, to prove that all the doctrines, which I had ever taught, were true and catholic, both from the scriptures and the authority of the fathers, who lived in the fourth century. He answered, that should not might not, and ought not to be granted me: for I was but a private man, and might not be heard against the determination of the whole realm. When a parliament said he, hath concluded a thing, should any single, or private person, have authority to discuss, whether they hath done right or wrong? No, that may not be.

I replied shortly, that all the laws of men might not, neither could rule the word of God, but that they all must be discussed and judged thereby; and neither my conscience, nor any christian man's, could be satisfied with such laws as disagreed from that word: and so was willing to have said much more. But the lord chancellor began a long tale to very small purpose, concerning mine answer; that there was nothing in me wherefore I should be heard, but arrogancy, pride, and vain-glory. I also granted mine ignorance to be greater than I could express, or than he took it: but yet that I feared not, by God's assistance and strength, to be able by writing to perform my word; neither was I (I thanked God) so utterly ignorant as he would make me; but all was of God, to whom be thanks rendered. Proud man was I never, nor yet vain-glorious. All the world knew well, where and on which side pride, arrogancy, and vain-glory, were. It was a poor pride, that was or is in us, God knoweth.

Then he said, that I, at the first dash, condemned the queen and the whole realm to be of the church of Antichrist. I answered, That the queen's majesty (God save her grace) would have done well enough, if it had not been for his counsel. He said, the queen went before him, and it was her own motion. I said, I neither could, nor would I ever believe it.

Then said Dr. Aldrife, bishop of Carlisle, that they the bishops would bear him witness. Yes, said I, that I believe well: and with that the people laughed; for that day there were many: but on the morrow they kept the doors shut, and would let none in, but the bishops' adherents and servants. Then Mr. Comptroller, and secretary Bourne, would have stood up also to bear witness, and did.

I said it was no great matter; and to say the truth, I thought that they were good helpers thereunto themselves: but I ceased to say any more, knowing that they were too strong and mighty of power, and that they should be believed before me, yes, and before our Saviour Christ and all his prophets and apostles too, in these days.

After many words, he asked me what I thought concerning the blessed sacrament and stood up, and put off his cap, and all his fellow bishops (of which there were a great sort, new men, of whom I knew few), whether I believed in the sacrament to be the very body and blood of our Saviour Christ, that was born of the Virgin Mary, and hanged on the cross, really and substantially.

I answered, I had often told him that it was a matter in which I was no meddler, and therefore suspected of my brethren to be of a contrary opinion. Notwithstanding, even as the most part of your doctrine in other points is false, and the defence thereof only by force and cruelty; so in this matter I think it to be as false as the rest. For I cannot understand [really and substantially] to signify otherwise than corporally: but corporally Christ is only in heaven, and so cannot Christ be corporally also in your sacrament. And here I somewhat set out his charity after this sort: My lord, said I, you have dealt with me most cruelly: for you have put me in prison without law, and kept me there now almost a year and a half: for I was almost half a year in my house, where I was obedient to you, God knoweth and spake with no man. And now have I been a full year in Newgate, at great costs and charges, having a wife and ten children to provide for, and have not received a penny from my livings, which was against the law.

He replied, that Dr. Ridley, who had given them me, was an usurper, and therefore, I was the unjust possessor of them.

Was the king then an usurper, said I, who gave Dr. Ridley the bishopric?

Yes, said he, and began to set out the wrongs that the king had done to the bishop of London, and to himself also. But yet I do misuse my terms, said he, to call the king usurper. But the word was gone out the abundance of the heart before; and I think that of he was not very sorry for it in heart. I might have said more concerning that matter, but I did not.

I asked him wherefore he put me in prison. He said, because I preached against the queen.

I answered that it was not true; and I would be bound to prove it, and to stand to the trial of the law, that no man should be able to disprove it, and thereupon would set my life. I preached, I confessed, a sermon at the Cross, after the queen came to the Tower; but therein was nothing said against the queen, I take witness of all the audience, which was not small. I acknowledged also, that he had, after an examination, let me go at liberty after the preaching of that sermon.

But you did read lectures after, said he, against the commandment of the council?

That I did not, said I: let that be proved, and let me die for it. Thus have you now against the law of God and man handled me, and never sent for me, never conferred with me, never spoke of any learning, till now that you have gotten a whip to whip me with, and a sword to cut off my head, if I will not condescend to your mind. This charity doth all the world understand.

I might and would have added, if I could have been suffered to speak, that it had been time enough to take away men's livings, and then to have imprisoned them after after that they had offended laws: for they are good citizens that break not laws; and worthy of praise, and not of punishment. But their purpose is to keep men in prison, until they may catch them in their laws; and so kill them. I could and would have added the example of Daniel, who by a crafty devised law was cast into the lion's den. I might also have declared, that I most humbly desired to be set at liberty, sending my wife to him with a supplication, being great with child, and with her eight honest women, or thereabouts, to Richmond, at Christmas was a twelve-month, while I was yet in my house.

I wrote likewise two supplications to him out of Newgate, and sent my wife many times to him. Mr. Gofnold also, that worthy man, who is now departed in the Lord, laboured for me, and so did divers other worthy men also take pains in the matter. These things declare my lord chancellor's antichristian charity, which is, that he hath and doth seek my blood, and the destruction of my poor wife and my ten children:

This is a short sum of the words which were spoken on the 28th of January, in the afternoon, after that Mr. Hooper had been the first, and Mr. Cardmaker the second in examination before me. The Lord grant us grace to stand together, fighting lawfully in his cause, till we be smitten down together, if the Lord's will be so. For there shall not a hair of our heads perish against his will. Whereunto the same Lord grant us to be obedient unto the end, and in the end, Amen: sweet, mighty, and merciful Lord Jesus, the Son of David and of God: Amen; Amen, let every true christian say and pray.

Then the clock being, as I guessed, about four, the lord chancellor said, that he and the church must yet use charity with me, (what manner of charity it is, all true christians do well understand, the same that the fox doth with the chickens, and the wolf with the lambs) and gave me respite till to-morrow, to see whether I would recollect, and whether I would return to the catholic church again; (for so he called his antichristian false church) and repent, and they would receive me to mercy.

I said that I was never out of the true catholic church, nor would be: but into his church would I, by God's grace, never come.

Well, said he; then is our church false and antichristian?

Yes, said I.

And what is the doctrine of the sacrament?

False; and I cast my hands abroad.

Then one said that I was a player. To whom I answered not; for I took no notice of his mock.

Come again, said the lord chancellor, to-morrow, between nine and ten.

I am ready to come again, whensoever you call.

And thus was I brought up by the sheriffs to the compters in Southwark, Mr. Hooper going before me, and a great multitude of people being present, so that we had much ado to go in the streets. Thus much was done January 28.

The THIRD EXAMINATION, and CONDEMNATION, of the Rev. Mr. JOHN ROGERS, on the 29th of JANUARY, 1555.

THE next day, January 29, we were sent for in the morning about nine o'clock, and by the sheriffs fetched from the compters in Southwark, to St. Mary Overy's; and when Mr. Hooper was condemned, as I understood afterwards, then sent they for me. My lord chancellor said:

Rogers, here thou wast yesterday, and we gave thee liberty to remember thyself last night, whether thou wouldst come to the holy catholic church of Christ again or not. Tell us now what thou hast determined, whether thou wilt be repentant and sorry, and wilt return again and take mercy.

My lord, said I, I remember well what you yesterday said to me, and desire you to give me leave to declare my mind, what I have to say thereunto; and that done, I shall answer to your demanded question.

When I yesterday desired that I might be suffered by the scripture and authority of the first, best, and purest church, to defend my doctrine by writing; meaning not only of the primacy, but also of all the doctrine that ever I had preached) you answered; that it might not, and ought not to be granted me; for I was a private person; and that the parliament was above the authority of all private persons, and therefore the sentence thereof might not be found faulty and useless by me, being but a private person. Yet; my lord, I am able to shew examples; that one man hath come into a general council; and after the whole had determined and agreed upon an act or article, some one man coming in afterwards, hath by the word of God proved so clearly that the council had erred in decreeing the said article, that he caused the whole council to change and alter their act or article before determined. And of these examples, I am able to shew two. I can also shew the authority of St. Augustine; that when he disputed with an heretic, he would neither himself, nor yet have the heretic to lean unto the determination of two former councils, of which the one made for him, and the other for the heretic that disputed against him: but said, that he would have the scriptures to be their judge; which were common and indifferent for them both, and not proper to either of them.

I could also shew the authority of a learned lawyer, Panormitanus, who saith, That unto a simple lay-man that bringeth the word of God with him, there ought more credit to be given, than to a whole council gathered together. By these things will I prove that I ought not to be denied to speak my mind, and to be heard against a whole parliament, bringing the word of God for me, and the authority of the old church 400 years after Christ, albeit that every man in the parliament had willingly and without respect of fear and favour agreed thereunto, which thing I doubt not a little of; especially seeing the like had been permitted in the old church, even in general councils, yea, and that in one of the chiefest councils that ever was, unto which neither any acts of this parliament, nor yet any of the late general councils of the bishops of Rome ought to be compared. For if Henry VIII. were alive, and should call a parliament, and begin to determine a thing, (and here I would have alledged the example of the act of making the queen a bastard, and of making himself the superior head; but I could not, being interrupted by one, whom God forgive) then would you (pointing to my lord chancellor) and ye, and all (pointing to the rest of the bishops) say Amen: yea; and it please your grace, it is meet that it be so enacted.

Here my lord chancellor would suffer me to speak no more; but bade me sit down, mockingly, saying; That I was sent for to be instructed of them, and I would take upon me to be their instructor.

My lord, said I, I stand, and sit not: shall I not be suffered to speak for my life?

Shall we suffer thee to tell a tale, and prate? said he. And with that he stood up, and began to face me, after his old arrogant proud fashion, for he perceived that I was in a way to have touched them somewhat, which he thought to hinder by dashing me out of my tale, and so he did: for I could never be suffered to come to my tale again, no not to one word of it; but he had much like communication with me as he had the day before; and, as his manner is, taunt upon taunt, and check upon check. For in that case, being God's cause; I told him he should not make me afraid to speak.

Lord Chancellor. See what a spirit this fellow hath, saith he, finding fault at mine accustomed earnestness, and hearty manner of speaking.

Rogers. I have a true spirit, agreeing to, and obeying the word of God, and would further have said, that I was never the worse, but the better, to be earnest in a just and true cause, and in my master Christ's matters: but I could not be heard. And at length he proceeded towards his excommunication and condemnation, after that I had told him, that his church of Rome was the church of Antichrist, meaning the false doctrine and tyrannical laws, with the maintenance thereof by cruel persecutions used by the bishops of the said church (of which the bishop of Winchester, and the rest of his fellow bishops that are now in England, are the chief members): of laws I mean, said I, and not all men and women which are in the pope's church. Likewise, when I was said to have denied their sacrament (whereof he made his wonted reverent mention, more to maintain his kingdom thereby, than for the true reverence of Christ's institution; more for his own and his popish generation's sake, than for religion or God's sake; I told him after what order I did speak of it, (for the manner of his speaking was not agreeing to my words, which are before recited in the communication that we had Jan. 28,) wherewith he was not contented, but asked the audience, whether I had not simply denied the sacrament. They would have said, and did what he desired, for most of them were his of his own servants on this day. At last I said, I will never deny what I said, that your doctrine of the sacrament is false; but yet I tell you after what order I said it.

To be short, he read my condemnation before me, particularly mentioning therein but two articles; first, that I affirmed the Romish catholic church to be the church of Antichrist; and that I denied the reality of their sacrament. He caused me to be degraded and condemned, and put into the hands of the laity, and so he gave me over into the sheriff's hands, which were much better than his.

The following is a copy of the sentence of condemnation, passed upon the Rev. Mr. John Rogers, by Stephen Gardiner, bishop of Winchester, at St. Mary Overy's church, in Southwark, January 29th, 1555; which we have here inserted, to the intent, that the same may be referred to, as being the common form of all condemnatory sentences used by popish bishops against the Martyrs, throughout the whole of this history.

The SENTENCE CONDEMNATORY, passed upon the Rev. Mr. JOHN ROGERS, in a COUNCIL of BISHOPS, whereof WINCHESTER was PRESIDENT, January 29th, 1555.

IN the name of God, Amen: We Stephen, by the permission of God, bishop of Winchester, lawfully and rightly proceeding with all goodly favour by authority and virtue of our office, against thee John Rogers, priest, otherwise called Matthew, before us personally here present, being accused and detected, and notoriously slandered of heresy, having heard, seen, and understood, and with all diligent deliberation weighed, discussed, and considered the merits of the cause, all things being observed, sitting in our judgment seat, the name of Christ being first called upon, and having only God before our eyes, because by the acts enacted, propounded and exhibited in this matter, and by thy own confession judicially made before us, we do find that thou hast taught, holden and affirmed, and obstinately defended divers errors, heresies, and damnable opinions, contrary to the doctrine and determination of the holy church, as namely these; "That the catholic church of Rome is the church of Antichrist. Item, That in the sacrament of the altar there is not substantially or really the natural body and blood of Christ." The which aforesaid heresies and damnable opinions, being contrary to the law of God, and determination of the universal and apostolical church, thou hast arrogantly, stubbornly, and wittingly maintained, held and affirmed, and also defended before us, as well in this judgment, as also otherwise, and with the like obstinacy, stubbornness, malice, and blindness of heart, both wittingly and willingly hast affirmed, that thou wilt believe, maintain and hold, affirm and declare the same: we therefore, S. Winchester, bishop, ordinary, and diocesan aforesaid, by the consent and assent as well of our reverend brethren the lords bishops here present and assistant, as also by the counsel and judgment of divers worshipful lawyers and professors of divinity, with whom we have communicated in this behalf, do declare and pronounce thee the said John Rogers, otherwise called Matthew, through thy demerits, transgressions, obstinacies and wilfulness, (which through manifold ways thou hast incurred by thine own wicked and stubborn obstinacy (to have been and to be guilty of the detestable, horrible, and wicked offences of heretical pravity and execrable doctrine, and that thou hast before us sundry times spoken, maintained, and wittingly and stubbornly defended the said cursed and execrable doctrine in the sundry confessions, assertions, and recognitions here judicially before us oftentimes repeated, and yet still dost maintain, affirm and believe the same, and that thou hast been, and art lawfully and ordinarily convicted in this behalf: we therefore, I say, albeit following the example of Christ, "which would not the death of a sinner, but rather that he should convert and live;" we have gone about oftentimes to correct thee, and by all lawful means that we could, and all wholesome admonitions that we did know, to reduce thee again unto the true faith and unity of the universal catholic church, notwithstanding have found thee obstinate and stiff-necked, willingly continuing in thy damnable opinions and heresies, refusing to return again unto the true faith and unity of the holy mother church; and as the child of wickedness and darkness, so to have hardened thy heart, that thou wilt not understand the voice of thy shepherd, which with a fatherly affection doth seek after thee, nor wilt be allured with his fatherly and godly admonitions: we therefore, Stephen, the bishop aforesaid, not willing that thou which art wicked shouldst now become more wicked, and infect the Lord's flock with thine heresy, (which we are greatly afraid of) with sorrow of mind, and bitterness of heart, do judge thee, and definitively condemn thee the said John Rogers, otherwise called Matthew, thy demerits and faults being aggravated through thy damnable obstinacy, as guilty of most detestable heresies, and as an obstinate impenitent sinner, refusing penitently to return to the lap and unity of the holy mother church, and that thou hast been and art by law excommunicated, and do pronounce and declare thee to be an excommunicate person. Also we pronounce and declare thee, being an heretic, to be cast out from the church, and left unto the judgment of the secular power, and now presently so do leave thee as an obstinate heretic, and a person wrapped in the sentence of the great curse, to be degraded worthily for thy demerits (requiring them notwithstanding, in the bowels of our Lord Jesus Christ, that this execution and punishment worthily to be done upon thee, may so be moderated, that the rigour thereof be not too extreme, nor yet the gentleness too much mitigated, but that it may be to the salvation of thy soul, to the extirpation, terror, and conversion of the heretics to the unity of the catholic faith) by this our sentence definitive which we here lay upon and against thee, and do with sorrow of heart promulgate in this form aforesaid.

After this sentence was read, bishop Gardiner sent Mr. Hooper and me to the Clink, there to remain till night: and when it was dark, they carried us, Mr. Hooper going before with one sheriff, and coming after with the other, with bills and weapons enough, out of the Clink, and led us through the bishop's house, and St. Mary Overy's church-yard, and so into Southwark, and over the bridge in procession to Newgate, through the city. But I must observe, that when the bishop had read the condemnation, he declared that I was in the great curse, and what a dangerous matter it was to eat and drink with us that were accursed, or to give us any thing; for all that did so, should be partakers of the same great curse.

Well, my lord, said I, here I stand before God and you, and all this honourable audience, and take him to witness, that I never knowingly, or willingly, taught any false doctrine; and therefore have I a good conscience before God and all good men: I am sure that you and I shall come before a judge that is righteous, before whom I shall be as good a man as you; and I nothing doubt but that I shall be found there a true member of the true catholic church of Christ, and everlastingly saved. And as for your false church, you need not to excommunicate me from it, I have not been in it these twenty years, the Lord be thanked; but now you have done what you can, my lord, I pray you yet grant me one thing.

What is that? said he.

That my poor wife, being a stranger, may come and speak with me so long as I live; for she hath ten children, and somewhat I would counsel her, what were the best for her to do.

No, said he, she is not thy wife.

Yes, my lord, and hath been these eighteen years.

Should I grant her to be thy wife? said he.

Chuse you, whether you will or not; she shall be so nevertheless.

She shall not come at thee.

Then I have tried out all your charity, said I. You make yourself highly displeased with the matrimony of priests, but you maintain open whoredom: as in Wales, where every priest hath his whore openly dwelling with, and lying by him; even as your holy father suffereth all the priests in Dutchland, and in France, to do the like. Thereto he answered not, but looked as it were asquint at it; and thus I departed and saw him no more.

The WRITINGS of the Rev. Mr. ROGERS, while in Prison, containing the Substance of what he intended, might he have been permitted to plead in his Defence, when examined by the BENCH of POPISH BISHOPS.

DEARLY beloved, ye have heard what was said: now hear what I purposed the night before to have said, if I could have been permitted. Two things I purposed to have touched upon. The one, how it was lawful for a private man to reason and write against a wicked act of parliament, or ungodly council, which the lord chancellor the day before denied me; the other was to prove, that prosperity was not always a token of God's love.

And this I purposed to speak of, because the lord chancellor boasted of himself, that he was delivered forth of prison, as it were by miracle, and preserved of God to restore true religion, and to punish me and such others, whom he termed heretics. Concerning these two points, in this manner I purposed to have proceeded. It is not unknown to you, that king Henry VIII. in his time made his daughter, the queen that now is, a bastard: he abolished the authority of the bishop of Rome: he pulled down abbeyes: and all this he did by the consent of parliament.

King Edward VI. in his time made lawful the marriage of priests, turned the service into English, abolished the idolatrous mass, with all like superstitious trumpery, set up the holy communion, and all by consent of parliament.

The queen that now is, hath repealed the act that made her a bastard; hath brought in the bishop of Rome, and set him in his old authority; beginneth to set up abbeyes again; hath made the marriage of priests unlawful; hath turned the English service into Latin again; hath set up mass again, and pulled down the holy communion: and all this is done by consent of parliament.

If the acts of parliament, made in king Henry's time, and in king Edward's, had their foundation upon God's word, whereupon all positive law ought to be grounded; then these which are established in the queen's time, being clean contrary to the others, as they are not warranted by God's word, so are they wicked, and therefore to be both spoken and written against of all men, as well of private as of public persons.

If your acts, my lord chancellor, which you have lately coined, (I call them your's, because you only bear the sway, devise, and decree what you list, and all other men are forced to follow) be good, and according to God's word, then the former acts were naught, which thing you seem to say, in utterly taking of them away, and setting up of the contrary: if the former were naught, why then did you consent unto them, and set firm them to be good by your voluntary and advised writing? as it appeareth, and will do to the world's end, in your book "Of true obedience," where you prove the queen a bastard, and the bishop of Rome to be an usurper, and to have no authority in the realm of England.

You must needs confess, that the most part of your acts of parliament in these latter days have been according to the fantasies of a few. King Henry in his time established by parliament in a manner what he pleased, and many things that might well have been amended.

In king Edward's days, the dukes of Somerset and Northumberland bare a great sway in things, and did not all things sincerely. Even so, since the queen, that now is, came to the government of the realm, all things are ordered by your device and head, and the whole parliament-house is led as you please; by reason whereof they are compelled to condescend to things both contrary to God's manifest word, and also to their own consciences; so great is your cruelty.

For to bring your wicked purposes to pass, and to establish your antichristian kingdom, (which, I trust, the Lord with the breath of his mouth will speedily blow over) you have called three parliaments in one year and a half, that what you could not compass by subtil persuasion, you might bring to pass by tyrannical threatening: for if you had not used cruel force in your doings, you had never brought to pass such things as this day you have, to the utter defacing and abolishing of God's true religion, and to the casting away and destruction of your natural country, so much as in you lieth.

And as it is most true, that acts of parliament have in these latter days been ruled by the fantasies of a few; and the whole parliament-house, contrary to their minds, was compelled to such things as a few have conceived; so it must needs be granted, that the papists at all times were most ready to apply themselves to the present world, and like men-pleasers to follow the fantasies of such as were in authority, and turn with the state, which way soever it turned. Yes, if the state should change ten times in one year, they would ever be ready at hand to change with it, and so follow the cry, and rather utterly forsake God, and be of no religion, than that they should forego lust or living, for God or for religion.

King Henry by parliament, according to God's word, put down the pope: the clergy consented, and all men openly by oath refused his usurped supremacy, knowing, by God's word, Christ to be the head of the church, and every king in his realm to have, under and next unto Christ, the chief sovereignty.

King Edward also by parliament, according to God's word, set the marriage of priests at liberty, abolished the popish and idolatrous mass, changed the Latin service, and set up the holy communion; the whole clergy consented hereunto; many of them set it forth by their preaching; and they all by practising confirmed the same.

Notwithstanding, now when the state is altered, and the laws changed, the papistical clergy, with other like worldlings, as men neither fearing God, neither flying worldly shame, neither yet regarding their consciences, oath or honesty, like wavering weather-cock sturn round, about, and putting on harlot's foreheads, sing a new song, and cry with an impudent mouth, Come again, come again to the catholic church, meaning the antichristian church of Rome, which is the synagogue of Satan, and the very sink of all superstition, heresy, and idolatry.

Of what force, I pray you, may a man think these parliaments to be, which scarcely stand a year in strength? Or what credit is to be given to these law-makers, who are not ashamed to establish contrary laws, and to condemn that for evil, which before (the thing itself and the circumstances remaining all one) they affirmed and decreed to be good. Truly you are so ready, contrary to all right, to change and turn for the pleasure of man, that at length, I fear, God will use you like changelings, and both turn you out of his kingdom, and out of your own country.

Ye charge the gospel-preachers with the undoing of this realm: nay, it is the turning papists, which have not only set to sale their country like traitors, but also troubled the simple people, so that they cannot tell what they may believe. For that which they affirmed, and preached to be true doctrine in king Edward's days, now they cry against it, as it were most abominable heresy. This fault, I trust, you shall never find at our hands.

Therefore to conclude that which I purposed, forasmuch much as the acts of parliament of these latter times are one contrary to another, and those which you now have established in your time are contrary to God's most manifest word, as is the usurped supremacy of the bishop of Rome, the idolatrous mass, the Latin service, the prohibiting of lawful marriage, (which St. Paul calleth the doctrine of devils) with many other things: I say, it is not only lawful for any private man, which bringeth God's word for him, and the authority of the primitive and best church, to speak and write against such unlawful laws; but it is his duty, and he is bound in very conscience to do it. Which thing I have proved by divers examples before, and now will add but one other, which is written in the fifth of the Acts, where it appeareth that the high priests, the elders, scribes, and pharisees, decreed in their council, and gave the same commandments to the apostles, that they should not preach in the name of Christ, as you have also forbidden us; notwithstanding when they were charged therewithal, they answered, We ought rather to obey God than man: even so we do answer you; God is more to be obeyed than man; and your wicked laws cannot so tongue-tie us, but we will speak the truth.

The apostles were beaten for their boldness, and they rejoiced that they suffered for Christ's cause. You have also provided rods for us, and bloody whips: yet when you have done that which God's hand and counsel hath determined that you shall do, be it life or death, I trust that God will so assist us by his holy spirit and grace, that we shall patiently suffer it, and praise God for it: and whatsoever become of me and others, which now suffer for speaking and professing of the truth, yet be you sure, that God's word will prevail and have the upper hand, when your bloody laws and wicked decrees, for want of sure foundation, shall fall in the dust: and that which I have spoken of your acts of parliament, the same may be said of the general councils of these latter days, which have been within these five hundred years, where the Antichrist of Rome, by reason of his usurped authority, ruled, and decreed such things as made for his gain, not regarding God's glory: and therefore are they to be spoken, written, and cried out against of all such as fear God and love his truth.

And thus much I purposed to have said concerning the first point.

Now touching the second point. That whereas my lord chancellor had the day before said his pleasure of them that ruled the realm while he was in prison, and also rejoiced as though God had made this alteration, even for his sake, and his catholic church, as he called it, and to declare as it were by miracle, that we were before in a schism and heresy, and the realm was now brought unto an unity, and to a truth; to which I was fully purposed to have spoken. Secondly, my lord, whereas you, yesterday, so much dispraised the government of them that ruled in innocent king Edward's days, may it please your lordship to understand, that we poor preachers, whom you so evil treat, did most boldly and plainly rebuke their evil government in many things, especially their covetousness, and neglect, and small regard to live after the gospel, as also their negligence to occasion others to live thereafter, with more things than I can now rehearse. This all London can testify with us. I would also have told him, what I myself for my part did once at Paul's-Cross, concerning the mis-use of abbeyes, and other church goods: and I am right well assured, that never a papist of them all did ever so much therein as I did, I thank the Lord therefore: I was also, as is well known, fain to answer before all the council, and many of my brethren did the like, so that we, for the not rebuking of their faults, shall not answer before God, nor be blame-worthy before men. Therefore let the gentlemen and courtiers themselves, and all the citizens of London, testify what we did.

But, my lord, you could not abide them, for that which they did unto you, and for that they were of a contrary religion unto you. Wherefore in that you seem so inveterate against them, it is neither any just or public cause, but it is your own private hate that maketh you to report so evil of their governance, and you may now say what you please of them, when they are partly dead and gone, and partly, by you, put out of office.

But what shall be said of you when your fall shall follow, you shall then hear. And I must say my conscience to you: I fear, you have, and will, with your governance; bring England out of God's blessing into a warm sun. I pray God you do not.

I am an Englishman born; and, God knoweth, do naturally wish well to my country. And, my lord, I have often proved that the things, which I have much feared should come to pass; have indeed followed. I pray God I may fail of my guessing in this behalf: but truly, that will not be with expelling the true word of God out of the realm, and with the shedding of innocent blood.

And as touching your rejoicing, as though God had set you aloft to punish us by miracle; (for so you report and brag openly of yourself) and to minister justice, if we will not receive your holy father's mercy, and thereby do declare your church to be true, and our's false; to that I answer thus: God's works are wonderful, and are not to be comprehended and perceived by man's wisdom, nor by the wit of the most wise and prudent.

But here they will cry out, Lo these men will be still John Baptist, the apostles, and prophets, &c.

I answer, We make not ourselves like unto them, in the singular virtues and gifts of God given unto them; as of doing miracles, and of many other things. The similitude and likeness of them and us consisteth not in all things, but only in this, that is, that we be like them in doctrine, and in the suffering of persecution and infamy for the same.

We have preached their very doctrine, and no other thing: that we are able sufficiently to declare by their writings; and by writing for my part, I have proffered to prove the same, as is often said. And for this cause we suffer the like reproach, shame, and rebuke of the world, and the like persecution, losing of our lives and goods, forsaking (as our master Christ commandeth) father, mother, sister, brethren, wives, children, and all that there is, being assured of a joyful resurrection, and to be crowned in glory with them, according to the infallible promises made unto us in Christ, our only and sufficient mediator, reconciler, priest, and sacrifice, which hath pleased the Father, and quieted and pacified his wrath against our sins, and made us without spot or wrinkle in his sight by imputation, although we, of and in ourselves, are blotted with many filthy sins, which if the great mercy granted in Christ did not put away, by not imputing them unto us of his unspeakable mercy and love to save us, they would have brought us to everlasting damnation: and herein, and in no other, do we affirm ourselves to be like unto our head Christ, and all his apostles, prophets, martyrs, and saints. And herein ought all christian men to be like them, and herein are all true christian men and women like them, every one according to the measure of the faith that God hath dealt unto them, and to the diversity of the gifts of the spirit given unto them. But let us now consider, that if it be God's good will and pleasure to give his own beloved heart, that is, his beloved church, and the members thereof, into the hands of their enemies, to chasten, try, and prove them, and to bring them to the true unfeigned acknowledging of their own natural stubbornness, disobedience towards God and his commandments, as touching the love of God and of their brethren or neighbours, and their natural inclination, readiness, and desire to love creatures, to seek their own lusts, pleasures, and things forbidden of God, to obtain a true and earnest repentance, and sorrowfulness thereof, and to make them to sigh and cry for the forgiveness of the same, and for the aid of the spirit, daily to mortify and kill the said evil desires and lusts: yea, and often falling into gross outward sins, as did David, Peter, Magdalen, and others, to rise again also, with a mighty crying for mercy, with many other causes. Let us also consider, what he hereafter doth with the same enemies, into whose hands he hath given his tender beloved dearlings to be chastened and tried: whereas he but chasteneth and croseth them for a small while, according to his good pleasure, ture, as all fathers do with their children, Heb. xii. Prov. iii. he utterly destroyeth, yea, and everlastingly damneth the unrepentant enemies. Let Herod tell me what he got by killing James, and prosecuting Peter and his church. Verily God thought him not worthy to have death ministered unto him by men or angels, or any worthy creatures; but those small, and yet most vile vermin, lice and worms, must consume and kill his beastly, vile, and tyrannous body. Pharaoh and Nebuchadnezzar, for all their pride and most mighty power, must at length let God's dearlings go freely away out of their land, yea, out of their bands and tyranny. For when it could not be obtained at their hands, that God's congregation might have true mercy ministered unto them, but the counterfeit mercy of these our days, that is to say, extreme cruelty, and even the very, and that most horrible and cruel death, God arose and awoke out of his sleep, and destroyed those enemies of his flock with a mighty hand and stretched-out arm. Pharaoh did with most great and intolerable labours and burdens oppress and bring under the poor Israelites, and yet did the courtiers undoubtedly noise abroad, that the king was merciful unto them, to suffer them to live in the land, and to set them to work, that they might get them their livings. If he could thrust them out of his land, whither should they go, like a sort of vagabonds and runagates? This title and name of mercy would that tyrant have, and so did his flattering false courtiers spread his vain praise abroad. Have not we the like example now-a-days? O that I had now time to write certain things pertaining to our Winchester's mercy! How merciful he hath been to me and my good brethren, I will not speak of, neither yet unto the duke of Suffolk's most innocent daughter, and to her as innocent husband. For although their fathers were faulty, yet had their youth and lack of experience deserved a pardon by all true merciful men's judgements. O that I had time to paint out this matter aright! but there are many alive that can do it much better when I am dead. Pharaoh had his plagues; and his most flourishing land was, in consequence of his counterfeit mercy, which was indeed right cruelty and tyranny, utterly destroyed. And think you that bloody butcherly bishop of Winchester, and his most bloody brethren shall escape? Or that England shall for their offences, and especially for the maintenance of their idolatry, and willful following of them, not abide as great brunts? yes undoubtedly.

After Mr. Rogers had been long and straitly imprisoned, and lodged in Newgate among thieves, often examined, and very uncharitably treated, and at length unjustly and most cruelly condemned by Stephen Gardiner, bishop of Winchester: on the fourth of February, being Monday in the morning, he was suddenly warned by the keeper of Newgate's wife, to prepare himself for the fire; who being then sound asleep, could scarce be awaked. At length being raised and awaked, and bid to make haste, Then, said he, if it be so, I need not tie my points; and so was laid down, first to bishop Bonner to be degraded; which being done, he craved of Bonner but one petition; and Bonner asking what that should be? Mr. Rogers replied, that he might speak a few words with his wife before his burning. But that could not be obtained of him. Then, said he, you declare what your charity is: and so he was brought into Smithfield by Mr. Chester and Mr. Woodroffe, then sheriffs of London, there to be burnt; where he shewed most constant patience, not using many words, for he could not be permitted, but only exhorting the people constantly to remain in that faith and true doctrine which he before had taught, and they had learned, and for the confirmation whereof he was not only content patiently to suffer and bear all such bitterness and cruelty as had been shewed him, but also most gladly to resign up his life, and to give his flesh to the consuming fire, for the testimony of the same.

In few words, to comprehend the whole order of his life, doings and martyrdom: First, this good man, Mr. Rogers, was committed to prison, and there continued a year and half. In prison he was cheerful and earnest in all he went about. He wrote much; his examinations

he penned with his own hand, which else had never come to light. Wherein is to be noted, by the way, a memorable working of God's providence. You heard how Mr. Rogers craved of bishop Bonner, going to his burning, that he might speak a few words with his wife, which could not be granted. What these words were it is for no man certainly to determine. It may be supposed; that his purpose was, amongst other things, to signify unto her of the book of his examinations and answers, which he had written and privily hid in a secret corner of the prison where he lay. But where man's power lacketh, see how God's providence worketh. For notwithstanding that during the time of his imprisonment, there was strict search made to take away his letters and writings; yet after his death, his wife and one of her sons, called Daniel, coming into the place where he lay, to seek for his books and writings, and now ready to go away, it chanced her son, casting his eye aside, to spy a black thing, (for it had a black cover, probably because it should not be known) lying in a dark corner under a pair of stairs. Who desiring his mother to see what it was, found it to be the book written with his own hand, containing his examinations and answers, with other matters above specified. In the latter end whereof, this was also contained; which because it concerneth a propheticall fore-warning of things pertaining to the church, I thought (says Mr. Fox) to place the same in his own words, as they are there written, which are these: "If God look not merciful upon England, the seeds of utter destruction are sown in it already by these hypocritical tyrants, and antichristian prelates, popish papists, and double traitors to their natural country. And yet they speak of mercy, of blessing, of the catholic church, of unity, of power, and strengthening of the realm. This double dissimulation will shew itself one day when the plague cometh, which undoubtedly will light upon these crown-shorn captains, and that shortly, whatsoever the godly and the poor realm suffer in the mean while by God's sufferance and will.

"Spite of Nebuchadnezzar's beard, and maugre his heart, the captive, thrall, and miserable Jews must come home again, and have their city and temple built up by Zerubbabel, Esdras, and Nehemiah, &c. and the whole kingdom of Babylon must go to ruin and be taken of strangers, the Persians and Medes: So shall the dispersed English flock of Christ be brought again into their former state, or to a better, I trust in the Lord God, that it was in innocent king Edward's days; and our bloody Babylonical bishops, and the whole crown-shorn company brought to utter shame, rebuke, ruin, decay, and destruction. For God cannot, and undoubtedly will not, suffer for ever their abominable lying, false doctrine, their hypocrisy, blood-thirst, whoredom, idleness, their pestilent life, pampered in all kind of pleasure, their vain boasting pride, their malicious, envious and poisoned stomachs, which they bear towards his poor and miserable christians. Peter truly warneth, that "If judgement beginneth in the house of God, what shall be the end of them that believe not the gospel? If the righteous shall scarcely be saved, where shall the ungodly and sinful appear?" Some shall have their punishment here in this world, and in the world to come; and they that do escape in this world, shall not escape everlasting damnation. This shall be your end, O ye wicked papists, make ye merry as long as ye may."

Amongst other words and sayings, which may seem prophetically to be spoken by him, this also may be added, and is notoriously to be marked, that he spake, being then in prison, to the printer of Mr. Fox's book, who then also was laid up for like cause of religion: "Thou," said he, "shall live to see the alteration of this religion, and the gospel to be freely preached again." And therefore have me commended to my brethren, as well in exile as others, and bid them be circumspect in displacing the papists, and putting good ministers into churches, or else their end will be worse than our's. And for lack of good ministers to furnish churches, his device was, (Mr. Hooper also agreeing to the same) that for every ten churches, some one good and learned superintendant should be appointed, which should have under him faithful readers, such as might well be got, so that popish priests should clean be put out, and the bishop once a year to oversee the profiting of the parishes; and if the minister did not his duty, as well in profiting himself in his book, and his parishioners in good instructions, so that they may be trained by little and little to give a reckoning how they do profit, then he to be expelled, and another put in his place: and the bishop to do the like with the superintendant: this was his counsel and request: shewing moreover, and protesting in his commendations to his brethren by the printer aforesaid, that if they would not do so, their end, he said, would be worse than their's.

Besides divers things, touching Mr. Rogers, this is not to be forgotten, how in the days of king Edward VI. there was a controversy among the bishops and clergy, for wearing of priest's caps, and other attire belonging to that order. Mr. Rogers being of that number which never went otherwise than in a round cap, during all the time of king Edward, affirmed that he would not agree to that decreement of uniformity, but upon this condition, that if they would needs have such an uniformity of wearing the cap, tippet, &c. then it should also be decreed withal, that the papists, for a difference betwixt them and others, should be constrained to wear upon their sleeves a chalice with an host upon it. Whereupon if they would consent, he would agree to the other; otherwise he would not, he said, consent to the setting forth of the same, nor ever wear the cap, as indeed he never did.

On the 4th of February, as we have before observed, Mr. Rogers was taken out of Newgate, to be led to the place of execution, when the sheriff asked him, if he would recant his opinions? To this he answered, "That what he had preached, he would seal with his blood." Then, said the sheriff, thou art an heretic. To which Mr. Rogers replied, "That shall be known at the day of judgement." Well, said Mr. Woodroffe, I will never pray for thee. But I will pray for you, said Mr. Rogers; and so he was brought the same day, Monday, February 4th, by the sheriffs towards Smithfield, saying the Psalm Miserere by the way, all the people wonderfully rejoicing at his constancy, with great praises and thanks to God for the same. And there, in the presence of Mr. Rochester, comptroller of the queen's household, sir Richard Southwell, both the sheriffs, and a great number of people, he was burnt to ashes, washing his hands in the flame as he was burning. A little before his burning, his pardon was brought, if he would have recanted; but he utterly refused it. He was the first martyr, of all the blessed company that suffered in queen Mary's time, that gave the first adventure upon the fire. His wife and children, being eleven in number, ten able to go, and one sucking at her breast, met him by the way as he went towards Smithfield: this sorrowful sight of his own flesh and blood could nothing move him, but he constantly and cheerfully took his death with wonderful patience, in the defence of the gospel of Christ.

The LIFE and MARTYRDOM of the Rev. Mr. LAURENCE SAUNDERS, who was burned at COVENTRY, February 8th, 1555.

AFTER queen Mary, by public proclamation, in the first year of her reign, had prohibited the sincere preaching of God's holy word, several pious ministers, who had the cure and charge of souls committed to them, did notwithstanding, according to their duty, feed their flock faithfully, not as preachers authorized by public authority, (as the godly order of the realm was in the happy days of blessed king Edward) but as the private pastors of particular flocks, among whom Laurence Saunders was one, a man of good parentage. His bringing up was in learning from his youth, in places meet for that purpose, as in the school of Eaton. From whence (according to the manner there used) he was chosen to go to the king's college in Cambridge, where he continued a scholar three whole years, and profited in knowledge and learning very much for that time: shortly after, he did forsake the university, and went to his parents, upon whose advice he minded to become a merchant, for that his mother, who was a gentlewoman of good estimation, being left a widow, and having a good portion for him among his other brethren, she thought to set him up wealthily, and so he coming up to London, was bound apprentice with a merchant, named sir William Chester (who afterwards chanced to be sheriff of London the same year that Saunders was burnt at Coventry.) Thus, by the mind of his friends, Laurence should needs have been a merchant; but Almighty God, who hath his secret working in all things, saw better for his servant, as it fell out in the end: for although that Saunders was bound by indenture, yet the Lord so wrought inwardly in his heart, that he could find no liking in his vocation: so that when his other fellows were busily occupied about their trade, he would secretly withdraw himself into some privy corner, and there fall into solitary lamentations, as one not pleased with that kind of life.

It happened that his master, being a good man, and hearing his prentice thus in his secret prayers inwardly to mourn by himself, called him unto him, to know what the cause was of his solitariness and lamentations: who then perceiving him not to fancy that kind of life, (for so Saunders declared unto him) and perceiving also his whole purpose to be bent to the study of books, and spiritual contemplation, like a good man, directed his letters unto his friends, and giving him his indentures, set him free. Thus Mr. Laurence Saunders being ravished with the love of learning, and especially with the reading of God's word, tarried not long in the traffic of merchandize, but shortly returned to Cambridge again to his study, where he began to add to the knowledge of the Latin, the study of the Greek tongue, wherein he profited very much in a little time; therewith also he joined the study of the Hebrew. Then he gave himself wholly to the study of the holy scripture, to furnish himself for the office of a preacher.

In study he was diligent and painful; in godly life he declared the fruits of a well exercised conscience; he prayed often, and with great fervor, and in his prayers, as also at other times, he had his part of spiritual exercises, in which, when any special assault did come, he felt present relief: then was his company marvellous comfortable. For as his exercises were special teachings, so in the end they proved singular consolations: wherein he became so expert, that within a short space was able to comfort others that were in affliction, by the consolation wherewith the Lord did comfort him. Thus continued he in the university, till he became master of arts; and a long space after.

In the beginning of king Edward's reign, when God's true religion was introduced, after licence obtained, he began to preach, and was so well liked of them who then had authority, that they had appointed him to read a divinity lecture in the college at Fotheringham, where, by doctrine and life, he edified the pious, drew many ignorant to the true knowledge of God, and stopped the mouths of adversaries. He married about that time, and in the married state led a life unblameable before all men. The college of Fotheringham being dissolved, he was placed to be a reader in the minster at Litchfield: where he so behaved himself in teaching and living, that his very adversaries did give a full report as well of his learning, as of his piety. After a certain space, he departed from Litchfield to a benefice in Leicestershire, called Church-langton, where he keeping residence, taught diligently, and kept a liberal house. From thence he was orderly called to take a benefice in the city of London, named Alhallows in Bread-street. Then he was minded to give over his cure in the country; and therefore after he had taken possession of his benefice in London, he departed from thence into the country, clearly to discharge himself thereof. And even at that time began the broil about the claim that queen Mary made to the crown, by reason whereof he could not accomplish his purpose.

In this trouble, and even among the beginners of it, (such (such I mean as were for the queen) he preached at Northampton. nothing meddling with the state, but boldly uttered his conscience against popish doctrines, which were like to spring up again in England; as a just plague for the little love which the English nation did bear to the blessed word of God, which had been so plentifully offered unto them. The queen's party who were there, and heard him, were highly displeased with him for his sermon, and for it kept him among them as prisoner. But partly for love of his brethren and friends, who were chief doers for the queen among them, partly because there was no law broken by his preaching, they dismissed him. He, seeing the dreadful days at hand, inflamed with the fire of godly zeal, preached with diligence at both those benefices, as time could serve him, seeing he could resign neither of them now, but into the hands of a papist.

Thus passed he his time in preaching, until that proclamation was put forth, of which mention has been made, at which time he was at his benefice in the country, where he (notwithstanding the proclamation) taught diligently God's truth, confirming the people therein, and arming them against false doctrines, until he was not only commanded to cease, but also with force resisted, so that he could not proceed there in preaching. Some of his friends, perceiving such fearful menacing, counselled him to fly out of the realm, which he refused to do. But seeing he was with violence kept from doing good in that place, he returned towards London to visit the flock, of which he had there the charge.

On Saturday, October 14th, as he was coming nigh to the city of London, sir John Mordant, a counsellor to queen Mary, did overtake him, and asked him whether he went. I have, said Saunders, a cure in London, and now I go to instruct my people, according to my duty. If you will follow my counsel, said Mr. Mordant, let them alone, and come not at them. To this Saunders answered: How shall I then be discharged before God, if any be sick, and desire consolation, if any want good counsel, and need instruction? or if any should slip into error, and receive false doctrine? Did you not, said Mordant, preach such a day, and named the day, in Bread-street, London? Yes verily, said Saunders, that same is my cure. I heard you myself, said Mr. Mordant: and will you preach now there again? If it please you, said Saunders, to morrow you may hear me again in that same place, where I will confirm, by the authority of God's word, all that I said then, and whatsoever before that time I taught them.

I would counsel you, said the other, not to preach. If you can and will forbid me by lawful authority, then I must obey, said Saunders. Nay, said he, I will not forbid you, but I do give you counsel. And thus entered they both the city, and departed each from the other. Mr. Mordant, of an uncharitable mind, went to give warning to Bonner, bishop of London, that Saunders would preach in his cure the next day. Saunders reported to his lodging, with a mind bent to do his duty. Where because he seemed to be somewhat troubled, one who was there about him, asked him how he did. In every deed, said he, I am in prison, till I be in prison; meaning, that his mind was unquiet until he had preached, and that he should have quietness of mind, though he were put in prison.

The next day, which was Sunday, in the forenoon, he made a sermon in his parish, treating on that place which St. Paul writeth to the Corinthians: "I have coupled you to one man, that ye should make yourselves a chaste virgin unto Christ. But I fear lest it come to pass, that as the serpent beguiled Eve, even so your minds should be corrupt from the singleness which ye had towards Christ." He recited the sum of that true christian doctrine, through which they were coupled to Christ, to receive of him free justification through faith in his blood. The papistical doctrine he compared to the serpent's deceiving: and lest they should be deceived by it, he made a comparison between the voice of God, and the voice of the popish serpent; descending to more particular declaration thereof, as it were to let them plainly see the difference that is between the order of the church service, set forth by king Edward in the English tongue, and comparing it with the popish service then used in the Latin tongue.

The first he said was good, because it was according to the word of God, 1 Cor. xiv. and the order of the primitive church. The other, he said, was evil; and though in that evil, be intermingled some good Latin words, yet was it but as a little honey or milk mingled with a great deal of poison. This was the sum of his sermon.

In the afternoon he was ready in his church to have given another exhortation to his people. But the bishop of London interrupted him by sending an officer for him. This officer charged them, upon pain of disobedience and contumacy, forthwith to come to the bishop his master. Thus, as the apostles were brought out of the temple, where they were teaching, unto the rulers of the priests, so was Laurence Saunders brought before the bishop of London, who had in his company the aforementioned sir John Mordant and some of his chaplains. This bishop laid no more to Laurence Saunders's charge, but treason for breaking the queen's proclamation, heresy and sedition for his sermon.

The treason and sedition, his charity was content to let slip until another time. But an heretic he would now prove him, and all those, he said, who did teach and believe that the administration of the sacraments, and all orders of the church are most pure, which do come most nigh to the order of the primitive church. For the church was then but in her infancy, and could not abide that perfection which was afterwards to be furnished with ceremonies. And for this cause Christ himself, and after him the apostles, did in many things bear with the rudeness of that church. To this Laurence Saunders answered with the authority of St. Augustine, "That ceremonies were even from the beginning invented and ordained for the rude infancy and weak infirmity of man, and therefore it was a token of the more perfection of the primitive church, that it had few ceremonies, and of the rudeness of the papistical church, because it had so many ceremonies, partly blasphemous, partly unfavoury and unprofitable."

After much talk concerning this matter, the bishop desired him to write what he believed of transubstantiation. Laurence Saunders did so, saying, My lord, you do seek my blood, and you shall have it: I pray God that you may be so baptized in it, that you may thereafter loathe blood-sucking, and become a better man. This writing the bishop kept for his purpose, even to cut the writers throat, as shall appear hereafter. The bishop, when he had his will, sent Laurence Saunders to the lord chancellor, as Annas sent Christ to Caiaphas: and like favour found Saunders as Christ his master did before him. But the chancellor being not at home, Saunders was constrained to tarry for him the space of four hours, in the outer chamber, where he found a chaplain of the bishop's very merrily disposed, with certain gentlemen playing at tables, with divers others of the same family or house occupied there in the same exercise.

All this time Saunders stood very modestly and soberly at the screen or cupboard bare-headed, sir John Mordant his guide or leader walking up and down by him: who (as I said before) was then one of the council. At last the bishop returned from the court, whom, as soon as he was entered, a great many suiters met and received; so that before he could get out of one house into another, half an hour was passed. At last he came into the chamber where Saunders was; and went through into another chamber: where in the mean time, sir John Mordant gave him a writing, containing the cause, or rather the accusation of the said Saunders: which when he had perused, where is the man, said the bishop? Then Saunders, being brought forth to the place of examination, first most lowly and meekly kneeled down, and made courtesy before the table where the bishop sat; unto whom the bishop spoke on this wise:

How happeneth it, said he, that, notwithstanding the queen's proclamation to the contrary, you have attempted to preach.

Saunders

Saunders denied not that he did preach; saying, that forasmuch as he saw the perilous times now at hand, he did but (according as he was admonished, and warned by Ezekiel the prophet) exhort his flock and parishioners to persevere and stand stedfastly in the doctrine which they had learned; saying also, that he was moved thereunto by the place of the apostle, wherein he was commanded rather to obey God than man; and moreover, that nothing more moved him thereunto, than his own conscience.

A goodly conscience, surely said the bishop. This your conscience could make our queen a bastard, or misbegotten; would it not, I pray you?

We, said Saunders, do not declare, or say that the queen is base, or misbegotten, neither go about any such matter. But for that, let them care whose writings are yet in the hands of men, witnessing the same; not without the great reproach and shame of the author: privily taunting the bishop himself, who had before (to get the favour of Henry VIII.) written and set forth in print a book of true obedience, wherein he had openly declared queen Mary to be a bastard: now Mr. Saunders going forwards in his purpose, said, We do only profess and teach the sincerity and purity of the word; which, though it be now forbidden us to preach with our mouths, yet notwithstanding, I do not doubt, but that our blood hereafter shall manifest the same. The bishop being touched, said, Carry away this frenzy fool to prison. Unto whom Mr. Saunders answered, that he did give God thanks, which had given him at the last a place of rest and quietness, where he might pray for the bishop's conversion.

Furthermore, he that did lie with him afterwards in prison, in the same bed, reported, that he heard him say, that even in the time of his examination he was wonderfully comforted, insomuch as not only in spirit, but also in body, he received a certain taste of that holy communion of saints, whilst a most pleasant refreshing did issue from every part and member of the body unto the seat and place of the heart, and from thence did ebb and flow to and fro unto all the parts again.

Mr. Saunders continued in prison one year and three months. In all which space he sent several letters to divers men; as one to Crammer, Ridley, and Latimer; another to his wife, and also to others, certifying them both of the public calamity of the time, and also of his private afflictions, and of his sundry conflicts with his adversaries; and in writing to his friend, he speaketh of Dr. Weston's conferring with him in the prison. In the mean time, Gardiner, the chancellor, sent him to the prison of the Marshalsea, where he was kept prisoner one year and a quarter. During which time he sent a letter part of which is as follows, to Gardiner, bishop of Winchester.

LETTER I.

Which the Rev. Mr. SAUNDERS sent to BISHOP GARDINER, exculpating himself from CERTAIN CHARGES laid against him.

TOUCHING the cause of my imprisonment, I doubt whether I have broken any law or proclamation. In my doctrine I did not, forasmuch as at that time it was permitted by the proclamation to use, according to our consciences, such service as was then established. My doctrine was then agreeable unto my conscience and the same service then used. The act which I did (meaning his public teaching of God's word in his own parish, called Allhallows in Breadstreet, in the city of London) was such as being indifferently weighed, sounded to no breaking of the proclamation, or at least no wilful breaking of it, forasmuch as I caused no bell to be rung, neither occupied I any place in the pulpit, after the order of sermons or lectures. But be it that I did break the proclamation, this long time of continuance in prison may be thought to be more than a sufficient punishment for such a fault.

Touching the charging of me with my religion, I say with St. Paul; this I confess, "That after the way which they call heresy, so worship I the God of my fore-fathers, believing all things which are written in the law and the prophets, and have hope towards God," &c. Acts xxiv. And herein study I to have always a clear conscience towards God and towards men; so that God I call to witness, I have a conscience. And this my conscience is not grounded upon vain fantasy, but upon the infallible verity of God's word, with the witnessing of his chosen church agreeable unto the same.

It is an easy thing for them which take Christ for their true pastor, and be the very sheep of his pasture, to discern the voice of their true shepherd, from the voice of wolves, hirelings, and strangers: forasmuch as Christ saith, "My sheep hear my voice," John x. yea, and thereby they shall have the gift to know the right voice of the true shepherd, and so to follow him, and to avoid the contrary; as he also saith, "The sheep follow the shepherd, for they know his voice: a stranger they will not follow, but will fly from him; for they know not the voice of a stranger." Such inward inspiration doth the Holy Ghost put into the children of God, being indeed taught of God, but otherwise unable to understand the true way of their salvation. And although the wolf (as Christ saith) cometh in sheep's clothing, yet by their fruits you shall know them. That the Romish religion is ravening and wolfish, is apparent in three principal points.

First, It robbeth God of his due and only honour,

Secondly, It taketh away the true comfort of conscience, in obscuring, or rather burying of Christ and his office of salvation.

Thirdly, It spoileth God of his true worship and service in spirit and truth, appointed in his commandments, and driveth men unto that inconvenience, against which Christ with the prophet Isaiah doth speak sharply; "This people honoureth me with their lips, but their hearts is far from me, They worship me in vain, teaching the doctrines and precepts of men." And in another place, "Ye cast aside the commandments of God, to maintain your own traditions."

Wherefore I in conscience weighing the Romish religion, and by indifferent discussing thereof finding the foundation unfitted, and the building thereupon but vain: and on the other side, having my conscience framed after a right and uncorrupt religion, ratified and fully established by the word of God, and the consent of his true church, I neither may, nor do intend, by God's gracious assistance, to be pulled one jot from the same; no, though an angel out of heaven should preach another gospel than that which I have received of the Lord.

And although that for lack either of such deep knowledge and profound judgement, or of readily uttering what I do know and judge, as required in an excellent clerk, I shall not be able sufficiently to answer, for the convincing of the gainfayer: yet nevertheless this my protestation shall be of me premised, that for the respect of the grounds and causes before considered, albeit I cannot conceive all that is to be conceived, neither can discuss all that is to be discussed, nor can effectually express all that can be expressed in a discourse of the doctrine of this most true religion, whereunto I am professed: yet I do bind myself, as by my humble simplicity, by faith in generality, to wrap my belief in the credit of the same, that no authority of that Romish religion repugnant thereunto, shall by any means remove me from the same, though it may be that our adversaries will labour to beguile us with enticing words, and seek to spoil us through philosophy and deceitful vanity, after the tradition of men, and after the ordinances of the world, and not after Christ, &c.

And thus much of Mr. Saunders's letter, so much as remained thereof; it is sufficient to understand, how good was his cause and state, being a prisoner for Christ's cause. For the defence whereof, he wholly bestowed and so resigned himself, that he forbade his wife to sue for his delivery. and when others of his friends had by suit almost obtained it; he discouraged them, so that they did not follow their suit, as by his letter following may appear.

LETTER II.

From the Rev. Mr. SAUNDERS to his WIFE.

GRACE, mercy, and peace in Christ our Lord, intirely beloved wife, even as unto my own soul and body, so do I daily in my hearty prayer wish unto you; for I do daily, twice at least, in this sort remember you. And I do not doubt, dear wife, but that both I and you, as we are written in the book of life, so we shall together enjoy the same everlastingly, through the grace and mercy of God our dear Father, in his Son our Christ. And for this present life, let us wholly appoint ourselves to the will of our good God, to glorify him either by life or by death; and even that same merciful Lord make us worthy to honour him either way as pleaseth him, Amen. I am cheerful, I thank my God and my Christ, in whom and through whom I shall (I know) be able to fight a good fight, and finish a good course, and then receive the crown, which is laid up in store for me, and all the true soldiers of Christ. Wherefore, wife, let us, in the name of our God, fight lustily to overcome the flesh, the devil, and the world. What our harness and weapons be in this kind of fight, look in the first chapter unto the Ephesians, and pray, pray, pray. I would that you make no suit for me in any wise. Thank you know whom, for her most sweet and comfortable putting me in remembrance of my journey whither I am passing. God send us all good speed, and a joyful meeting. I have too few friends to further me in that journey, which is indeed the greatest friendship. The blessing of God be with you all, Amen.

A prisoner in the Lord, L. SAUNDERS.

The constancy of this faithful servant of Christ, even unto the death, is sufficiently manifested and declared by his valiant contest with those two powerful enemies, Antichrist and death: to neither of these did he give place, and in the end got the victory over them both. One of his conflicts was with Dr. Weston, in the Marshalsea, of which he thus writeth to one of his friends.

Dr. Weston came to confer with Mr. Grimoald: what he hath concluded with him I know not: I wish it may be to God's glory, Amen, Amen. Mr. Weston of his gentleness visited me, and offered me friendship in his wordly wily sort, &c. I had not so much good manners as to take it at his hand: for I said, that I was well enough, and ready cheerfully to abide any extremity, to keep thereby a good conscience. You are asleep in sin, said he. I would awake, said I, and do not forget Vigilate et orate, i. e. "Watch and pray." What church was there thirty years past? said he. What church was there, said I, in Elias's time? Joan of Kent, said he, was of your church. No, said I, we did condemn her as an heretic. Who was of your church, said he, thirty years past? Such, said I, as the Romish Antichrist, and his rabble, have reputed and condemned as heretics. Wickliffe, said he, Thorpe, Oldcastle, &c. Yes, said I, with many more. The bishop of Rome hath, said he, a long time played a part in your railing sermons; but now, be ye sure, he must play another manner of part. The more pity, said I, and yet some comfort it is to see how that the most learned, wisest, and holiest of you all, have heretofore had him to play a part likewise in your sermons and writings, though now, to please the world, you do turn with the weather-cock. Did you ever, said he, hear me preach against the bishop of Rome? No, said I, for I never heard you preach. But I think you have been no wiser than others, &c. with more about the sacrament. Pray pray. God keep your family, and bless it.

In order more fully to shew what blessed taste this good man and heroic martyr had of God's holy Spirit, we shall here insert two more of his letters, which he wrote in the Marshalsea, the first of which is addressed to Cranmer, Ridley, and Latimer, prisoners for the like cause of Christ in Oxford.

LETTER III.

From the Rev. Mr. SAUNDERS, to ARCHBISHOP CRANMER, BISHOP RIDLEY, and the Rev. Mr. LATIMER, then Prisoners in OXFORD.

IN my most humble wife I salute you, most reverend fathers in Christ Jesus our Lord. Immortal thanks and everlasting praises be given unto our Father of mercies, "which hath made us meet to be partakers of the inheritance of the saints in light, which hath delivered us from the power of darkness, and hath translated us into the kingdom of his beloved Son, by whom we have redemption through his blood," &c. Coloss. i. & iii. O most happy estate, that in an unspeakable wife our life is hid with Christ in God: but whensoever Christ which is our life shall shew himself, then shall we also appear with him in glory, Coloss. iii. 4. In the mean season, as our sight is but in a glass, even in a dark speaking, so we walk in faith, not after outward appearance: which faith, although for want of outward appearance, reason reputeth but as vain, yet the chosen of God do know the effect thereof, to bring a more substantial state and lively fruition of very felicity and perfect blessedness, than reason can reach, or senses receive. By this faith we have in our possession all good things, yea even those, "which the eye hath not seen, and the ear hath not heard, neither hath entered the heart of man," &c. 1 Cor. ii. 9. Then if hereby we do enjoy all good things, it followeth, that we must needs possess, have, and enjoy you, most reverend fathers, who are no small part of our joy and good things given us of God.

We heretofore have had the fruition of you by bodily presence to our inexplicable benefit, praised be that our most gracious God therefore. And now in spirit we have the experience of unspeakable comfort by your reverend fatherhoods, for that in this so glorious sort ye are become a town set upon a hill, a candle upon a candlestick, a spectacle unto the world, both to the angels and unto men, Matt. v. So that as we to our great comfort do feel, you also may assuredly, with St. Paul 2 Cor. iv. that the things which happen unto us do tend to the great furtherance of the gospel; so that our bonds in Christ are manifest, not only throughout all the judgment-hall, but in all Europe; inasmuch that many of the brethren in the Lord, being encouraged through our bonds, dare more boldly speak the word without fear, Phil. i. And herein as you have with St. Paul greatly to rejoice, so we rejoice with you, and we do indeed with you give thanks for this worthy excellent favour of our God towards you, that Christ is thus magnified in you, yea, and hereafter shall be magnified in your bodies, whether it be through life or death. Of which thing truly we are assured in our prayers for you, and ministering of the Spirit, Phil. ii. And although for your own parts, Christ is unto you in life and death advantage, and that your desire is (as indeed it were better for you) to be loosed, and to be with Christ, yet for the church of Christ were it much more necessary, that ye should abide in the flesh. Yea, that merciful God, even for Christ's sake, grant that you may abide and continue for the furtherance of the church, and increase of faith, that the rejoicing thereof may be the more abundant through Christ by your restoring. Amen, Amen.

But if it seem better otherwise unto the divine wisdom, that by speedy death he hath appointed you to glorify him, the Lord's will be done. Yea, even as we do rejoice both on your behalfs, and also on our own, that God is magnified by life, and should be more abundantly glad for the continuance thereof; so we shall no less rejoice to have the same wrought by death. We shall give thanks for this honour given unto you, rejoicing that ye are accounted worthy to suffer for the name of Christ, and that "it is given to you of God, not only that ye should believe in him, but also that ye should suffer for his sake." And herein we shall have to rejoice in the behalf of the church of Christ, whose faith may be the faster fixed upon God's verity, being confirmed with three such worthy witnesses. O thanks be to God for this his unspeakable gift.

And now, most reverend fathers, that you may understand the truth of us, and our estate how we stand in the Lord; I do assure your reverences, partly by what I perceive by such of your brethren as be here in bonds with me, partly by what I hear of them which be in other places, and partly by the inward experience which I, most unworthy, have of God's good comfort, (more abundance whereof I know there is in others) you may be assured (I say) by God's grace, that you shall not be frustrated of your hope of our constant continuance in the cheerful confession of God's everlasting verity. For even as we have received the word of truth, even the gospel of our salvation, wherein we believing are sealed with the holy Spirit of promise, which is the earnest of our inheritance (which Spirit certifieth our spirit, that we are the children of God, and therefore God hath sent the Spirit of his Son into our hearts, crying Abba, Father,) so after such portion as God measureth unto us, we with the whole church of Christ, and with you reverend fathers, receiving the same spirit of faith, according as it is written, "I believed, and therefore I have spoken," 1 Cor. iv. we also believe, and therefore speak. For which we in this dangerous bondage and other afflictions, having even such a sight as we have seen in you, and have heard of you, are in no wise afraid of our adversaries.

And forasmuch as we have such an office, even as God hath had mercy on us, we go not out of kind, but even with you; after our little power, we labour to maintain the faith of the gospel, knowing most certainly, that though "we have this treasure in earthen vessels, that the excellency of this power might be God's, and not our's, 2 Cor. iv. yet shall we not be dashed in pieces; for the Lord will put his hand under us. When "we are troubled on every side, yet are we not without thift: when we are in poverty, we are not utterly without something: when we suffer persecution, we are not forsaken therein: when we are cast down, yet we shall not perish," but to communicate with our sweet Saviour Christ in bearing the cross, it is appointed unto us, that even with him also we shall be glorified: for it is a true saying, "If we be dead with him, we shall also live with him; if we be patient, we shall also reign with him, if we deny him, he shall also deny us," 1 Tim. ii. Wherefore are we of good cheer, "always bearing about in our body the dying of the Lord Jesus, that the life of Jesus might appear also in our body: for we know, that he which raised up the Lord Jesus, shall raise up us also by the means of Jesus, and shall join us to himself together with you," 2 Cor. iv. Wherefore we are not wearied; but though our outward man perish, yet the inward man is renewed day by day. For our tribulation which is momentary and light, prepareth an exceeding and eternal weight of glory unto us, while we look not on the things which are seen, but on the things which are not seen. For the things which are seen, are temporal; but the things which are not seen, are eternal.

We testify unto you, reverend fathers, that we draw these matters with joy out of the wells of the Saviour. And I trust we shall continually with you bless the Lord, and give thanks unto the Lord out of the wells of Israel; we trust to be merry together at that great supper of the Lamb, whose spouse we are by faith, and there to sing that song of everlasting Hallelujah, Amen. Yea, come Lord Jesus. The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you, Amen.

LETTER IV.

From the Rev. Mr. LAURENCE SAUNDERS to his WIFE.

GRACE and comfort in Christ Jesus, our only comfort in all extreme assaults, Amen. Fain would this flesh make strange of that which the spirit doth embrace. Oh! Lord, how loth is this loitering sluggard to pass forth in God's path? It fancieth much fear, and were it not for the force of faith, and of hope, great likelihood there were of fainting by the way. But blessed, and everlastingly blessed be that heavenly Father of our's, who in his Christ, our sufficient Saviour, hath vouchsafed to shine in our hearts, that he giveth us the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ: and having "this treasure in our earthen vessels, that the excellency of the power might be God's, and not our's; we are (according to his good will) troubled on every side, yet are we not without shift, we are in poverty, but yet not without what is sufficient; we suffer persecution, but are not forsaken therein; we are cast down, nevertheless we perish not: we bear in the body the dying of the Lord Jesus, that the light of Jesus might also appear in our body." Wherefore by the grace of our Christ we shall not be wearied, neither be dismayed by this our probation through the fire of affliction, as though some strange thing had happened unto us: put by his power we shall rejoice, inasmuch as we are partakers of Christ's passion, that when he doth appear, we may be merry and glad, knowing that "our tribulation, which is momentary and light, prepareth an exceeding and eternal weight of glory unto us, while we look not on the things which are seen, but on the things which are not seen. They that sow in tears shall reap in joy. For he that goeth on his way weeping and scattering his good seed, shall doubtless come again with joy, and bring his whole sheaves with him." Then, then shall the Lord wipe away all tears from our eyes. Then, then shall be brought to pass that saying which is written, "Death is swallowed up in victory. Death, where is thy sting? Hell, where is thy victory? Yea, thanks be to God, which hath given us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ. Amen."

In the mean season it remaineth for us to follow St. Peter's advice; "Let them (saith he) that are troubled, according to the will of God, commit their souls to him with well-doing, as a faithful creator and maker." He is our maker, and we are his handy-work and creatures, whom now when he hath made, he doth not leave and forsake, as the shipwright doth the ship, leaving it at all adventures to be tossed in the tempest; but he comforteth us his creatures, and in him we live, move, and have our being: yea, not only that, but now that he hath in his dear Christ repaired us, being before utterly decayed, and redeemed us, purging us unto himself as a peculiar people by the blood of his Son; he hath put on a most tender good will and fatherly affection towards us, never to forget us: unto whom by such promises he hath plighted such faith, that though it were possible that the mother could forget her infant, and not be tender-hearted to the child of her womb, yet may not it be, that his faithful believers should be forgotten of him. He exhorteth us to cast our care on him, and faith, that assuredly he careth for us. And what though for a season he doth suffer us to be tossed in the turbulent tempests of temptation, and seemeth as in much anger to have given us over, and forgotten us? Let not us for all that leave off to put our trust in him, but let us with godly Job conclude in ourselves and say, "Even though he kill me, yet will I put my trust in him." Let us with the blessed Abraham in hope, even contrary to hope, by belief lean unto that our loving Lord, though, for our probation he suffereth us to be afflicted, yet will he not be always chiding, neither keepeth he his anger forever; for he knoweth wherefore we are made; he remembereth that we are but dust. Wherefore, look how high the heaven is in comparison of the earth, so great is his mercy towards them which fear him. Look how wide the east is from the west, so far hath he set our sins from us. Yea, like as a father pitieth his own children, even so is the Lord merciful unto them that fear him." Oh! what great cause of rejoicing have we in our most gracious God: We cannot but burst forth in the praising of such a bountiful benefactor, and say with the same Psalmist, "Praise the Lord, O my soul, and all that is within me praise his holy name. Praise the Lord, O my soul, and forget not all his benefits."

Dear wife, riches I have none to leave behind me, wherewith to endow you after the worldly manner: but that treasure of tasting how sweet Christ is unto hungry consciences, (whereof I thank my Christ, I do feel part, and would feel more) that I bequeath unto you, and to the rest of my beloved in Christ, to retain the same in sense of heart always. Pray, pray. I am merry, and I trust I shall be merry, in spite of all the devils in hell. I utterly refuse myself and resign myself unto my Christ, in whom I know I shall be strong, as he seeth needful. Pray, pray, pray.

LAURENCE SAUNDERS.

When Mr. Saunders was in prison, an order was sent to the keeper, that no person should speak with him; but his wife coming to the prison-gate with her young child in her arms, to visit her husband, the keeper, though he durst not, on account of his charge, suffer her to come into the prison, yet took the infant out of her arms, and brought him unto his father. Mr. Saunders, seeing the child, said, that he rejoiced more to have such a boy, than he should if two thousand pounds were given him. And to the standers-by, who praised the goodness of the child, he said, "What man fearing God, would not lose his life, rather than by prolonging it, he should adjudge this boy to be a bastard, his wife a whore, and himself a whoremonger? Yea, if there were no other cause, for which a man of my estate should lose his life, yet who would not give it, to vouch this child to be legitimate, and his marriage to be lawful and holy?"

I do, good reader, (says Mr. Fox) recite this saying, not only to let you see what he thought of priest's marriage, but chiefly to let all married couples and parents learn to bear in their bosom true affection: natural, but yet seasoned with the true salt of the spirit, unfeignedly and thoroughly mortified to do the natural works and offices of married couples and parents, so long as with their doings they may keep Christ with a free confessing faith in a clear conscience: otherwise both they and their own lives are so to be forsaken, as Christ required them to be denied, and given in his cause.

After this good and faithful martyr had been kept in prison one year and a quarter, the bishops at length called him, as they did his fellow-prisoners, openly to be examined; and the purport of his examination, as written by himself, here followeth.

The EXAMINATION of the Rev. Mr. SAUNDERS before the QUEEN'S COUNCIL; GARDINER, BISHOP of WINCHESTER, the then CHANCELLOR, and other BISHOPS, being present.

In this examination the Lord Chancellor thus spake:

Lord Chancellor.

IT is not unknown that you have been a prisoner, for such abominable heresies and false doctrine as have been sown by you; and now it is thought good that mercy be shewed to such as seek for it. Wherefore if now you will shew yourself conformable, and come home again, mercy is ready. We must say that we have fallen in manner all: but now we are risen again, and returned to the catholic church; you must rise with us, and come home unto it. Give us forthwith a direct answer.

Saunders. My lord, and my lords all, may it please your honours to give me leave to answer with deliberation.

Chancellor. Leave off your painting and pride of speech: for such is the fashion of you all, to please yourselves in your glorious words. Answer yes, or no.

Saunders. My lord, it is no time for me now to paint. And as for pride, there is no great cause why it should be in me; my learning I confess to be but small; and as for riches or worldly wealth, I have none at all. Notwithstanding, it standeth me in hand to answer your demand circumspectly, considering that one of these two extreme perils is like to fall upon me, the losing of a good conscience, or the losing of this my body and life. And I tell you truth, I love both life and liberty, if I could enjoy them without the hurt of my conscience.

Chancellor. Conscience? you have none at all, but pride and arrogancy, dividing yourselves by singularity from the church.

Saunders. The Lord is the knower of all men's consciences. And where your lordship layeth to my charge this dividing myself from the church, (as you do mean, and is now among you concluded upon, and I do understand) I do assure you that I live in the faith wherein I have been brought up since I was fourteen years of age, being taught that the power of the bishop of Rome is but usurped, with many other abuses springing thereof. Yes, this I have received even at your hands that are here present, as a thing agreed upon by the catholic church and public authority.

Chancellor. But have you received by consent and authority all your heresies of the blessed sacrament of the altar?

Saunders. My lord, it is less offence to cut off an arm, hand, or joint of man, than to cut off the head. For the man may live though he doth lose an arm, hand, or joint; but he cannot without his head. Now you, all the whole sort of you, had agreed to cut off the supremacy of the bishop of Rome, whom now you will have to be the head of the church again.

Bishop of London. And if it please your lordship, I have his hand against the blessed sacrament. How say you to that?

Saunders.

Saunders. What I have written, that I have written, and further I will not accuse myself. Nothing have you to burden me withal, for breaking of your laws since they were in force.

Chancellor. Well, you are obstinate, and refuse liberty:

Saunders. My lord, I may not buy liberty at such a price: but I beseech your honours to be means to the queen's majesty for such a pardon for us, that we may live and keep our consciences unclogged, and we shall live as most obedient subjects. Otherwise, I must say for myself, that by God's grace I will abide the utmost extremity that man may do against me, rather than act against my conscience.

Chancellor. Ah firrah, you will live as you like. The Donatists did desire to live in singularity; but indeed they were not fit to live on earth: no more are you, and that you shall understand within these seven days; and therefore away with him.

Saunders. Welcome be it, whatsoever the will of God shall be, either life or death. And I tell you truly, I have learned to die. But I exhort you to beware of shedding of innocent blood. Truly it will cry. The Spirit of God rest upon all your honours, Amen. This is the sum and form of my first examination. Pray, &c.

This examination being ended, the officers led him out of the place, and stayed until the rest of his fellow-prisoners were likewise examined, that they might have them all together to prison. Laurence Saunders, standing among the officers, seeing there a great multitude of people, spoke freely, warning them all of that which by their falling from Christ to Antichrist they deserved; and therefore exhorting them by repentance to rise again, and to embrace Christ with stronger faith, to confess him to the end, in the defiance of Antichrist, sin, death, and the devil: so should they retain the Lord's favour and blessing.

The copies of his other examination and excommunication came to the hands of such as do keep them still in secret. But in them, as he defended Christ's cause stoutly, so warned he the pharisaical bishops and papists of their hypocrisy and tyranny, and cleared himself of their unjust accusations.

Having been excommunicated and delivered over to the secular power, he was brought by the sheriffs of London to the Compter, a prisoner in his own parish of Breadstreet, whereat he rejoiced greatly, both because he found there a fellow-prisoner, Mr. Cardmaker, with whom he had much christian and comfortable discourse; and because out of prison, as before out of a pulpit, he might have an opportunity of preaching to his parishioners.

On the fourth day of February, Bonner, bishop of London, came to the prison to degrade him: which when he had done, Mr. Saunders said to him, "I thank God I am none of your church."

The day following in the morning, the sheriff of London delivered him to certain of the queen's guard, which were appointed to carry him to the city of Coventry, there to be burned. The first night they came to St. Alban's, where Mr. Grimoald (a man who had more store of good gifts, than of great constancy) did speak with him.

After Mr. Saunders had given him a lesson meet for his lightness, he took a cup in his hand, and asked him if he would pledge him of that cup, of which he would begin to him. Grimoald shewing by his shrugging and shrinking what he was, said, Of that cup which is in your hand I will pledge you: but of that other which you mean, I will not promise you. Well, said Mr. Saunders, my dear Lord Jesus Christ hath begun to me of a more bitter cup than mine shall be, and shall I not pledge my most sweet Saviour? Yes, I hope.

When they were arrived at Coventry, a poor shoemaker, who used to serve him with shoes, came to him, and said, O my good master, God strengthen and comfort you. Good shoemaker, (Mr. Saunders replied) and I desire thee to pray for me, for I am the most unfit man for this high office, that ever was appointed to it: but my gracious God and dear Father is able to make me strong enough. The same night he was put into the common jail among other prisoners, where he slept little, but spent the night in prayer; and instructing of others.

The next day; being the 8th of February; he was led to the place of execution in the park, without the city; going in an old gown and a shirt; bare-footed, and oftentimes fell flat on the ground, and prayed. When he was come nigh to the place; the officer appointed to see the execution done; said to Mr. Saunders, that he was one of them who marred the queen's realm with false doctrine and heresy, wherefore thou hast deserved death: but yet if thou wilt revoke thine heresies; the queen hath pardoned thee; if not; yonder fire is prepared for thee. To whom Mr. Saunders answered, It is not I, nor my fellow-preachers of God's truth, that have hurt the queen's realm, but it is yourself, and such as you are, which have always resisted God's holy word; it is you who have and do marr the queen's realm. I do hold no heresies, but the doctrine of God, the blessed gospel of Christ; that hold I, that believe I, that have I taught, and that will I never revoke. With that; this tormenter cried, Away with him. And away from him went Mr. Saunders, with a cheerful courage, towards the fire. He fell to the ground, and prayed: he rose up again and took the stake to which he should be chained, in his arms, and kissed it, saying, Welcome the Cross of Christ, welcome everlasting life: and being fastened to the stake, and fire put to him, full sweetly he slept in the Lord.

Well might the apostle say, that if we only in this life have hope, we are of all men the most miserable. And what will the reader think, when he is told that this martyr was of a timid disposition? And yet here we see with what constancy he died. This is a strong proof that there must be an almighty power, working through faith in the hearts of those who are punished for the truth.

Mr. Saunders often told his friends, that many would suffer, if ever Mary ascended the throne. He knew the temper of that princess, and probably it was that which made him expect sufferings. It is for the benefit of succeeding ages, that God gives strength to the heart of man to suffer. It is to promote many valuable purposes, by teaching us to set a proper value on the many national blessings we enjoy in the present age; and there is no way of making a better use of them, than to live in the practice of every virtuous and religious duty; to bless the Almighty for having delivered us from a worse than Egyptian darkness; for certainly popery, both in it's spirit and tendency, can be called by no other name. We live in an age when, perhaps, our own wickedness has so much displeased God, that he has suffered the enemy to sow tares among us.

To what other cause can we ascribe the increase of popery, which has not been confined to the capital, but has been extended to the remotest parts of the kingdom? In Scotland, where, about thirty years ago, there were not, perhaps, two hundred papists, there are now as many thousands.

We must impute much of this to our own remissness in our duty. The popish priests use all the means they can think of to seduce our people, and they even have recourse to bribes. They get money from their gentry, part of which they give away to the poor; and those who are, in a manner, unprincipled in religion, will soon turn to any thing.

Another method used by them, is to spread amongst the poor small treatises on religious subjects; and these are generally filled with such bewildered notions, that the vulgar are easily caught in the snare. Why should we not be as exact in preserving our people from these wolves in sheep's cloathing? Let us take an example from this pious martyr, whose life was a comment on his doctrine, and who lived as he preached. This will do more towards suppressing popery and deism, than the best discourses that can be formed.

Some modern unbelievers have said, that the martyrs had good hearts, but confused heads; and to this they have added, that they were madmen. Supposing we should turn the argument against the deists, by begging the

the question, and asked them, whether Socrates, whom they so much glory in, was a madman, for asserting that there was but one divine being? For this crime (if it was one) Socrates suffered death, by being condemned to drink the hemlock. Now let any man read the Phædon of Plato, and then let him answer whether Socrates did not die an enthusiast.

When his friend came to visit him the day before he suffered, and told him the ship would return that day which would decide his fate; Socrates told him, that the ship would not arrive that day, for he had had a dream, which informed him of the contrary. Was not this a real sign of weakness, or rather of superstition? Nay, did not Socrates with his last words desire, that a cock should be offered up to Æsculapius? Did ever a christian martyr make such a speech, when all the horrors of death presented themselves to his view? The answer is obvious; there is not an instance of it upon record. Thus the deist's argument falls to the ground.

It is also said, they had good hearts, but their heads were not clear. Let us admit the assertion to be true, and let us consider the circumstances from which it took its rise. The whole truth will appear from a careful attention to the following things:

First, many of these men had, from motives of conscience, left that system of superstition in which they had been educated, and embraced the truth perhaps in a more violent manner than was consistent with that calmness of reflection, which must, at all times, conduct those to the knowledge of the truth, who would willingly obey the gospel. Under such circumstances men's minds must have been much confused: they loved knowledge perhaps, but it was not in their power to find out the road that led towards it.

Secondly, It may be observed, that however desirable it may be to have a head well informed, it is much better to have a good heart. A man may have much knowledge, and at the same time be destitute of piety. There have been many learned men who were strangers to religion; there have been sufferers for the truth, who knew but little of what is commonly called human knowledge. Men may speak of these things, at this distance of time, in what manner they please; but if they look back to history, they will be enabled to form more just opinions.

Lastly, Let them consider the circumstances of the times: light breaking out from darkness is apt to bewilder the rational faculties; and men are frequently led into extravagancies, without any intention to deceive. Indeed, the martyrs knew they had nothing to expect but sufferings; and therefore they thought they might, with a becoming propriety, avow their sentiments. It was their duty to do so; and it will remain a monument of their everlasting honour, that they were sincere in all their declarations.

This may serve to shew, that all the objections which, from time to time, have been brought against the martyrs, are extremely insignificant, and not worthy of a serious answer. Let those who live in the present age emulate the conduct of those men, and let them never forget, that however respectful knowledge may be, yet piety is much better. Those who really love God, never make any display, in an ostentatious manner, of religion; but those who have no religion at heart, have generally a great deal of it in their mouths.

And the better to understand what the grace of Christ worketh in his servants, and again, how weak man is in himself without the assistance of divine grace, we shall here relate the conversation which passed between Mr. Saunders, in the beginning of his troubles, and Dr. Pendleton; to which we shall subjoin a few more letters of the Rev. Mr. Saunders, full of godly instruction and consolation.

A CONVERSATION between the Rev. Mr. LAURENCE SAUNDERS and Dr. PENDLETON, in the beginning of QUEEN MARY's Reign.

AT the change of religion in this realm, and the beginning of queen Mary's reign, doctor Pendleton and Mr. Saunders, men known to the world, not only to be learned, but also earnest preachers of God's word in the time of blessed king Edward, met together in the country, where by occasion they were at that time, and as the case required (by reason of the persecution that was then at hand) fell to debate what was best for them to do in so dangerous a season. Whereunto Mr. Saunders, whether through very frailty of his weak flesh, that was loth to taste the bitter cup, though his spirit was ready thereunto: or whether it were upon the mistrust of his own strength, that he might receive the greater power from above; or whether it were not for any one of the said causes alone, but for both together, or such like; seemed so fearful and feeble-spirited, that he shewed himself in appearance, like either to fall quite from God and his word, which he had taught, or at least, to fly the land, rather than stick to his profession. Whereas Dr. Pendleton took upon him to comfort Mr. Saunders all that he might (who, on the contrary side, appeared not so big of body, but as bold in courage, nor so earnest before in the pulpit, but as ready now to seal the same with his blood), admonishing him, as he could do it very well, not to forsake cowardly his flock when he had most need to defend them from the wolf; neither having put his hand to God's plough, to start now aside, and give it over; nor yet (what is worst of all) having once forsaken Antichrist, to fall either himself, or suffer others by his example to return to their vomit again.

After which, and such like persuasions, bidding him be of good comfort, and to take a good heart unto him; What, man! (said he) there is a great deal more cause in me to be afraid than in you; forasmuch as you see, I carry a greater mass of flesh upon my back than you do; and being so laden with a heavier lump of this vile carcase, ought therefore of nature to be more frail than you: and yet, said he, I will see the last drop of this grease of mine melted away, and the last particle of this flesh consumed to ashes, before I will forsake God and his truth. Whereunto the other answered but little, wishing that God would give him more strength than he then felt in himself, acknowledging his own weakness; but consented notwithstanding, though it were somewhat faintly, to join with him in the profession of the gospel, and so to go up to London, and set forth the same; whereupon they gave each other their hands.

Now when they were come to London, behold, what a great change was there between these two persons! The poor, feeble, and faint-hearted Saunders, by the goodness of Almighty God, taking heart of grace to him, seeking the same in humility, boldly and stoutly confirmed his flock out of the pulpit, where his charge lay, mightily beating down Antichrist, and zealously preaching Christ his master, for which he afterwards suffered most willingly, as is before declared. Whereas, on the other side, Dr. Pendleton the proud (who, as it appeared by the sequel, had been more stout in words than constant in deeds, and a greater boaster than a good warrior) no sooner came to London, but he changed his mind, and played the apostate, preaching, instead of sound doctrine, nothing almost but errors and lies, advancing Antichrist, and overthrowing Christ with all his might: so his former boldness came to nothing, unless it were a contrary key, becoming of a faithful pastor, a false runagate; and of a true preacher, a sworn enemy to God's everlasting testament; to the great offence of his brethren, the hurt of his flock, and the utter undoing, without God's greater mercy, of his own soul. Wherein is especially to be considered the deep and marvellous judgement of God, who as he can and doth make strong whom he pleaseth, when he seeth his time, and most commonly such as appear most feeble; so on the other hand, he throweth down others, whom they ever so stout, stand they ever so much in their own conceits. Wherefore let him that standeth take heed he fall not; and let us pray continually to Almighty God, though we have faith, that he will help and increase our faith, that in him it may be made strong, which of itself is so weak, that it is soon overthrown.

While this good man was confined in prison, he did not pass all his time in unfruitful idleness, but still from time time to time did visit his friends, (as is said) and especially his wife, with many letters; some of which we thought not improper here to insert.

LETTER V.

From the Rev. Mr. LAURENCE SAUNDERS; to BISHOP FERRAR, Dr. TAYLOR, Mr. BRADFORD, and Mr. PHILPOT.

GRACE, mercy, and peace in Jesus Christ our Lord, &c. Good fathers, and dear brethren, be thankful unto our most gracious God, which hath preserved us, and shall (I doubt not) from blaspheming his blessed name: yea, not only that, but also "Out of the mouth of very babes and sucklings shall be set forth his praise." They offer us our liberty and pardon, so that we will rise with them into that faith which we with them were fallen from. Yes, or no, must be answered in haste. They will not admit any needful circumstances, but all (as heretofore) most detestable and abominable. Rise with them we must unto the unity. And pardon, I say, of me must not so dearly be purchased. A pardon I desire, to live with an unclogged conscience. The Donatists, they say, sought for such singularity, but they were not meet to live in a commonwealth, no more be you, as you shall shortly understand. Wherefore away with him; yea, the time was named within this se'nnight. There are twelve hours in the day. Death shall be welcome, say I, as being looked for long since; and yet do justice ye were best, for Abel's blood cryed, ye know what. The spirit of God be upon you, and God save your honours. Thus departed I from them. Pray, pray. I am a child, I cannot speak. My brother Philpot shall shew you more herein. By him send me word what you have done. Farewel, and pray, pray. I would gladly meet with my good brother Bradford on the backside about eleven o'clock. Before that time I cannot start out, we have such out-walkers, but then will they be at dinner.

Your's as you know,

LAURENCE SAUNDERS.

LETTER VI.

From the Rev. Mr. LAURENCE SAUNDERS, to his WIFE, and others of his Pastoral Flock, written in the COMPTER, the last Day of January, 1555, after his Condemnation.

THE grace of Christ, with the consolation of the Holy Ghost, to the keeping of the faith and a good conscience, confirm and keep you for ever vessels to God's glory. Amen.

Oh! what worthy thanks can be given to our gracious God for his unmeasurable mercies plentifully poured upon us? And I most unworthy wretch cannot but pour forth at this present, even from the bottom of my heart, the bewailing of my great ingratitude and unkindness towards so gracious a God and loving Father. I beseech you all, as for my other many sins, so especially for that sin of my unthankfulness, crave pardon for me in your earnest prayers, commending me to God's great mercies in Christ.

To number these mercies in particular, were to number the drops of water which are in the sea, the sands on the shore, the stars in the sky. O my dear wife, and ye the rest of my friends, rejoice with me, I say rejoice with thanksgiving for this my present promotion, in that I am made worthy to magnify my God, not only in my life, by my slow mouth and uncircumcised lips, bearing witness unto his truth, but also by my blood to seal the same, to the glory of my God, and confirming of his true church: and as yet I testify unto you, that the comfort of my sweet Christ doth drive from my mind the fear of death. But if Christ doth for my trial leave me alone a little to myself, alas! I know in what case I shall be then: but if for my proof he do so, yet I am sure he will not be long or far from me. He is a very tender-hearted Joseph; though he speak roughly to his brethren, and handle them hardly, yea, threaten grievous bondage to his best beloved brother Benjamin; yet can he not contain himself from weeping with us, and upon us. Such, such a brother is our Christ unto all. Wherefore hasten to go unto him as Jacob did with his sons and family, leaving their country and acquaintance. Yea, this our Joseph hath obtained for us, that Pharaoh the infidel shall minister unto us chariots, wherein at ease we may be carried to come unto him: as we have experience how our adversaries do help us unto our everlasting bliss by their speedy dispatch: yea, and how all things have been helpings hereunto; blessed be our God. Be not afraid. Fear rather the everlasting fire: fear the serpent which hath that deadly sting, of which by bodily death they shall be brought to taste which are not grafted in Christ, wanting faith and a good conscience, and so are not acquainted with Christ the killer of death. But oh, my dear wife and friends! we, we whom God hath delivered from the power of darkness, and hath translated into the kingdom of his dear Son, by putting off the old man, and by faith putting on the new, even our Lord Jesus Christ, his wisdom, holiness, righteousness, and redemption; we, I say, have to triumph against the terrible spiteful serpent the devil, sin, hell, death, and damnation. For Christ our brazen serpent, hath pulled away the sting of this serpent, so that now we may boldly, in beholding it spoiled of sting, triumph, and with our Christ and all his elect say, "Death, where is thy sting? Hell, where is thy victory? Thanks be to God, who hath given us the victory, through our Lord Jesus Christ."

Wherefore be merry, my dear wife, and all my dear fellow heirs of the everlasting kingdom, always remember the Lord. Rejoice in hope, be patient in tribulation, continue in prayer, and pray for us now appointed to the slaughter, that we may be unto our heavenly Father a fat offering, and an acceptable sacrifice. I may hardly write to you. Wherefore let these few words be a witness of my commendations to you and all them which love us in the faith; and namely, unto my flock, among whom I am resident by God's providence, but as a prisoner.

And although I am not so among them; as I have been, to preach to them out of a pulpit, yet doth God now preach unto them by me, by this my imprisonment and captivity which now I suffer among them for Christ's gospel's sake, bidding them beware of the Romish antichristian religion and kingdom, requiring and charging them to abide in the truth of Christ, which is shortly to be sealed with the blood of their pastor: who though unworthy of such a ministry, yet Christ their high pastor is to be regarded, whose truth hath been taught them by me, is witnessed by my chains, and shall be by my death, through the power of that high pastor. Be not careful, good wife, cast your care upon the Lord, and commend me unto him in repentant prayer, as I do you and our Samuel; whom even at the stake, I will offer as myself unto God. Farewel all in Christ, in hope to be joined with you in joy everlasting. This hope is put up in my bosom, Amen, Amen, Amen. Pray, pray.

LETTER VII.

To Mrs. LUCY HARRINGTON.

GRACE and mercy, &c. It happeneth oftentimes that abundance of matter bringeth with it much vehemency of friendly affliction, maketh men dumb, and even then chiefly when there is most eager purpose of speaking, silence doth suppress, and causeth the party so affected imperfectly to express what he goeth about to utter. Such impediment by much matter, mingled with fervency of affection, feel I sometimes in myself, hindering the utterance, either by tongue or writing, of the abundance of the heart. The love of our most gracious God and heavenly Father, bestowed upon us in the merits of Christ our Saviour, who may, by conceit of mind, comprehend, passing indeed all understanding! Much less may the same by any means be expressly uttered. And as such heavenly blessings, which by faith we fetch from above, are inexplicable, so it is hard to utter, when the faithful are set on fire by love, their readiness to reach forth and to give by charity, as by faith they have received. "But, alas! we carry this treasure in earthen vessels." Many times faith is feeble, and then love loseth her favour. Pray we therefore, Lord increase our faith, and love forthwith will be on fire. And immortal thanks be given unto our God, who in our Christ hath bestowed upon us the first fruits of his Spirit, who crieth in our hearts, Abba, Father. And, as St. Paul saith, "Seeing we have the same Spirit of faith, according as it is written; I believe, and therefore have I spoken: we also believe, and therefore we speak." Yea, God knoweth, this Spirit putteth us in mind to speak, but in attempting thereof we are driven with Moses to say, "O Lord, I am slow in speech and of uncircumcised lips;" and with Jeremy, "O Lord, I cannot speak."

But though this infancy restraineth the opening of such abundance of heart, in my tender christian duty to be declared towards you, yet I beseech you, let this be settled in your understanding; that as St. Paul expresseth unto his Corinthians, they were in his heart either to live or to die, with many other such sayings uttered unto them and the Galatians, expressing his vehement affection towards them: so in some part I would be like affected towards all God's children, and especially towards you whom I know in Christ, and to whom I will not say how much I am indebted. I thank you for your great friendship and tender good will towards my wife: yea, that good gracious God recompense you, which may worthily with the more countervail the same, and fulfil that which lacketh of thankful duty in us. And because of that which heretofore I have conceived of you, and of your more than natural love towards me and mine; I make myself thus bold to lay this burden upon you, even the care and charge of my said poor wife; I mean, to be unto her a mother and mistress to rule and direct her by your discreet counsel. I know she conceiveth of you the same that I do, and is thankful unto God with me for such a friend: and therefore I beseech you even for Christ's sake, put never from you this friendly charge over her, whether I live longer, or shortly depart. But to charge you otherwise, thanks be to God, neither I nor she have any such extreme need: if we had, I would be as bold with you as with my own mother. I beseech you, give my hearty salutations unto Mr. Fitz Williams, and my good lady, with thanks also for my poor wife and child: the Lord recompense them.

To his WIFE, exhorting her with him to commend their CHILD SAMUEL to the BLESSING of GOD.

GRACE and comfort, &c. Wife, you shall do best not to come often unto the grate where the porter may see you. Put not yourself in danger where it needs not; you shall, I think, shortly come far enough into danger by keeping faith and a good conscience: which, dear wife, I trust you do not slack to make reckoning and account upon, by exercising your inward mind in meditation of God's most holy word, being the sustenance of the soul, and also by giving yourself to humble prayer, for these two things are the very means how to be made members of our Christ meet to inherit his kingdom.

Do this, dear wife, in earnest, and not leaving off, and so we two shall with our Christ and all his chosen children, enjoy the merry world in that everlasting immortality; whereas here will nothing else be found but extreme misery, even of them which most greedily seek this worldly wealth; and so, if we two continue God's children grafted in our Christ, the same God's blessing which we receive shall also settle upon our Samuel. Though we do shortly depart hence and leave the poor infant (to our seeming) at all adventures, yet shall he have our gracious God to be his God: for so hath he said, and he cannot lye, I will be thy God, saith he, and the God of thy seed. Yea, if you leave him in the wilderness destitute of all help, being called of God to do his will, either to die for the confession of Christ, or any work of obedience; that God which heard the cry of the little poor infant of Hagar, Sarah's hand-maiden, and did succour it, will do the like to your child, or any other fearing him, and putting your trust in him.

And if we lack faith, as we do indeed many times, let us call for it, and we shall have the increase both of it and also of any other good grace needful for us: and be merry in God, in whom also I am very merry and joyful. O Lord, what great cause of rejoicing have we, to think upon that kingdom, which he vouchsafeth for his Christ's sake freely to give us, forsaking ourselves and following him? Dear wife, this is truly to follow him, even to take up our cross and follow him; and then as we suffer with him here, so shall we reign with him everlastingly, Amen.

LAURENCE SAUNDERS.

To his WIFE, Mr. HARRINGTON, and other FRIENDS.

GRACE and comfort, &c. Dear wife, rejoice in our gracious God, and his and our Christ, and give thanks most humbly and heartily to him for this day's work, that in any part I most unworthy wretch should be made worthy to bear witness unto his everlasting verity, which Antichrist with his main force, I perceive, and by most impudent pride and boasting will go about to suppress. Remember God always, my dear wife, and so shall God's blessing light upon you and your Samuel. O remember always my words for Christ's sake, be cheerful, grudge not against God, and pray, pray. We are all merry here, thanks be unto our God, who in his Christ hath given us great cause to be merry, by whom he hath prepared for us such a kingdom, and doth and will give unto us some little taste thereof, even in this life, and to all such as are desirous to take it. "Blessed (saith our Christ) are they which hunger and thirst after righteousness, for such shall be satisfied." Let us go, yea, let us run to seek such treasure, an that with whole purpose of heart to cleave unto the Lord, to find such riches in his heavenly word through his spirit obtained by prayer. My dear friends and brethren, Mr. Harrington and Mr. Hurland, pray, pray. "The spirit is ready, but the flesh is weak." When I look upon myself, being astonished and confounded, what have I else to say but those words of Peter, "Lord, go from me, for I am a sinful man?" But then I feel that sweet comfort, "The word of the Lord is a lantern unto my feet, and a light unto my paths: and this is my comfort in my trouble. Then am I bold with the same Peter to say, "Lord to whom shall we go? Thou hast the words of everlasting life." This comfort have I, when the giver thereof doth give it. But I look for battles, which the root of unfaithfulness, which I feel in me, will most eagerly give unto my conscience, when we come once to the combat. We are (I think) within the sound of the trumpet of our enemies. Play ye that are abroad the part of Moses, "praying in all places, lifting up pure hands:" and God's people shall prevail: yea, our blood shall be their perdition who do most triumphantly spill it, and we then being in the hands of our God, shall shine in his kingdom, and shall stand in great steadfastness against them which have dealt extremely with us: and when these our enemies shall thus see us, they shall be vexed with horrible fear, and shall wonder at the hastiness of the sudden death; and shall say with themselves, having inward sorrow and mourning for very anguish of mind: "These are they whom we some time had in derision and jested upon: we fools thought their lives to be very madness, and their end to be without honour; but lo! how are they accounted among the children of God." The blessing of God be with you all, &c.

To his WIFE, a little Time before his MARTYRDOM.

GRACE and comfort in Christ, Amen. Dear wife, be merry in the mercies of our Christ, and also you my dear friends. Pray, pray for us every body. We are shortly to be dispatched hence unto our good Christ, Amen, Amen. Wife, I would have you send me my shirt, which you know whereunto it is consecrated. Let it be sewed down on both sides, and not open. O my heavenly Father, look upon me in the face of thy Christ, or else I shall not be able to abide thy countenance; such is my filthiness. He will do so, and therefore I will not be afraid what sin, death, hell, and damnation can do against me. O wife, always remember the Lord. God bless you, yea, he will bless thee, good wife, and thy poor boy also; only cleave thou unto him, and he will give thee all things. Pray, pray, pray.

LAURENCE SAUNDERS.

To the foregoing letters of the Rev. Mr. Saunders, which were dispersed among the faithful congregation of Christ, we shall add two other letters, written by Mr. Edward Saunders, the justice, his brother, and sent to our martyr while in prison; to the intent that our readers may see; how in these two brethren, joined in consanguinity; but divided in religious sentiments, the word of the Lord was verified in them, which saith, "Brother shall rise up and be against brother," &c.

From JUSTICE SAUNDERS to his BROTHER, the Rev. Mr. LAURENCE SAUNDERS, Prisoner in the Compter.

AFTER my most hearty commendations, these are to ascertain you, that I have spoken with Mr. Bassett, who hath shewed me, that four pounds (all deductions being allowed) is the whole that hath come to his hands of the profit of the prebendary at York, the which you shall have, although as he thinketh, it was not due unto you by reason of your deprivation before it was due. As concerning your conscience in religion, I beseech God it may be lightened by the Holy Ghost, and that you may also have the grace of the Holy Ghost to follow the counsel of St. Paul to Timothy, ch. ii. "To handle righteously the word of truth." Wherein you dissenting from many holy and catholic men, especially in the sacrament, it maketh me in my conscience to condemn your's. For although I have not hitherto fancied to read Peter Martyr, and other such, &c. yet have I had great desire to see Theophylact and divers others of this sort and opinion, both notable and holy fathers, (if any credit be to be given to the writings of our ancient fathers before us) and surely the sentences and judgments of two or three of them have more confirmed my conscience, than three hundred of the Zuinglians, or as many of the Lutherans can or should do. Thus in haste, willing to relieve you, to the end you might convert, if you shall need towards your finding, if you shall require it of me, you shall unfeignedly find my money ready, as knoweth our Lord, who send us all things good for us. Scribbled this Thursday by your brother and petitioner to God,

From the same to the same, wherein the JUSTICE endeavors to gain over his BROTHER to POPERY, by sending him the MEDITATION of St. BERNARD.

AS nature and brotherly love with godly charity requireth, I send you by these letters most hearty commendation, being sorry for your fault and your disobedient handling of yourself towards my lord chancellor, who I assure you, mindeth your good and preservation, if you can so consider and take it. I would be glad to know whether you have not had with you of late some learned men to talk with you by my lord chancellor's appointment, and how you can frame yourself to reform your error in the opinion of the most blessed and our most comfortable sacrament of the altar. Wherein I assure you, I was never in all my life better affected than I am at this present, using to my great comfort hearing of mass, and somewhat before the sacrament time, the meditation of St. Bernard, set forth in the third leaf of this present book. The accustomed using whereof I am fully professed unto, during my life, and to give more faith unto that confession of holy Bernard, than to Luther, &c. or Latimer, &c. for that the antiquity, the universality of the open church, and the consent of all saints and doctors do confirm the same, ascertaining you, that I have been earnestly moved in my own conscience these ten or twelve days past, and also between God and myself, to move you to the same, most earnestly desiring you, and as you tender my natural, godly, and friendly love towards you, that you would read over this book this holy time at my request, although you have already seen it, and let me know wherein you cannot satisfy your own conscience. Thus fare you well for this time.

By your's, from Serjeant's Inn,

C H A P. II.

The LIFE and MARTYRDOM of JOHN HOOPER, BISHOP of WORCESTER and GLOUCESTER, who was Burned for maintaining and defending the TRUE RELIGION, February 9th, 1555.

JOHAN HOOPER, student and graduate in the university of Oxford, after the study of the sciences, wherein he had abundantly profited and proceeded, was stirred with fervent desire to the love and knowledge of the scriptures. Growing more and more, by God's grace, in ripeness and spiritual understanding, and shewing withal some sparkles of his fervent spirit, being then about the beginning of the six articles, in the time of king Henry VIII. fell quickly into displeasure, and hatred of certain doctors in Oxford, who by and by began to stir coals against him, whereby, and especially by the procurement of Dr. Smith, he was compelled to quit the university; and removing from thence, was retained in the house of Sir Thomas Arundel, and there was his steward, till the time that Sir Thomas Arundel having intelligence of his opinions and religion, which he in no case did favour, and yet exceedingly favouring the person and conditions of the man, found the means to send him with a message to the bishop of Winchester, writing his letter privily to the bishop, by conference of learning to do some good unto him, but in any case requiring him to send home his servant to him again.

Winchester, after long conference with Mr. Hooper, four or five days together, at length perceiving, that neither he could do that good which he thought to him, nor that he would take any good at his hand, according to Mr. Arundel's request, he sent home his servant again, right well commending his learning and wit, but yet bearing in his breast a grudge against Mr. Hooper.

Not long after this, as malice is always working mischief, intelligence was given to Mr. Hooper to provide for himself, for danger was working against him; whereupon Mr. Hooper left Mr. Arundel's house, and borrowing a horse of a certain friend (whose life he had saved a little before from the gallows), took his journey to the sea-side to go to France, sending back the horse again by one, who indeed did not deliver him to the owner. Mr. Hooper being at Paris tarried there not long, but in a short time returned into England again, and was retained by Mr. Senlow, till the time that he was again molested and sought for; whereby he was compelled (under the pretence of being captain of a ship going to Ireland) to take to the seas, and so escaped (although not without extreme peril of drowning) through France, to the higher parts of Germany. Where, commencing acquaintance with learned men, he was by them friendly and lovingly entertained, both at Basil, and especially at Zurich, by Mr. Bullinger, being his singular friend. Where also he married his wife, who was a Burgonian, and applied very studiously to the Hebrew tongue.

At length, when God saw it good to stay the bloody time of the six articles, and to give us king Edward to reign over this realm, with some peace and rest unto the church, amongst many other English exiles, who then repaired homeward, Mr. Hooper also, moved in conscience, thought not to absent himself, but seeing such a time and occasion, offered to help forward the Lord's work, to the uttermost of his ability. And coming to Mr. Bullinger, and other of his acquaintance in Zurich, (as duty required) to give them thanks for their singular kindness and humanity towards him many ways declared, with like humanity again proposed to take his leave of them at his departing; and so he did. Unto whom Mr. Bullinger (who had always a special favour to Mr. Hooper) spake on this wise: "Mr. Hooper, (saith he) although we are sorry to part with your company for our own cause, yet much greater cause have we to rejoice, both for your sake and especially for the cause of Christ's true religion, that you shall now return out of long banishment into your native country again, where not only you may enjoy your own private liberty, but also the cause and state of Christ's church by you may fare the better; as we doubt not but it will. Another cause moreover why we rejoice with you and for you, is this; that you shall remove not only out of exile into liberty, but you shall leave here a barren, a sour, and an unpleasant country, rude, and savage, and shall go into a land flowing with milk and honey, replenished with all pleasure and fertility. Notwithstanding, with this our rejoicing one fear and care we have left you being absent, and so far distant from us, or else coming to such abundance of wealth and felicity, in your new welfare and plenty of all things, and in your flourishing honours, where you shall come peradventure to be a bishop, and where you shall find so many new friends, you will forget us your old acquaintance and well-wishers. Nevertheless, howsoever you shall forget and shake us off, yet this persuade yourself that we will not forget our old friend and fellow Mr. Hooper. And if you will please not to forget us, then I pray you let us hear from you."

Whereunto Mr. Hooper answering again, first gave to Mr. Bullinger, and the rest hearty thanks, for that their singular good will, and undeserved affection, appearing not only now, but at all times towards him; declaring moreover, that as the principal cause of his removing to his country was the matter of religion; so touching the unpleasantness and barrenness of that country of their's, there was no cause therein why he could not find in his heart to continue his life there, as soon as in any place in the world, and rather than in his own native country, if there were nothing else in his conscience that moved him so to do. And as touching the forgetting of his old friends, although, said he, the remembrance of a man's country naturally doth delight him, neither could he deny but God had blessed his country of England with many great commodities; yet neither the nature of country, nor pleasure of commodities, nor newness of friends should ever induce him to the oblivion of such friends and benefactors, whom he was so entirely bound unto: and therefore you shall be sure, said he, from time to time to hear from me, and I will write unto you how it goeth with me. But the last news of all I shall not be able to write; for there, said he, (taking Mr. Bullinger by the hand) where I shall take most pains, there shall you hear of me to be burned to ashes; and that shall be the last news, which I shall not be able to write unto you, but you shall hear of me, &c.

To this also may be added another like prophetic demonstration, foreshewing the manner of his martyrdom wherewith he should glorify God, which was this; when Mr. Hooper being made bishop of Worcester and Gloucester, should have his arms given him by the herald, as the manner is here in England, every bishop to have his arms assigned unto him (whether by the appointment of Mr. Hooper, or by the herald, I have not certainly to say) but the arms which were to him allotted was this, A lamb in a fiery bush, and the sunbeams from heaven descended down upon the lamb, rightly denoting, as it seemed, the order of his sufferings, which afterwards followed.

But to proceed: when Mr. Hooper had taken his farewell of Mr. Bullinger, and his friends in Zurich, he repaired again into England in the reign of king Edward the sixth, and coming to London, used continually to preach most times twice, at least once every day,

In his sermons, according to his accustomed manner, he corrected sin, and sharply inveighed against the iniquity of the world, and corrupt abuses of the church; the people in great flocks and companies daily came to hear his voice, as the most melodious sound and tune of Orpheus's harp, in so much, that oftentimes when he was preaching preaching, the church would be so full, that none could enter further than the doors thereof. In his doctrine he was earnest; in tongue eloquent, in the scriptures perfect; in pains indefatigable.

Moreover, besides his other gifts and qualities, this is in him to be admired, that even as he began, so he continued unto his life's end. For neither could his labour and pains-taking break him, promotion change him, nor dainty fare corrupt him. His life was so pure and good; that no kind of slander (although some went about to revile him) could fasten any fault upon him. He was of body strong, his health whole and sound, his wit very pregnant, his invincible patience able to sustain whatsoever sinister fortune and adversity could do. He was constant of judgment, spare of diet, sparer of words, and sparest of time. In house-keeping very liberal, and sometimes more free than his living would extend unto. Briefly, of all those virtues and qualities required of St. Paul in a good bishop, in his epistle to Timothy, I know not one in this good bishop lacking. He bore in countenance and talk always a certain reserve and grave grace, which might peradventure be wished some time to have been a little more popular and vulgar-like in him; but he knew what he had to do best himself.

Once an honest citizen, having in himself a certain conflict of conscience, came to his door for counsel, but being abashed at his austere behaviour, durst not come in, but departed, seeking remedy for his troubled mind at other men's hands, which he afterwards, by the help of Almighty God, did find and obtain. Therefore, in my judgment, such as are appointed and made governors over the flock of Christ, to teach and instruct them, ought so to frame their life, manners, countenance, and external behaviour, as neither to shew themselves too familiar and light, whereby to be brought into contempt; nor on the other side again, that they appear more lofty and rigorous, than appertaineth to the edifying of the simple flock of Christ. Nevertheless, as every man hath his peculiar gift wrought in him by nature, so this disposition of fatherly gravity in this man neither was excessive, nor did he bear that personage that was in him, without great consideration. For it seemed to him peradventure, that this licentious and unbridled life of the common sort ought to be chastened, not only with words and discipline, but also with the grave and severe countenance of good men.

After he had practised himself in this popular and common kind of preaching; at length, and that not without the great profit of many, he was called to preach before the king's majesty, and soon after made bishop of Gloucester by the king's commandment. In that office he continued two years, and behaved himself so well, that his very enemies (except it were for his good doings, and sharp correcting of sin) could find no fault with him, and after that he was made bishop of Worcester.

But I cannot tell what sinister and unlucky contention concerning the ordering and consecration of bishops, and of their apparel, with other such like trifles, began to disturb the good beginning of this bishop. For notwithstanding that godly reformation of religion that begun in the church of England, besides other ceremonies more ambitious than profitable, or tending to edification, they used to wear such garments and apparel as the popish bishops were wont to do: first a chymere, and under that a white rochet, then a mathematical cap with four angles, dividing the whole world into four parts. These trifles tending more to superstition than otherwise, as he could never abide, so in no wise could he be persuaded to wear them. For this cause he made supplication to the king's majesty, most humbly desiring his highness, either to discharge him of the bishopric, or else to dispense with him for such ceremonial orders. Whose petition the king granted immediately, writing his letter to the archbishop after this purport.

KING EDWARD VI. his LETTER to the ARCHBISHOP of CANTERBURY, and other BISHOPS.

RIGHT reverend father, and right truly and well-beloved, we greet you well. Whereas we, by the advice of our council, have called and chosen our right well-beloved and well worthy, Mr. John Hooper, professor of divinity, to be our bishop of Gloucester, as well for his great knowledge, deep judgment, and long study both in the scriptures, and prophane learning, as also for his good discretion, ready utterance, and honest life for that kind of vocation: to the intent all our loving subjects, which are in his said charge, and elsewhere, might by his sound and true doctrine learn the better their duty towards God, their obedience towards us, and love towards their neighbours: from consecrating of whom we understand you do stay, because he would have you omit and let pass certain rights and ceremonies offensive to his conscience, whereby ye think ye should fall in preminure of laws; we have thought good, by the advice aforesaid, to dispense and discharge you of all manner of dangers, penalties, and forfeitures, you shall run and be in any manner of way, by omitting any of the same. And these our letters shall be your sufficient warrant and discharge therefore.

Given under our signet at our Castle of Windsor, the 5th of August, the 4th year of our reign.

A LETTER from the EARL of WARWICK, to the ARCHBISHOP of CANTERBURY, to this Effect, that Mr. HOOPER might not be burdened with the Oath, used commonly in the Consecration of Bishops.

AFTER my most hearty commendations to your grace, these may be to desire the same, that in such reasonable things, wherein this bearer, my lord elect of Gloucester, craveth to be borne withal at your hands, you would vouchsafe to shew him your grace's favour, the rather at this my instance: which thing partly I have taken in hand by the king's majesty's own motion. The matter is weighed by his highness, none other but that your grace may easily condescend unto. The principal cause is, that you would not charge this said bearer with an oath burdensome to his conscience. And so for lack of time I commit your grace to the tuition of Almighty God. From Westminster, July 23, 1550.

Your grace's most assured loving friend,
J. WARWICK.

But notwithstanding this grant of the king, and also the earl's letter aforesaid, the bishops still stood earnestly in the defence of the aforesaid ceremonies, saying, it was but a small matter, and that the fault was in the abuse of the things, and not in the things themselves: adding moreover, that he ought not to be so stubborn in so light a matter, and that his wilfulness therein was not to be suffered.

To be short, whilst both parties thus contended about this matter more than reason would, in the mean time occasion was given, as to the true christians to lament, so to the adversaries to rejoice. In conclusion, this theological contention came to this end, that, the bishops having the upper hand, Mr. Hooper was fain to agree to this condition, that sometimes he should in his sermon shew himself apparelled as the other bishops were. Wherefore being appointed to preach before the king, as a new player in a strange apparel, he cometh forth on the stage. His upper garment was a long scarlet chymere down to the foot, and under that a white linen rochet, that covered all his shoulders. Upon his head he had a geometrical, that is, a four-squared cap, albeit that his head was round. What cause of shame the strangeness hercof was that day to that good preacher, every man may easily judge. But this private injury and reproach, in respect of the public profit of the church, which he only sought, he bore and suffered patiently.

It now remaineth to record the godly reconciliation of these good men, in time of persecution, as appeareth from the following letter, sent from bishop Ridley to the bishop of Gloucester, of which, as it was written in Latin, the following is a faithful translation into English.

A LETTER of RECONCILIATION from BISHOP RIDLEY, to JOHN HOOPER, BISHOP of GLOUCESTER.

TO my dear brother, and reverend fellow elder in Christ, John Hooper, grace and peace. My dear beloved brother and fellow elder, whom I reverence in the Lord, pardon me, I beseech you, that hitherto since your captivity and mine, I have not saluted you by my letters: whereas I do indeed confess, I have received from you (such was your gentleness) two letters at sundry times; but yet at such time as I could not be suffered suffered to write to you again; or if I might, yet was I in doubt how my letters might safely come into your hands. But now, my dear brother, forasmuch as I understand by your works, which I have but superficially seen, that we thoroughly agree and wholly consent together in those things which are the grounds and substantial points of our religion, against which the world so furiously rageth in these our days, howsoever in time past by certain bye-matters and circumstances of religion, your wisdom and my simplicity (I grant) hath a little jarred, each of us following the abundance of his own sense and judgment; now, I say, be you assured, that even with my whole heart, God is my witness, in the bowels of Christ I love you in the truth and for the truth's sake, which abideth in us, and, as I am persuaded, shall, by the grace of God, abide in us for evermore.

And because the world, as I perceive, brother, ceaseth not to play his pageant, and busily conspireth against Christ our Saviour, with all possible force and power, exalting high things against the knowledge of God; let us join hands together in Christ, and, if we cannot overthrow, yet to our power, and as much as in us lieth, let us shake those high altitudes, not with carnal, but with spiritual weapons: and withal, brother, let us prepare ourselves to the day of our dissolution, by the which, after the short time of this bodily affliction, by the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ we shall triumph together with him in eternal glory.

I pray you, brother, salute in my name your reverend fellow prisoner, and venerable father, D. C. by whom, since the first day that I heard of his most godly and fatherly constancy, in confessing the truth of the gospel, I have conceived great consolation and joy in the Lord. For the integrity and uprightness of that man, his gravity and innocency, all England, I think, hath known long ago. Blessed be God therefore, which in such abundance of iniquity and decay of all godliness, hath given unto us, in this reverend old age, such a witness for the truth of his gospel. Miserable and hard-hearted is he, whom the godliness and constant confession of so worthy, so grave, and innocent a man, will not move to acknowledge and confess the truth of God.

I do not now, brother, require you to write any thing to me again: for I stand much in fear, lest your letters should be intercepted before they can come to my hands. Nevertheless know you, that it shall be to me great joy to hear of your constancy and fortitude in the Lord's quarrel. And albeit I have not hitherto written unto you, yet have I twice, as I could, sent unto you my mind touching the matter which in your letters you required to know. Neither can I yet, brother, be otherwise persuaded: I see methinks so many perils, whereby I am earnestly moved to counsel you not to hasten the publishing of your works, especially under the title of your own name. For I fear greatly, lest by this occasion both your mouth should be stopped hereafter, and all things taken away from the rest of the prisoners, whereby otherwise, if it so please God, they may be able to do good to many. Farewell in the Lord, my most dear brother; and if there be any more in prison with you for Christ's sake, I beseech you, as you may, salute them in my name. To whose prayers I do most humbly and heartily commend myself and my fellow-prisoners and captives in the Lord, and yet once again, and for ever in Christ, my most dear brother, farewell.

N. RIDLEY.

After this discord, and not a little vexation about vestures, at length, Mr. Hooper entering into his diocese, did there employ his time which the Lord lent him under king Edward's reign, with such diligence, as may be a spectacle to all bishops who shall ever hereafter succeed him, not only in that place, but in whatsoever diocese through the whole realm of England: so careful was he in his cure, that he left neither pains untaken, nor ways unfought, how to train up the flock of Christ in the true word of salvation, continually labouring in the same. Other men are commonly wont, for lucre or promotion's sake, to aspire to bishoprics, some hunting for them, and some purchasing or buying them, as men use to purchase lordships; and when they have them, are loth to leave them, and thereupon also loth to commit that thing by worldly laws, whereby to lose them.

To this sort of men, Dr. Hooper was quite contrary, who abhorred nothing more than gain, labouring always to save and preserve the souls of his flock; who, being bishop of two dioceses, so ruled and guided either of them, and both together, as though he had in charge but one family. No father in his household, no gardener in his garden, nor husbandman in his vineyard, was more or better occupied, than he in his diocese amongst his flock, going about his towns and villages in teaching and preaching to the people there. The time that he had to spare from preaching, he bestowed either in hearing public causes, or else in private study, prayer, and visiting of schools: with his continual doctrine he adjoined due and discreet correction not so much severe to any, as to those who for abundance of riches and wealthy state, thought they might do what they pleased. And doubtless he spared no kind of people, but was indifferent to all, as well rich as poor, to the great shame of many men in these days; whereof we see so many addicted to the pleasing of the great and rich, that in the mean time they have no regard to the meaner sort whom Christ hath bought as dearly as the other. But to return to Dr. Hooper, whose life was such, that to the church and all churchmen, it might be a light and example, to the rest a perpetual lesson and sermon. Finally, how virtuous and good a bishop he was, you may conceive and know evidently by this, that even as he was hated by none but of them which were evil, yet the worst of them all could not reprove his life in any one particular. Nor was this good bishop less exemplary in his private, than in his public character. At home, in his domestic concerns, he exhibited an example of a worthy prelate's life; for he bestowed the most part of his care upon the public flock and congregation of Christ, for which also he spent his blood: yet nevertheless there was nothing wanting in him, to bring up his own children in learning and good manners; insomuch that it is difficult to say, whether he deserved more praise for his fatherly usage at home, or his public conduct abroad. For every where he kept one religion in one uniform doctrine and integrity. So that if you entered into the bishop's palace, you would suppose yourself to have entered into some church or temple. In every corner thereof there was the beauty of virtue, good example, honest conversation, and reading of the holy scriptures. There was not to be seen in his house any courtly rioting or idleness; no pomp, no dishonest word, no swearing, could there be heard: As to the revenues of both his bishoprics, if if any thing surmounted thereof, he saved nothing, but bestowed it in hospitality. Twice I was (says Mr. Fox) in his house at Worcester, where in his common-hall, I saw a table spread with good store of meat, and beset full of beggars and poor people: I asking his servants what this meant, they told me, that every day their lord and master's manner was, to have at dinner a certain number of the poor of the said city by course, who were served by four at a mess, with wholesome meats: and when they were served, (being before examined by him or his deputies, of the Lord's prayer, the articles of their faith, and ten commandments) then he himself set down to dinner, and not before. In this manner Dr. Hooper executed the office of a most careful and vigilant pastor, for the space of two years and more, so long as the state of religion in king Edward's time did safely flourish and take place: and would to God, that all other bishops would use the like diligence, care, and observance in their function. After this, in the reign of queen Mary, religion being subverted and changed, this good bishop was one of the first who was sent for by a pursuivant to be at London; and that for two causes:

First, To answer to Dr. Heath, then appointed bishop of that diocese, who was deprived thereof in king Edward's days, for being a papist.

Secondly, To render an account to Dr. Bonner, bishop of London, for that he in king Edward's time was one of his accusers, in that he shewed himself not conformable to such ordinances as were prescribed to him by the king and his council; openly at St. Paul's Cross. And although the said bishop Hooper was not ignorant of the evils that should happen towards him. (for he was admonished by certain of his friends to get away, and shift for himself) yet he would not prevent them, but tarried still saying, "Once I did flee, and take me to my feet; but now, because I am called to this place and vocation, I am thoroughly persuaded to tarry, and to live and die with my sheep."

When at the day of his appearance, the first of September, he was come to London, before he could see Dr. Heath and Dr. Bonner, he was intercepted, and commanded, violently, against his will, to appear before the queen and his council; to answer certain bonds and obligations, wherein he said he was bound unto her. And when he came before them, Gardiner, bishop of Winchester, received him very opprobriously, railing and rating of him, and accused him of his religion. He again freely and boldly answered, and cleared himself. But he was commanded to ward, (it being declared unto him at his departure, that the cause of his imprisonment was only for certain sums of money, for which he was indebted to the queen, and not for religion): This, how false and untrue it was, shall in it's place more plainly appear.

The next year, being March 19, 1554, he was called again to appear before Winchester, and others of the queen's commissioners: where, what for the bishop, and what for the unruly multitude, when he could not be permitted to plead his cause, he was deprived of his bishoprics. Which how, and in what order it was done, may here be seen from the testimony and report of one, who being present at the doing, committed the same to writing.

The REPORT of a PERSON of good Credit, declaring the Cause of depriving Dr. JOHN HOOPER, BISHOP of GLOUCESTER and WORCESTER, of his BISHOPRICS, March 19, 1554.

FORASMUCH as a rumour is spread abroad of the conversation of my lord chancellor's, between him with other commissioners there appointed, and Dr. Hooper, quite contrary to the truth, and therefore to be judged rather to be risen of malice, for the discrediting of the truth by false suggestions and evil reports, than otherwise: I thought it my duty, being present thereat myself, in writing to set forth the whole effect of the same; partly that the verity thereof may be known to doubtful people; and partly also to advertise them, how uncharitably Dr. Hooper was handled at their hands, who with all humility used himself towards them, desiring, that with patience he might have been permitted to speak: so that had I been in a doubt, which of these two religions to have credited, either that set forth by the king's majesty that is dead, or else that now maintained by the queen's majesty, their irreverent behaviour towards Dr. Hooper, would have moved me the rather to credit his doctrine, than that which they with railing and cruel words defended, considering that Christ was so handled before. And that this which I have written here, was the effect of their discourse, as I acknowledge it to be true myself, so I appeal to all the hearers' consciences that were then present (so they put affection away) for the witness of the same.

The FIRST EXAMINATION of BISHOP HOOPER, before the BISHOPS of WINCHESTER, LONDON, DURHAM, LANDAFF, and CHICHESTER, who were appointed Commissioners; according to the Report of the above-mentioned good man.

AT Dr. Hooper's coming in, the lord chancellor asked whether he was married.

Hooper. Yes, my lord, and will not be unmarried, till death unmarry me.

Durham. That is matter enough to deprive you.

Hooper. It is not, my lord, except you do against the law.

The matter concerning marriage was no more talked of then for some time: but as well the commissioners, such as stood by, began to make such outcries, and laughed, and used such gestures as were unseemly for the place, and for such a matter. Dr. Day, bishop of Chichester, called bishop Hooper hypocrite, with vehement words, and scornful countenance. Bishop Tonstall called him beast; so did Smith, one of the clerks of the council, and several others that stood by. At length the bishop of Winchester said, that all men might live chaste who would, and brought in this text, "There are those that have become eunuchs for the kingdom of heaven, Matt. xix. 12.

Bishop Hooper said, that text proved not, that all men could live chaste, but such to whom it was given; and read the context that goeth before. But there was a clamour and cry, mocking and scorning, with calling him beast, that the text could not be examined. Then bishop Hooper said, that it did appear by the old canons, that marriage was not forbidden unto priests, and named the decrees. But the bishop of Winchester sent for another part, namely, the Clementines, or the Ex-travagants. But bishop Hooper said, that book was not it which he named.

The bishop of Winchester replied, You shall not have any other, until you be judged by this. And then began such a noise, tumult, and speaking together of a great many that favoured not the cause, that nothing was done or spoke orderly or charitably. Afterwards, judge Morgan began to rail at bishop Hooper a long time, with many opprobrious and foul words of his doing at Gloucester, in punishment of men, and said, there was never such a tyrant as he was. After that, Dr. Day, bishop of Chichester, said, that the council of Ancyra, which was before the council of Nice, was against the marriage of priests.

Upon which the lord chancellor cried out, and many with him, that bishop Hooper had never read the councils.

Yes, my lord, said he, and my lord of Chichester, Dr. Day knoweth, that the great council of Nice, by the means of one Paphnutius, decreed, That no minister should be separated from his wife. But such clamours and cries were used, that the council of Nice was not attended to.

After long brutish talk, Tonstall, bishop of Durham, asked bishop Hooper, whether he believed the corporal presence of the sacrament? Who said plainly, that, there was none such, neither did he believe any such thing.

Then the bishop of Durham would read out of a book, (what book it was I cannot tell) but there was such a noise and confused talk on every side, that he did not read. Then the bishop of Winchester asked Dr. Hooper, what authority moved him not to believe the corporal presence? He said, the authority of God's word, and alledged this text, "Whom heaven must hold until the latter day." But the bishop of Winchester would have made that text to serve nothing for his purpose, and said, he might be in heaven, and in the sacrament also.

Dr. Hooper would have opened the text, but all those that stood next about the bishop prevented his speaking with clamours and cries, so that Dr. Hooper was not permitted to say any more against the bishop. Whereupon they bade the notaries write, That he was married, and said, that he would not go from his wife; and that he believed not the corporal presence in the sacrament; wherefore he was worthy to be deprived of his bishopric.

This is the truth of the matter (as far as I can remember) of the confused and troublesome conversation between them, and except hasty and uncharitable words, it is the whole of their discourse at that time.

An ACCOUNT of the severe TREATMENT of BISHOP HOOPER, during near eighteen Months Confinement in the FLEET, written with his own Hand, January 7, 1554.

THE first of September, 1553, I was committed unto the Fleet, from Richmond, to have the liberty of the prison; and within six day after I paid five pounds sterling to the warden for fees, for my liberty; who immediately upon payment thereof, complained unto Stephen Gardiner, bishop of Winchester, and so I was committed to close prison one quarter of a year in the Tower-chamber of the Fleet, and used extremely ill. Then by the means of a good gentlewoman, I had liberty to come down to dinner and supper, not suffered to speak with any of my friends; but as soon as dinner and supper was done, to repair to my chamber again. Notwithstanding, whilst I came down thus to dinner and supper, the warden and his wife picked quarrels with me, and complained untruly of me to their great friend the bishop of Winchester.

After one quarter of a year and somewhat more, Babington the warden, and his wife, fell out with me for the wicked men: and thereupon the warden resorted to the bishop of Winchester, and obtained to put me into the wards, where I have continued a long time, having nothing appointed to me for my bed, but a little pad of straw and a rotten covering, with a tick and a few feathers therein, the chamber being vile and stinking, until by God's means good people sent me bedding to lie on. On one side of which prison, is the sink and filth of the house, and on the other the town ditch, so that the stench of the house hath infected me with sundry diseases.

During which time I have been sick, and the doors, bars, hasps, and chains being all closed, and made fast upon me, I have mourned, called and cried for help; but the warden when he hath known me many times ready to die, and when the poor men men of the wards have called to help me, hath commanded the doors to be kept fast, and charged that none of his men should come at me, saying Let him alone, it were a good riddance of him. And, amongst many other times, he did thus October 18. 1553, as many can witness.

I paid always like a baron to the said warden, as well in fees, as for my board, which was twenty shilling a week, besides my man's table, until I was wrongfully deprived of my bishoprics, and since that time, I have paid him as the best gentleman doth in his house; yet hath he used me worse, and more vilely, than the veriest slave that ever came to the hall commons, (common side of the prison.)

The said warden hath also imprisoned my man, William Downton, and stripped him out of his clothes to search for letters, and could find none, but only a little remembrance of good people's names, that gave me their alms to relieve me in prison; and to undo them also, the warden delivered the same bill unto the said Stephen Gardiner, God's enemy and mine.

I have suffered imprisonment almost eighteen months, my goods, livings, friends, and comfort taken from me; the queen owing me, by just account, fourscore pounds or more. She hath put me in prison, and giveth nothing to keep me, neither is there suffered any one to come at me, whereby I might have relief. I am with a wicked man and woman, so that I see no remedy (saving God's help) but I shall be cast away in prison before I come to judgment. But I commit my just cause to God, whose will be done, whether it be life or death.

SECOND EXAMINATION of Dr. JOHN HOOPER, BISHOP of GLOUCESTER and WORCESTER, before the intolerant GARDINER, BISHOP of WINCHESTER.

THE twenty-second of January, 1555, Babington, the warden of the Fleet, was commanded to bring Mr. Hooper before the bishop of Winchester, with other bishops and commissioners at the said Winchester's house, at St. Mary Overy's: where the bishop of Winchester, in the name of himself and the rest, moved Mr. Hooper earnestly to forsake the evil and corrupt doctrine (as he termed it) preached in the days of king Edward the sixth, and to return to the unity of the catholic church, and to acknowledge the pope's holiness to be head of the same church, according to the determination of the whole parliament, promising, that as he himself, with other his brethren, had received the pope's blessing, and the queen's mercy; even so mercy was ready to be shewed to him and others, if he would arise with them, and condescend to the pope's holiness.

Bishop Hooper answered, That forasmuch as the pope taught doctrines altogether contrary to those of Christ, he was not worthy to be accounted as a member of his church, much less to be head thereof; wherefore he would in no wise condescend to any such usurped jurisdiction, neither esteemed he the church, whereof they call him head, to be the catholic church of Christ: for the church only heareth the voice of her spouse Christ, and flieeth strangers. Howbeit (saith he) if in any point to me unknown, I have offended the queen's majesty, I shall most humbly submit myself to her mercy, if mercy may be had with safety of conscience, and without the displeasure of God.

Answer was made, that the queen would shew no mercy to the pope's enemies. Whereupon Babington was commanded to carry him to the Fleet again: who did so, and shifted him from his former chamber into another, near to the warden's own chamber, where he remained six days: and in the mean time his former chamber was searched by Dr. Martin and others, for writings and books, which Dr. Hooper was thought to have wrote, but none was found.

THIRD EXAMINATION of BISHOP HOOPER, before the BISHOP of WINCHESTER, and other COMMISSIONERS.

JANUARY 28th, the bishop of Winchester, and other commissioners sat in judgment at St. Mary Overy's, where bishop Hooper appeared before them in the afternoon, and there, after much reasoning and disputation, he was commanded aside, till the Rev. Mr. Rogers (who was then come) had been likewise examined. Examinations being ended, the two sheriffs of London were commanded, about four o'clock, to carry them to the Compter in Southwark, there to remain till to-morrow at nine o'clock, to see whether they would relent and come home again to the catholic church. So bishop Hooper went before, with one of the sheriffs, and Mr. Rogers came after with the other; and being out of the churchdoor, Dr. Hooper looked back, and stayed a little till Mr. Rogers drew near, unto whom he said, Come brother Rogers, must we two take this matter first in hand, and begin to fry these faggots? Yes, sir, said Mr. Rogers, by God's grace. Doubt not, said Dr. Hooper, but God will give strength. So going forwards, there was such a press of people in the streets, who rejoiced at their constancy, that they had much ado to pass.

By the way, the sheriff said to the bishop I wonder you was so hasty and quick with my lord chancellor, and did use no more patience: he answered, Mr. Sheriff, I was nothing at all impatient, although I was earnest in my master's cause, and it standeth me so in hand, for it goeth upon life and death, not the life and death of this world only, but also of the world to come. Then they were committed to the keeper of the Compter, and appointed to several chambers, with command that they should not be suffered to speak one with another, neither any one permitted to come to them that night.

Upon the next day following, January 29, at the hour appointed, they were brought again by the sheriffs before the said bishop and commissioners in the church, where they were the day before. And after long and earnest talk, when they perceived that bishop Hooper would by no means condescend unto them, they condemned him to be degraded, and read unto him his condemnation. That done, the Rev. Mr. Rogers was brought before them, and treated in like manner; and both were delivered to the secular power, the two sheriffs of London, who were ordered to carry them to the Clink, a prison not far from the bishop of Winchester's house, and there to remain till night.

When it was dark, bishop Hooper was led by one of the sheriffs, with many bills and weapons, through the bishop of Winchester's house, and over London-bridge, through the city to Newgate, and by the way some of the serjeants were sent before, to put out the costermongers' candles, who used to sit with lights in the streets: either fearing, that the people would have made some attempt to have taken him away from them by force, if they had seen him go to that prison; or else, being burdened with an evil conscience, they thought darkness to be a most fit season for such a business.

But notwithstanding this device, the people having some foreknowledge of his coming, many of them came forth to their doors with lights, and saluted him, praising God for his constancy in the true doctrine which he had taught them, and desiring God to strengthen him in the same to the end. The bishop required the people to make their earnest prayers to God for him, and so went through Cheapside to the place appointed, and was delivered as close prisoner to the keeper of Newgate, where he remained six days, nobody being permitted to come to him, or talk with him, saving his keepers, and such as should be appointed thereto.

During this time, Bonner, bishop of London, and others at his appointment, as Fecknam, Chedsey, Harpsfield, &c. resorted several times unto him, to try if, by any means, they could persuade him to relent, and become a member of their antichristian church. All the ways they could advise they attempted. For, besides the disputations and allegation of testimonies of the scriptures, and of ancient writers wrested to a wrong sense, according to their accustomed manner; they used also all outward gentleness and significations of friendship, with many great promises of worldly wealth; not omitting also most grievous threatenings, if with gentleness, they could not prevail; but they found him always the same man, steadfast and immoveable. When they perceived that they could by no means reclaim him to their purpose, with such persuasions and offers as they used for his conversion, then went they by false rumours and reports of recantations (for it is well known that they and their servants did first spread it abroad) to bring him, and the doctrine of Christ which he professed, in discredit with the people. Which being thus spread abroad, and believed by some of the weaker sort, by reason reason of the often resort of the bishop of London and others; it increased more, and at last came to bishop Hooper's ears, who was greatly grieved thereat, that the people should give credit to such false rumours; having to simple a ground; as may appear by the following letter, which he wrote upon that occasion.

A LETTER,

From BISHOP HOOPER, concerning certain false Rumours spread abroad of his RECANTATION.

THE grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with all them, who unfeignedly look for the coming of our Saviour Christ. Amen.

Dear brethren and sisters in the Lord, and my fellow-prisoners for the cause of God's gospel, I do much rejoice and give thanks unto God for your constancy and perseverance in affliction, unto whom I wish continuance unto the end. And as I do rejoice in your faith and constancy in afflictions that be in prison; even so do I mourn and lament to hear of our dear brethren that yet have not felt such dangers for God's truth, as we have and do feel, and are daily like to suffer more, yea, the very extreme and vile death of the fire: yet such is the report abroad, (as I am credibly informed) that I John Hooper, a condemned man for the cause of Christ, should now after sentence of death, (being prisoner in Newgate, and looking daily for execution) recant and abjure that which heretofore I have preached. And this talk ariseth from this, that the bishop of London and his chaplains resort unto me. Doubtless, if our brethren were as godly as I could wish them, they would think, that in case I did refuse to talk with them, they might have just occasion to say that I was unlearned, and durst not speak with learned men, or else proud and disdainful to speak with them. Therefore to avoid just suspicion of both, I have, and do daily speak with them when they come, not doubting but they report that I am neither proud nor unlearned. And I would with all men to do as I do in this point. For I fear not their arguments, neither is death terrible unto me, praying you to make true report of the same, as occasion shall serve; and that I am more confirmed in the truth which I have heretofore preached, by their coming.

Therefore, you that may send to the weak brethren, pray them that they trouble me not with such reports of recantations as they do. For I have hitherto left all things of the world, and suffered great pains and imprisonment, and I thank God I am as ready to suffer death, as a mortal man can be. It were better for them to pray for us, than to credit or report such rumours that are untrue. We have enemies enough of such as know not God truly. But yet the false report of weak brethren is a double cross. I wish you eternal salvation in Jesus Christ, and also require your continual prayers, that he which hath begun in us, may continue it to the end.

I have taught the truth with my tongue, and with my pen heretofore, and hereafter shortly shall confirm the same by God's grace with my blood. From Newgate, February 2, 1555.

Your brother in Christ,

JOHN HOOPER.

Monday morning, Bonner, bishop of London, came to Newgate, and degraded bishop Hooper; the sentence of his degradation here followeth.

The DEGRADATION of DR. HOOPER, BISHOP of GLOUCESTER and WORCESTER.

IN the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, Amen. Whereas by a definitive sentence from the reverend father in Christ, Stephen, by divine permission, lord bishop of Winchester, against you John Hooper, presbyter of his jurisdiction, on account of heresy and offence notoriously committed within his diocese of Winchester, and of late justly and legally proved; it plainly appears to us, Edmund, bishop of London, that you the aforesaid John Hooper have been and still continue to be an open, obstinate, and incorrigible heretic; and it also appears by the aforesaid sentence that you have been declared and pronounced an heretic of this sort, and have likewise incurred the sentence of the greater excommunication; and it plainly and fully appears that you are to be deposed and degraded from your order, and for these your demerits are to be delivered to the secular power, according to the tenor of the aforesaid sentence, to which we refer ourselves in this affair. We therefore, the aforesaid Edmund, bishop of London, as it concerns us and the university to do our alternate endeavours, in whose diocese you John Hooper have committed the same heresy then, and oftentimes both before and after; for these, I say, and the aforesaid considerations, and that we may execute the aforesaid sentence in a better and more efficacious manner, have thought fit to proceed to the actual degradation of you the aforesaid John Hooper, (your crime and justice so requiring) and so we do really proceed according to the direction of the law, and the laudable custom of former times, that we may rightly and legally deliver you to the secular power, who are unwilling to continue in the pale of the church; and that this ought to be done, we do by these presents declare and pronounce in this our sentence.

After the sentence of degradation thus declared, now let us see the form and manner of their degrading, which here also followeth. But first it is to be noted, that they degrading this blessed bishop, did not proceed against him as a bishop, but only as against a priest, as they termed him; for such as he was, these Baalamites accounted no bishop:

The FORM and MANNER of the said DEGRADATION.

THE fourth day of February, the year above-mentioned, in the chapel of Newgate, Gardiner, bishop of London, there sitting with his notary and several other witnesses, Alexander Andrew the gaoler came in, bringing with him bishop Hooper and the Rev. Mr. Rogers, being condemned before by the lord chancellor, where the said bishop of London, at the request of the bishop of Winchester, proceeded to the degradation of Mr. Hooper and Mr. Rogers, after this form and manner: first, he put upon him all the vestures and ornaments belonging to a priest, with all other things to the same order appertaining, as though, (being revested) they should solemnly execute their office. They being thus apparelled and revested, the bishop began to pluck off, first the outermost vesture, and so by degrees and order coming down to the lowest vesture, which they had only in taking Benet and Collet; and so being stript and deposed, he deprived them of all order, benetit, and privilege belonging to the clergy; and consequently that being done, pronounced, decreed, and declared the said parties so degraded, to be given personally to the secular power, as the sheriffs being for that year, Mr. David Woodroffe, and Mr. William Chetler, who receiving first the Rev. Mr. Rogers at the hands of the bishop, had him away with them, bringing him to the place of execution where he suffered. The witnesses there present were Mr. Harpsfield, archdeacon of London, Robert Cofin, and Robert Willerton, canons of St. Paul's, Thomas Montague, and George How, clerks, Tristram Swadock, and Richard Clumney, sumner, &c.

The same Monday at night, February 4, his keeper gave the bishop a hint that he should be sent to Gloucester to suffer death, whereat he rejoiced very much, lifting up his eyes and hands unto heaven; and praising God that he saw it good to send him among the people, over whom he was pastor, there to confirm with his death the truth which he had before taught them: not doubting but the Lord would give him strength to perform the same to his glory: and immediately he sent to his servant's house for his boots, spurs, and cloak, that he might be in readiness to ride when he should be called.

The next day following, about four o'clock in the morning, before day, the keeper with others came to him and searched him, and the bed wherein he lay, to see if he had written any thing, and then he was led by the sheriffs of London, and their officers, from Newgate to a place appointed, not far from St. Dunstan's church in Fleet-street, where six of the queen's guards were appointed to receive him, to carry him to Gloucester, there to be delivered unto the sheriff, who with the lord Shandois, Mr. Wicks, and other commissioners, were appointed to see execution done. Which guard brought him to the Angel, where he brake his fast with them, eating his meat at that time more liberal than he had used to do a good while before. About break of day he leaped cheerfully on horseback without help, having a hood upon his head, under his hat, that he should not be known, and so he took his journey joyfully towards Gloucester; and by the way the guard inquired of him, where he was accustomed to bait or lodge; but always carried him to another inn.

On the Thursday following, he came to a town in his diocese called Cirencester, fifteen miles from Gloucester, about eleven o'clock, and there dined at a woman's house who had always hated the truth, and spoken all the evil she could of bishop Hooper. This woman, perceiving the cause of his coming, shewed him all the friendship she could, and lamented his case with tears, confessing that she before had often reported, that if he were put to the trial, he would not stand to his doctrine.

After dinner he rode forwards, and came to Gloucester about five o'clock, and a mile without the town was much people assembled, who cried and lamented his his state; inſomuch that one of the guard rode poſt into the town, to require aid of the mayor and ſheriffs, fearing leſt he ſhould have been taken from them. The officers and their retinue repaired to the gate with weapons, and commanded the people to keep their houſes, &c. but there was no man that once gave any ſignification of a reſcue or violence. He lodged at one Ingram's houſe in Glouceſter, and that night (as he had done all the way) he did eat his meat quietly, and ſlept his firſt ſleep ſoundly, as it was reported by the guard and others. After his firſt ſleep, he continued in prayer until morning; and all the day, except a little time at his meals, and when converſing with ſuch as the guard permitted to ſpeak to him, he ſpent in prayer.

Sir Anthony Kingſton, at one time Dr. Hooper's good friend, was appointed by the queen's letters to attend at his execution. As ſoon as he ſaw the biſhop, he burſt into tears. At firſt ſight, Dr. Hooper did not know him; the knight therefore addreſſing the biſhop, ſaid, "Why, my lord, do you not know me, an old friend of your's, Anthony Kingſton?"

Yes, ſir Anthony Kingſton, I do know you well, and am glad to ſee you in health, and do praiſe God for the ſame.

But I am ſorry to ſee you, my lord, in this caſe; for as I underſtand, you are come hither to die. But, alas! conſider that life is ſweet, and death is bitter. Therefore ſeeing life may be had, deſire to live; for life hereafter may do good.

Indeed it is true, Mr. Kingſton, I am come hither to end this life, and to ſuffer death here, becauſe I will not gainſay the truth that I have heretofore taught amongſt you in this dioceſe, and elſewhere; and I thank you for your friendly counſel, although it be not ſo friendly as I could have wiſhed it. True it is, that death is bitter, and life is ſweet: but, alas! conſider that the death to come is more bitter, and the life to come is more ſweet. Therefore for the deſire and love I have to the one, and the terror and fear of the other, I do not ſo much regard this death, nor eſteem this life, but have ſettled myſelf, through the ſtrength of God's holy Spirit, patiently to paſs through the torments and extremities of the fire now prepared for me, rather than to deny the truth of his word, deſiring you and others, in the mean time, to commend me to God's mercy in your prayers.

Well, my lord, returned ſir Anthony, then I perceive there is no remedy, and therefore I will take my leave of you: and I thank God that ever I knew you, for God did appoint you to call me, being a loſt child: and by your good intructions, where before I was both an adulterer and a fornicator, God hath brought me to the forſaking and deteſting of the ſame.

If you have had the grace ſo to do, I do highly praiſe God for it: and if you have not, I pray God you may have, and that you may continually live in his fear. After theſe and many other words, they took leave of each other, Mr. Kingſton with bitter tears, Dr. Hooper with tears alſo trickling down his cheeks. At his departure, biſhop Hooper told him, that all the troubles he had ſuſtained in priſon, had not cauſed him to utter ſo much ſorrow.

The ſame day in the afternoon, a blind boy, after long interceſſion made to the guard, obtained leave to be brought into Dr. Hooper's preſence. The ſame boy not long before had ſuffered imprifonment at Glouceſter for confeſſing of the truth. Dr. Hooper, after he had examined him of his faith, and the cauſe of his imprifonment, beheld him ſtedfaſtly, and (the water appearing in his eyes) ſaid unto him, "Ah! poor boy, God hath taken from thee thy outward ſight, for what reaſon he beſt knoweth: but he hath given thee another ſight much more precious, for he hath endued thy ſoul with the eye of knowledge and faith. God give thee grace continually to pray unto him, that thou loſe not that ſight, for then wouldeſt thou be blind both in body and ſoul."

After him another came, whom the biſhop knew to be a papift, and a wicked man, who appeared to be ſorry for Dr. Hooper's troubles, ſaying, Sir, I am ſorry to ſee you thus. To ſee me! Why art thou ſorry? To ſee you (ſaid the other) in this caſe: for I hear ſay, you are come hither to die. Be ſorry for thyſelf, man, (ſaid Dr. Hooper) and lament thine own wickedneſs; for I am well, I thank God, and death to me for Chriſt's ſake is welcome.

The ſame night the biſhop was committed by the guard (their commiſſion being then expired) into the cuſtody of the ſheriffs of Glouceſter, Jenkins and Bond, who, with the mayor and aldermen, repaired to Dr. Hooper's lodging, and at the firſt meeting ſaluted him, and took him by the hand. Unto whom Dr. Hooper ſpake in this manner. "Mr. Mayor, I give moſt hearty thanks to you, and to the reſt of your brethren, that you have vouchſafed to take me, a priſoner, and a condemned man, by the hand; whereby, to my rejoicing, it is very apparent that your old love and friendship towards me is not altogether extinguished: and I truſt alſo that all the things I have taught you in times paſt, are not utterly forgotten, when I was your biſhop and paſtor. For which moſt true and ſincere doctrine, becauſe I will not now account it falſhood and hereſy, as many other men do, I am ſent hither (as I am ſure you know) by the queen's commands, to die, and am come where I taught it, to confirm it with my blood. And now, Meſſ. Sheriffs, I underſtand by theſe good men, and my good friends (meaning the guard) at whoſe hands I have found ſo much favour and gentleneſs on the road hither, as a priſoner could reaſonably require, (for which alſo I moſt heartily thank them) that I am committed to your cuſtody, as unto them that muſt ſee me brought to-morrow to the place of execution. My requeſt therefore to you ſhall be only, that there may be a quick fire, ſhortly to make an end; and in the mean time I will be as obedient unto you, as yourſelves could wiſh. If you think I do amiſs in any thing, hold up your finger, and I have done. For I am not come hither as one forced or compelled to die; for it is well known, I might have had my life with worldly gain; but as one willing to offer and give my life for the truth, rather than to conſent to the wicked papiftical religion of the biſhop of Rome, received and ſet forth by the magiſtrates in England, to God's high diſpleaſure and diſhonour; and I truſt, by God's grace, to-morrow to die a faithful ſervant of God, and a true obedient ſubject to the queen."

Theſe, and ſuch-like words in effect, biſhop Hooper uſed to the mayor, ſheriffs, and aldermen, whereat many mourned and lamented. Notwithſtanding, the two ſheriffs went aſide to conſult, and were determined to have lodged him in the common gaol of the town, called Northgate, if the guard had not made earneſt interceſſion for him; who declared at large, how quietly, mildly, and patiently, he had behaved himſelf in the way, adding thereto, that any child might keep him well enough, and that they themſelves would rather take pains to watch with him, than that he ſhould be ſent to the common priſon. So it was determined at length he ſhould ſtill remain in Robert Ingram's houſe; and the ſheriffs and the ſerjeants and other officers did appoint to watch with him that night themſelves. His deſire was, that he might go to bed that night betime, ſaying, that he had many things to remember: and ſo he did at five o'clock, and ſlept one ſleep ſoundly, and ſpent the reſt of the night in prayer. After he had got up in the morning, he deſired that no man ſhould be ſuffered to come into the chamber, that he might be ſolitary till the hour of execution.

About eight o'clock came ſir John Bridges, lord Shandois, with a great band of men, ſir Anthony Kingſton, ſir Edmund Bridges, and other commiſſioners appointed to ſee execution done. At nine, Dr. Hooper prepared himſelf to be in readineſs, for the time was at hand. Immediately he was brought down from his chamber by the ſheriffs, who were accompanied with bills, and other weapons. When he ſaw the multitude of weapons, he ſpake to the ſheriffs on this wiſe; Meſſ. Sheriffs (ſaid he) I am no traitor, neither needed you to have made ſuch a buſineſs to bring me to the place where I muſt ſuffer: for if you had ſuffered me, I would have gone alone to the ſtake, and troubled none of you. Afterwards looking upon the multitude of people that were assembled, being by estimation to the number of 7000, (for it was market day, and many came to see his behaviour) he spake unto those that were about him, saying, "Alas! why are these people assembled and come together? Peradventure they think to hear something of me now, as they have in times past: but alas! speech is prohibited me. Notwithstanding, the cause of my death is well known unto them. When I was appointed here to be their pastor, I preached unto them true and sincere doctrine, and that out of the word of God: because I will not now account the same to be heresy and untruth, this kind of death is prepared for me." Having said this, he went forward, led between the two sheriffs, (as it were a lamb to the place of slaughter) in a gown of his host's, his hat upon his head, and a staff in his hand to stay himself withal; for the grief of the Sciatica, which he had taken in prison, caused him somewhat to halt. All the way, being straitly charged not to speak, he could not be perceived once to open his mouth; but beholding the people, who mourned bitterly for him, he would sometimes lift up his eyes towards heaven, and look very cheerfully upon such as he knew: and he was never known, during the time of his being amongst them, to look with so cheerful and ruddy a countenance as he did at that present. When he came to the place appointed where he should die, he smilingly beheld the stake and preparation made for him, which was near unto the great elm-tree over-against the college of priests, where he was wont to preach. The place round about the houses, and the boughs of the tree were filled with spectators; and in the chamber over the college-gate stood the priests of the college. Then he kneeled down (forasmuch as he could not be suffered to speak unto the people) to prayer, and beckoned six or seven times unto one whom he well knew, that he might hear his prayer, and report faithfully the same. When this person came to the good bishop, he (pouring tears upon his shoulders and in his bosom) continued his prayer for the space of half an hour; which prayer was drawn from the whole creed.

Now after he was entered into his prayer, a box was brought and laid before him upon a stool, with his pardon (or at least-wise it was feigned to be his pardon) from the queen, if he would turn. At the sight whereof he cried, If you love my soul, away with it. The box being taken away, the lord Shandois said, Seeing there is no remedy, dispatch him quickly. Mr. Hooper replied, Good my lord, I trust your lordship will give me leave to make an end of my prayers.

Then the lord Shandois said to sir Edmund Bridges' son, who gave ear before to Mr. Hooper's prayer, at his request: Edmund, take heed that he do nothing else but pray: if he do, tell me, and I shall quickly dispatch him.

In the mean time, one or two persons, uncalled, stepped up, who heard the bishop speak the words following.

Bishop HOOPER'S PRAYER.

LORD, I am hell, but thou art heaven; I am a sink of sin, but thou art a gracious God and a merciful redeemer. Have mercy therefore upon me most miserable and wretched offender, after thy great mercy, and according to thine inestimable goodness. Thou art ascended into heaven, receive me hence to be partaker of thy joys, where thou sittest in equal glory with thy Father. For well knowest thou, Lord, wherefore I am come hither to suffer, and why the wicked do persecute this thy poor servant; not for my sins and transgressions committed against thee, but because I will not allow their wicked doings, to the contaminating of thy blood, and to the denial of the knowledge of thy truth, wherewith it did please thee by thy Holy Spirit to instruct me: which, with as much diligence as a poor wretch might, (being thereto called) I have set forth to thy glory. And well seest thou, my Lord and God, what terrible pains and cruel torments are prepared for thy creature; such, Lord, as without thy strength none is able to bear, or patiently to pass. But all things that are impossible with man, are possible with thee. Therefore strengthen me of thy goodness, that in the fire I break not the rules of patience; or else allwage the terror of the pains, as shall seem most to thy glory.

As soon as the mayor saw those men, who reported the foregoing words, they were commanded away, and could not be suffered to hear any more. Prayer being done, bishop Hooper prepared himself for the stake, and put off his host's gown, and delivered it to the sheriffs, requiring them to see it restored unto the owner, and put off the rest of his apparel, unto his doublet and hose, wherein he would have burned. But the sheriffs would not permit that, (such was their greediness) unto whose pleasures (good man!) he very obediently submitted himself; and his doublet, hose, and waistcoat were taken off. Then being in his shirt, he took a point from his hose himself, and trussed his shirt between his legs, where he had a pound of gun-powder in a bladder, and under each arm the like quantity delivered him by the guard. So desiring the people to say the Lord's prayer with him, and to pray for him, (who performed it with tears, during the time of his pains) he went up to the stake; when he was at it, three irons, made to bind him thereto, were brought; one for his neck, another for his middle, and the third for his legs. But he refusing them said, "You have no need thus to trouble yourselves. I doubt not, God will give me strength sufficient to abide the extremity of the fire, without bands: notwithstanding, suspecting the frailty and weakness of the flesh, but having assured confidence in God's strength, I am content you do as you shall think good."

Then the hoop of iron prepared for his middle was brought, which being made somewhat too short, (for his belly was swollen with imprisonment) he thrank and put in his belly with his hand, until it was fastened: but when they offered to have bound his neck and legs with the other two hoops of iron, he refused them, and would have none, saying, I am well assured I shall not trouble you.

Thus being ready, he looked upon the people, of whom he might be well seen, (for he was both tall, and stood also upon a high stool) and beheld round about him, that in every corner there was nothing to be seen but weeping and sorrowful people. Then lifting up his eyes and hands to heaven, he prayed in silence. By and by, he that was appointed to make the fire, came to him, and did ask him forgiveness. Of whom he asked why he should forgive him, saying, that he never knew any offence he had committed against him. O sir, said the man, I am appointed to make the fire. Therein, said Mr. Hooper, thou dost nothing to offend me: God forgive thee thy sins, and do thine office I pray thee. Then the reeds were cast up, and he received two bundles of them in his own hands, embraced them, kissed them, put one of them under each arm, and shewed with his hand how the rest should be bestowed, and pointed to the place where any were wanting.

Command was now given that the fire should be kindled. But because there were not fewer green faggots, than two horses could carry, it kindled not speedily, and was a pretty while also before it took the reeds upon the faggots. At length it burned about him, but the wind having full strength in that place (and being a lowring cold morning) it blew the flame from him, so that he was in a manner little more than touched by the fire.

Within a space after, a few dry faggots were brought, and a new fire kindled with faggots, (for there were no more reeds) and that burned at the nether parts, but had small power above, because of the wind, saving that it did burn his hair, and scorch his skin a little. In the time of which fire, even as at the first flame, he prayed, saying mildly, and not very loud, (but as one without pains) O Jesus, son of David, have mercy upon me, and receive my soul. After the second fire was spent, he wiped both his eyes with his hands, and beholding the people, he said with an indifferent loud voice, For God's love, good people, let me have more fire: and all this while his nether parts did burn; but the faggots were so few, that the flame did not burn strongly at his upper parts.

The third fire was kindled within a while after, which was more extreme than the other two: and then the bladders of gun-powder brake, which did him little the good, they were so placed, and the wind had such power. In this fire he prayed with a loud voice, Lord Jesus have mercy upon me! Lord Jesus have mercy upon me! Lord Jesus receive my spirit! And these were the last words he was heard to utter. But when he was black in the mouth, and his tongue swoln, that he could not speak, yet his lips went till they were shrunk to the gums: and he knocked his breast with his hands, until one of his arms fell off, and then knocked still with the other, while the fat, water, and blood dropped out at his finger ends, until by renewing of the fire his strength was gone, and his hand did cleave fast in knocking to the iron upon his breast. So immediately, bowing forwards, he yielded up his spirit.

Thus was he three quarters of an hour or more in the fire; even as a lamb, patiently bearing the extremity thereof, neither moving forwards, backwards, nor to any side; but having his nether parts burned, and his bowels fallen out, he died as quietly as a child in his bed: and he now reigneth as a blessed martyr in the joys of heaven, prepared for the faithful in Christ before the foundations of the world: for whose constancy all christians are bound to praise God.

A POEM by CONRADE GESNER, on the Martyrdom of Dr. JOHN HOOPER, Bishop of GLOUCESTER and WORCESTER.

HOOPER, unvanquish'd by Rome's cruelties, (Confessing Christ in his last moments) dies:
Whilst flames his body rack, his soul doth fly,
Inflam'd with faith, to immortality:
His constancy on earth has raised his name,
And gave him entrance at the gates of fame,
Which neither storms, nor the cold north-winds blast,
Nor all-devouring time shall ever waste:
For he whom God protects shall sure attain
That happiness, which worldlings seek in vain.
Example take by him, you who profess
Christ's holy doctrines; ne'er the world cares
In hopes of riches; or if fortune frown
With inauspicious looks, be not cast down;
For man ne'er saw, nor can his heart conceive,
What God bestows on them that righteous live.

LETTER I.

From BISHOP HOOPER, when in Prison, to some of his Friends.

THE grace of God be with you, Amen. I did write unto you of late, and told you what extremity the parliament had concluded concerning religion, suppressing the truth, and setting forth the untruth, intending to cause all men by extremity to forswear themselves, and to take again, for the head of the church, him that is neither head nor member of it, but a very enemy, as the word of God and all ancient writers do record: and for lack of law and authority, they will use force and extremity, which have been the arguments to defend the pope and popery, since their authority first began in the world. But now is the time of trial, to see whether we fear more God or man. It was an easy thing to hold with Christ whilst the prince and the world held with him: but now the world hateth him, it is the true trial who be his.

Wherefore in the name, and in the virtue, strength, and power of his Holy Spirit, prepare yourselves in any case to adversity and constancy. Let us not run away when it is most time to fight; remember none shall be crowned, but such as fight manfully; and he that endureth to the end shall be saved. Ye must now turn all your thoughts from the peril you see, and mark the felicity that followeth the peril; either victory in this world of your enemies, or else a surrender of this life to inherit the everlasting kingdom. Beware of beholding too much the felicity or misery of this world, for the consideration and too earnest love or fear of either of them draweth from God.

Wherefore think with yourselves as touching the felicity of the world, it is good; but yet no otherwise than as it standeth with the favour of God. It is to be kept; but yet so far forth as by keeping of it we lose not God. It is good abiding and tarrying still among our friends here; but yet so, that we tarry not there-withal in God's displeasure, and hereafter dwell with the devils in fire everlasting. There is nothing under God but may be kept, so that God, being above all things we have, be not lost.

Of adversity judge the same. Imprisonment is painful, but yet liberty upon evil conditions is more painful. The prisons stink; but yet not so much as sweet houses, where the fear and true honour of God is wanting. I must be alone and solitary: it is better so to be and have God with me, than to be in company with the wicked. Loss of goods is great; but loss of God's grace and favour is greater. I am a poor simple creature, and cannot tell how to answer before noble, learned, and wise men: it is better to make answer before the pomp and pride of wicked men, than to stand naked in the sight of all heaven and earth before the just God at the latter day. I shall die then by the hands of the cruel man: he is blessed that loseth his life full of miseries, and findeth the life of eternal joys. It is pain and grief to depart from goods and friends: but yet not so much, as to depart from grace and heaven itself. Wherefore there is neither felicity nor adversity of this world, that can appear to be great, if it be weighed with the joys or pains in the world to come.

I can do no more, but pray for you; do the same for me, for God's sake. For my part, (I thank the heavenly Father) I have made mine accounts, and appointed myself unto his will; and as he will, so I will by his grace. For God's sake, as soon as ye can, send my poor wife and children some letter from you, and my letter also which I sent of late to D. As it was told me she never had a letter from me since the coming of M. S. unto her, the more to blame the messengers, for I have written divers times. The Lord comfort them, and provide for them; for I am able to do nothing in worldly things. She is a godly and wise woman. If my meaning had been accomplished, she should have had necessary things: but what I meant, God can perform, to whom I commend both her and you all. I am a precious jewel now, being close and daintily kept: for neither mine own man, nor any of the servants of the house may come to me, but my keeper alone, a simple rude man, God knoweth; but I am nothing careful thereof. Fare you well. January 21, 1555.

Your bounden,

JOHN HOOPER.

LETTER II.

From the same to certain GODLY PROFESSORS, instructing them how to behave in the Time of TRIAL, under a woeful Alteration and Change of RELIGION.

THE grace, mercy, and peace of God the Father through our Lord Jesus Christ, be with you, my dear brethren, and with all those that unfeignedly love and embrace his holy gospel, Amen.

It is told me, that the wicked idol, the mass, is established again by law, and passed in the parliament-house. Learn the truth of it, I pray you, and what penalty is appointed in the act to such as speak against it: also whether there be any compulsion to constrain men to be at it. The statute thoroughly known, such as be abroad and at liberty may provide for themselves, and avoid the danger the better. Doubtless there hath not been seen before our time such a parliament as this is, that as many as were suspected to be favourers of God's word, should be banished out of both houses. But we must give God thanks for that truth he hath opened in the time of his blessed servant king Edward VI. and pray unto him that we deny it not, nor dishonour it with idolatry; but that we may have strength and patience rather to die ten times than to deny him once. Blessed shall we be, if ever God makes us worthy of that honour to shed our blood for his name's sake: and blessed then shall we think the parents which brought us into the world, that we should from this mortality be carried into immortality. If we follow the command of St. Paul, that faith, "If ye then be risen again with Christ, seek those things, which are above, where Christ sitteth at the right hand of God;" we shall neither depart from the vain transitory goods of this world, nor from this wretched and mortal life, with so great pain as others do.

Let us pray to our heavenly Father, that we may know and love his blessed will, and the glorious joy prepared for us in time to come, and that we may know and hate all things contrary to his blessed will, and also the pain prepared for the wicked in the world to come. There is no better way to be used in this troublesome time for your consolation, than many times to have assemblies together of such men and women as be of your religion in Christ, and there to take and renew amongst yourselves the truth of your religion, to see what you are by the word of God, and to remember what you were before you came to the knowledge thereof, to weigh and confer the dreams and false lies of the preachers that now preach, with the word of God that retaineth all truth; and by such talk and familiar resorting together, you shall the better find out all their lies that now go about to deceive you, and also both know and love the truth that God hath opened unto us. It is much requisite that the members of Christ comfort one another, make prayers together, confer one with another; so shall you be the stronger, and God's Spirit shall not be absent from you, but in the midst of you, to teach you, to comfort you, to make you wise in all godly things, patient in adversity, and strong in persecution.

You see how the congregation of the wicked, by helping one another, make their wicked religion and themselves strong against God's truth and his people. If you may have some learned man, that can out of the scripture speak unto you of faith, and true honouring of God, also that can shew you the descent of Christ's church from the beginning of it until this day, that you may perceive by the life of our fore-fathers these two things: the one, that Christ's words, who said that all his must suffer persecution and trouble in the world, be true: the other, other, that none of all his, before our time, escaped trouble: then shall you perceive, that it is but a folly for one that professes Christ truly, to look for the love of the world.

Thus shall you learn to bear trouble, and to exercise your religion, and feel indeed that Christ's words be true, "In the world you shall suffer persecution." And when you shall feel your religion indeed, say, you be no better than your forefathers; but be glad, that you may be counted soldiers for this war: and pray to God when you come together, that he will use and order you and your doings in these three ends, which you must take heed to: the first, that you glorify God; the next, that you edify the church and congregation; the third, that you profit your own souls.

In all your doings beware you be not deceived. For although this time be not so bloody and tyrannous, as the time of our forefathers, that could not bear the name of Christ, without danger of life and goods; yet is our time more perilous both for body and soul. Therefore of us Christ said, "Think ye when the Son of man cometh, he shall find faith upon the earth?" He said not, Think ye, ye shall find any man or woman christened; and in name a christian? but he spake of the faith that saveth the christian man in Christ: and doubtless the scarcity of faith is now more (and will, I fear, increase) than it was in the time of the greatest tyrants that ever were; and no marvel why. Read the sixth chapter of St. John's Revelation, and ye shall perceive amongst other things, that at the opening of the fourth seal came out a pale horse, and he that sat upon him was called death, and hell followed. This horse is the time wherein hypocrites and dissemblers entered into the church under the pretence of true religion, as monks, friars, nuns, massing-priests, with such others, that have killed more souls with heresy and superstition, than all the tyrants, that ever killed bodies by fire, sword, or banishment, as it appeareth by his name that sitteth upon the horse, who is called Death: for all that love not Christ, and trust to these hypocrites, live to the devil in everlasting pain, as is declared by him that followeth the pale horse which is hell.

These pale hypocrites have stirred the earthquakes, that is to say, the princes of the world, against Christ's church, and have also darkened the sun, and made the moon bloody, and have caused the stars to fall from heaven, that is to say, have darkened with mists, and daily do darken (as you hear by their sermons) the clear sun of God's most pure word: the moon, which be God's true preachers, which fetch only light at the sun of God's word, are turned into blood, prisons, and chains, that their light cannot shine unto the world as they would: whereupon it cometh to pass, that the stars, that is to say, christian people, fall from heaven, that is, from God's most true word to hypocrisy, most devilish superstition, and idolatry. Let some learned man shew you all the articles of your belief and monuments of christian faith, from the time of Christ hitherto, and you shall perceive that there was never mention of such articles as these hypocrites teach. God blefs you, and pray for me as I do for you.

Out of the Fleet by your brother in Christ,

JOHN HOOPER.

LETTER III.

To Dr. ROBERT FERRAR, Bishop of St. DAVID's, the Rev. Dr. ROWLAND TAYLOR, the Rev. Mr. JOHN BRADFORD, and Archdeacon PHILPOT, Prisoners in the King's Bench, Southwark.

THE grace of God be with you, Amen. I am advertised by divers, as well such as love the truth, as also by such as yet be not come unto it, that you and I shall be carried shortly to Cambridge, there to dispute for the faith, and for the religion of Christ (which is most true) that we have and do profess. I am, as I doubt not you be) in Christ ready, not only to go to Cambridge, but also to suffer, by God's help, death itself in the maintenance thereof. Weston and his accomplices have obtained forth the commission already, and speedily (most like) he will put it in execution. Wherefore, dear brethren, I do advertise you of the thing before for divers causes. The one to comfort you in the Lord, that the time draweth near and is at hand, that we shall testify before God's enemies God's truth. The next, that you should prepare yourselves the better for it. The third, to shew you what ways I think ourselves were best to use in this matter, and also to hear of you your better advice, if mine be not good. Ye know, such as shall be censors and judges over us thirst for our blood, and whether we, by God's help, overcome after the word of God, or by force, and subtilty of our adversaries, be overcome, this will be the conclusion; our adversaries will say, they overcome, and you perceive how they report of those great learned men and godly personages at Oxford.

Wherefore I mind never to answer them, except I have books present, because they not only use false allegation of the doctors, but also a piece of the doctors against the whole course of the doctors' mind. The next, that we may have sworn notaries, to take things spoken indifferently: which will be very hard to have, for the adversaries will have the oversight of all things, and then make their's better than it was, and our's worse than it was. Then if we see that two or three, or more will speak together, or with scoffs and taunts illude and mock us; I suppose it were best to appeal, to be heard before the queen and the whole council, and that would much set forth the glory of God. For many of them know already the truth, many of them err rather of zeal than malice, and the others that be obdurate should be answered fully to their shame, (I doubt not) although to our smart and blood-shedding. For of this I am assured, that the commissioners, appointed to hear us and judge us, mean nothing less than to hear the cause indifferently; for they be enemies unto us and our cause, and be at a point already to give sentence against us: so that if it were possible with St. Stephen to speak so that they could not resist us, or to use such silence and patience as Christ did, they will proceed to revenging.

Wherefore, my dear brethren, in the mercy of Jesus Christ, I would be glad to know your advice this day or to-morrow; for shortly we shall be gone, and I verily suppose that we shall not company together, but be kept one apart from another. They will deny our appeal, yet let us challenge the appeal, and take witness thereof, of such as be present, and require for the difference of hearing and judgment, to be heard either before the queen and the council, or else before all the parliament, as they were used in king Edward's days. Further, for my part I will require both books and time to answer. We have been prisoners now three quarters of a year, and have lacked our books; and our memories, by close keeping and ingratitude of their parts, be not so present and quick as their's be. I trust God will be with us, yea, I doubt not but he will, and teach us to do all things in his cause godly and constantly. If our adversaries, that shall be our judges, may have their purpose, we shall dispute one day, be condemned the next day, and suffer the third day. And yet is there no law to condemn us, (as far as I know) and so one of the convocation-house said this week to Dr. Weston. To whom Weston made this answer, It mattereth not (quoth he) for a law, we have a commission to proceed with them; when they be dispatched, let their friends sue the law.

Now how soon a man may have such a commission at my lord chancellor's hand, you know. It is as hard to be obtained as an indictment for Christ at Caiaphas' hand. Besides that the bishops having the queen so upon their sides, may do all things both without the advice, and also the knowledge of the rest of the lords of the temporality; who at this present have found out the mark that the bishops shot at, and doubtless be not pleased with their doings. I pray you help, that our brother Saunders and the rest in the Marshalsea may understand these things, and send me your answer betime. Judas sleepeth not; neither know we the day nor the hour. The Lord Jesus Christ with the Holy Spirit comfort and strengthen us all. Amen. May 6, Anno 1554.

Your's, and with you unto death in Christ,

JOHN HOOPER.

LETTER IV.

From the Bishop to his Wife ANNE HOOPER, whereby all the true Members of Christ may take Comfort and Courage to suffer Affliction for the Profession of his Holy Gospel.

OUR Saviour Jesus Christ (dearly beloved, and my godly wife) in St. Matthew's gospel said to his disciples, that it was necessary scandals should come: and that they could not be avoided, he perceived as well by the condition of those that should perish and be lost for ever in the world to come, as also by their affliction that should be saved. For he saw the greatest part of the people would condemn and neglect whatsoever true doctrine or godly ways should be shewed unto them, or else receive and use it as they thought good to serve their pleasures, without any profit to their souls, not caring whether they lived as they were commanded by God's word or not; but would think it sufficient to be counted to have the name of a christian man, with such works and fruits of his profession and christianity, as his fathers and elders, after their custom and manner, esteem and take to be good fruits and faithful works, and will not try them by the word of God. These men, by the just judgment of God, be delivered unto the craft and subtilty of the devil, that they may be kept by one scandalous stumbling-block or other, that they never come unto Christ, who came to save those that were lost, as you may see how God delivereth wicked men up unto their own lusts, to do one mischief after another, careless, until they come into a reprobate mind, that forgetteth itself, and cannot know what is expedient to be done, or to be left undone, because they close their eyes, and will not see the light of God's word offered unto them; and being thus blinded, they prefer their own vanities before the truth of God's word. Where such corrupt minds be, there are also corrupt notions and choice of God's honour: so that the mind of man taketh falsehood for truth, superstition for true religion, death for life, damnation for salvation, hell for heaven, and persecution of Christ's members for God's service and honour. And as these men wilfully and voluntarily reject the word of God; even so God most justly delivereth them up to blindness of mind and hardness of heart, that they cannot understand, nor yet consent to any thing that God would have preached, and set forth to his glory, after his own will and word: wherefore they hate it mortally, and of all things most detest God's holy word. And as the devil hath entered into their hearts, that they themselves cannot nor will come to Christ, to be instructed by his holy word; even so can they not abide any other man to be a christian man, and to lead his life after the word of God, but hate him, persecute him, rob him, imprison him, yea, and kill him, whether he be man or woman, if God suffer it. And so much are these wicked men blinded, that they regard no law, whether it be God's or man's, but persecute such as never offended, yea, do evil to those that have prayed daily for them, and with them God's grace.

In their blind fury they have no respect to nature. For the brother persecuteth the brother, the father the son; and most dear friends, in devilish slander and offence, are become most mortal enemies. And no marvel; for when they have chosen sundry masters, the one the devil, the other God, the one shall agree with the other, as God and the devil agree between themselves. For this cause (that the more part of the world doth use to serve the devil under cloaked hypocrisy of God's title) Christ said, it is expedient and necessary, that scandals should come, and many may be advised to keep the little babes of Christ from the heavenly Father. But Christ saith, Wo be unto him by whom the offence cometh: yet is there no remedy, man being of such corruption and hatred towards God, but that the evil shall be deceived, and persecute the good; and the good shall understand the truth, and suffer persecution for it unto the world's end. For as he that was born after the flesh, persecuted in times past him that was born after the spirit, even so it is now. Therefore soasmuch as we live in this life amongst so many great perils and dangers, we must be well assured by God's word how to bear them, and how patiently to take them as they be sent to us from God. We must also assure ourselves, that there is no other remedy for christians in the time of trouble, than Christ himself hath appointed us. In St. Luke he giveth us this commandment, Ye shall possess your lives in patience, saith he. In which words he giveth us both commandment what to do, and also great comfort and consolation in all troubles. He sheweth what is to be done, and what is to be hoped for in trouble: and, when troubles happen, he biddeth us be patient; and in no case violently nor seditiously to resist our persecutors, because God hath such care and charge of us, that he will keep in the midst of all troubles the very hairs of our head, so that one of them shall not fall away without the will and pleasure of our heavenly Father. Whether the hair therefore tarry on the head, or fall from the head, it is the will of the Father. And seeing he hath such care for the hairs of our head, how much more doth he care for our life itself? Wherefore let God's adversaries do what they list, whether they take life or take it not, they can do us no hurt: for their cruelty hath no further power than God permitteth them; and that which cometh unto us by the will of our heavenly Father can be no harm, no loss, neither destruction unto us, but rather gain, wealth, and felicity. For all troubles and adversity that chance to such as be of God, by the will of the heavenly Father, can be none other but gain and advantage.

That the spirit of man may feel these consolations, the giver of them, the heavenly Father, must be prayed unto for the merits of Christ's passion: for it is not the nature of man that can be contented, until it be regenerated and possessed with God's spirit, to bear patiently the troubles of the mind or of the body. When the mind and heart of a man seeth on every side sorrow and heaviness, and the worldly eye beholdeth nothing but such things as be troubles, and wholly bent to rob the poor of what he hath, and also to take from him his life: except the man weigh these brittle and uncertain treasures that be taken from him, with the riches of the life to come, and this life of the body, with the life in Christ's blood, and so for the love and certainty of the heavenly joys contemn all things present, doubtless he shall never be able to bear the loss of goods, life, or any other thing of this world.

Therefore St. Paul giveth a godly and necessary lesson to all men in this short and transitory life, and therein sheweth how a man may best bear the iniquities and troubles of this world; "If ye be risen again with Christ, (saith he) seek the things which are above, where Christ sitteth at the right hand of God the Father." Wherefore, the christian man's faith must be always upon the resurrection of Christ, when he is in trouble; and in that glorious resurrection he shall not only see continual and perpetual joys and consolation, but also the victory and triumph over all persecution, trouble, sin, death, hell, the devil, and all other tyrants and persecutors of Christ, and of Christ's people, the tears and weeping of the faithful dried up, their wounds healed, their bodies made immortal in joy, their souls for ever praising the Lord, in conjunction and society everlasting with the blessed company of God's elect in perpetual joy. But the words of St. Paul in that place, if they be not marked, shall do little profit to the reader or hearer, and give him no patience at all in this impatient and cruel world.

In this first part St. Paul commandeth us, "to think or set our affections on things that are above." When he biddeth us seek the things that are above, he requireth that our minds never cease from prayer and study in God's word, until we see, know, and understand the vanities of this world, the shortness and misery of this life, and the treasures of the world to come, the immortality thereof, the joys of that life, and so never cease seeking, until such time as we know certainly and be persuaded, what a blessed man he is, that seeketh the one and findeth it, and careth not for the other though he lose it; and in seeking to have right judgment between the life present and the life to come, we shall find how little the pains, imprisonment, slanders, lies, and death itself is in this world, in respect of pains everlasting, the prison infernal, and dungeon of hell, the sentence of God's just judgment, and everlasting death.

When a man hath, by seeking the word of God, found out what the things above be, then must he (as St. Paul saith) set his affections upon them. And this commandment is more hard than the other. For man's knowledge many times seeth the best, and knoweth that there is a life to come, better than this life present, (as you may see how daily men and women can praise and commend, yea, and wish for heaven, and to be at rest there) yet they set not their affections upon it: they do more affect and love indeed a trifle of nothing in this that pleaseth their affection, than the treasure of all treasures in heaven, which their own judgment saith is better than all worldly things. "Wherefore we must set our affections on the things that be above;" that is to say, when any thing worse than heaven, upon the earth, offereth itself to be our's, if we will give our good wills to it, and love it in our hearts, then ought we to see by the judgment of God's word, whether we may have the world without offence of God, and such things as be for this worldly life without his displeasure. If we cannot, St. Paul's commandment must take place, "Set your affections on things that are above." If the riches of this world may not be gotten nor kept by God's law, neither our lives be continued without the denial of his honour, we must set our affections upon the riches and life that is above, and not upon things that are on the earth. Therefore this second commandment of St. Paul requireth, that our minds judge heavenly things to be better than things upon the earth, and the life to come better than the life present; so we should chuse them before the other, and prefer them, and have such affection to the best, that in no case we set the worst before it, as the most part of the world doth and hath done, for they chuse the best and prove it, and yet follow the worst.

But these things, my godly wife, require rather thought, meditation, and prayer, than words or talk. They are easy to be spoken of, but not so easy to be used and practised. Wherefore seeing they be God's gifts, and none of our's, to have as our own when we would, we must seek them at our heavenly Father's hand, who seeth, and is privy how poor and wretched we be, and how naked, how spoiled, and destitute of all his blessed gifts we be by reason of sin. He did command therefore his disciples, when he shewed them that they should take patiently the state of this present life full of troubles and persecution, to pray that they might well escape those troubles that were to come, and be able to stand before the Son of man. When you find yourself too much oppressed, (as every man shall be sometimes with the fear of God's judgment) use the 77th Psalm that beginneth, "I will cry unto God with my voice, and he shall hearken unto me." In which Psalm is both godly doctrine and great consolation unto the man or woman that is in anguish of mind.

Use also in such trouble the 88th Psalm, wherein is contained the prayer of such a man, that was brought to extreme anguish and misery, and being vexed with adversaries and persecutions, saw nothing but death and hell. And although he felt in himself, that he had not only man, but also God angry towards him; yet he by prayer humbly resorted unto God.

We must not also murmur against God, but always say his judgments are right and just, and rejoice that it pleaseth him by troubles to use us as he used heretofore such as he most loved in this world. "Be glad, and rejoice, for your reward is great in heaven." His promises shall (by God's grace) work both consolation and patience in afflicted christians. And when our Saviour Christ hath willed men in trouble to be content and patient, because God in the end of trouble in Christ hath ordained eternal consolation; he useth also to take from us all shame and rebuke, as though it were not an honour to suffer for Christ, because the wicked world doth curse and abhor such poor troubled christians. Wherefore Christ placeth all his honourably, and saith, "Even so persecuted they the prophets that were before you." We may also see with whom the afflicted for Christ's sake be esteemed, by St. Paul to the Hebrews, where the number of the blessed and glorious company of saints appears now to our faith in heaven, in joy: yet in the letter, for the time of this life, in such pains and contempt as was never more. Let us therefore consider both them and all other things of the world since the fall of man, and we shall perceive nothing to come to perfection, but with such confusion and disorder to the eye of the world, as though things were rather lost for ever, than like to come to any perfection at all. For of godly men, who ever came to heaven (no not Christ himself) until such time as the world had thought verily, that both he and all his had been clean destroyed and cast away: as the wife man saith of the wicked people, "We thought them to be fools, but they are in peace."

We may learn by things that nourish and maintain us, both meat and drink, what loathsomeness and (in a manner) abhorring they come unto, before they work their perfection in us. From life they are brought to the fire, and clean altered from what they were when they were alive; from the fire to the trencher and knife, and all hacked; from the trencher to the mouth, and as small ground as the teeth can grind them; and from the mouth into the stomach, and there so boiled and digested before they nourish, that whosoever saw the same, would loath and abhor his own nourishment, before it came to it's perfection.

Is it then any marvel if such christians as God delighteth in, be so mangled and defaced in this world, which is the kitchen and mill to boil and grind the flesh of God's people in, till they achieve their perfection in the world to come? And as a man looketh for the nutriment of his meat when it is full digested, and not before; so must he look for his salvation when he hath passed this troublesome world, and not before. Raw flesh is not meat wholesome for man: and unmortified men and women be not creatures meet for God. Therefore Christ saith, that his people must be broken, and all be torn in the mill of this world, and so shall they be most fine meal unto the heavenly Father. And it shall be a christian man's part, and the duty of a mind replenished with the Spirit of God, to mark the order of God in all his things, how he dealeth with them, and how they suffer, and be content to let God do his will upon them, as St. Paul saith, "They wait until the number of the elect be fulfilled, and never be at rest, but look for the time when God's people shall appear in glory."

We must therefore patiently suffer, and willingly attend upon God's doings, although they seem clean contrary, after our judgment, to our wealth and salvation: as Abraham did, when he was bid to offer his son Isaac, in whom God promised the blessing and multiplying of his seed. Joseph at the last came to that which God promised him, although in the mean time, after the judgment of the world, he was never like to be (as God said he should be) lord over his brethren. When Christ would make the blind man to see, he put clay upon his eyes, which, after the judgment of man, was a means rather to make him doubly blind, than to give him his sight; but he obeyed, and knew that God could work his desire, what means soever he used contrary to man's reason: and as touching this world, he useth all his after the same sort. If any smart, his people be the first; if any suffer shame, they begin; if any be subject to slander, it is those that he loveth; so that he sheweth no face or favour, nor love, almost in this world outwardly to them, but layeth clay upon their sore eyes that be sorrowful; yet the patient man seeth (as St. Paul saith) life hid under these miseries and adversities, and sight under the foul clay; and in the mean time he hath the testimony of a good conscience, and believeth God's promises to be his consolation in the world to come, which is more worthy unto him, than all the world is worth besides: and blessed is the man in whom God's Spirit beareth record that he is a child of God, whatsoever troubles he suffer in this troublesome world.

And judge things indifferently, my good wife, the troubles be not yet generally, as they were in our good father's time, soon after the death and resurrection of our Saviour Jesus Christ, whereof he spake in St. Matthew. Of which place you and I have taken many times great consolation, and especially of the latter part of the chapter, wherein is contained the last day and end of all troubles (I doubt not) both for you and me, and for such as love the coming of our Saviour Christ to judgment. Remember therefore that place, and mark it again, and you shall in this time see this great consolation, and also learn much patience. Were there ever such troubles, as Christ threatened upon Jerusalem? Who was then best at ease? The apostles that suffered in body persecution, and gathered of it ease and quietness in the promises of God. And no marvel, for Christ saith, "Lift up your heads, for your redemption is at hand;" that is to say, your eternal rest approacheth and draweth near. The world is stark blind, and more foolish than foolishness itself, and so are the people of the world. For when God saith, trouble shall come, they will have ease. And when God saith, be merry and rejoice in trouble, we lament and mourn, as though we were cast-aways. But this our flesh (which is never merry with virtue, nor sorry with vice; never laugheth with grace, nor ever weepeth with sin) holdeth fast with the world, and letteth God slip. But, my dearly beloved wife, you know how to perceive and to beware of the vanity and crafts of the devil well enough in Christ. And that you may the better have patience in the Spirit of God, read again the 24th of St. Matthew, and mark what difference is between the destruction of Jerusalem, and the destruction of the whole world, and you shall see, that then there were left alive many offenders to repent: but at the latter day there shall be absolute judgment, and sentence (never to be revoked) of eternal life and eternal death upon all men: and yet towards the end of the world we have nothing so much extremity as they had then; but even as we are able to bear. So doth the merciful Father lay upon us now imprisonment, (and as I suppose for my part shortly, death) now spoil of goods, loss of friends, and the greatest loss of all, the knowledge of God's word. God's will be done. I wish in Christ Jesus our only Mediator and Saviour, your constancy and consolation, that you may live for ever and ever, whereof in Christ I doubt not; to whom, for his most blessed and painful passion, I commit you, Amen. Octob. 13. 1553.

To a PIOUS WIDOW.

THE grace of God, and the comfort of his Holy Spirit be with you, and all them that unfeignedly love his holy gospel, Amen. I thank you, dear sister, for your most loving remembrance: and although I cannot recompense the same, yet do I wish with all my heart, that God would do it, requiring you not to forget your duty towards God in these perilous days, in which the Lord will try us. I trust you do increase, by reading of the scriptures, the knowledge you have of God, and that you diligently apply yourself to follow the same: for the knowledge helpeth not, except the life be according thereunto. Further, I do heartily pray you, to consider the state of your widowhood, and if God shall put in your mind to change it, remember the saying of St. Paul, 1 Cor. vii. "It is lawful for the widow or maiden to marry to whom they list, so it be in the Lord:" that is to say, to such a one as is of Christ's religion. Dearly beloved in Christ, remember these words, for you shall find thereby great joy and comfort, if you change your state. Whereof I will, when I have better leisure, (as now I have none at all) further advertise you. In the mean time I commend you to God, and the guiding of his good Spirit, who establish and confirm you in all well-doing, and keep you blameless to the day of the Lord. Watch and pray, for this day is at hand.

Your's, assured in Christ,
JOHN HOOPER.

L E T T E R VI.

From the BISHOP of GLOUCESTER, to all his Brethren, Relievers, and Helpers, in the City of LONDON.

THE grace of God be with you, Amen. I have received from you (dearly beloved in our Saviour Jesus Christ) by the hands of my servant William Downton, your liberality, for the which I most heartily thank you, and I praise God highly in you and for you, who hath moved your hearts to shew this kindness towards me, praying him to preserve you from all famine, scarcity, and lack of the truth of his word, which is the lively food of your souls, as you preserve my body from hunger, and other necessities which should happen unto me, were it not cared for by the benevolence and charity of godly people. Such as have taken all worldly goods and lands from me, and spoiled me of all that I had, have imprisoned my body, and appointed not one halpenny to feed or relieve me withal: but I do forgive them and pray for them daily in my poor prayer unto God, and from my heart I wish their salvation, and quietly and patiently bear their injuries, wishing no farther extremity to be used towards us. Yet if the contrary seem best unto our heavenly Father, I have made my reckoning, and fully resolved myself to suffer the uttermost that they are able to do against me, yea, death itself, by the aid of Christ Jesus, who died the most vile death of the cross for us wretches and miserable sinners. But of this I am assured, that the wicked world, with all their force and power, shall not touch one of the hairs of our heads without leave and licence of our heavenly Father, whose will be done in all things. If he will life, life be it: if he will death, death be it. Only we pray, that our wills may be subject unto his will, and then although both we and all the world see no other thing but death, yet if he think life best, we shall not die, no, although the sword be drawn out over our heads: as Abraham thought to kill his son Isaac, yet when God perceived that Abraham had surrendered his will to God's will, and was content to kill his son, God then saved his son.

Dearly beloved, if we are contented to obey God's will, and for his commandment's sake to surrender our goods and our lives to be at his pleasure, it maketh no matter whether we keep goods and life, or lose them. Nothing can hurt us that is taken from us for God's cause, nor can any thing at length do us good, that is preserved contrary to God's commandment. Let us wholly suffer God to use us and our's after his holy wisdom, and beware we neither use nor govern ourselves contrary to his will by our own wisdom: for if we do, our wisdom will at length prove foolishness. It is kept to no good purpose, that we keep contrary unto his commandments. It can by no means be taken from us, that he should tarry with us. He is no good christian that ruleth himself and his, as worldly means serve: for he that so doth shall have as many changes as chanceth in the world. To-day with the world he shall like and praise the truth truth of God, to-morrow as the world will, so will he like and praise the falshood of man; to-day with Christ, and to-morrow with Antichrist. Wherefore, dear brethren, as touching your behaviour towards God, use both your inward spirits and your outward bodies, your inward and your outward man (I say) not after the manners of men, but after the infallible word of God.

Restrain from evil in both; and glorify your heavenly Father in both. For if you think you can inwardly in the heart serve him, and yet outwardly serve with the world in external service the thing that is not God, you deceive yourselves; for both the body and the soul must together concur in the honour of God, as St. Paul plainly teacheth, 1 Cor. vi. For if an honest wife be bound to give both heart and body to faith and service in marriage, and if an honest wife's faith in the heart cannot stand with a whorish or defiled body outwardly; much less can the true faith of a christian, in the service of christianity, stand with the bodily service of external idolatry: for the mystery of marriage is not so honourable between man and wife, as it is between Christ and every christian man, as St. Paul saith.

Therefore, dear brethren, pray to the heavenly Father, that as he spared not the soul nor the body of his dearly beloved Son, but applied both of them with extreme pain, to work our salvation both of body and soul; so he will give us all grace to apply our bodies and souls to be servants unto him: for doubtless he requirerh as well the one as the other, and cannot be discontented with the one and well pleased with the other. Either he hateth both, or loveth both; he divideth not his love to one, and his hatred to the other. Let not us therefore, good brethren, divide ourselves, and say our sou's serve him, whatsoever our bodies do to the contrary for civil order and policy.

But, alas! I know by myself, what troubleth you, that is, the great danger of the world, that will revenge (you think) your service to God with sword and fire, with loss of goods and lands. Put, dear brethren, weigh of the other side, that your enemies and God's enemies shall not do so much as they would, but as much as God shall suffer them, who can trap them in their own counsels, and destroy them in the midst of their furies. Remember you be the workmen of the Lord, and called into his vineyard, there to labour till evening tide, that you may receive your penny, which is more worth than all the kingdoms of the earth. But he that calleth us into his vineyard, hath not told us how sore and how fervently the sun shall trouble us in our labour: but hath bid us labour, and commit the bitterness thereof unto him, who can and will so moderate all afflictions, that no man shall have more laid upon him, than in Christ he shall be able to bear. Upon whose merciful tuition and defence I commend both your souls and bodies. September 2, anno 1554.

Your's, with my poor prayer,

JOHN HOOPER.

LETTER VII.

To a MERCHANT, from whom the BISHOP received great Consolation and Comfort, during the Time of his IMPRISONMENT in the FLEET.

GRACE, mercy, and peace in Christ Jesus our Lord. I thank God and you for the great help and consolation I have received in the time of adversity by your charitable means; but most rejoiced that you be not altered from truth, although falshood cruelly seeketh to destroy her. Judge not, my brother, truth by outward appearance; for truth now worse appeareth, and more vilely is rejected than falshood. Leave the outward shew, and see by the word of God what truth is, and accept truth and dislike her not, though man call her falshood. As it is now, so it hath been heretofore, the truth rejected and falshood received. Such as have professed truth, for truth have smarted, and the friends of falshood laughed them to scorn. The trial of both hath been by contrary success: the one having the condemnation of truth by man, but the condemnation of falshood by God, flourishing for a time, with endless destruction; the other afflicted a little season, but ending with immortal joys. Wherefore, dear brother, ask and demand of your book, the testament of Jesus Christ, in those woful and wretched days, what you should think, and what you should rely upon for a certain truth, and whatsoever you hear taught, try it by your book, whether it be true or false. The days are dangerous and full of peril, not only for the world and worldly things, but for heaven and heavenly things. It is a trouble to lose the treasure of this life, but yet a very pain, if it be kept with the offence of God. Cry, call, pray, and in Christ daily require help, succour, mercy, wisdom, grace, and defence, that the wickedness of this world prevail not against us. We began well, God preserve us unto the end. I would write more often unto you, but I do perceive you are at so much charges with me, that I fear you would think when I write, I crave. Send me nothing till I send to you for it; and so tell the good men your partners: and when I need, I will be bold with you. December 3, 1554.

Your's, with my prayer,

JOHN HOOPER.

LETTER VIII.

From the same, to Mrs. WILKINSON, a Woman hearty in God's Cause, and who afterwards died in Exile, at FRANCKFORT.

THE grace of God; and the comfort of his Holy Spirit be with you. Amen.

I am very glad to hear of your health, and do thank you for your loving tokens. But I am a great deal more glad to hear how christianly you avoid idolatry, and prepare yourself to suffer the extremity of the world, rather than to endanger yourself to God. You do as you ought to do in this behalf; and in suffering of transitory pains, you shall avoid permanent torments in the world to come. Use your life; and keep it with as much quietness as you can, so that you offend not God. The ease that cometh of his displeasure, turneth at length to unspeakable pains; and the gains of the world, with the loss of his favour, are beggary and wretchedness. Reason is to be amended in this cause of religion; for it will chuse and follow an error with the multitude, if it may be allowed, rather than turn to faith and follow the truth with the people of God. Moses found the same fault in himself, and did amend it; chusing rather to be afflicted with the people of God, than to use the liberty of the king's daughter, that accounted him as her son. Pray for contentment and peace of the spirit, and rejoice in such troubles as shall happen to you for the truth's sake: for in that part Christ saith, You are happy. Pray also for me, I pray you, that I may do in all things the will of our heavenly Father: to whose tuition and defence I commend you.

LETTER IX.

To Mr. HALL and his WIFE, whom the BISHOP files his DEAR FRIENDS in GOD, and exhorts to stand fast in the TRUTH.

THE grace of God be with you, Amen. I thank you for your loving and gentle friendship at all times, praying to God to shew unto you such favour, that whatsoever trouble and adversity happen, you go not back from him. These days are dangerous and full of peril: but yet let us comfort ourselves in calling to remembrance the days of our forefathers, upon whom the Lord sent such troubles, that many hundreds, yea, many thousands, died for the testimony of Jesus Christ, both men and women, suffering with patience and constancy as much cruelty as tyrants could devise, and so departed out of this miserable world to the bliss everlasting, where now they remain for ever, looking always for the end of this sinful world, when they shall receive their bodies again in immortality, and see the number of the elect associated with them in full and consummate joys: and as virtuous men suffering martyrdom, and tarrying a little while in this world with pains, by and by rested in joys everlasting; and as their pains ended their sorrows, and began ease, so did their constancy and steadfastness animate and confirm all good people in the truth, and gave them encouragement even to suffer the like, rather than to close with the world, and consent unto wickedness and idolatry. Wherefore, my dear friends, seeing God of his part hath illuminated you with the same gift and knowledge of true faith, wherein the apostles and evangelists, and all martyrs suffered most cruel death; thank him for his grace in knowledge, and pray unto him for strength and perseverance, that through your own fault you be not ashamed or afraid to confess it. Yet you are in the truth, and the gates of hell shall never prevail against it, nor Antichrist with all his imps can prove it to be false. They may kill and persecute, but never overcome. Be of good comfort, and fear God more than man. This life is short and miserable; happy are they that can spend it to the glory of God. Pray for me, as I do for you, and commend me to all good men and women. December 22, 1554.

Your brother in Christ,

JOHN HOOPER.

LETTER X.

To Mrs. ANNE WARCOP, whom the BISHOP files his DEARLY BELOVED SISTER in the LORD.

THE grace of God be with you, Amen. I thank you for your loving token. I pray you burthen not yourself too much. It were meet for me rather to bear a pain, than to be a hindrance to many. I did rejoice at the coming of this bearer, to understand of your constancy, and how that you are fully resolved, by God's grace, rather to suffer extremity, than to go from the truth of God which you have professed. He that gave you grace to begin so infallible a truth, will follow you in the same unto the end. But, my loving sister, as you are travelling this perilous journey, take this lesson with you, practised by wise men; whereof you may read in the second of St. Matthew's gospel. Such as travelled to find Christ, followed only the star, and as long as they saw it, they were assured they were in the right way, and had great mirth in their journey. But when they entered into Jerusalem, whereas the star led them not thither, but unto Bethlehem, and there asked the citizens the things that the star shewed before; as long as they tarried in Jerusalem, and would be instructed where Christ was born! they were not only ignorant of Bethlehem, but also lost the sight of the star that led them before. Whereof we learn, in any case, whilst we are going in this life to seek Christ that is above, to beware that we lose not the star of God's word, that is the only mark that sheweth us where Christ is, and which way we may come unto him. But as Jerusalem stood in the way, and was an impediment to these wise men; so doth the synagogue of Antichrist, that beareth the name of Jerusalem, which by interpretation is called the vision of peace, and amongst the people now is called the catholic church, stand in the way that pilgrims must go by through this world to Bethlehem, the house of saturity and plentifulness, and is an impediment to all christian travellers; yea, and except the more grace of God be, will keep the pilgrims still in her, that they shall not come where Christ is at all. And to stay them indeed, they take away the star of light, which is God's word, that it cannot be seen: as you may see how the celestial star was hid from the wise men, when they asked of the pharisees at Jerusalem, where Christ was born. You may see what great dangers happened unto these wise men, whilst they were learning of liars, where Christ was. First, they were out of their way, and next they lost their guide and conductor, the heavenly star. Christ is mounted from us into heaven, and there we seek him, (as we say) let us go thitherward by the star of his word, and beware we happen not to come into Jerusalem, the church of men, and ask for him. If we do, we go out of the way, and lose also our conductor and guide that only leadeth us straight thither.

The poets write in fables, that Jason, when he fought with the dragon in the isle of Colchis, was preserved by the medicines of Medea, and so won the golden fleece. And they write also that Phaeton, whom they feign to be the son and heir of the high god Jupiter, would needs upon a day have the conduction of the sun round about the world; but, as they feigned, he missed of the accustomed course: whereupon when he went too high, he burned heaven; and when he went too low, he burned the earth and the water. These prophane histories do shame us that are christian men. Jason against the poison of the dragon used only the medicine of Medea. What a shame is it for a christian man against the poison of the devil, heresy, and sin, to use any other remedy than Christ and his word? Phaeton, for lack of knowledge, was afraid of every sign of the Zodiack, that the sun passeth by: wherefore he now went too low, and now too high, and at length fell down and drowned himself in the sea. Christian men for lack of knowledge, and for fear of such dangers as they must needs pass by, go clean out of order, and at length fall into the pit of hell.

Sister, take heed; you shall in your journey towards heaven meet with many a monstrous beast: have the salve of God's word therefore ready. You shall meet husband, children, lovers, and friends, that shall, if God be not with them, (as God be praised he is, I would it were with all other alike) be very lets and impediments to your purpose. You shall meet with slander and contempt of the world, and be accounted ungracious and ungodly; you shall hear and meet with cruel tyranny to do you all extremities; you shall now and then see the troubles of your own conscience, and feel your own weakness; you shall hear that you be cursed by the sentence of the catholic church, with such like terrors: but pray to God, and follow the star of his word, and you shall arrive at the port of eternal salvation, by the merits only of Jesus Christ: to whom I commend you, and all your's most heartily.

Your's in Christ,
JOHN HOOPER.

To these letters of bishop Hooper, we shall annex one, written by the famous Henry Bullinger, of whom mention has been made in the beginning of the bishop's life.

A L E T T E R

From the learned HENRY BULLINGER, chief Superintendent in the City of ZURICH, in SWITZERLAND, to BISHOP HOOPER.

TO the most Rev. Father, Dr. John Hooper, Bishop of Worcester and Gloucester, and now a prisoner for the gospel of Jesus Christ, my fellow elder, and most dear brother in England. The heavenly Father grant unto you, and to all those which are in bonds and captivity for his name's sake, grace and peace through Jesus Christ our Lord, with wisdom, patience, and fortitude of the Holy Ghost.

I have received from you two letters, my most dear brother, the former in the month of September of the year past, the latter in the month of May in this present year, both written out of prison. But I doubting lest I should make answer to you in vain, whilst I feared that my letters should never come into your hands, or else increase and double your sorrow, did refrain from the duty of writing. In which thing I doubt not but you will have me excused, especially seeing you did not vouchsafe, no not once in a whole year, to answer to my whole volumes, rather than letters, whereas I continued still notwithstanding in writing unto you: as also at this present, after I heard you were cast in prison, I did not refrain from continual prayer, beseeching our heavenly Father, through our only mediator, Jesus Christ, to grant unto you and to your fellow-prisoners, faith and constancy unto the end. Now is that thing happened unto you, (my brother) the which we did oftentimes prophesy unto ourselves, at your being with us, should come to pass, especially when we did talk of the power of Antichrist, and of his felicity and victories. For you know the saying of Daniel, his power shall be mighty, but not in his strength, and he shall wonderfully destroy and make havock of all things, and shall prosper and practise, and he shall destroy the mighty and the holy people after his own will. You know what the Lord warned us of before-hand by Matthew, in the 10th chapter, by John in the 15th chapter, and the 16th, and also what that chosen vessel St. Paul hath written in the second of Timothy and the third chapter. Wherefore I do nothing doubt (by God's grace) of your faith and patience, whilst you know that those things which you suffer are not looked for, or come by chance; but that you suffer them in the best, truest, and most holy quarrel: for what can be more true and holy than our doctrine, which the papists, those worshippers of Antichrist, do persecute? All things touching salvation we attribute unto Christ alone, and to his holy institutions, as we have been taught of him and of his disciples: but they would have even the same things to be communicated, as well to their Antichrist, and to his institutions. Such we ought no less to withstand, than we read that Elias withstood the Baalites. For if Jesus be Christ, then let them know, that he is the fulness of his church; and that perfectly: but if Antichrist be king and priest, then let them exhibit unto him that honour. How long do they halt on both sides? Can they give unto us any one that is better than Christ? Or who shall be equal with Christ, that may be compared with him, except it be he whom the apostle calleth the adversary? But if Christ be sufficient for his church, what needeth this patching and piecing? But I know well enough, I need not use these disputations with you, who are sincerely taught, and have taken root in Christ, being persuaded that you have all things in him, and that we in him are made perfect.

Go forwards therefore constantly to confess Christ, and to defy Antichrist, being mindful of this most holy and most true saying of our Lord Jesus Christ; He that overcometh shall possess all things, and I will be his God, and he shall be my son; but the fearful, and the unbelieving, and the murderers, and whoremongers, and forcerers, and idolaters, and all liars, shall have their part in the lake which burneth with fire and brimstone, which is the second death. The first death is soon overcome, although a man must burn for the Lord's sake: for they say well that do affirm this our fire to be scarcely a shadow of that which is prepared for unbelievers, and them that fall from the truth. Moreover, the Lord granteth unto us, that we may easily overcome by his power the first death, the which he himself did taste and overcome; promising withal such joys as shall never have end, unspeakable, and passing all understanding, the which we shall possess as soon as ever we depart hence. For so again saith the angel of the Lord; If any man worship the beast and his image, and receive his mark in his forehead, or in his hand, the same shall drink of the wrath of God; yea, of the wine which is poured into the cup of his wrath, and he shall be tormented in fire and brimstone before the holy angels, and before the Lamb: and the smoke of their torment shall ascend evermore, and they shall have no rest day nor night, which worship the beast and his image, and whosoever receiveth the print of his name. Here is the patience of saints; here are they that keep the commandments of God, and the faith of Jesus. To this he addeth by and by; I heard a voice saying to me, Write, blessed are the dead that die in the Lord, from henceforth, or speedily, they be blessed, John v. even so saith the Spirit; for they rest from their labours, but their works follow them: for our labour shall not be frustrate or in vain.

Therefore seeing you have such a large promise, be strong in the Lord, fight a good fight, be faithful to the Lord unto the end: consider that Christ the Son of God is your captain, and fighteth for you, and that all the prophets, apostles, and martyrs, are your fellow-soldiers. They that persecute and trouble us, are men sinful and mortal, whose favour a wise man would not buy with the value of a farthing: and besides that, our life is frail, short, brittle, and transitory. Happy are we, if we depart in the Lord, who grant unto you, and to all your fellow-prisoners, faith and constancy. Commend me to the most reverend fathers and holy confessors of Christ, Dr. Crammer, bishop of Canterbury, Dr. Ridley, bishop of London, and the good old father Dr. Latimer. Them and all the rest of the prisoners with you for the Lord's cause, salute in my name, and in the name of all my fellow-ministers, the which do speak unto you the grace of God, and constancy in the truth.

Concerning the state of our church, it remaineth even as it was when you departed from us into your country. God grant we may be thankful to him, and that we do not only profess the faith with words, but also express the same effectually with good works, to the praise of our Lord. The word of God increaseth daily in that part of Italy that is near unto us, and in France.

In the mean while the godly sustain grievous persecutions, and with great constancy and glory, through torments they go unto the Lord. I and all my household, with my son-in-law and kinsmen, are in good health in the Lord. They do salute you, and pray for your constancy, being sorrowful for you and the rest of the prisoners. There came to us English students, both godly and learned. They are received of our magistrate. Ten of them dwell together, the rest remain here and there with good men. Amongst others, Mr. Thomas Lever is dear unto me, and familiar. If there be any thing wherein I may do any service to your wife and children, they shall have me wholly at commandment: whereof I will write also to your wife, for I understand she abideth at Franckfort. Be strong and merry in Christ, waiting for his deliverance; when, and in what sort it shall seem good unto him. The Lord Jesus shew pity upon the realm of England, and illuminate the same with his Holy Spirit, to the glory of his name, and the salvation of souls. The Lord Jesus preserve and deliver you from all evil, with all them that call upon his name. Farewel, and farewel eternally. The 10th of October, Anno 1554, from Zurich.

C H A P. III.

HISTORY of the LIFE, SUFFERINGS, and MARTYRDOM, of the REV. DR. ROWLAND TAYLOR, VICAR of HADLEY, in SUFFOLK, under the cruel TYRANNY of STEPHEN GARDINER, BISHOP of WINCHESTER, and in the BLOODY REIGN of MARY I. This VALIANT MARTYR was burned at ALDHAM-COMMON, February 9, 1555.

THE town of Hadley was one of the first that received the word of God, at the preaching of the Rev. Thomas Bilney; by whose industry the gospel of Christ took such root there, that a great number became exceeding well learned in the holy scriptures, as well women as men.

In this parish, Dr. Rowland Taylor was a vicar, a man of eminent learning, and who had been admitted to the degree of doctor of the civil and canon law.

His attachment to the pure and uncorrupted principles of christianity recommended him to the favour and friendship of Dr. Cranmer, archbishop of Canterbury, with whom he lived a considerable time, till through his interest he obtained the living of Hadley. This charge he attended with the utmost diligence and assiduity, recommending and enforcing the doctrines of the gospel not only by his judicious discourses from the pulpit, but also by the whole tenor of his life and conversation. His faith was sound and consequently productive of good works; that faith indeed which in scripture is deemed the gift of God, is always known by its fruits, according to James ii. 26, "For as the body without the spirit is dead, so faith without works is dead also."

Thus continued Dr. Taylor promoting the interest of the great Redeemer, and the souls of mankind, both by his preaching and example during the reign of king Edward VI. but on his demise and the succession of queen Mary to the throne, he escaped not the cloud that burst on so many beside; for two of his parishioners, Foster, an attorney, and Clark, a tradesman, out of blind zeal, resolved that mass should be celebrated in all its superstitious forms, in the parish church of Hadley, on Monday before Easter; nay, they had even caused an altar to be built in the chancel for that purpose, which being pulled down by the protestant inhabitants, they erected another, and prevailed with the minister of an adjacent parish to celebrate mass in the passion-week.

The doctor being employed in his study, was alarmed at the ringing of bells at an unusual time, but went to the church to inquire the cause. He found the great doors shut, but lifting up the latch of the chancel-door, he entered and was not a little surprised, to see a priest in his habit prepared to celebrate mass, guarded by a party of men under arms, to prevent interruption.

Dr. Taylor being vicar of the parish, demanded of the priest the cause of such proceeding without his knowledge or consent; and how he dared prophane the temple of God with abominable idolatries. Foster, the lawyer, insolently replied, "Thou traitor, how darest thou to intercept the execution of the queen's orders;" but the doctor undauntedly denied the charge of traitor, and asserted his mission as a minister of Christ, and delegation to that part of his flock, commanding the priest, as a wolf in sheep's clothing, to depart, nor infect the pure church of God with popish idolatry. A very violent altercation then ensued, between Foster the lawyer, and Dr. Taylor, the former asserting the queen's prerogative, and the other the authority of the canon law, which commanded that no mass be said, but at a consecrated altar.

The priest, intimidated by the intrepid behaviour of the protestant minister, would have departed without saying mass, but Clark said to him, Fear not, you have a super altare, (which is a consecrated stone, commonly about a foot square, which the popish priests carry instead of an altar, when they say mass in gentlemen's houses) proceed and do your duty.

They then forced the doctor out of the church, celebrated mass, and immediately informed the lord chancellor, bishop of Winchester, of his behaviour, who summoned him to appear before him, and answer the complaints that were alledged against him.

The doctor upon receipt of the summons, chearfully prepared to obey the same; and on some of his friends advising him to fly beyond sea, in order to avoid the cruelty of his inveterate enemies, he told them that he was determined to go to the bishop, being ready and willing to declare the motives of his behaviour to the popish emissaries, and defend the doctrines he had taught, as well as persuaded that he could not die in a better cause; so having committed his people to the care of a pious and faithful minister of Christ, he repaired to London, and waited on the bishop.

Now when bishop Gardiner saw Dr. Taylor, he, according to his common custom, reviled him, calling him knave, traitor, heretic, with many other villainous reproaches, which Dr. Taylor heard patiently, and at last said unto him:

My lord, I am neither traitor nor heretic, but a true subject, and a faithful christian man, and am come, according to your commandment, to know what is the cause that your lordship hath sent for me.

Then, said the bishop, art thou come, thou villain? How darest thou look me in the face for shame? Knowest thou not who I am?

Yes, said Dr. Taylor, I know who you are, Dr. Stephen Gardiner, bishop of Winchester, and lord chancellor, and yet but a mortal man. But if I should be afraid of your lordly looks, why fear you not God, the Lord of us all? How dare you for shame look any christian man in the face, seeing you have forsaken the truth, denied our Saviour Christ and his word, and done contrary to your own oath and writing? With what countenance will you appear before the judgment seat of Christ, and answer to your oath made first unto king Henry the eighth, and afterwards unto king Edward the sixth, his son.

The bishop answered, that was Herod's oath, unlawful; and therefore worthy to be broken: I have done well in breaking it; and I thank God, I am come home again to our mother, the catholic church of Rome, and so I would thou shouldst do.

Dr. Taylor answered, Should I forsake the church of Christ, which is founded upon the true foundation of the apostles and prophets, to approve those lies, errors, superstition, and idolatries, that the popes and their company at this day so blasphemously do approve? nay, God forbid. Let the pope and his followers return to our Saviour Christ and his word, and thrust out of the church such abominable idolatries as he maintaineth, and then will christian men turn unto him. You wrote truly against him, and were sworn against him.

I tell thee, said the bishop of Winchester, it was Herod's oath, unlawful; and therefore ought to be broken, and not kept: and our holy father the pope hath discharged me of it.

Then said Dr. Taylor, But you shall not be so discharged before Christ, who doubtless will require it at your hands, as a lawful oath made to our liege and sovereign lord the king, from whose obedience no man can quit you.

I see, said the bishop, thou art an arrogant knave, and a very fool.

My lord, Dr. Taylor replied, leave off your railing at me, which is not seemly for such a one in authority as you are. For I am a christian man, and you know, that "He that saith to his brother, Racha, is in danger of a council, and he that saith, Thou fool, is in danger of hell fire."

The bishop answered, You are false, and liars all the sort of you.

Nay, said Dr. Taylor, we are true men, and know that it is written, "The mouth that lieth, slayeth the soul;" and again, "Lord God, thou shalt destroy all that speak lies." And therefore we abide by the truth of God's word, which you, contrary to your own consciences, deny and forsake.

Thou art married, said the bishop. Yes, I thank God I am, and have had nine children, and all in lawful matrimony, and blessed be God that ordained matrimony, and commanded that every man, that hath not the gift of continency, should marry a wife of his own, and not live in adultery or whoredom.

Then said the bishop, Thou hast resisted the queen's proceedings, and would not suffer the minister of Aldam, Mr. John Averth, a very virtuous and devout priest, to say mass in Hadley. Dr. Taylor answered, My lord, I am vicar of Hadley, and it is against all right, conscience, and laws, that any man should come into my charge, and presume to infect the flock committed unto me, with the venom of the popish idolatrous mass.

With that the bishop waxed very angry, and said, Thou art a blasphemous heretic indeed, that blasphemest the blessed sacrament, (and put off his cap) and speakest against the holy mass, which is made a sacrifice for the quick and the dead.

Dr. Taylor answered, Nay, I blaspheme not the blessed sacrament which Christ instituted, but I reverence it as a true christian man ought to do, and confess, that Christ ordained the holy communion in the remembrance of his death and passion, which when we keep according to his ordinance, we, through faith, eat the body of Christ, and drink his blood, giving thanks for our redemption, and this is our sacrifice for the quick and the dead, to give thanks for his merciful goodness shewed to us, in that he gave his Son Christ to die for us.

Thou sayest well, said the bishop. It is all that thou hast said, and more too; for it is a propitiatory sacrifice for the quick and the dead.

Then answered Dr. Taylor, Christ gave himself to die for our redemption upon the cross, whose body there offered was the propitiatory sacrifice full, perfect, and sufficient unto salvation for all them that believe in him. And such sacrifice did our Saviour Christ offer in his own person once for all, neither can any priest any more offer him, nor need we any more propitiatory sacrifice: and therefore I say with Chrysostom, and all the doctors, Our sacrifice is only memorative, in the remembrance of Christ's death and passion, a sacrifice of thanksgiving; and therefore the fathers called it Eucharistia: and no other sacrifice hath the church of God.

It is true, said the bishop, the sacrament is called Eucharistia, a thanksgiving, because we there give thanks for our redemption; and it is also a sacrifice propitatory for the quick and the dead, which thou shalt confess ere thou and I have done. Then the bishop called his men, and said, Have this fellow hence, and carry him to the King's-Bench, and charge the keeper he be straitly kept.

Dr. Taylor kneeling down, held up both his hands and said, "Good Lord, I thank thee; and from the tyranny of the bishop of Rome, and all his detestable errors, idolatries, and abominations, good Lord deliver us: and God be praised for good King Edward." So they carried him to prison to the King's-Bench, where he lay prisoner almost two years.

This is the sum of their first discourse, as mentioned in a letter that Dr. Taylor wrote to a friend of his, thanking God for his grace, that he had confessed his truth, and was found worthy for truth to suffer prison and bonds, beseeching his friends to pray for him, that he might persevere constant unto the end.

Being in prison, Dr. Taylor spent all his time in prayer, reading the holy scriptures, writing, preaching, and exhorting the prisoners, and such as resorted to him, to repentance and amendment of life: and within a few days after, several other learned and godly men in sundry counties of England were committed to prison for religion, that almost all the prisons in England were become christian schools and churches; so that there was no greater comfort for protestants than to come to the prisons to behold their virtuous deportment, and to hear their prayers, preachings, most godly exhortations, and consolations.

When Dr. Taylor was come into the King's-Bench, he found therein the virtuous and vigilant preacher of God's word, Mr. Bradford; which man for his innocent and pious living, his devout and virtuous preaching, was worthily counted a miracle of his time, as even his adversaries must needs confess. Finding this man in prison, he began to exhort him to faith, strength, and patience, and to persevere constant unto the end. Mr. Bradford hearing this, thanked God that he had provided him such a comfortable fellow-prisoner; and they both together praised God, and continued in prayer, reading, and exhorting one another; insomuch that Dr. Taylor told his friends that came to visit him, that God had most graciously provided for him, to send him to that prison where he found such an angel of God, to be in his company to comfort him.

After that Dr. Taylor had lain some time in prison, he was cited to appear in the arches of Bow-church, to answer unto such matter as should be there objected against him. At the day appointed he was led thither, his keeper waiting upon him. Where when he came, he stoutly and strongly defended his marriage, affirming by the scriptures of God, by the doctors of the primitive church, by both laws civil and canon, that it is lawful for priests to marry, and that such as have not the gift of continency are bound on pain of damnation to marry. This he did so plainly prove, that the judge could give no sentence of divorce against him, but gave sentence he should be deprived of his benefice, because he was married.

You do me wrong then, said Dr. Taylor, and alleged many laws and constitutions for himself, but all availed not; for he was again carried to prison, and his livings taken away, and given to another. As for Hadley benefice, it was given or sold (I know not which) to one Mr. Newcalle, whose great virtues were altogether unlike to Dr. Taylor's, his predecessor, as the poor parishioners full well have found.

After a year and three quarters, or thereabouts, the papists got certain old laws, which were annulled by Henry VIII. and Edward VI. to be again revived by parliament; so that now they might, by authority, cite whom they would, upon their own suspicion, and charge them with what articles they pleased, and, except they in all things agreed to their purpose, burn them. When these laws were once established, they sent for Dr. Taylor, with several other prisoners, who were convened before the chancellor and other commissioners in January.

After having been several times before the chancellor, with with whom he had warmly contended, the following articles were exhibited against him :

- (1) Maintaining the validity and legality of the marriage of priests.
- (2) Denying the presence of Christ's natural body and blood in the sacrament of the altar, or that it was a propitiatory sacrifice both for the quick and dead, or that it ought to be worshipped with divine honour.
- (3) Affirming his holiness the pope to be Antichrist, and popery antichristianity.

A RECAPITULATION out of Dr. TAYLOR's Confes. whereby our Readers may plainly see, how the PAPISTS act against sound Knowledge and sacred Truth, in forbidding PRIESTS to marry.

1. THEY know that matrimony in the Old Testament, agreeable to it's first institution, is indifferently permitted to all men without any exception.
2. They know that in the Old Testament, both priests, levites, prophets, patriarchs, and all others actually had their wives.
3. They know that matrimony was permitted and instituted by God for two principal ends; to wit, for procreation, and avoiding of sin.
4. They know that in the Old Testament, God not only instituted and permitted matrimony to be free, but also induceth and appointed men to marry and take wives, in these words, "It is not good for a man to be alone," &c.
5. They know that in the New Testament St. Paul permitteth the state of matrimony free to all men, having not the gift of continency, and forbiddeth none.
6. They know that in the New Testament the said St. Paul not only permitteth, but also expressly willeth and chargeth men, having not the gift, to marry, saying, "For avoiding fornication, let every man have his wife," &c.
7. They know that in the New Testament the said St. Paul not only permitteth and commandeth, but also commendeth and praiseth the state of matrimony, calling it honourable, and the bed-company to be undefiled, &c.
8. They know that in the New Testament, Christ himself not only was not conceived nor born of the virgin before she was espoused in matrimony, but also that both he and his blessed mother did beatify and honour the state of matrimony with their presence: yea, in the same began his first miracle.
9. They know both by the Old Testament and New, that marriage is no impediment to walk in the obedience of God's commandments; for both Abraham carried into the land of Canaan his old, yea and barren wife, the virtuous woman Sarah, with him: and also to Isaac, Jacob, Moses, David, and others, their marriage was no impediment to them to walk with God; neither to other levites, bishops, and priests in the time of both the Old Testament, and of the New. Again, neither was it an hindrance to Peter, Philip, and others, both to have their wives with them, and also to supply the office of apostleship.
10. They know both by the Old Testament and New, that sinful fornication and adultery depriveth man of God's favour and graces of the Holy Ghost, which graces especially be requisite in the men of the church.
11. They know in their own secret conscience, and by experience, that neither they which enjoin this vow of chastity, nor they which take it, do observe the vow of chastity. Whereupon rise inconveniencies more than can be expressed: but the Lord above knoweth all, besides the secret murders, peradventure, of many a poor infant, &c.
12. They know by St. Cyprian, Epist. 11. and St. Augustine to Julian in his book on marriage; that a vow is no impediment sufficient to hinder matrimony, or to divorce the same.
13. They know that Chrysostom affirmeth it to be an error to say, that a bishop may not have a wife.
14. They know that St. Ambrose says, Integrity will have no commandment; but counsel only to be given touching the observing of virginity.

15. They know that before the time of pope Hildebrand, that is, during the time of one thousand years after Christ, marriage was never restrained, by any forcible necessity of vow, from men of the church.

16. They know that St. Paul calleth it the doctrine of devils; to forbid meats and marriage, which God hath left free, with thanksgiving; for necessity of man and woman.

When Dr. Taylor had with great spirit and courage answered for himself, and rebuked his adversaries for breaking their oath made before to king Henry, and to king Edward his son, and for betraying the realm into the power of the Roman bishop; they perceiving, that in no case he could be drawn to their wills and purpose, that is, to turn with them from Christ to Antichrist, committed him thereupon to prison again, where he remained till the end of January.

The FOURTH and LAST EXAMINATION of Dr. ROWLAND TAYLOR, who with Mr. BRADFORD and Mr. SAUNDERS were brought before the BISHOP of WINCHESTER and other Prelates.

IN January, 1555, the Rev. Dr. Taylor, Mr. Bradford, and Mr. Saunders, were again called to appear before the bishop of Winchester, the bishops of Norwich, London, Salisbury, and Durham, and there were again charged with heresy and schism, and therefore a determinate answer was required, whether they would submit themselves to the Roman bishop, and abjure their errors, or else they would according to their laws proceed to their condemnation.

When Dr. Taylor, Mr. Bradford, and Mr. Saunders, heard this, they answered boldly, that they would not depart from the truth which they had preached in king Edward's days, neither would they submit themselves to the Romish Antichrist; but they thanked God for so great mercy, that he would call them to be worthy to suffer for his word and truth.

When the bishops saw them so bold, and immoveably fixed in the truth, they read the sentence of death upon them, which when they had heard, they most joyfully gave God thanks, and said unto the bishops, "We doubt not but God the righteous judge will require our blood at your hands; and the proudest of you all shall repent this receiving again of Antichrist, and your tyranny that you now shew against the flock of Christ."

Dr. Taylor being condemned, was committed to the Clink, and the keepers were charged to keep him straitly: for you have now another manner of charge, said the lord chancellor, than you had before; therefore look you, take heed to it.

When the keeper brought him toward the prison, the people flocked about to gaze upon him; unto whom he said, God be praised, good people, I am come away from them undefiled, and will confirm the truth with my blood. He was confined in the Clink till it was toward night, and then he was removed into the Poultry Compter.

When Dr. Taylor had lain in the Compter a week or thereabouts, on the fourth of February, 1555, Edmund Bonner, bishop of London, with others, came to degrade him, bringing with them such ornaments as do appertain to their massing-mummary. Now being come, he called for the said Dr. Taylor to be brought unto him; the bishop being then in the chamber where the keeper of the Compter and his wife lay. So Dr. Taylor was brought down from the chamber above that, to the said Bonner. And at his coming the bishop said, Doctor, I wish you would remember yourself, and turn to your mother holy church, so may you do well enough, and I will sue for your pardon. Whereunto Dr. Taylor answered, I wish you and your fellows would turn to Christ. As for me, I will not turn to Antichrist. Well, said the bishop, I am come to degrade you: wherefore put on these vestures. No, said Dr. Taylor, I will not. Wilt thou not, said the bishop?

I shall make thee ere I go. Said Dr. Taylor, you shall not, by the grace of God. Then he charged him upon his obedience to do it, but he would not.

So he ordered another to put them upon his back, and being thoroughly furnished therewith, he set his hands to his side, walking up and down, and said; How say you, my lord, am not I a goodly fool? How say you, my masters? If I were in Cheapside, should I not have boys to laugh at these apish toys, and trumpery? So the bishop scraped his fingers, thumbs, and the crown of his head, with the rest of such like childish observances.

At last, when he would have given Dr. Taylor a stroke on the breast with his crozier-staff, the bishop's chaplain said, My lord, strike him not, for he will certainly strike again. Yes, by St. Peter will I, said Dr. Taylor. The cause is Christ's, and I were no good christian, if I would not fight in my master's quarrel. So the bishop laid his curse upon him, but struck him not. Then Dr. Taylor said, Though you do curse me, yet God doth bless me. I have the witness of my conscience, that you have done me wrong and violence, and yet I pray God, if it be his will, forgive you. But from the tyranny of the bishop of Rome, and his detestable enormities, good Lord deliver us. And in going up to his chamber, he still said, God deliver me from you, God deliver me from you. And when he came up, he told Mr. Bradford (for they both lay in one chamber) that he had made the bishop of London afraid; for, faith he, laughingly, his chaplain gave him counsel not to strike me with his crozier-staff, for that I would strike again; and, by my troth, said he, rubbing his hands, I made him believe I would so indeed.

The night after he was degraded, his wife and his son Thomas resorted unto him, and were by the gentleness of the keepers permitted to sup with him. For this difference was ever found between the keepers of the bishop's prison, and the keepers of the king's prisons: that the bishop's keepers were ever cruel, blasphemous, and tyrannous, like their masters; but the keepers of the king's prisons shewed, for the most part, as much favour as they possibly might.

When Dr. Taylor's wife, his son, and John Hull his servant, came to sup with him, at their coming, they kneeled down and prayed, saying the litany.

After supper walking up and down, he gave God thanks for his grace, that had so called him, and given him strength to abide by his holy word: and turning to his son Thomas, "My dear son, said he, Almighty God bless thee, and give thee his Holy Spirit, to be a true servant of Christ, to learn his word, and constantly to stand by his truth all thy life long. And, my son, see that thou fear God always. Flee from all sin, and wicked living: be virtuous, serve God with daily prayer, and apply thy book. In any wise see that thou be obedient to thy mother, love her and serve her: be ruled by her now in thy youth, and follow her good counsel in all things. Beware of lewd company, of young men that fear not God, but follow their lewd lusts and vain appetites. Fly from whoredom, and hate all filthy living, remembering that I thy father do die in the defence of holy marriage. Another day, when God shall bless thee, love and cherish the poor people, and count that thy chief riches are, to be rich in alms: and when thy mother is waxed old, forsake her not; but provide for her to thy power, and see that she lack nothing: for so will God bless thee, and give thee long life upon earth and prosperity: which I pray God to grant thee."

Then turning to his wife, "My dear wife, said he, continue stedfast in the fear and love of God; keep yourself undefiled from their popish idolatries and superstition. I have been unto you a faithful yoke-fellow, and so have you been unto me, for which I pray God to reward you, and doubt not, dear wife, but God will reward it. Now the time is come that I shall be taken from you, and you discharged of the wedlock bond towards me: therefore I will give you my counsel what I think most expedient for you. You are yet a child-bearing woman, and therefore it will be most convenient for you to marry. For doubtless you shall never be at any convenient stay for yourself and your poor children, nor out of trouble till you be married. Therefore as soon as God will provide it, marry with some honest faithful man that feareth God. Doubt you not, God will provide an honest husband for you, and he will be a merciful father to our children, whom I pray you bring up in the fear of God, and in learning, to the utmost of your power, and keep them from the Romish idolatry." When he had thus said, they with weeping tears prayed together, and kissed one another: and he gave to his wife a book of the church-service, set out by king Edward, which he in the time of his imprisonment daily used. And unto his son Thomas he gave a Latin book, containing the notable sayings of the old martyrs, gathered out of the Ecclesiastical history; and in the end of that book he wrote his testament and last farewell; as here followeth.

The LAST WILL and TESTAMENT of Dr. ROWLAND TAYLOR, VICAR of HADLEY, in SUFFOLK.

I Say to my wife, and to my children; The Lord gave you unto me, and the Lord hath taken me from you, and you from me: blessed be the name of the Lord. I believe they are blessed which die in the Lord. God careth for sparrows, and for the hairs of our heads. I have ever found him more faithful and favourable, than is any father or husband. Trust ye therefore in him by the means of our dear Saviour Christ's merits: believe, love, fear, and obey him: pray to him, for he hath promised to help. Count me not dead, for I shall certainly live, and never die. I go before, and you follow after, to our long home. I go to the rest of my children, Susan, George, Ellen, Robert, and Zachary: I have bequeathed you to the only Omnipotent.

I say to my dear friends of Hadley, and to all others which have heard me preach, that I depart hence with a quiet conscience, as touching my doctrine, for which I pray you thank God with me. For I have, after my little talent, declared to others those lessons that I gathered out of God's book, the blessed bible. Therefore if I, or an angel from heaven should preach to you any other gospel than that ye have received, God's great curse be upon that preacher.

Beware for God's sake that ye deny not God, neither decline from the word of faith, lest God decline from you, and so ye do everlastingly perish. For God's sake beware of popery, for though it appear to have in it unity, yet the same is vanity and antichristianity, and not in Christ's faith and verity.

Beware of the sin against the Holy Ghost, now after such a light opened so plainly and simply, truly, thoroughly, and generally to all England.

The Lord grant all men his good and holy Spirit, increase of his wisdom, condemning the wicked world, hearty desire to be with God and the heavenly company, through Jesus Christ, our only mediator, advocate, righteousness, life, sanctification, and hope, Amen, Amen. Pray, pray.

Rowland Taylor departing hence in sure hope, without all doubting of eternal salvation, I thank God my heavenly Father, through Jesus Christ my certain Saviour, Amen.

February 5, 1555.

"The Lord is my light and my salvation: whom then shall I fear?" Psalm xxvii. 1.

"God is he that justifieth: who is he that can condemn?" Rom. viii. 33, 34.

"In thee, O Lord, have I trusted, let me never be confounded." Psalm xxxi. 1.

On the morning after Dr. Taylor had supped with his wife in the Compter, which was the fifth day of February, the sheriff of London with his officers came by two o'clock, and brought forth Dr. Taylor, and without any light led him to the Woolpack, an inn without Aldgate. Dr. Taylor's wife, suspecting that her husband would that night be carried away, watched all night in St. Botolph's church-porch without Aldgate, having with her two children, the one named Elizabeth, of thirteen years of age, (who being left without father or mother, Dr. Taylor had charitably brought up from three years old) the other named Mary, Dr. Taylor's own daughter.

When the sheriff and his company came against St. Botolph's church, Elizabeth cried, saying, O my dear father! mother, mother, here is my father led away. Then his wife said, Rowland, Rowland, where art thou? For it was a very dark morning, that the one could not not see the other. Dr. Taylor answered, Dear wife, I am here, and stopped. The sheriff's men would have led him forth; but the sheriff said, Stay a little, masters, I pray you, and let him speak to his wife, and so they staid.

Then she came to him, and he took his daughter Mary in his arms; and he, his wife, and Elizabeth, kneeled down and said the Lord's prayer. At which sight the sheriff wept much, and so did several others of the company. After they had prayed, he rose up and kissed his wife, and shook her by the hand, and said, Farewell, my dear wife, be of good comfort, for I am quiet in my conscience. God shall stir up a father for my children. And then he kissed his daughter Mary, and said, God bless thee, and make thee his servant: and kissing Elizabeth, he said, God bless thee. I pray you all stand strong and stedfast unto Christ and his word, and beware of idolatry. Then said his wife, God be with thee, dear Rowland, I will with God's grace meet thee at Hadley.

And so he was led forth to the Woolpack, and his wife followed him. As soon as he came to the Woolpack, he was put into a chamber, wherein he was kept with four yeomen of the guard, and the sheriff's men. Dr. Taylor, as soon he was come into the chamber, fell down on his knees, and gave himself wholly to prayer. The sheriff then seeing Dr. Taylor's wife there, would in no case grant her to speak any more with her husband, but gently desired her to go to his house and take it as her own, and promised her she should lack nothing, and sent two officers to conduct her thither. Notwithstanding, she desired to go to her mother's, whither the officers led her, and charged her mother to keep her there till they came again.

Dr. Taylor remained at the Woolpack, kept by the sheriff and his company, till eleven of the clock; at which time the sheriff of Essex was ready to receive him: and they sat him on horseback within the inn, the gates being shut.

At coming out of the gates, John Hull stood at the rails with Thomas, Dr. Taylor's son. When Dr. Taylor saw them, he called them, saying, Come hither, my son Thomas. And John Hull lifted the child up, and set him on the horse before his father: and Dr. Taylor put off his hat, and said to the people that stood there looking on him, Good people, this is mine own son, begotten of my body in lawful matrimony; and God be blessed for lawful matrimony. Then he lifted up his eyes towards heaven and prayed for his son, laid his hat upon his head and blessed him, and so delivered the child to John Hull, whom he took by the hand and said, Farewell John Hull, the faithfullest servant ever man had. And so they rode forth, the sheriff of Essex, with four yeomen of the guard, and the sheriff's men leading them.

When they were come almost to Burntwood, one Arthur Fayfy, a man of Hadley, who formerly had been Dr. Taylor's servant, met with them, and he, supposing him to have been at liberty, said, Master, I am glad to see you again at liberty, and came to him and took him by the hand. Sir, returned the sheriff, he is a prisoner; what hast thou to do with him? I cry you mercy, said Arthur, I knew not so much, and I thought it no offence to talk to a true man. The sheriff was very angry with this, threatened to carry Arthur with him to prison; notwithstanding he bid him get quickly away, and so they rode forth to Burntwood; where they caused to be made for Dr. Taylor a close hood, with two holes for his eyes to look out at, and a slit for his mouth to breathe at. This they did, that no man should know him, nor he speak to any man.

All the way Dr. Taylor was joyful and merry. He spoke many notable things to the sheriff and yeomen of the guard that conducted him, and often moved them to weep through his much earnest calling upon them to repent, and to amend their evil and wicked living. Of these yeomen of the guard, three used him very friendly, but the fourth (whose name was Homes) treated him most unkindly.

At Chelmsford the sheriff of Suffolk met them, there to receive and carry him into Suffolk. Being at supper, the sheriff of Essex very earnestly besought him to return to the popish religion, thinking with fair words to persuade him, and said, Good Doctor, we are right sorry for you, considering what the loss is of such a man as you might be. You would do much better to revoke your opinions, and return to the Catholic universal church of Rome, acknowledge the pope's holiness to be the supreme head of the church, and reconcile yourself to him. You may do well yet if you will; doubt you not but you shall find favour at the queen's hands. I and all these your friends, will be suitors for your pardon, which, no doubt, you will obtain; this counsel I give you, good Doctor, of a good heart, and good-will towards you: and thereupon I drink to you. In like manner said all the yeoman of the guard, Upon that condition, Doctor, we will all drink to you.

When they had all drank to him, and the cup was come to him, he staid a little, as one studying what answer he might give. At last he said, Mr. Sheriff, and my masters all, I heartily thank you for your good-will; I have hearkened to your words, and marked well your counsels. And to be plain with you, I do perceive that I have been deceived myself, and am like to deceive a great many of Hadley of their expectation. With that word they all rejoiced. Yes, Doctor, said the sheriff, God's blessing on your heart; hold you there still. It is the most comfortable word we heard you speak yet.

Then said Doctor Taylor, I will tell you how I have been deceived, and, as I think, I shall deceive a great many. I am, as you see, a man that hath a very great carcass, which I thought should have been buried in Hadley church-yard, if I had died in my bed, as I well hoped I should have done; but herein I see I was deceived; and there are a great number of worms in Hadley church-yard, which should have had jolly feeding upon this carrion, which they have looked for many a day. But now I know we shall be deceived, both I and they; for this carcass must be burned to ashes, and they shall lose their bait and feeding.

When the sheriff and his company heard him say so, they were amazed and looked one on another, marveling at the man's constant mind, that thus without all fear made but a jest at the cruel torment, and death now at hand prepared for him. Thus was their expectations disappointed.

At Chelmsford Dr. Taylor was delivered to the sheriff of Suffolk, and by him conducted to Hadley, where he suffered. When they were come to Lanham, the sheriff staid there two days; and thither came to him a great number of gentlemen and justices, who were appointed to aid the sheriff. These gentlemen endeavoured very much to reduce Dr. Taylor to the Romish religion, promising him his pardon, which, said they, we have here for you. They promised him great promotions, even a bishopric if he would take it: but all their labour and flattering words were in vain.

When they were come to Hadley, and riding over the bridge, at the bridge-foot waited a poor man with five small children: who when he saw Doctor Taylor, he and his children fell down upon their knees, and held up their hands, and cried with a loud voice, and said, O dear father and good shepherd, Doctor Taylor, God help and succour thee, as thou hast many a time succoured me and my poor children. Such witness had the servant of God of his virtuous and charitable alms given in his life-time. The streets of Hadley were beset on both sides the way with men and women of the town and country, who waited to see him: whom when they beheld so led to death, with weeping eyes and lamentable voices they cried, saying one to another, Ah good Lord! there goeth our good shepherd from us, that so faithfully hath taught us, so fatherly hath cared for us, and so godly hath governed us!

Coming against the alms-houses, which he well knew, he cast to the poor people money, which remained out of what had been given him in the time of his imprisonment. As for his living, they took it from him at his first going to prison, so that he was sustained all the time of his imprisonment by the charitable alms of good people that visited him.

When arrived at Aldham-Common, the place where he should suffer, seeing a great multitude of people, he asked, What place is this, and what meaneth it that so much people are gathered hither? It was answered, It is Aldham Common, the place where you must suffer; and the people are come to look upon you. Then said he, Thanked be God, I am even at home, and so alighted from his horse, and with both his hands rent the hood from his head.

Then he desired licence of the sheriff to speak; but the sheriff denied it to him, and bade him remember his promise to the council.

Dr. Taylor perceiving that he could not be suffered to speak, sat down, and seeing one named Soyce, he called him, and said, Soyce, I pray thee come and pull off my boots, and take them for thy labour: thou hast long looked for them, now take them. Then he rose up, and put off his clothes unto his shirt, and gave them away. Which done, he said with a loud voice, Good people, I have taught you nothing but God's holy word, and those lessons that I have taken out of God's blessed book, the Holy Bible: and I am come hither this day to seal it with my blood. With that word, Homes, yeoman of the guard, who used Dr. Taylor very cruelly all the way, gave him a great stroke upon the head, and said, Is that keeping thy promise, thou heretic? Then he, seeing they would not permit him to speak, kneeled down and prayed, and a poor woman that was among the people stepped in and prayed with him; but her they thrust away, and threatened to tread her down with their horses: notwithstanding she would not remove, but abode and prayed with him. When he had prayed, he went to the stake and kissed it, and set himself into a pitch-barrel, which they had set for him to stand in, and so stood with his back upright against the stake, with his hands folded together, and his eyes towards heaven, and continually prayed.

Then they bound him with chains, and the sheriff called one Richard Donningham, a butcher, and commanded him to set up the faggots: but he refused to do it, and said, I am lame, sir, and not able to lift a faggot. The sheriff threatened to send him to prison: notwithstanding, he would not do it. Then he appointed one Mulleine of Carsey, a man for his virtues fit to be a hangman, and Soyce, a very drunkard, and Warwick, who in king Edward's days, lost one of his ears for his seditious talk, with one Robert King, a deviser of interludes, to set up the faggots, and make the fire, which they most diligently did; and Warwick cruelly cast a faggot at him, which struck him on the head, and so cut his face, that the blood ran down. Then said Dr. Taylor, O friend, I have harm enough, what needed that?

Sir John Shelton standing by, as Dr. Taylor was speaking, and saying the Psalm Miserere in English, struck him on the lips; You knave, said he, speak Latin I will make thee. At last they kindled the fire; and Dr. Taylor, holding up both his hands, called upon God, and said, Merciful father of heaven, for Jesus Christ my Saviour's sake, receive my soul into thy hands. So he stood still without either crying or moving, with his hands folded together, till Soyce with an halberd struck him on the head that his brains fell out, and the corps fell down into the fire.

C H A P. IV.

An AFFECTING NARRATIVE, and HISTORICAL ACCOUNT of several PROTESTANTS, namely, JUDGE HALES, THOMAS TOMKINS, WILLIAM HUNTER, THOMAS CAUSTON, THOMAS HIGBED, WILLIAM PYGOT, STEPHEN KNIGHT, and JOHN LAURENCE; who were Persecuted, Tormented, and most of them Burned, under the BLOODY TYRANNY of BONNER, BISHOP of LONDON.

STEPHEN GARDINER, having condemned and burned several great and learned men, he presumed, that these examples would deter any one from speaking against, and opposing the popish religion; but in this he found himself deceived: for within eight or nine days after sentence had passed against bishop Hooper and others, being the 8th of February, six other good christians were likewise brought before the bishops, to be examined for the same cause of religion. Stephen Gardiner seeing this became discouraged; and from that day meddled no more in such kind of condemnations; but referred the whole of this cruel business to Bonner, bishop of London; who called before him in his consistory at St. Paul's (the lord mayor, and several aldermen sitting with him) the six persons, upon the 8th day of February, and on the next day, being the 9th, read the sentence of condemnation upon them. But as their death did not take place till the next month of March, we will defer the account till we come to the time and day of their suffering.

February 14, Dr. Robert Ferrar, bishop of St. David's, was sent towards St. David's, there to be condemned and executed. Touching whose martyrdom, soasmuch as it fell not before the month of March, we will defer the history thereof till we come to the day and time of his sufferings.

On the 14th day of February, the lord chancellor, and other bishops, caused the image of Thomas Becket to be set up over the mercer's chapel door, in Cheapside, London, in the form and shape of a bishop, with mitre and cross. But within two days after his erection, his two blessing fingers were first broken away, and on the next day (being the 17th of February) his head also was taken off: whereupon arose great trouble, and many were suspected: among whom one Mr. John Barnes, mercer, dwelling over-against the said chapel, was vehemently by the lord chancellor charged withal, as the doer thereof, and the rather for that he was a professor of the truth. Wherefore he and three of his servants were committed to prison; and at his delivery (although it could not be proved upon him) he was bound in a great sum of money, as well to build it up again as often as it should be broke down, as also to watch and keep the same. And therefore the image was again set up the 2d of March ensuing: but the 14th day of the same month, in the night, the head was again the second time broke off; which thing was so heinously taken, that the next day, being the 15, there was a proclamation made in London, that whosoever would tell who did strike off his head, (though he were of counsel, and not the principal doer) he should have not only his pardon, but also one hundred crowns of gold, with hearty thanks. But it was not known who did it.

February 18th, queen Mary at length, after long delay, made full answer to the king of Denmark's letters, who had written before two letters to the queen, in the behalf of Mr. Coverdale, for his deliverance, who at that time went under sureties, and was in great danger, had had he not been rescued by the suit and letters of the said king of Denmark.

On February 19, there was a certain intimation set forth, and printed in the name of bishop Bonner, wherein was contained a general monition, and strict charge given to every man and woman within his diocese, to prepare themselves against Lent, then near approaching, to receive the glad tidings of peace and reconciliation sent from the pope, Julius III. by Poole, his cardinal and legate.

A remarkable and affecting Account of JUDGE HALES, whom the CRUELTY of GARDINER drove to an ACT of DESPERATION.

IN a former part of this work, mention was made of Judge Hales, of whom we shall more particularly speak in this place; beginning with the conference between Stephen Gardiner, the bishop of Winchester, and him, he being in Westminster Hall with other judges to take his oath, October 6, 1553, declaring withal how false the excuse is of the papists, who so precisely by the law defend themselves, and say, that in all their doings they did nothing but by the law, to bear them out.

Lord Chancellor. MR. Hales, you are to understand, that as the queen's highness hath heretofore conceived a good opinion of you, especially for that you stood both faithfully, and lawfully in her cause of just succession, refusing to set your hand to the book among others that were against her grace in that behalf; so now, through your own late deserts against some of her highness's proceedings, you stand not well in her grace's favour; and therefore before you take any oath, it will be necessary for you to clear yourself.

Judge Hales. I pray you, my Lord, for what cause?

Lord Chancellor. Information is given, that you have indicted several priests in Kent for saying mass.

Judge Hales. My lord, it is not so, I indicted none; but indeed certain indictments of the like nature were brought before me at the last assizes there held, and I gave order therein as the law required. For I have professed the law, against which, in cases of justice, I will never, God willing, proceed, nor in anywise dissemble, but with the same shew forth my conscience; and if it were to do again, I would do no less than I did.

Lord Chancellor. Yes, Mr. Hales, your conscience is known well enough; I know you want not conscience.

Judge Hales. My lord, you may do well to search your own conscience, for mine is better known to myself than to you: and to be plain, I did as well use justice in your said mass-case by my conscience, as by law, wherein I am fully bent to stand in trial to the uttermost that can be objected. And if I have herein done any injury or wrong, let me be judged by the law; for I will seek no better defence, considering chiefly that it is my profession.

Lord Chancellor. Why, Mr. Hales, although you had the rigour of the law on your side, yet you might have had regard to the queen's highness's present doings in that case. And further, although you seem to be more than precise in the law, yet I think you would be very loth to yield to the extremity of such advantage as might be gathered against your proceedings in the law, as you have sometimes taken upon you in place of justice; and if it were well tried, I believe you should not well be able to stand honestly thereto.

Judge Hales. My lord, I am not so perfect, but I may err for want of knowledge. But both in conscience, and such knowledge of the law as God hath given me, I will do nothing but I will maintain it, and abide in it: and if my goods and all that I have be not able to counterpoise the case, my body shall be ready to serve the turn; for they be all at the queen's highness's pleasure.

Lord Chancellor. Ah sir, you be very quick and stout in your answers. But as it should seem, that which you did was more of favouring the opinion of your religion against the service now used, than for any occasion or zeal for justice, seeing the queen's highness doth set it forth as yet, wishing all her faithful subjects to embrace it accordingly: and where you offer both body and goods in your trial, there is no such matter required at your hands, and yet you shall not have your own will neither.

Judge Hales. My lord, I desire not an obstinate will, but to shew myself as I am bound in love to God, and obedience to the queen's majesty, in whose cause willingly for justice sake, all other respects set apart, I did of late, as your lordship knoweth, adventure as much as I had. And as for my religion, I trust it be such as pleaseth God, wherein I am ready to adventure as well my life as my substance, if I be called thereunto. And so instead of my own power and will, the Lord's will, the Lord's will be fulfilled.

Lord Chancellor. Seeing you be at this point, Mr. Hales, I will presently make an end with you. The queen's highness shall be informed of your opinion and declaration. And as her grace shall thereunto determine, you shall have knowledge. Until such time you may depart as you came, without your oath: for as it appeareth, you are scarce worthy the place appointed.

Judge Hales. I thank your lordship: and as for my vocation, being both a burden and a charge more than ever I desired to take upon me; whensoever it shall please the queen's highness to ease me thereof, I shall most humbly with due content obey the same; and so he departed from the bar.

A few days after, Mr. Hales, at the command of the bishop, was committed to the King's-Bench, where he remained constant until Lent; then he was removed to the Compter in Bread-street, and from thence to the Fleet.

Being in the Fleet, what it was that he had granted the bishops, by their fraudulent assaults and persuasions, (namely, of Dr. Day, bishop of Chester, and of judge Portman, as it is thought, overcome at last) I have not to say. This is certain, that shortly after, he was brought to great repentance and terror of conscience: insomuch, that for very anguish of heart he was ready to kill himself with his penknife when he was in prison.

It happened when supper time came that he should be called down, but he having little or no stomach to eat or drink, went immediately to bed, where he lay all night sobbing and groaning, and took little rest or sleep. At length when morning came, about six o'clock, he sent his servant for a cup of beer, under pretence as though he was thirsty and desirous to drink: whether this cause were true or feigned, is unknown; but his man was scarce got out of the chamber, when he with his penknife had wounded himself in divers places of his body, and, no doubt, intended to destroy himself; but his man meeting the butler, just when he had passed the chamber door, the latter was desired to fill the drink, and he, taking the cup, the other returned again unto his master, at the very time when he was working his own destruction; whereby Mr. Hales was hindered of his purpose. When the bishop of Winchester had knowledge of it, he straitway took occasion thereby to blaspheme the doctrine of the gospel, which he openly in the star-chamber called the doctrine of desperation. Mr. Hales being within a while after recovered of those wounds, and delivered out of prison, returned home to his house; where he, either for the greatness of his sorrow, or want of good counsel, or for that he would avoid the necessity of hearing mass, having all things set in order, a good while before that, pertaining to his last will and testament, casting himself into a shallow river, was drowned therein.

The unhappy end of this worthy judge was the cause of great sorrow and grief to all good men, and it likewise gave occasion to some divines to doubt with themselves, whether he was damned or saved. But notwithstanding God's judgments be secret, and we likewise in doubt upon what intent he did thus punish himself; neither again is any man certain, whether he did repent or not before the last breath went out of his body; I think (saith Mr. Fox) their opinion is more indifferent therein, who do rather disallow the example of the deed, than despair of his salvation.

Otherwise,

Otherwise, if we will judge all those to hell that have departed the world after this sort, how many examples have we, in the first persecutions of the church, of those men and women, who being registered in the works of worthy writers, have notwithstanding their praise and commendation? Or what shall we think of those young men, who being sought for to do sacrifice to idols, did cast themselves down headlong, and break their own necks, to avoid such horrible pollutions of themselves? What shall we say of those virgins of Antioch, who, to the end they might not defile themselves with uncleanness and idolatry, through the persuasion of their mother, casting themselves headlong into a river together with their mother, did destroy themselves, although not in the same water, yet after the same manner of drowning as this Mr. Hales did? What shall we say of the other two sisters, who for the same reason did violently throw themselves into the sea, as Eusebius doth record? In whom though perchance there was no less confidence to bear out the pains which should be ministered unto them by the wicked, yet, their good desire to keep their faith and religion unspotted was commended and praised.

We mention these examples neither to excuse nor to defend the heinous fact of judge Hales, which we could wish might be drowned in oblivion: and because we do not know, nor are able to comprehend the bottomless depth of the graces and mercies which are in Christ Jesus our Saviour, we will leave therefore his final judgment to the determination of him who is appointed judge both of the quick and dead.

The MARTYRDOM of the SIX PRISONERS before mentioned, namely, TOMKINS, PYGOT, KNIGHT, LAURENCE, HUNTER, and HIGBED.

I.

The HISTORY and MARTYRDOM of THOMAS TOMKINS, a Weaver in Shoreditch, who, having first his Hand burned by the bloody Bishop of LONDON, was afterwards burnt in Smithfield, March 16th, 1555.

THIS plain honest christian was by trade a weaver, and lived in the parish of Shoreditch, till he was summonsed before the inhuman Bonner, and confined with many others, who renounced the errors of popery, in a prison in that tyrant's house at Fulham.

Under his confinement, he was treated by the bishop, not only unbecoming a prelate, but even a man: for the savage, because Tomkins would not assent to the doctrine of transubstantiation, had bruised him in the face, and plucked off the greatest part of the hair of his beard.

On another occasion, this scandal to humanity, because our martyr remained inflexible, nor would deviate in the least point from the pure and uncorrupted truths of the gospel, in the presence of several who came to visit him at his seat at Fulham, took this poor honest man by the fingers, and held his hand directly over the flame of a wax candle, having three or four wicks, supposing that, being terrified by the smart and pain of the fire, he would leave off the defence of the doctrine which he had received.

Tomkins thinking not otherwise, but there presently to die, began to commend himself unto the Lord, saying, O Lord, into thy hands I commend my spirit, &c. In the time that his hand was burning, the same Tomkins afterwards reported to one James Hulse, that his spirit was so wrapt, that he felt no pain. In which burning he never shrunk, till the veins shrunk, and the sinews burst, and the water did spurt in Mr. Harpsfield's face: insomuch that Mr. Harpsfield, moved with pity, desired the bishop to stay, saying, that he had tried him enough.

The first EXAMINATION of THOMAS TOMKINS.

AFTER that Thomas Tomkins had been half a year in prison, about the 8th of February he was brought with several others before bishop Bonner sitting in his consistory, to be examined. To whom first was brought forth a certain bill or schedule subscribed (as appeareth) with his own hand, the 5th day of the same month, containing these words following:

"Thomas Tomkins of Shoreditch, and of the diocese of London, hath believed and doth believe, that in the sacrament of the altar, under the forms of bread and wine, there is not the very body and blood of our Saviour Jesus Christ in substance, but only a token and remembrance thereof, the very body and blood of Christ being only in heaven and no where else.

By me THOMAS TOMKINS."

Whereupon he was asked, whether he did acknowledge the same subscription to be of his own hand. To which he granted, confessing it so to be. This being done, the bishop went about to persuade him with fair words, rather than with reasons, to relinquish his opinions, and to return again to the unity of the catholic church, promising if he would do so, to remit all that was past. But he constantly refused so to do. When the bishop saw he could not so convince him, he brought forth and read to him another writing, containing articles and interrogatories, whereunto he should come the next day and answer; in the mean time he should deliberate with himself what to do: and so the next day, being the 9th day of March, at eight o'clock in the morning to be present in the same place again, to give his determinate answer what he would do in the premises, and then either to revoke and reclaim himself, or else in the afternoon of the same day to come again and have justice (as he called it) administered unto him. The copy of which articles here followeth.

ARTICLES objected and administered the 8th Day of February, against THOMAS TOMKINS, with his own Hand subscribing to the same.

THOU dost believe, that in the sacrament of the altar, under the forms of bread and wine, there is not by the omnipotent power of Almighty God, and his holy word, really, truly, and in very deed, the very true and natural body of our Saviour Jesus Christ, touching the substance thereof, which was conceived in the womb of the virgin Mary, and hanged upon the cross, suffering death there for the life of the world.

I do so believe.

Thou dost believe, that after the consecration of the bread and wine prepared for the use of the sacrament of the altar, there doth remain the substance of material bread and material wine, not changed nor altered in substance by the power of Almighty God, but remaining as it did before.

I do so believe.

Thou dost believe, that it is an untrue doctrine, and a false belief, to think or say, that in the sacrament of the altar there is, after consecration of the bread and wine, the substance of Christ's natural body and blood, by the omnipotent power of Almighty God, and his holy word.

I do so believe.

Thou dost believe that thy parents, kinsfolks, friends, and acquaintance, and also thy godfathers and godmothers, and all people did err, and were deceived, if they did believe, that in the sacrament of the altar there was, after consecration, the body and blood of Christ, and that there did not remain the substance of material bread and wine.

I do so believe.

By me THOMAS TOMKINS.

The second EXAMINATION of THOMAS TOMKINS.

THE next day being the 9th of February, at eight o'clock before noon, Thomas Tomkins was brought again before the bishop and his other assistants, where the aforesaid articles were propounded unto him, whereunto he answered as followeth:

To the first he said, that he did so believe, as in the same is contained.

To the second he said, that it was only bread and a participation of Christ's death and passion, and so do the scriptures teach.

To the third he said, he did believe it was a false doctrine, to believe and think as is contained in this article.

To the fourth, he did also believe the same.

After this answer, he did also subscribe his name to the said articles. Whereupon, the bishop drawing out his bosom another confession subscribed with Thomas's own hand, and also that article that was the first, he objected against him, caused the same to be openly read, and then willed him to revoke and deny his said opinions, which he utterly refused to do; and therefore he was commanded to appear before the bishop again at the same place at two in the afternoon.

Agreeable to this mandate, being brought before the bloody tribunal of bishops, and pressed to recant his errors and return to the mother-church; he maintained his fidelity, nor would swerve in the least from the articles he had signed with his own hand. Having therefore declared him an obstinate and damnable heretic, they delivered him up to the secular power, and he was burned in Smithfield, March 6th, 1555, triumphing in the midst of the flames, and adding to the noble company of martyrs, who had preceded him, through the path of the fiery trial to the realms of immortality.

II.

THE HISTORY and MARTYRDOM of WILLIAM HUNTER, an Apprentice in LONDON, aged Nineteen Years, who was pursued to Death by JUSTICE BROWN, and Burned March 27th, 1555.

THIS adherent to the cause of Christ had been trained to the doctrines of the reformation from his earliest youth, being descended from religious parents, who carefully instructed him in the principles of the religion.

When queen Mary succeeded to the crown, orders were issued to the priests of every parish, to summons all their parishioners to receive the communion at mass, the Easter after her accession; and Hunter, who was then nineteen years of age, refusing to obey the summons, was threatened to be brought before the bishop. His master fearful of incurring ecclesiastical censure, desired him to leave him for a time; upon which he quitted his service, went down to Brentwood, and resided with his father about six weeks.

One day finding the chapel open, he entered and began to read in the English bible, which lay upon the desk, but was severely reprimanded by an officer of the bishop's court, who said to him, William, why meddlest thou with the bible? Understandest thou what thou readest? Canst thou expound scripture? He replied, I come not to expound scripture; but finding the bible, I read for my comfort and edification.

The officer then informed a neighbouring priest of the liberty the young man had taken in reading the bible; the priest therefore severely chid him, saying, Wrah, who gave thee leave to read the bible and expound it?

He answered as he had done to the officer, and on the priest's telling him, that it became him not to meddle with the scriptures, he frankly declared his resolution to read them as long as he lived, as well as reprove the vicar for discouraging persons from that practice, which the scriptures so strongly enjoined.

The priest then upbraided him as an heretic; he denied the charge, and being asked his opinion concerning the corporal presence in the sacrament of the altar, he replied, that he esteemed the bread and wine but as figures, and looked upon the sacrament as an institution in remembrance of the death and sufferings of our blessed Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ.

William Hunter was then openly declared an heretic, for not believing in the sacrament of the altar. The vicar threatened to complain of him to the bishop.

No. 11.

A neighbouring justice named Brown, having heard that he maintained heretical principles, sent for his father and inquired of him concerning his son; the old man assured him that he had left him, that he knew not whither he was gone: and on the justice's threatening to imprison him, unless he caused him to be apprehended and brought before him; he said with tears in his eyes, Would you have me seek out my son to be burned.

The old man however was obliged to go, in pretence at least, in quest of him, and by accident meeting him, was asked by him, if he was seeking for him; he replied with tears, he was, and told him that it was by command of the justice who threatened to imprison him.

The son, to prevent his father from incurring any danger, said that he was ready to accompany him home on which they returned together.

The following day, he was taken by the constable, kept in the stocks four and twenty hours, and then brought before the justice; who called for a bible, turned to the 6th chapter of St. John, and desired him to give his opinion of the meaning of it, as it related to the sacrament of the altar.

Having given the same explanation as he had done to the priest, and persisting in his denial of the corporal presence in the eucharist, the justice upbraided him with damnable heresy; and wrote to the bishop of London, acquainting him with the same, to whom this valiant young martyr was conducted by a constable.

After Bonner had read the letter, and the constable returned home again, the bishop caused William to be brought into a chamber, where he began to reason with him in this manner; I understand, William Hunter, by Mr. Brown's letter, how that you have had certain communication with the vicar of Welde, about the blessed sacrament of the altar, and how that you could not agree; whereupon Mr. Brown sent for thee to bring thee to the catholic faith, from which, he saith, that thou art gone. Howbeit if thou wilt be ruled by me, thou shalt have no harm for any thing that thou hast said or done in this matter.

William answered, saying, I am not fallen from the catholic faith of Christ; I am sure, but do believe it, and confess it with all my heart.

Why, said the bishop, how sayest thou to the blessed sacrament of the altar? Wilt thou not recant thy saying, which thou confessedst before Mr. Brown, that Christ's body is not in the sacrament of the altar, the same that was born of the virgin Mary?

To which William answered, saying, My lord, I understand that Mr. Brown hath certified you of the talk which he and I had together, and thereby you know what I said to him, which I will not recant by God's help. Then said the bishop, I think thou art ashamed to bear a faggot, and recant openly; but if thou wilt recant thy sayings, I will promise thee that thou shalt not be put to open shame: but speak the word here now between me and thee, and I will promise thee it shall go no further, and thou shalt go home again without any hurt.

William answered and said, My lord, if you let me alone, and leave me to my conscience, I will go to my father and dwell with him, or else with my master again, and so if no body will disquiet nor trouble my conscience, I will keep my conscience to myself.

Then said the bishop, I am content, so that thou wilt go to the church, and receive, and go to confession, and so continue a good Catholic christian. No, said William, I will not do so for all the good in the world.

Then said the bishop, if you will not do so, I will make you sure enough, I warrant you. William answered, You can do no more than God will permit you. Well, said the bishop, wilt thou not recant indeed by any means? No, returned William, never while I live, God willing.

Upon this the bishop commanded his men to put William in the stocks in his gate-house, where he sat two days and nights, only with a crust of brown bread and a cup of water.

At the two days end the bishop came to him, and finding finding the cup of water and the crust of bread still by him upon the stocks, said to his men, Take him out of the stocks, and let him break his fast with you. Then they let him out of the stocks, but would not suffer him to eat with them, but called him heretic. And he said, he was as loth to be in their company, as they were to be in his.

After breakfast the bishop sent for William, and demanded whether he would recant or no. But William made answer, that he would never recant that which he had confessed before men, as concerning his faith in Christ.

Then the bishop said that he was no christian, but he denied the faith in which he was baptized. But William answered, I was baptized in the faith of the Holy Trinity, which I will not go from, God assisting me with his grace.

Then the bishop sent him to the convict prison, and commanded the keeper to lay irons upon him as many as he could bear; and moreover asked him, how old he was: and William said that he was nineteen years of age.

Well, said the bishop, you will be burned before you be twenty years old, if you will not yield yourself better than you have done yet. William answered, God strengthen me in his truth: and then he parted, the bishop allowing him a half-penny a day to live on in bread or drink.

Thus he continued in prison three quarters of a year. In which time he had been before the bishop five times, besides the time when he was condemned in the consistory in St. Paul's, the 9th day of February; at which time his brother, Robert Hunter, was present.

Then the bishop calling William, asked him if he would recant, and so read to him his examination and confession, as is above related: and then rehearsed how that William confessed he did believe, that he received Christ's body spiritually, when he did receive the communion. Dost thou mean, said the bishop, that the bread is Christ's body spiritually?

William answered, I mean not so, but rather when I receive the holy communion rightly and worthily, I do feed upon Christ spiritually through faith in my soul, and am made partaker of all the benefits which Christ hath brought unto all faithful believers through his precious death, passion, and resurrection, and not that the bread is his body, either spiritually or corporally.

Then said the bishop to William, Dost thou not think (holding up his cap) that for example here of my cap, thou mayest see the squareness and colour of it, and yet that not to be the substance, which thou judgest by the accident?

William answered, If you can separate the accidents from the substance, and shew me the substance without the accidents, I could believe. Then said the bishop, Thou wilt not believe that God can do any thing above man's capacity. Yes, said William, I must needs believe that; for daily experience teacheth all men that thing plainly: but our question is not what God can do, but what he will have us to learn in his holy supper.

The bishop said, I always have found thee at this point, and I see no hope to reclaim thee unto the Catholic faith, but thou wilt continue a corrupt member, and then pronounced sentence upon him, that he should go from that place to Newgate for a time, and so from thence to Burntwood, where, said he, thou shalt be burned.

Then the bishop called for another, and so when he had condemned them all, he called for William Hunter, and reasoned with him, saying, If thou wilt yet recant, I will make thee a free man in the city, and give thee forty pounds in good money to set up thine occupation withal; or I will make thee steward of my house, and set thee in office; for I like thee well, thou hast wit enough, and I will prefer thee if thou recant.

But William answered, I thank you for your great offers: notwithstanding, my lord, said he, if you cannot persuade my conscience with scriptures, I cannot find in my heart to turn from God for the love of the world; for I count all worldly things but loss and dung in respect of the love of Christ.

Then said the bishop, If thou diest in this mind, thou art condemned for ever. William answered, God judgeth righteously, and justifieth them whom he condemneth unjustly.

Thus William and the bishop parted, William and the rest being committed to Newgate, where they remained about a month, who afterwards were sent down to Burntwood, and the others unto diverse places of the country. Now, when William was come down to Burntwood, which was the Saturday before the annunciation of the Virgin Mary that followed the Monday after, William remained till the Tuesday, because they would not put him to death then, for the holiness of the day.

In the mean time William's father and mother came to him, and desired heartily of God that he might continue to the end in that good way which he had begun, and his mother said to him, that she was glad that she was so happy to bear such a child, which could stand in his heart to lose his life for Christ's name's sake.

Then William said to his mother, For my little pain I shall suffer, which will soon be at an end, Christ hath promised me, mother, a crown of joy; may you not be glad of that? With that his mother kneeled down on her knees, saying, I pray God strengthen thee, my son, to the end: yea, I think thee as well bestowed as any child that ever I bare.

At which words Mr. Higbed took her in his arms, saying, I rejoice (and so said the others) to see you in this mind, and you have good cause to rejoice. And his father and mother both said, that they always were of that mind, and praying for him, that as he had begun to confess Christ before men, he might likewise continue so to the end. William's father said, I was afraid of nothing but that my son should have been killed in the prison by hunger and cold, the bishop was so hard to him. But William confessed, after a manner that his father was charged with his board, that he had nothing, but had meat and clothing enough, yet was out of the court, both money, meat, clothes, wood, coals, and all things necessary.

They continued in the inn, being the Swan in Burntwood, whither resorted many people of the country to see those good men which were there: and many of William's acquaintance came to him, and reasoned with him, and he with them, exhorting them to come away from the abomination of popish superstition and idolatry.

Thus passing away Saturday, Sunday, and Monday on Monday at night it happened, that William had a dream, which was this: That he was at the place where the stake was pitched, where he should be burned, which (as he thought in his dream) was at the town end where the butts stood, which was so indeed: and also he dreamed, that he met with his father and went to the stake, and also that there was a priest at the stake, who went about to have him recant. To whom he said (as he thought in his dream) Away false prophet; that he exhorted the people to beware of him and such as he was: which things came to pass. It happened that William made a noise to himself in his dream, which caused Mr. Higbed and the others to awake him out of his sleep, to know what he wanted. When he awaked, he told them his dream in order as is said.

Next morning the sheriff Mr. Brocket called to him, and sent him forward to the burning of William Hunter; and the sheriff's son came to him, and embraced him in his right arm, saying, William, be not afraid of these men which are here with bows, bills, and weapons ready prepared to bring you to the place where you shall be burned. To whom he replied, I thank God I am not afraid; for I have reckoned what it will cost me already.

Then the sheriff's son could speak no more to him for weeping.

Hunter then plucked up his gown, and went forward cheerfully, the sheriff's servant taking him by one arm and his brother by another; and going along he

th his father according to his dream, and he said to son weeping, God be with thee, son William. And William said, God be with you, good father, and be of good comfort; for I hope we shall meet again when we all be merry. His father said, I hope so, William; and so departed. He then went to the place where the stake stood, even according to his dream, where all things were not ready; and taking a wet broom faggot, kneeled down thereon, and read the 51st Psalm, till he came to these words, "The sacrifice of God is a contrite spirit, a contrite and a broken heart, O God, thou wilt not despise."

Then said Mr. Tyrill of the Braches, called William Tyrill, Thou liest, heretic, thou readest false; for the words are an humble spirit. But William said, The translation saith a contrite heart. Yes, quoth Mr. Tyrill, the translation is false, you translate books as you please yourselves, like heretics. Well, said William, there is no great difference in those words. Then said the sheriff, Here is a letter from the queen: thou wilt recant, thou shalt live; if not, thou shalt be burned. No, said William, I will not recant, God willing. He then rose up and went to the stake, and stood upright to it. And one Richard Ponde, a bailiff, came and made the chain fast about him.

Then said Mr. Brown, Here is not wood enough to burn a leg of him: said William, Good people, pray for me; and make speed and dispatch me quickly: and pray for me while you see me live, good people, and I will pray for you likewise.

No, said Mr. Brown, pray for thee! I will pray no more for thee, than I will pray for a dog. To whom William answered, Mr. Brown, now you have that which you sought for, and I pray God it be not laid to your charge in the last day; howbeit I forgive you. Then Mr. Brown said, I ask no forgiveness of thee. Well, said William, if God forgive you, I shall not require my blood at your hands.

Then said William, Son of God shine upon me; and immediately the sun in the element shone out of a dark cloud so full in his face, that he was constrained to look another way; whereat the people mused, because it was so dark a little time before. Then William took up a faggot of broom, and embraced it in his arms.

Then the priest, which William dreamed of, came to his brother Robert, with a popish book to carry to William, that he might recant, which book his brother would not meddle with.

William seeing the priest, and perceiving how he would have shewed him the book, said, Away thou false prophet: beware of them, good people, and come away from their abominations, lest you be partakers of their plagues. Then the priest said, Look how thou burnest here, so shalt thou burn in hell. William answered, Thou liest thou false prophet; away.

There was a gentleman present which said, I pray God have mercy upon his soul. The people said, Amen, Amen. Immediately the fire was made.

Then William cast his psalter into his brother's hand, who said, William, think on the holy passion of Christ, and be not afraid of death.

And William answered, I am not afraid. Then lift he up his hands to heaven, and said, Lord, Lord, Lord, receive my spirit; and casting down his head again into the smothering smoke, he yielded up his life for the truth, sealing it with his blood to the praise of God.

III.

The HISTORY and MARTYRDOM of WILLIAM PYGOT, STEPHEN KNIGHT, and the Rev. JOHN LAWRENCE: the two former were Burned March 28th, the one at BRAINTREE, the other at MALDEN in ESSEX; and the latter at COLCHESTER, March 29th, 1555.

THESE two pious laymen, and one protestant divine, having been pointed out by the emissaries of Bonner and Gardiner, information was given to those savage prelates, that they maintained religious opinions contrary to the doctrine and practise of the holy mother church. In consequence of this they were all three summonsed to appear before bishop Bonner, at his consistory court at London, where they were severally questioned concerning their faith of the corporal presence in the sacrament.

Having respectively answered and subscribed that they were not substantially, but figuratively, the body and blood of Christ in that holy ordinance, they were severely reprimanded by the court, admonished to recant their heretical opinions, and for that time dismissed.

A few days after they were again examined concerning the same tenet, when they made the like declaration as before; in consequence of which the bishop addressed himself to the two laymen, and with an affected concern for their spiritual and temporal interests, warmly exhorted them to reject their heresies, and not expose themselves to death here, and damnation hereafter, by obstinately persisting in disobedience to the holy see: but these plain and honest christians were too well grounded in the doctrines of Christ's pure gospel, to be moved from their adherence to the true faith. They, therefore, told the bishop, that they could not recant consistently with the dictates of their consciences, nor would they abjure the opinions to which they had subscribed.

After this bishop Bonner entered into argument with the Rev. Mr. Lawrence alone, and having demanded of what order he was, he answered, that he was admitted to the priest's orders eighteen years past, that he was some time a black friar, and that he was betrothed to a maid, whom he intended to marry.

The bishop then asked him his opinion of the corporal presence in the sacrament: to which he replied, that it was an institution of our blessed Lord, in commemoration of his death and sufferings; and that those were greatly deceived, who believed that his body was verily present in the same, saying, that he had long before ascended into heaven, and was placed at the right hand of the glorious majesty of the Father.

Mr. Lawrence was, for the present, dismissed; but a few days after he, with Pygot and Knight, was again summonsed before the bishop, who, with his usual hypocrisy, exhorted them to recant, embrace the Roman Catholic faith, and not be the wilful cause of their own destruction. But no arguments could induce them to recede in a single point; all of them declaring, they would abide by their opinions, because they were founded on the word of God; whereas the other was merely of human invention.

From this frank declaration, bishop Bonner proceeded to pass sentence on them as irreclaimable heretics; and then degraded Mr. Lawrence with the usual ceremonies. After which, they were all three delivered to the sheriff, who conducted them to Newgate, where they remained with joy together, until they were carried down into Essex, and there the 28th day of March, the said William Pygot was burned at Braintree, and Stephen Knight at Malden, who at the stake, kneeling upon the ground, said the following prayer:

O Lord Jesus Christ, for whose love I leave willingly this life, and desire rather the bitter death of thy cross, with the loss of all earthly things; than to abide the blasphemy of thy most holy name, or to obey men in breaking thy holy commandment: thou seest, O Lord, that where I might live in worldly wealth to worship a false God; and honour thine enemy, I chuse rather the torment of the body, and the loss of this life, and have counted all things but vile, dust, and dung, that I might win thee; which death is dearer unto me, than thousands of gold and silver. Such love, O Lord, hast thou laid up in my breast, that I hunger for thee, as the wounded deer desireth the foyl. Send thy holy comforter, O Lord, to aid, comfort, and strengthen this weak piece of earth, which is empty of all strength of itself. Thou rememberest O Lord, that I am but dust, and able to do nothing that is good; therefore, O Lord, as of thine accustomed goodness and love thou hast invited me to this banquet, and accounted me worthy to drink of thine own cup amongst thine elect; even so give me strength, O Lord, against this raging element, which as to my sight it is most irksome and terrible, so to my mind it may at thy commandment (as an obedient servant) be sweet and pleasant; that through the strength of thy Holy Spirit, I may pass through through the rage of this fire into thy bosom, according to thy promise, and for this mortal receive an immortal, and for this corruptible put on incorruption: accept this burnt sacrifice and offering, O Lord, not for the sacrifice, but for thy dear Son's sake my Saviour, for whose testimony I offer this free-will offering with all my heart and with all my soul. O heavenly Father, forgive me my sins, as I forgive all the world. O sweet Son of God my Saviour, spread thy wings over me. O blessed and Holy Ghost, through whose merciful inspiration I am come hither, conduct me into everlasting life. Lord, into thy hands I commend my spirit. Amen.

The next day, being the 29th of March, the said John Lawrence was brought to Colchester, and there being not able to go, (for his legs were much worn with heavy irons in prison, and also his body weakened with low keeping) was taken to the fire in a chair, and so sitting, was in his constant faith consumed with fire.

When he was burning, the young children came about the fire, and cried, as well as they could speak, saying, Lord, strengthen thy servant, and keep thy promise.

IV.

The MARTYRDOM of Mr. THOMAS CAUSTON, and Mr. THOMAS HIGBED, two worthy Gentlemen of ESSEX, who were Burned, the first at RAYLY, and the last at HORNDEN ON THE HILL, both in the County of ESSEX, March 26th, 1555.

MR. HIGBED and Mr. CAUSTON, two gentlemen in the county of Essex, the one at Hornden on the Hill, the other of the parish of Thundurst, being zealous and religious in the true service of God; as they could not dissemble with the Lord, nor flatter with the world, so in time of blind superstition and wretched idolatry, they could not long lie hid and obscure in such a number of malignant adversaries, accusers, and servants of this world; but at length they were perceived, and discovered to Edmund Bonner, bishop of London, by whose command they were committed to the officers of Colchester, to be safely kept, and with them also a servant of Thomas Causton, who was nothing inferior to his master in true piety.

Bishop Bonner perceiving these two gentlemen to be of good estate, and of great estimation in that country, lest any tumult should thereby arise, came thither himself, accompanied by Mr. Fecknam and several others, thinking to reclaim them to his religion: so that great labour and diligence was taken therein, as well by terrors and threatenings, as by large promises and flatterings, and all fair means, to reduce them again to the unity (as they termed it) of the mother church.

In fine, when nothing could prevail to make them assent to their doings, at length they came to this point, that they required certain respite to consult with themselves what was best to do. Which time of deliberation being expired, and they remaining still constant and immovable in their professed doctrine, and setting out also their confession in writing, the bishop seeing no good to be done in tarrying any longer there, departed thence, and carried them both with him to London, and with them certain other prisoners also, who about the same time were apprehended in those parts.

At length, when no persuasions would serve, they were brought forth to open examination at the consistory in St. Paul's, February 17, 1555, where they were demanded as well by the said bishop, as also by the bishop of Bath and others, whether they would recant their errors and perverse doctrine, as they termed it, and so come to the unity of the popish church. But on their refusing so to do, the bishop assigned them to appear again the next day, being the 18th of February.

On which day, among many other things there said and passed, he read unto them several certain articles, and gave them respite until the next day to answer unto the same, and so committed them again to prison. The copy of which articles here followeth.

ARTICLES objected and ministered by Bishop BONNER, against THOMAS CAUSTON and THOMAS HIGBED.

FIRST, That thou Thomas Causton (or Thomas Higbed) hast been and art of the diocese of London, and also of the jurisdiction now of me Edmund Bonner, bishop of London.

Item, That thou wast in times past, according to the order of the church of England, baptized and christened.

Item, That thou hast godfathers and godmother, according to the said estate.

Item, That the said godfathers and godmother did then promise for thee, and in thy name, the faith and religion that then was used in the realm of England.

Item, That that faith and religion which they did profess and make for thee, was accounted and taken to be the faith and religion of the church, and of the christian people: and so it was in very deed.

Item, Thou coming to the age of discretion, that is to say, to the age of 14 years, didst not mislike nor disallow that faith, that religion, or promise then used and approved, and promised by the said godfathers and godmother, but for a time didst continue in it, as others (taking themselves for christian people) did likewise.

Item, That at that time, and also before, it was taken for a doctrine of the church, catholic and true; and every-where in Christendom then allowed for Catholic and true, and to be the profession of christian men, to believe, that in the sacrament of the altar, under the forms of bread and wine, after the consecration, there was and is by the omnipotent power and will of Almighty God, and his word, without any substance of bread and wine there remaining, the true and natural body and blood of our Saviour Jesus Christ in substance, which was born of the virgin Mary, and suffered upon the cross, really, truly, and in very deed.

Item, That at that time thy father and mother, all thine ancestors, all thy kindred, acquaintance and friends, and thy said godfathers and godmother did then so believe, and think in all the same as the said church did therein believe.

Item, That thyself hast had no just cause or lawful ground to depart or swerve from the said religion or faith, nor any occasion at all, except thou wilt follow and believe the erroneous opinion or notion, that hath been against the common order of the church, brought in by certain disordered persons of late, at the uttermost within these thirty or forty years last past.

Item, That thou dost know, or credibly hast heard, and dost believe, that John Hooper, late bishop of Gloucester, Laurence Saunders, priest, John Rogers, priest, Rowland Taylor, priest, John Lawrence, priest, William Pygot, Stephen Knight, William Hunter, and Thomas Tomkins, have been heretofore reputed, taken, and accounted as heretics, and also condemned as heretics, and so pronounced openly and manifestly; especially in holding and believing certain damnable opinions, against the verity of Christ's body and blood in the sacrament of the altar; and all the same persons have suffered pains of death by fire, for the maintenance and defence of their said opinions and misbelief.

Item, That thou dost know, or credibly hast heard, and dost believe, that Thomas Cranmer, late archbishop of Canterbury, and Nicholas Ridley, naming himself bishop of London, Robert Ferrar, late bishop of St. David's, and Hugh Latimer, sometime bishop of Worcester, have been, and are at this present reputed, accounted, and taken as heretics and misbelievers, in maintaining and holding certain damnable opinions against the verity of Christ's body and blood in the sacrament of the altar.

Item, That thou hast commended and praised all the said persons so erring and believing (or at leastwise some of them) secretly, and also openly, taking and believing them to be faithful and Catholic people, and their said opinions to be good and true, and the same to the best and uttermost of thy power thou hast allowed, maintained, and defended at sundry times.

Item, That thou having heard, known, and understood all the premises thus to be as is aforesaid, hast not regarded all or any part thereof, but contrary to the same and every part thereof, hast attempted and done, condemning, transgressing, and breaking the promise, faith, religion, order, and custom aforesaid, and hast become, and art an heretic and misbeliever in the premises, denying the verity of Christ's body and blood in the sacrament of the altar, and obstinately affirming, that the substance of the material bread and wine are there remaining, and that the substance of Christ's body and blood, taken of the virgin Mary, are not there in the said sacrament really and truly.

Item, That all the premises be true, notorious, famous, and manifest, and that upon all the same, there have and be amongst the said good people of the city of London, and diocese of the same, in great multitude, commonly and publicly, a common and public same and opinion, and also in all places where thou hast been, within the said diocese of London.

These articles being given to them in writing by the bishop, the next day was assigned to them to give up and exhibit their answers unto the same.

On the 1st of March, the said Thomas Causton and Thomas Higbed, being brought before the bishop in the consistory, they there exhibited their answers to the articles, in which they declared the true faith.

Then the bishop, reading their former articles and answers to the same, asked them if they would recant; which when they denied, they were again dismissed and commanded to appear the Wednesday after, at two o'clock in the afternoon.

On the 8th of March, the said Thomas Causton was first called to a second examination before the bishop, Mr. Fecknam and Dr. Stempe being in his palace, and there had read unto him his foresaid articles with his answers. The bishop now exhorted and persuaded him to recant, but he answered, No, I will not abjure. You said that the bishops that were lately burned are heretics, but I pray God make me such a heretic as they were.

Then leaving Mr. Causton, the bishop called for Mr. Higbed, using with him the like persuasions, but to no purpose: I have been, (said Higbed,) of this mind and opinion that I am now, these sixteen years, and do what you can, you shall do no more than God will permit you to do, and with what measure you measure us, look for the same again at God's hands.

They were again commanded to depart for that time, and to appear the next day in the consistory at St. Paul's, between the hours of one and three o'clock in the afternoon.

On the 9th of March, their third examination took place but with similar effect. Mr. Causton delivered in writing to the bishop (as well in his own name, as also in Mr. Thomas Higbed's,) a confession of their faith, to which they would stand: and required leave to read the same, which, (after great suit,) being obtained, he read it openly in the hearing of the people. This confession proved them to be of the same faith with their late fellow sufferers.

The bishop then pronounced sentence, first against Thomas Causton, and then against Thomas Higbed. They were both delivered to the sheriffs, and by them sent to Newgate, where they remained 14 days. On the 23d of March they were taken from Newgate, at four o'clock in the morning, and led through the city to Aldgate, where they were delivered unto the sheriff of Essex, and there being fast bound in a cart, were shortly after brought to their several appointed places of burning; Thomas Higbed to Hornden on the Hill, and Thomas Causton to Rayly, (both in the county of Essex), where they did most constantly, the 26th day of the same month, seal their faith with their blood. Justice Brown and divers gentlemen in the shire were commanded to be present, for fear they should be taken from them. And thus much touching the apprehension, examination, confession, condemnation, and burning of these two godly and constant martyrs of God.

C H A P. V.

The EXAMINATIONS, CONDEMNATION, and MARTYRDOM, of Dr. ROBERT FARRAR, Bishop of St. DAVID's in WALES; who gave his Life for the Truth, and was Burned in the Market-Place of the TOWN of CAERMARTHEN, March 30th, 1555.

THIS worthy and learned prelate having in the former reign, as well as since the accession of Mary, been remarkably zealous in promoting the reformed doctrines, and exploding the errors of popish idolatry; was summoned, among others, before the popish and persecuting bishop of Winchester, (who was then likewise lord chancellor), and other commissioners set apart for the abominable work of devastation and massacre.

His principal accusers and persecutors were, George Constantine Walter, his servant; Thomas Young, chaunter of the cathedral, afterwards archbishop of York; Dr. Rowland Merrick, afterwards bishop of Bangor; Thomas Lee, and Hugh Rawlins, &c. at whose instance, Hugh Rawlins, a priest, and Thomas Lee, brother-in-law to the said George Constantine, did exhibit to the king's most honourable council, the following articles and informations, which, with the bishop's answer to the same, we here think good to insert.

A TRUE COPY of ARTICLES and INFORMATIONs exhibited by HUGH RAWLINS, and THOMAS LEE, against Dr. ROBERT FARRAR, Bishop of St. DAVID's.

1. IMPRIMIS, When the said bishop first came to his diocese, he appointed his chancellor by his letters of commission, omitting the king's majesty's stile and authority, and grounded his said commission upon foreign usurped laws and authority, by force of which authority his said chancellor did visit certain deaneries of his said diocese, and admonished the chaunter and chapter of the cathedral church of St. David's aforesaid, against a certain day and place, for like intent and purpose, contrary to the king's highness's laws and statutes, and in derogation of his highness's supremacy.

2. Item, that the said chaunter and chapter, perceiving the fault of the said commission, took the same from the register into their custody, refusing to appear by virtue thereof, and by secret and charitable ways and means, did admonish the said bishop of the unlawfulness and faults of the said commission, and of the danger he had incurred for granting and executing the same; opening also unto him the effect of the statute made in the 28th year of our late sovereign lord Henry VIII. Which admonitions notwithstanding, the said Bishop neglecting the same, and continuing in his malicious doing, or inexcusable ignorance; about the 20th day of August, in the fourth year of the reign of our Sovereign lord that now is, did confer unto one John Evans, the vicarage of Pembrin, instituting him by authority of the old foreign usurped law, making no mention of the king's highness's authority, in contempt and derogation of the same.

3. Item, Whereas the chancellor and vicar general to the said bishop, did upon a lawful title, and by the king's highness's supreme authority, admit and institute one John Gough into the rectory of Haskard with the appurtenances, and gave out in the king's name under his highness's seal ecclesiastical appointed for that office, with the test of the said bishop, and subscription of the said Chancellor, a mandate to induct accordingly, by virtue whereof the said John Gough was inducted by the official there into the real possession of the same rectory, with the rights and appurtenances to the same belonging; whereupon the register of the said diocese, at the request of the aforesaid chancellor, did signify the premises, with all the circumstances, before divers persons to the forenamed bishop: who notwithstanding did institute and cause to be inducted, one Harry Goddard, unto the same parsonage, making no mention of the king's majesty's authority nor supremacy; in contempt and derogation of the same his highness's crown and dignity, and in extolling the foreign usurped authority, contrary to the form of the statute, &c.

4. Item, The said bishop, immediately after the unlawful institution and induction of Goddard, molested the said John Gough, lawfully instituted and inducted as before, citing him from place to place, objecting no matter unto him of long season, till at length he articulated: so taking upon him the cognition of the title of the whole fruits and patronage, in contempt of the king's highness's regal crown and dignity, and in derogation of the laws and statutes of this realm.

5. Item, He hath commonly made his collations and institutions, as he did his first commission, in his own name and authority, without expressing the king's supremacy.

6. Item, He made under his seal one collation, two institutions, three mandates to induct, in one vocation of one benefice, three several persons without order of law, or revocation of any of them, giving to every one like authority, title, and right. Whereby except good foresight, as well of justices of the peace, as of the friends, had not been there had ensued much inconvenience amongst the partakers of the entitled incumbents in that behalf.

7. Item, The same bishop decreeing caveats to be made in benefices, thereby knowing the titles litigious, instituted and caused to be inducted without trial of any title or due order of law.

8. Item, He directeth his mandates of induction unto private men, and not to the archdeacon nor his officials: contrary to the law and custom used in that behalf. Notwithstanding he hath been counselled to the contrary by learned men.

9. Item, Having no manner of knowledge nor practice in the law, he sitteth every day in harvest, and other times, upon causes, without the assistance of the learned in the law, having with him only an unlearned boy, who is no notary, to his scribe, neither observing the law, nor yet reasonable order: and therefore doth no good, but triflETH the time, as may appear by his acts, if he have them to shew.

10. Item, He and his officers, by his knowledge, used to dispense with marriages, to be solemnized without banns, contrary to the laws and ordinances in that behalf.

11. Item, Whereas one Thomas Prichard, a chaplain of his, solemnized matrimony in a private house without banns, and that between a priest and a sister of her's that was appointed to be married with the said priest that day; he also being a parson, and leaving his cure unserved that day being Sunday: and notwithstanding that one of the king's council in the marches of Wales informed the said bishop of some misdemeanors, requiring due reformation thereof, he hath done nothing therein, but put the same chaplain in office, and made him commissary general since that time, bearing a special favor to the rest of the offenders.

12. Item, Whereas one Meredith ap Thomas his household-servant, was accused by one Sage Hughes, to have been father of her child; the said bishop, without acquittal of his servant, caused him to sue the parents of the said Sage of infamy, first in his principal consistory, and from thence before a commissary of his, being his household chaplain, and at last took the matter before himself, railing against all his officers, because they proceeded not after his partial affection, and against the law, that honest men of Caermarthen, where he sat upon the cause, judged him to be, or at the least to have been distracted of his wit: and by this partial handling, the cause remaineth unfinished, and the child without a father.

13. Item, Whereas one Jenkin Ph. accused William Chambers, a servant of the bishop's that found this Williams in an adulterous manner with his wife, by reason whereof the bishop expelled the wife out of his house, the said infamy not purged, the said parties have been both again in the bishop's house and service since that time, to the evil example of others.

14. Item, By this unlawful sequestration of the fruits of the benefices of Langattock and Lanvihangel, by the indiscreet handling of the same, there were raised the number of four hundred people or more, who made much disturbance, to the great danger of the inhabitants thereabout, had it not been pacified by the discreet means of sir John Vaughan, knight.

15. Item, By this unlawful collation of the prebend of Lanbister to one Stephen Green, a chaplain of his, by covenant and promise to maintain the suit, by wholecrafty and indiscreet handling of the same, there was raised in the county of Radnor, the 19th day of August last past, about three or four hundred men to like danger, but that the matter was stayed by John Bradshaw, Rice ap Glin, and Stephen ap Rice; justices of the same county; who with great danger to themselves and their's, pacified the matter, committing an hundred of the offenders to ward.

16. Item, Such as he owes displeasure unto, he citeth from place to place, and day to day, only for their vexation; laying no matter against them; and being divers times required the copy of his proceedings against them, to the intent they might answer accordingly, and be at their lawful defence; he denied to all such persons the copies of his proceedings.

17. Item, He and his officers wink at the manifest and open crimes of his favourers and adherents, to the evil example of the whole diocese, and abuse the censure of excommunication and suspension, making it an instrument of revenge against such as they do not favor.

18. Item, Having received payment of the king's majesty's subsidy, due in Oct. the fourth year of his grace's reign, of the aforesaid chaunter of the cathedral church of St. David's, and Rowland Meyrike, two of the residentiaries there, before Christmas last, he unjustly, of a premeditated mind and purpose, afterwards certified them for recusants, to their ruin, if they had not been admonished of his cruel purpose, and provided lawful defence for the same.

19. Item, The said bishop celebrating matrimony in his own person, dispensed, contrary to the book of ordinance, with the parties married, for not receiving the holy communion; the parties both being young and lusty persons, having no reasonable cause wherefore they should abstain. At which celebration the bishop communicated not himself. And further, the communion was celebrated by a chaplain of his, with superstitious bowings, kneelings, and knockings both by the chaplain that ministered, and by all the company, only one other priest communicating for the manner.

20. Item

20. Item, Where the official of the archdeacon of Caermarthen, in his visitation within Caermarthen, and, contrary unto the said ordinance, an altar set in the body of the church, for the celebration of the communion, and caused the said altar to be taken away, and a table to be set up in the middle of the church; the bishop after the same commanded the parson of Caermarthen to set the table without the chancel again for the ministration of the communion.

21. Item, He being often in Caermarthen, and other places in the chancel, at the time of the holy communion, not only tarried there himself, neither communicating nor ministering bare-headed and uncovered, reverently kneeling; but also permitting the people there to continue, the chancel and choir full, kneeling and knocking their breasts. Which manner is yet used in all the diocese, without any reformation or reformation of him or any of his officers.

22. Item, Whereas superstitious praying upon beads is not only ungodly, but reprov'd in the king's majesty's injunctions; the said bishop meeting many with beads in their hands never rebuked any of them.

23. Item, The said bishop being in the pulpit, and seeing divers corpses within the church, with a great number of lights upon them, never spoke against any of them.

24. Item, Whereas the ordinance willeth, that no children be baptized but upon the Sunday, or holyday, (only cases of necessity excepted) he, having two children himself born without danger, caused one of them to be baptized on the week-day. And by his example, without any contradiction or motion of reformation, it is used, as it hath been accustomed, in the diocese commonly, contrary to the book of ordinance in that behalf.

25. Item, From his first coming into the diocese, he hath had, and yet hath his only study, labour, and practice, to survey land, and to look for mines, &c. neglecting his own bounden duty to apply to his book and preaching.

26. Item, He keepeth no manner of hospitality, but with his servants' table in one parlour with him, lest by strangers should approach his servants being at their meat.

27. Item, He is commonly talking not of godliness, but of worldly matters, as baking, brewing, inclosing, ploughing, mining, of mill-stones, discharging of tenants, and such like, not only at his table, but also most commonly at other places.

28. Item, He hath warned divers tenants out of their lands, which they and their ancestors have enjoyed for their rents, these hundred years and more, and occupied with tillage; which he said he would inclose, and being sued to by poor men, because of quietness, he answered, The crows shall eat the corn, rather than ye shall have any profit thereof.

29. Item, When the vicars choral of St. David's, for relief of their hospitality, had an island of his called the Bishop's-isle, for 40s. rent, which he let to a chaplain of his for 5l. by the year; and where, at the suit of the said vicars it was granted by the bishop in the whole chapter, that the vicars should have it for years 40s. rent, and pay 20l. entry; he now covetously, and against his promise openly made, denieth the same, except the vicars would give 50l.

30. Item, He caused the curate of St. David's to warn their tenants out of their said lands in the pulpit, to the great offence of the people, who were wont to have God's word preached there; and so they said to the curate at that time.

31. Item, To the ploughing of a pasture not above ten days work, in lent, anno 1549, he had 32 ploughs in one day, and those ploughs the priest bade in the church, contrary to the statute of Gomortha in that behalf provided, and to the evil example of gentlemen in that country.

32. Item, Where the king's majesty, of godly remembrance, Henry VIII. appointed at Brecknock a school-master, usher, reader of divinity, a minister, and certain scholars, and for the maintenance thereof appointed

40l. and 12l. of the pensions and revenues of Brecknock; the bishop finding it so furnished, has neither reader nor minister there, covetously converting their stipends to his own use.

33. Item, The bishop was twice in one day presented in the great court, held in the court of Caermarthen, for inclosing and covetously incroaching on the king's high-way.

34. Item, He covetously continueth purchasing of lands, buying of cattle, merchandise, and other things, being indebted a notable sum to the king's majesty, as may appear by his accounts in the court of tenths, and first fruits.

35. Item, Whereas one Lewis John Tho. Bool, putting from him his lawful wedded wife, upon Christmas-eve last, without banns, had marriage solemnized with a concubine of his in a church within three miles of the bishop's abode at that time: the bishop since knowing the premises, has not only of a covetous mind entered into a familiarity with the said Lewis, and bought a piece of land of him, but also ever since has (to have his lands cheap) left both the parties and priest unpunished, using him so familiarly, that whereas a sumner cited the parties to appear among other criminals for the same fact, the bishop commanded the said sumner to let him alone, and so they all remain unpunished.

36. Item, Whereas the whole chapter of St. David's (as it was thought) was in assured amity with the bishop, they all being his officers or chaplains, he procured them to be impleaded with a writ of quo warranto in the King's-bench, keeping the writ with him secretly, at least three months, not delivering it but only ten days before the day of their appearance, the parties being seven days journey from London.

37. Item, He is a wilful wrong doer, and troubler of men in their rights, entering upon their lawful possessions, stirring thereby much contention, and so notably known to the offence of the country.

38. Item, Whereas the bishop aforesaid was appointed in August, 1547, and consecrated in September following, he never came into the diocese himself, nor sent or appointed any officer there before the month of April, 1548, to the great disorder of the king's majesty's subjects, lack of reformation, and administration of justice.

39. Item, During his visitation, the said bishop did not endeavour himself to see reformation, but rode surveying of lands, appointing vain inclosures, and such other things. Which are no part of the office to him committed, nor yet proper at that time.

40. Item, The visitation finished, he neither appointed his officers to examine the clergy of the places of scripture to them appointed to be studied in the same visitation, nor has hitherto effectually gone about any good reformation, according to the ordinances of this realm.

41. Item, The bishop since his coming to the diocese never administered the communion, saving only twice that he ordained certain deacons; but in every thing (save that he sometimes preaches) ordereth himself like no minister, nor man of his vocation.

42. He hath so alienated himself from study, that he preaches indiscreetly, discrediting the office, not only untruly reporting the scriptures, but also preaching ten commandments in one place in declaration of the eighth of them, for lack of stuff, the pith of his matter was matrimony of priests.

43. Item, The 13th day of September last, he ordained certain deacons, and making his exhortation, he taught that a man was not bound to forgive, but him that asketh forgiveness; and being admonished by a letter better to declare the same, because that divers were offended with that doctrine; he hath hitherto deferred so to do, to the maintenance of malicious hearts in these parts.

44. Item, Since the 1st day of August, 1549, unto the feast of candlemas last, he hath preached but two or three sermons, of which one was preached at Aberguilly upon St. Stephen's day last, to a great audience that understood no English, being but a mile from Caermarthen, an English town, and chief of his diocese.

45. Item, Since his ordinary visitation which was finished in July, 1548, he hath neither preached, nor caused to be preached in the towns of Tinby, Pembroke, nor Haverford, being English towns, not much distant from the place of his abode.

46. Item, The churches appropriated to the bishop have no paraphrases in English, and few of them bibles.

47. Item, The churches of the diocese for the most part, and the clergy almost every one, lack paraphrases notwithstanding there hath been these two years, and yet be a great number of them to be sold in the diocese.

48. Item, To declare his folly in riding, he useth a bridle with white studs and snaffle, white Scottish stirrups, with spurs, a Scottish pad, with a little staff of three quarters long, which he hath not only used superstitiously these four or five years, in conversation oftentimes boasting what countries he has compassed and measured with the same staff.

49. Item, He hath made a vow, that he will never wear a cap; for he says, it is comely wearing of a hat, and so cometh in his long gown and hat, both into the cathedral church, and to the best town of his diocese, sitting in that sort in the king's great sessions, and in his consistories, making himself a mock to the people.

50. Item, He said that he would go to the parliament on foot: and to his friends that dissuaded him, alledging that it is not meet for a man in his place; he answered, I care not for that, it is no sin.

51. Item, Having a son, he went before the midwife to the church, presenting the child to the priest, and giving his name Samuel, with a solemn interpretation of the name, appointing also two godfathers and two godmothers, contrary to the ordinances, making his son a monster, and himself a laughing-stock throughout all the country.

52. Item, He daily useth whistling to his child, and says that he understood his whistle, when he was but three days old. And being advertised by his friends that men laughed at his folly, he answered, They whistle their horses and dogs, and I am contented; they might also be contented that I whistle my child, and so whistle him daily, all friendly admonition neglected.

53. Item, In his ordinary visitation, among other his surveys, he surveyed Milford Haven, where he espied a seal-fish tumbling. And he crept down to the water side, and continued whistling there the space of an hour persuading the company that laughed at him, that by his whistling he made the fish to tarry there.

54. Item, Speaking of scarcity of herrings, he laid the fault to the covetousness of fishers, who in the time of plenty took so many, that they destroyed the breeders.

55. Item, Speaking of the alteration of the coin, he wished that what metal soever it was of, the penny should be in weight worth a penny of the same metal.

56. For a conclusion, The said bishop in all his doings, since he came to his diocese, hath behaved himself most unmeet for a man of his vocation, being for a minister of justice, an abuser of the authority to him committed; for a teacher of the truth, and reformer of superstition; a maintainer of superstition without any doctrine of reformation; for a liberal and hospitable, an insatiable covetous man; for a diligent overseer, wilful and negligent; for an example of Godly wisdom, given wholly to folly; for merciful, a cruel revenger; and further, for a peace-maker, a sower of discord. And so in all his behaviour a discrediter and slanderer of his vocation, and a deceiver of all men, that had hope he should do any reformation. For he yet hath neither brought into his diocese, nor hath belonging unto him any learned preacher. But such learned preachers as he found in the diocese at his entry, he so vexeth and disquieteth, that they cannot attend to apply their preaching for the defence of their livings, against his quarrellous inventions, and unjust pretensions.

After these wrangling articles and informations were given up, then the bishop was called for to answer, the hearing whereof was committed unto Dr. Wotton, and fir John Mason, knight, who likewise received the bishop's answers to the aforesaid articles, the copy and effect of which answers hereafter follow.

The ANSWER of Dr. ROBERT FARRAR, Bishop of St. DAVID'S, to the ARTICLES ministered against him.

TO the 1st article he says, That after lawful admonition in the king's majesty's name and authority, from the said bishop (being then at London) given to the chaunter and chapter of St. David's, for visitation at a certain day there to be entered; the said bishop himself for such purpose coming into the diocese, knowing also that the chaunter and one of the canons of the church, and late before commissaries in that diocese, had not only by their own evil examples and winking at the faults of others, or neglecting to correct the same, left there among priest and others much detestable whoredom; but had also spoiled the cathedral church of crosses, chalices, and censers, with other plate, jewels, and ornaments of the church, to the value of four or five hundred marks or more, for their own private lucre, (the church remaining even yet very wise, and in great decay) and had also made further under their chapters seal many blanks, to the number of twelve or more, vacant seats, without the king's majesty's licence or knowledge; therefore he brought with him one Edmund Farlee, bachelor of law, commended by Dr. Young and Dr. Nevison to him, as a man sufficient in faith, truth, and learning, to be his chancellor. To whom he granted and sealed a commission for that purpose, giving credit to him in his faculty, concerning the draught and form thereof. But the king's majesty's stile of supremacy was fully set forth in the same commission. Whether there were any default of formal words in setting forth of the king's authority therein, he is not certain; for he committed the doing thereof to his chancellor, who was commended to him for a learned man. And the bishop says, that he never did ground the commission upon any foreign usurped laws or authority: neither did his said chancellor by force of such authority visit any deanry of the said diocese, nor give any admonition to the chaunter and chapter there, by force of that commission, for any like intent or purpose, but only offered in the king's majesty's name and authority (to the said bishop committed) to enter visitation of the chaunter and chapter of the cathedral church at another day to be executed by the bishop himself for the reformation of the chapter church, and minister there, according to the king's gracious ordinances and injunctions in that behalf. But the aforesaid chaunter and canon of the church, before the sight of any commission, stubbornly answered the said chancellor, that they would not receive him, nor any other to visit them, except he were of their chapter. And further desiring to see his commission, he delivered the same into their hands, who would not deliver it him again. And so it may appear that he did nothing by force of that commission.

2. To the 2d article he says, That they opened not unto him the danger of any statute, to his knowledge and remembrance. Nevertheless, he not knowing any default in the said commission, and certainly minding with all diligence the faithful execution of his office, preaching, and visiting the whole diocese in his own person, by the king's majesty's authority, for the conservation of God's peace and the king's, in that dangerous time of rebellion, then beginning to arise in other places, did neglect and laid aside the stubborn behaviour and wicked doings of the said chaunter and canon, and agreed with them, omitting all contempts and reproaches towards him and his said chancellor, and in manner of contention by them done, fearing else through their unquietness some tumult might have risen among the people there; and did also make the said chaunter his chancellor, and canon his commissary, according to their ambitious desires, to appease their malice in that dangerous time. And further he says, that he made collation to fir John Evans of the vicarage of Penbrin; what day or time he remembereth not, nor that an old foreign usurped authority, but by the king's authority.

authority only, making full mention of the king's stile authority in the same collation.
 3. and 4. To the 3d and 4th he says, That whereas had granted to George Constantine the office of a register, who brought unto him a commission for the chancellorship, to be sealed and delivered to the aforechaunter of St. David's, desiring the said bishop to it, he utterly refused to do so, because the said George put therein a clause of admitting clerks into bene-fices: which authority the said bishop would not in any grant, reserving the examination and admission of clerks only to himself, for the avoiding of wicked bribery and partiality. Whereupon the said George and chaunter promised the said bishop by their faithful truth, before three or four honest witnesses, not to execute that clause of institution into benefices, but only those clerks whom the bishop did first examine and admit, and send unto them to be instituted and inducted; on which promise the bishop sealed the said commission, and after that time the parsonage of Haskard being void, and by reason of lapse devolved to the bishop's gift at that time, he conferred it on one Henry Goddard, with a collation of institution by the king's authority, not tolling any foreign usurped authority. In which collation or institution is fully mentioned the renunciation of the bishop of Rome, and all foreign power and authority, with the full stile of his majesty's supremacy. And in this collation of the church of Haskard he gave, before understood or knew that his chancellor had given out the like, and he surely thinketh his collation was the right. That notwithstanding, the said George Constantine, and the said chaunter having a vowson determined by reason of lapse, admitted and instituted one John Pugh to the said parsonage of Haskard, by virtue of their expired vowson, and sealed his institution with a wrong seal, (because they had not the right seal of office for that purpose) contrary to their former earnest promise, and the bishop's right, and without any manner of warning or fore-knowledge thereof to him given;
 which thing by them untruly done, the said George Constantine nevertheless came to the bishop's house, and there did write with his own hand the letters of induction for the said Henry Goddard, priest, comprising in the same the whole sum of the institution or collation which the said bishop had made, and the same George did seal the said letters of induction with his own hand, finding no manner of fault therein, nor making any word of mention of his and the chaunter's former wrong doing, but so departed for that time. And afterwards he came again, and shewed the bishop what they had done before concerning the parsonage aforesaid. And further, the said defendant saith, that he did not molest the said John Pugh, but lawfully did call him in the king's majesty's name, not for any title of patronage, but to know whether he was parson of Haskard, and how he was thereto admitted, instituted, and inducted, and by what authority he presumed to preach there without the king's majesty's licence, and other like lawful demands; whereunto he sturdily refused to give answer, and saith, that the article contained in his accusation, namely, "Item, he is interrogated under what title he holds the rectory of Haskard," was not ministered unto the party in that sort, so far as he knoweth, but in these words or like, "How did he get admission into the rectory," &c.
 5. To the 5th he saith, That albeit George Constantine, register, did wilfully withdraw his bounden service due to the king's highness, and to the said defendant in the king's name, refusing to attend either by himself, or his sufficient deputy for writing of records, and other instruments, yet the said defendant made his collations and institutions in his own name, not by his own authority, nor by another, save only the king's authority, according as he hath declared in his answer to the 1st article, expressing in them the king's supremacy with the bishop's own name and seal of office, as he ought to do, according to the provision of the king's statute in such a case.
 6. To the 6th he saith, That the vicarage of Penbrin being void, he, as right patron thereof to his knowledge conferred it to John Evans, clerk, with letters of institution and induction; and after, when the king's presentation came to him for one David Jenkin, clerk, he desired 14 days respite at that time, either to shew ancient record for his right, and then the matter to stand to the determination of the law, or else if he shewed not, both he and his clerk to give place to the king's clerk, which condition was by sir Thomas Jones, knight, Dr.

 Meyrick, and the said David Jenkin, received; and an institution with an induction was made conditionally to be put in the hands of sir Thomas Jones, knight, for safe custody of the king's clerks' behalf, after the fourteen days to be executed at the hands of the said defendant, if he failed to shew. Within which time the said defendant did shew an old ancient record, declaring the full right of patronage on the said defendant's behalf, and so that institution and induction was never by the said defendant put in execution. Nevertheless the said David Jenkin (contrary to his promise and oath, giving thereupon his right hand to the said sir Thomas Jones, knight) took advantage by the said writing, without knowledge of the said defendant. After which time the lord chancellor, by his letters written to the said defendant, advertised him, to admit one John ap Powell, clerk, presented by virtue of the vowson which the lord chancellor judged to be good, and so to be admitted notwithstanding his former presentation, whereby he would not bar the other man's right. And so this defendant made one collation, two institutions, and three mandates, doing no wrong thereby to his knowledge. And further (he saith) that there was no business nor inquietness about the possession of the said vicarage, but this defendant giving place, was content to lose his right for that time.

7. To the 7th he saith, That as he now remembereth, he never decreed any caveats to be made in benefices, neither did institute nor cause to be inducted any into benefices, being known to him litigious.

8. To the 8th he saith, That because the archdeacons be absent from their offices, and have not had faithful diligent officials, he hath directed his mandates to them or their officials, or to other lawful persons in that behalf, so far as he knoweth.

9 and 10. The 9th and 10th articles he denieth as very untrue.

11. To the 11th, he saith, that whereas sir Thomas Jones, knight, advertised him, that Thomas Prichard had celebrated matrimony in a private house, betwixt a certain priest and woman, whose sister had refused the same, the said Prichard leaving his own cure unserved on that Sunday, this defendant did put the same Thomas Prichard to penance for so doing, marrying them without banns. And whereas he made the said Thomas Prichard, who is a bachelor of law, his commissary; it was for the respect of learning in the law, thereby faithfully to execute his office according to justice. And the said defendant did never favour nor bear with any man wittingly in his wrong doings. He confesseth that the matrimony was solemnized in a private church, and that the cure was that day unserved.

12. To the 12th he saith, That it is slanderous and utterly untrue. And that one John Hughes, priest, made Sage Hughes (daughter to his step-mother) a harlot at eleven years of age, and after married openly to another man, being minister thereof himself. After which doing he took her away from her husband again, and kept her, alledging a former contract. And when the said John Hughes was lawfully convicted before the said bishop, in open court at Caermarthen, of that his abominable adultery, claiming the king's pardon thereof, yet the said Sage confessed, that he had to do with her the night before that day of appearance. Which later crime he denied. Nevertheless she proved with child, affirming, both before the birth and after, the child to be his, the midwife and others being witnesses thereof.
 Yet notwithstanding, George Constantine, as a wicked encourager of the said priest in his naughty doings, with the help of the aforesaid chaunter, first uttered that Meredith Thomas was the father of the said child:
 which matter was ordered in the ecclesiastical court according to justice, without any partial affection of the said bishop, or of any other to his knowledge.

13. To the 13th he saith, It is utterly false so far as he knoweth.

14. To the 14th he saith, That by lawful sequestration in the king's majesty's name, he committed the custody of the fruits of Langathoke and Lanvihangel to two honest men, for the behoof of the king's first fruits and tenths, and of the next incumbent, and further he did not meddle nor minister any cause of unquietness in that behalf.

15. To the 15th he saith, that he made a collation, (lawful, as he supposeth) of the prebend of Lanbister, to Stephen Greene, his chaplain, without any covenant or colour, and further he did not meddle in that behalf.

16. To the 16th he saith, All is untrue as far as he knoweth.

17. To the 17th he saith, It is untrue for his own part, and his officers, as far as he knoweth.

18. To the 18th he saith, It is untrue as far as he knoweth, and that he did certify the recusants justly, as he thinketh, because they refused wilfully to pay the king's whole subsidy of their whole dividends, as it standeth in the king's book, pertaining to the canons resident.

19. To the 19th he saith, That after a travel of fourteen miles, being not able fasting to celebrate the communion, in a chapel within the house of sir Thomas Jones, knight, one of the king's majesty's honourable council of the marches of Wales, this defendant celebrated matrimony without receiving the communion for the causes abovesaid, betwixt Mr. Griffith Rice, and the daughter of the said sir Thomas Jones, according to the king's ordinances. And Thomas Prichard, priest, administered the holy communion there without any superstition, to this defendant's knowledge: and the married persons not disposed to receive the holy communion, he could not compel them against their consciences, and saith, that he did not dispense with them, as it is contained in the article.

To the slanderous and untrue CHARGE of Maintenance of SUPERSTITION, &c. he saith, that he did not maintain any SUPERSTITION, contrary to the King's Ordinances and Injunctions, but abhorring in his Heart all SUPERSTITION, hath travelled and doth travel to abolish the same by True Doctrine, and doing as much as he can, with the King's Peace, among his People there.

20. TO the 20th he saith, that George Constantine, in the third year of his majesty's reign, not regarding the dangerous time of rebellion in other places, rashly caused to be pulled down, without any authority known to this defendant, the communion altar in Caermarthen church, by his own presumptuous mind, appointing the use thereof in another place of the church, not without grudge of the people. Wherefore the bishop fearing tumult, commanded the vicar to set up the communion table (for the time) near to the place where it was before.

21. To the 21st he saith, That he has been divers times in the quire of Caermarthen, and hath tarried there in the communion time, not communicating himself, and that in every church where he cometh on the holy-day to preach, or to pray, he kneeleth in the quire bare-headed, as well at matins before the communion, as at evening song after, without any superstition: he thinketh it not necessary for the communion's sake to leave kneeling to Christ. But he hath diligently taught the people not to kneel nor knock to the visible shew, or external shew of the sacrament. And the choirs of Caermarthen and other places there, are not close at the sides, so that the people may come in and go out at their pleasure. Moreover the king's ordinances do not authorize him to rebuke the people for knocking on their breasts, in token of repentance of their sins; nor for kneeling, in token of submission to God for mercy in Christ.

22. To the 22d he saith, That in the time of the rebellion in Devonshire and Cornwall, threatening to come into Wales, he taught the people the true form of prayer, according to God's holy word, and declared the prayer upon beads to be vain and superstitious, durst not for fear of tumult forcibly take from any man his beads, without authority. And touching the not reproving of such as he should meet, wearing beads, he remembereth not that he hath so done, unless it were in the rebellion time, at which time he durst not rebuke such offenders.

23. To the 23d he saith, That he being in the pulpit, his face towards the people, did not see the light if any were set up about the corpse behind his back till after that he came down from the pulpit. But with George Constantine and the aforesaid chamber sitting in the church, in Caermarthen, to hear curate and seeing the vicar with other priests, with song and lights bringing a corpse up to the church, called for with the vicar and priests, and rebuked them in open court, as cormorants and ravens, flying about dead carcasses for lucre sake.

24. To the 24th he saith, That he caused the child being born with great peril of death to the mother and itself lying for dead a certain space after, to be christened on the working day: the other child was christened on the working day, because both father and mother, and all other people there were in peril of death by reason of the sudden sweat, which all men feared at that time. And touching the rest of the accusation, which is, that by that example, it is used after the old accustomed fashion, he knoweth no such taling.

To the CHARGE of COVETOUSNESS he saith,

Doings prove the contrary, as his Neighbours know.

25. AND the 25th article he utterly denieth.

26. To the 26th he saith, That his hall at Aberguilly being ruinous, he useth for his hall a great chamber adjoining, for himself and his servants, and in a manner of strangers, and besides twenty persons in his house daily. What other hospitality he keepeth, his neighbours can testify.

27. To the 27th he saith, That his talk is according to his hearers, that is to say, reverently and truly of faith, love, and honest life, according to scripture, like auditors: and to other irreverent and rash talkers of scriptures and holy doctrine, he doth talk of honest worldly things with godly intent, and that he doth not most commonly talk of such things as are expressed in this article, but when he hath honest occasion so to do.

28. The 28th he saith, is untrue, and that he hath warned no man out of his lands; but where he is destitute of necessary provision, and would have part of his own domain from certain freeholders, having it only from year to year at pleasure, he cannot obtain it without brawling. Wherefore he suffereth them to keep it even yet still, against right and reason. And touching the rest, that he had rather the crows should eat it, &c. he never spake any such word.

29. To the 29th he saith, That whereas his predecessor bishop Barloe did let to farm the isle of Ramsey to one William Brown, after whose hands the defendant received it into his own possession, the vicars of St. David's being dispossessed of it long before, he did let it over to Stephen Green, for 40s the ground as it was before, and 3l. more for seals, coney, and fowls there; and he knoweth of no right the vicar choral had therein, who did refuse when this defendant did diligently upon reasonable conditions offer the same unto them; and this defendant made no promise unto them, as is contained in the article.

30. To the 30th he saith, He knoweth not but that he advertised his bailiff to warn the freeholders and others having his domain in rent, during pleasure to leave it at a lawful day to this defendant's necessary use: but did not cause the curate to do as is contained in the article to his remembrance.

31. To the 31st he saith, That he knoweth not what the priest made in the church, nor how many ploughs there came, undesired of this defendant. But he knoweth certainly, that he desired no man's labour but for his money.

2. To the 32d he saith, That he knoweth not any appointment of schools and revenues there, but found there (after the departing of bishop Barloe) schoolmaster, an usher being a priest, and twenty scholars, which he hath hitherto maintained better than he found it, to his knowledge: he did never contribute any penny thereof to his own use, albeit he might fully have done the same.

3. The 33d, he saith, is all untrue, so far as he knoweth.

4. To the 34th article he saith, He never purchased more than three parcels, whereof one was 2s. 8d. the year; the second, 3s. 4d. and the third, 1l. 6s. 8d. thereabout, by the year; the rest he denieth.

5. To the 35th he saith, That he never bought of John Thomas, his land good cheap, but after 40 years purchase, not knowing at that time any such thing was contained in the articles against the said Lewes and Thomas. Neither bade he the sumner to let him come, but as soon as he heard any thing of it, commanded the sumner to cite him; and so he was cited to this defendant's house, occasioning him to break bargain; to which Lewes, the defendant said these words, If you would give me your land with a house full of gold, I cannot, nor will I suffer you to keep a woman. Then the said Lewes affirming the latter woman to be his wife, and the first unknown to this defendant, he brought the said Lewes to the consistory trial, where it hangeth yet: and also by lawful process excommunicated the first woman, for that she could not by any means appear in the court to claim to confess marriage with the said Lewes, and so she lieth this day at the point of Significavit.

6. To the 36th he saith, That whereas the chaunter, and R. M. with other canons there, would not obey the king's godly injunctions, concerning the finding of school for poor men's children, a lecture of divinity sermons on the Sundays, repairing of their church and mansion houses, decent order and ministration there; but stubbornly counted themselves (with the chaunter) to be a body politic, without regard of the bishop and his lawful motions, being himself named in their shire statutes a deacon, having also their dean-stall in the choir with a prebend thereunto annexed, and the chief place in the chapter-house, with a key of their chapter-seal, being also by the king's majesty's commission appointed their ordinary: yet would they not in any wise deliver unto him a book of their statutes, for the better knowledge of his and their duties, nor shew unto him their records and monuments, for declaring of the king's right and his. For which cause this defendant, by writ of quo warranto, lawfully called them to answer, which yet lieth asleep, to the loss of the king's majesty's right. The time of delivery of the said writ, he remembereth not.

7. The 37th, he saith, is all false, as far as he knoweth.

To the CHARGE of WILFUL NEGLIGENCE he saith, that he hath used to his power Willing Diligence.

8. TO the 38th he saith, That he being attendant (according to his bounden duty) to serve the king's highness during the time of the parliament, from the first unto the last day; then immediately after repaired into his diocese, and he might not trust R. M. the chaunter, and George Constantine to execute faithfully the jurisdiction, because they had before (through their slanderous life, and not punishing misdoers) left the country in great enormity of filthy whoredom. And saith further, that one cause why he appointed not an officer, &c. was for that he lacked his letters of authority of jurisdiction.

39 and 40. The 39th and 40th, he saith, are untrue.

41. To the 41st he saith, That how often he did minister the communion he doth not remember; but in all other things, so far as he knoweth, he hath studied to order himself according to his vocation, and as far as he believeth acted like a minister.

42. To the 42d he saith, That he hath not alienated himself from study, neither preached indiscreetly, nor reported the scriptures untruly to his knowledge; (but he hath been very much hindered both from study and preaching, by the malicious, crafty, and covetous behaviour of the forenamed persons.) And that he did set forth the doctrine of honest marriage, as well of all other men as of priests, even as the scripture then rehearsed did minister occasion.

43. To the 43d he saith, That reciting the words of Luke, "If thy brother have offended against thee, blame him, and if he repent, forgive him, and if he have offended against thee seven times in one day, and seven times in the day he be converted unto thee, saying, I am sorry, forgive him:" he said farther these words in effect, It appeareth by this place of scripture, that we are not bound (except he repent) to forgive him; but we are bound to pray God to forgive him, and to give him grace to repent, that he may forgive him.

44. To the 44th he saith, That he hath preached right often at Caermarthen, as well as at other places: and he saith that a great number at Aberguilly do understand English very well.

45. To the 45th he saith, That after he had preached first at Brecknock, Caermarthen, Swansea, Laugharne, Tinby, Pembroke, Hereford, St. David's, Cardigan, with other notable towns; he hath since that time preached to a great many other poor churches, but not in Tinby nor Pembroke: but for Hereford he standeth in doubt. And whereas he brought with him at the first a learned preacher, of godly life, the ungodly stubborn behaviour of the persons before named, wearied him away. And whereas he had engaged another learned man to come into his diocese to preach, George Constantine by his discouragement advised him from this defendant.

46. To the 46th he saith, That in all his churches appropriated, there is both bible and paraphrases, so far as he knoweth: and if the priests there would not shew him the lack thereof, yet should the officials declare it unto him, that it might be amended (by his will) without delay.

47. To the 47th he saith, That George Constantine covetously ingrossed into his hands a great number of paraphrases: and this defendant hath admonished the clergy to buy every one, for his discharge; and if the said George being official of two archdeacons, and other officials in their office would declare unto him what churches do lack bibles and paraphrases, he would cause it to be amended as much as in him lieth.

To the CHARGE of FOLLY he saith, That his Desire is in true simple Manner of his Words, Deeds, and Honest Behaviour, through GOD's GRACE, to shew GODLY WISDOM.

8. TO the 48th he saith, That he thinketh no folly in the decent colour or fashion with honest use of saddle, bridle, stirrups, staff, and other like necessary or convenient things; and saith, that he used a saddle made after the Scottish fashion, with stirrups of iron unvarnished, and like spurs; and black bridle without studs, the bit and snaffle white as other men's are.

49. To the 49th he saith, That when he goeth abroad in winter, he weareth a hat to bear off rain and snow, and in summer to shadow him from the sun, without any vow of superstition or offence to the people.

50. To the 50th he saith, That all is one to him, to ride or walk, as cause requireth; and whether he said as is contained in the article or not, he remembereth not. Howbeit he doth use to go on foot.

51. To the 51st he saith, That after lawful prayer it pleased God to give him a son begotten and born in honest marriage; whom he therefore caused to be named Samuel, presenting him to the minister to be received into Christ's church as a poor member of Christ: by the holy sacrament of baptism was this done openly in the cathedral church, with earnest gravity, and without offending any man; and also two wives, being before at variance, desired both to be godmothers, which were both received to make unity between them, not knowing any law to the contrary, nor any offence thereby conceived of the people.

52. To the 52d he saith, That he doth use with gravity all honest loving entertainment of his child, to encourage him hereafter willingly at his father's mouth, to receive wholesome doctrine of the true fear and love of God; and saith, that he hath whistled to his child, but said not that the child understood it, and that he answered to one that found fault with it, as is contained in the article.

53. To the 53d he saith, That he was never surveyor, but went to see Milford-Haven for honest purpose, and not to survey it; and for that he at the sight of a seal whistled in his fist, such as meant folly might turn it to their purpose. But it is not true that he stood whistling an hour to the fish, nor that any fault was found with it, nor any such answer made by him to his knowledge.

54. To the 54th he saith, That if he did say, the destroying of the fry hindereth plenty of fish, he thinketh the same not against reason: but he remembereth not to have said, as is contained in the article.

55. To the 55th he saith, That he remembereth not that ever he said as they alledge.

56. To the slanderous, untrue, and ungodly conclusion he saith, That George Constantine, with other his adversaries before-named, and their adherents, not regarding the fear of God, and their bounden duty of loving obedience towards God and the king, and his true ministers, have with false tongues, contumelious words, and spiteful deeds, laboured by all means to discredit and deface the king's gracious authority to him committed; who, ever since he came to the diocese hath endeavoured himself to shew his faithful ministry by his true honest doing, and to use his authority according to his vocation, to God's glory and the king's honour. And this deponent brought into his diocese both learned men in the law, to his very great charges, which men George Constantine with his adherents hath wearied away.

The whole process was long and tedious, and during the whole time of the examination of witnesses, the bishop was obliged to continue in London upon the allegation of his adversaries, which was, that if the bishop should depart into his diocese, he would hinder them of their proofs. About three weeks after the return of their commission, 127 witnesses having been examined, publication of their witnesses was granted: after which it was a fortnight before the bishop could obtain a copy of their depositions, the whole thereof being so voluminous.

This good man was detained in prison till the death of king Edward; and the coming in of queen Mary and the popish religion; new trouble now began, being accused and examined for his faith and doctrine, he was called before the bishop of Winchester, bishop Hooper, Mr. Rogers, Mr. Bradford, Saunders, and others, the 4th of February. On that day he should also with them have been condemned, but his condemnation was deferred, and he sent to prison again, where he continued till February 14.

He now was examined before Stephen Gardiner and others.—His second examination took place, February 28, before Henry Morgan, the pretended bishop of St. David's, and George Constantine, his secretary; Morgan's words having no effect, he pronounced him obstinate, and for the punishment of this his contumacy to be counted pro confesso, and did so pronounce him in writing. Which being done, he committed the said bishop to the custody of Owen Jones, on Monday next, being the 4th of March, then to be brought again into the same place, between one and two. The third examination being attended with the same effect, he was committed again to custody, the following Thursday, March 7, when the pretended bishop delivered unto him a copy of the articles, assigning him Monday next following, to answer and subscribe to the same, either affirmatively or negatively.

March 11, appearing again before the bishop, George Constantine, he exhibited in a written paper his mind and answer. Upon that the bishop assigned the next Wednesday in the forenoon to hear his answer and definitive sentence.

Dr. Farrar personally appearing the appointed time and refusing still to renounce his faith, the bishop in a rage, pronounced the definitive sentence and he was given up forthwith to the secular power, namely, Mr. Leyson, sheriff of the town of Caermarthen.

The good bishop being condemned and degraded was not long after brought to the place of execution in the town of Caermarthen, where he in the market-place, in the south-side of the market-cross, the 30th day of March, being Saturday next before Passion Sunday, most constantly sustained the torments of fire.

Concerning whose constancy, this is moreover to be added, that one Richard Jones, a knight's son, coming to Dr. Farrar a little before his death, seemed to lament the painfulness of the death he had to suffer; unto whom the bishop answered again to this effect, saying, That if he saw him once stir in the pain of his burning, he should then give no credit to his doctrine. And as he said, so he right well performed the same; for so patiently he stood, that he never moved; till one Richard Gravell, with a staff struck him down.

C H A P. VI.

The HISTORY and MARTYRDOM of RAWLINS WHITE aged 60, a Fisherman in WALES, who was burned at CARDIFF, in the same Month as was Bishop FARRAR: reported by J. DANE, who was almost continually with him during his Troubles and Sufferings, unto his DEATH. Also a LETTER from Bishop GARDINER to Bishop BONNER, concerning celebrating the POPE's FUNERAL; with other Public Occurrences the Months of March and April, 1555.

RAWLINS WHITE was by his calling and occupation a fisherman, living and continuing in the said trade for the space of twenty years at least, in the town of Cardiff, being one of a very good name amongst his neighbours. As touching his religion at first, it cannot otherwise be known, but that he was a great partaker of the superstition and idolatry that then was used in the reign of Henry VIII. But after that God of his mercy had raised up the light of his gospel, through the blessed government of king Edward the VI. Rawlins White began partly to mislike that which before he had embraced, and to have some good opinion of that which before by the iniquity of the times had been concealed from him; and the rather to bring to this good purpose and intent of his to pass, he began to be a diligent hearer, and a great searcher, of the truth.

Because the good man was altogether unlearned, and withal very simple, he knew no ready way how he might satisfy his great desire. At length it came into his mind to take a special remedy to supply his necessity, which was this: He had a little boy, his own son, which child he sent to school, to learn to read English; now after the little boy could read indifferently well, his father every night after supper, summer and winter, would have the boy to read part of the holy scripture, and now and then of some other good book. In which kind of virtuous exercise the old man had such delight and pleasure, that, as it seemed, he rather practised himself in the study of the scripture, than in the trade or science which before-time he had used: so that within few years in the time of king Edward, through the help of his little son, and through much conference besides, he profited and went forward in such sort, that he was able not only to resolve himself touching his own former blindness and ignorance, but was also able to admonish and instruct others: and therefore when occasion served, he would go from one place to another, visiting such as he had best hope in. By which his doing, he became in that country both a notable and open professor of the truth, being at all times and in all such places, not without the company of his little boy, whom (as I have said) he used as an assistant to this good purpose. And to this his great industry and endeavour in the holy scripture, God did also add in him a singular gift of memory, so that by the benefit thereof he would and could do that in vouching and rehearsing of the text, which men of riper and more profound knowledge, by their notes and other helps of memory, could hardly accomplish. Insomuch that he would, upon the alledging of scripture, very often cite the book, the leaf, yea, and the very sentence; such was the wonderful working of God in this simple and unlearned man.

Now when he had thus continued in his profession the space of five years, king Edward died, upon whose decease queen Mary succeeded, and with her all kind of superstition crept in. Which thing being once perceived, Rawlins White did not altogether use open instruction and admonition, (as before he was wont) and therefore oftentimes in some private place or other he would call his trusty friends together, and with earnest prayer and great lamentations, pass away the time, so that by his virtuous instructions, being without any blemish of error, he converted a great number, which number (no doubt) had greatly increased, had not the cruel storm of persecution been. The extremity and force whereof at last so pursued this good man, that he looked every hour to go to prison; whereupon many who had received comfort by his instructions, did resort unto him, and by all means possible began to persuade him to shift for himself, and to dispose of his goods by some reasonable order to the use of his wife and children, and by that means he should escape that danger, which was imminent over his head.

But Rawlins, nothing abashed for his own part, nor moved with these their persuasions, thanked them most heartily for their good will, and told them plainly that he had learned one good lesson touching the confession and denial of Christ; advertising them, that if he upon their persuasions should presume to deny Christ, Christ in the last day would deny and utterly condemn him: and therefore (said he) I will, by his grace, confess and bear witness of him before men, that I may find him in everlasting life.

Notwithstanding which answer, his friends were very importunate with him. Howbeit he continued still in his good purpose so long, till at last he was taken by the officers of the town, as a man suspected of heresy, upon which apprehension he was convened before the bishop of Landaff that then was, the said bishop being then at his house near Chepstow: by whom, after divers combats and conflicts with him and his chaplains, this good father Rawlins White was committed to prison in Chepstow. But this his keeping, whether it were by the bishop's means, because he would rid his hands of him, or through the favour of his keeper, was not so severe and extreme, but that (if he had pleased) he might have escaped oftentimes.

No. 13.

At last he was removed from Chepstow to the castle of Cardiff, where he continued for the space of one whole year: during which time, this reporter resorted to him very often, with money and other relief from this reporter's mother, (who was a great favourer of those that were in affliction in those days) and other of his friends: which he received not without great thanks and praises given to the name of God. And notwithstanding he was thus troubled and imprisoned to his own undoing in this world, and the utter decay of his poor wife and children; yet was his heart so set on the instruction and furtherance of others in the way of salvation, that he was never in quiet, but when he was persuading or exhorting such of his familiar friends as commonly came unto him. Insomuch that on Sundays and other times of leisure, when his friends came to visit him, he would pass away the time in prayer and exhortations, admonishing them always to beware of false prophets which come in sheep's clothing.

When he had continued in Cardiff castle for the space of one whole year, the time of his further trial was at hand. Whereupon the bishop of Landaff caused him to be brought again from the castle of Cardiff unto his own house near Chepstow; and while he continued there, the bishop endeavoured by various means to reduce him to some conformity. But when they found their threatening words and flattering promises ineffectual, the bishop desired him to advise and determine with himself, either to recant his opinions, or else to suffer the rigour of the law, and thereupon gave him a day of determination: which day being come, the bishop with his chaplains went into his chapel, with a great number of the neighbours that had the curiosity to see their proceedings. When the bishop and his retinue were placed in order, poor Rawlins White was brought before them. The bishop (after much deliberation in addressing himself, as it seemed, and silence forewarned to the rest that were present) made a long discourse to him, declaring the cause of his being sent for, which was, that he was a man well known to hold heretical opinions, and that by his instructions many were led into blind error. In the end, he exhorted him to consider his own state wherein he stood: for, (said the bishop) Rawlins, you have oftentimes since your first trouble, both here in my house, and elsewhere, been warned touching your opinions, and you seem altogether obstinate and wilful. Now hereupon we thought good to send for you, to see if there were any conformity in you: so that the matter is come to this point, That if you will shew yourself repentant for that which you have done against God and the law, we are ready to use favour towards you; but if by no means we can persuade you touching your reformation, we are minded at this time to minister the law unto you, and therefore advise with yourself what you will do.

When the bishop had made an end, this good father Rawlins spake boldly to him, and said, My lord, I thank God I am a christian man, and I hold no opinions contrary to the word of God; and if I do, I desire to be reformed out of the word of God, as a christian man ought to be. Many more words were between the bishop and Rawlins, which this reporter doth not well remember. But in the end, when Rawlins would in no wise recant his opinions, the bishop told him plainly, that he must proceed against him by the law, and condemn him as an heretic.

Proceed in your law in God's name, said Rawlins, but for an heretic you shall never condemn me while the world stands. But (said the bishop to his company) before we proceed any further with him, let us pray to God that he would send some spark of grace upon him, and it may so chance, that God through our prayers will here turn his heart. When Rawlins heard the bishop say so, Ah, my lord, said he, now you deal well and like a godly bishop, and I thank you most heartily for your great charity and gentleness. Christ faith, Where two or three be gathered together in my name, I will be in the midst of them: and there be more than two or three of you. Now if it be so that your request be godly and lawful, and that ye pray as ye should should pray, without doubt God will hear you. And therefore, my lord, do you pray to your God, and I will pray to my God; I know that my God will both hear my prayer, and perform my desire.

The bishop with his company then prayed; and Rawlins turning himself to a pew that stood somewhat near him, fell down upon his knees, covering his face with his hands: when they had prayed a-while, the bishop with his company arose from prayer. And then also arose Rawlins, and came before the bishop.

Then said the bishop, Now Rawlins, how is it with thee? Wilt thou revoke thy opinions, or no? Surely, my lord, Rawlins you left me, and Rawlins you find me, and by God's grace, Rawlins I will continue. Certainly if your petitions had been just and lawful, God would have heard them: but you honour a false God, and pray not as you should pray, and therefore God has not granted your desire. But I am a poor simple man, as you see, and God has heard my complaint, and I trust he will strengthen me in his own cause.

The bishop, when he perceived that this hypocrisy of their's took no effect, then with sharp words he reproved him, and forthwith was ready to read the sentence; but upon some advice given to him by his chaplains that were there present, he thought best first to have a mass, thinking, that indeed, by so doing some wonderful change would have been wrought in Rawlins, and thereupon a priest began mass.

In the mean time poor Rawlins betook himself to prayer in a secret place, until the priest came to the sacrificing, as they term it, which is a principal part of their idolatry. When Rawlins heard the sacrificing-bell ring, he rose out of his place, and came to the choir door, and there standing a while, turned himself to the people, speaking these words; Good people, if there be any brethren amongst you, or at the least, if there be but one brother amongst you, the same one bear witness at the day of judgment, that I bow not to this idol (meaning the host that the priest held over his head).

Mass being ended, Rawlins was called for again; to whom the bishop used many persuasions; but the blessed man continued so stedfast in his former profession, that the bishop's discourse was altogether in vain, and to no purpose. Whereupon the bishop caused the definitive sentence to be read. Which being ended, Rawlins was dismissed, and from thence he was by the bishop's commandment carried again to Cardiff, there to be put into the prison of the town, called Cockmarel, a very dark, loathsome, and most vile dungeon.

Rawlins passed away the time in prayer, and chiefly in singing of psalms: which kind of godly exercise he always used both at Cardiff castle, and in all other places.

Having continued a prisoner in Cockmarel prison at Cardiff, some time, about three weeks before the day wherein he suffered, the head officers of the town, that had the charge of his execution, were determined to burn him because they would be sooner rid of him; although they had no writ of execution awarded, as by the law they should have. Whereupon one H. Lewes, the recorder of the town, that then was, seeing they went about to burn him without any warrant by writ, came to them and told them, That if they did burn him before they had the writ, for burning of heretics, the wife of the said Rawlins would upon just cause, by law, call their doings into question.

Immediately upon this advertisement, they sent to London for the writ above-named: upon the receipt whereof they made speed to the execution. The day being at hand, wherein the good father should perform and accomplish the last act of this his worthy conflict, he was the night before engaged in preparing himself.

Now when Mr. Rawlins perceived his time was no less near than it was reported, he sent forthwith to his wife, and desired her by the messenger, that in any wise she should make ready and send unto him his wedding garment, meaning a shirt, which afterwards he was burned in. This request, or rather commandment of his, his wife with grief of heart did perform, and early in the morning did send it to him, which he received most gladly and joyfully.

The hour of his execution being come, this good and constant martyr was brought out of prison, having on his body the long shirt, which he called his wedding garment, and an old russet-coat which he was wont to wear. Besides this, he had upon his legs an old pair of leather buskins. And thus being brought out of prison, he was accompanied, or rather guarded, with a great number of bills and weapons. Which sight when he beheld, Alas! (said he) what meaneth all this? By God's grace I will not run away: with all my heart and mind I give God most hearty thanks, that he hath made me worthy to abide all this for his holy name's sake.

So he came to a place, in his way, where his poor wife and children stood weeping, and making great lamentation: the sudden sight of whom so pierced his heart, that the very tears trickled down his face. But he soon after, as though he had disliked this infirmity of his flesh, began to be as it were altogether angry with himself: inasmuch, that striking his breast with his hand, he used these words, Ah flesh, hinderest thou me so? Wouldst thou fain prevail? Well, I tell thee, do what thou canst, thou shalt not, by God's grace, have the victory.

By this time the poor innocent came to the altar of his sacrifice, and there found a stake ready set up, with some wood towards the making of the fire. Which when he beheld, he set forward very boldly: but in going towards the stake, he fell down upon his knees and kissed the ground; and in rising again, a little earth sticking on his nose, he said these words, Earth unto earth, and dust unto dust; thou art my mother, and unto thee I shall return. Then went he cheerfully and very joyfully, and set his back close unto the stake; and when he had stood there a-while, he cast his eye upon this reporter, and called him unto him, and said, I feel a great fighting between the flesh and the spirit, and the flesh would very fain have his swing; and therefore I pray you, when you see me any thing tempted, hold your finger up to me, and I trust I shall remember myself.

As he was thus standing with his back close unto the stake, a smith came with a great chain of iron; whom when he saw, he cast up his hand, and with a loud voice, gave God great thanks. Then as the smith was making it fast on the other side, Rawlins said unto him, I pray you good friend knock in the chain fast; for it may be that the flesh would strive mightily; but God of his great mercy give me strength and patience to abide the extremity.

Now when the smith had made him fast to the stake, the officers began to lay on more wood, with a little straw and reeds: wherein the good old man was no less occupied than the best; for as far as he could reach his hands, he would pluck the straw and reeds, and lay it about him in places most convenient for his speedy dispatch. Which thing he did with such a cheerful countenance and familiar gesture, that all men there present were astonished at it.

When all things were ready, directly over-against the stake, in the face of Rawlins White, there was a standing erected, whereon stood up a priest, addressing himself to the people, which were many in number, because it was market-day. When Rawlins perceived him, and considered the cause of his coming, he reaching a little straw unto himself, made two little stays, and set them under his elbows. Then went the priest forward in his sermon, wherein he spake of many things touching the authority of the church of Rome. In the mean time Rawlins gave such good ear and attention, that he seemed nothing at all moved or disquieted. At last, the priest came to the sacrament of the altar, and there he began to inveigh against Rawlins's opinions: in which harangue he cited the common place of scripture, and thereupon made a learned interpretation.

Now when Rawlins perceived, that he went about not only to preach and teach the people false doctrine, but also to confirm it by scripture, he suddenly started up, and beckoned his hands to the people, saying twice, Come hither good people, and hear not a false prophet preaching: and then said unto the preacher, Ah! thou wicked hypocrite, dost thou presume to prove thy false doctrine by scripture? Look in the text what followeth; Did not Christ say, "Do this in remembrance of me?" After which words, the priest being rather amazed than interrupted, forthwith held his peace.

Then some that stood by cried out, Put fire; set to fire; which being done, the straw and reeds cast up a great and sudden flame. In which flame this good man bathed his hands so long, until such time as the sinews thrunk, and the fat dropped away, saying that once he did, as it were, wipe his face with one of them. All this while, which was somewhat long, he cried with a loud voice, O Lord, receive my spirit, until he could not open his mouth. At last, the extremity of the fire was so vehement against his legs, that they were consumed almost before the rest of his body was hurt, which made the whole body fall over the chain into the fire sooner than it would have done. Thus died this good old man for the testimony of God's truth, being now rewarded, no doubt, with the crown of eternal life.

It is further recorded of the said good father Rawlins, by this reporter, that as he was going to his death and suffering at the stake, he seemed in a manner to be altered in nature. For as before he was wont to go slooping, or rather crooked, through the infirmity of age, having a sad countenance and a very feeble complexion, and withal very soft in speech and gesture, now he went and stretched himself not only upright, but also bore withal a most pleasant and comfortable countenance, and had great courage and boldness both in speech and behaviour.

It is also said by this reporter, that a little before the fire flashed up to his body, many of his friends came up to him, and took him by the hand, amongst whom the reporter of this story held him so long by the hand, till the flame arose and forced them to part. In the mean time, the priest, of whom I spake before, cried out and said, That it was not lawful for any man to take him by the hand, because he was an heretic, and condemned by the church. The chief cause of his trouble was his opinion concerning the sacrament of the altar. He was, at the time of his death, about 60 years of age.

TRANSACTIONS in the PRIVY COUNCIL, and PUBLIC OCCURRENCES, in the Months of March and April, 1555.

MARCH 28th, the queen summoned into her presence four of her privy council, namely, William, lord marquis of Winchester, high-treasurer of England; sir Robert Rochester, knight, the queen's comptroller; sir William Peter, knight, secretary; and sir Francis Inglefield, knight, master of the wards; to whom she thus spake:

"You are here of our council, and we have ordered you to be called unto us, to the intent you might hear of me my conscience, and the resolution of my mind, concerning the lands and possessions, as well of monasteries as of other churches whatsoever, being now presently in my possession.

"First, I do consider, that the said lands were taken away from the churches aforesaid in the time of schism, and that by unlawful means, such as are contrary both to the law of God and of the church: for which cause my conscience doth not suffer me to detain them; and therefore I here expressly refuse either to claim or to retain the same lands for mine, but with all my heart freely and willingly, without any covenant or condition, here and before God I do surrender and relinquish the said lands and possessions, or inheritances whatsoever, and do renounce the same with this mind and purpose, that order and disposition thereof may be taken, as shall seem best to our most holy lord the pope, or else his legate the lord cardinal, to the honour of God, and wealth of this our realm.

"You may object to me, that considering the state of my kingdom, and the dignity thereof, my crown imperial cannot be honourably maintained and furnished without the possessions aforesaid; yet notwithstanding I set more by the salvation of my soul, than by ten kingdoms; and therefore the said possessions I utterly refuse here to hold after that sort and title, and give most hearty thanks to Almighty God, who hath given me an husband likewise minded, with no less good affection in this behalf, than myself.

"Wherefore I charge and command, that my chancellor (with whom I have conferred my mind in this matter before) and you four, do resort together to-morrow to the most reverend lord legate, and signify to him the premises in my name, and give your attendance upon him for the more full declaration of the state of my kingdom, and of the aforesaid possessions accordingly, as you yourselves do understand the matter, and can inform him in the same."

We must here observe, that in the preceding month, February 19th, the bishop of Ely, with lord Montague, and 140 horse, were sent as ambassadors from the king and queen to Rome. For what cause, is not expressed; but by conjecture, it may be well supposed to be for the same cause of abbey-lands, as by the sequel thereof may probably appear. For it was not long after, the pope did set forth in print a bull of excommunication for all manner of such persons, without exception, as kept any of the church or abbey-lands; by virtue of which bull, the pope excommunicated as well such as had any of the church or abbey-lands, as also all such princes, bishops, and noblemen, justices of peace, and others in office, who had not, or did not forthwith put the same bull in execution. This execution (God be thanked) was never put in practice. For neither the bishop of Winchester, nor any of the pope's clergy, would greatly stir in that matter, perceiving the nobility to be too strong for them; and therefore were contented to stay for a more convenient opportunity; and that those who held lands should not, at the first coming out of the bull, be exasperated too much against them, they subtilly abused the pulpits, and dissembled with the people, affirming that the said pope's late bull, set forth in print for restitution of abbey-lands, was not meant for England, but for other foreign countries: when in truth the meaning of that bull was only for England, and no country else, as both by the intimation of queen Mary, and by many other conjectures, evidently appear. Whereby it is easy for all men to understand what the purpose of those men was to do, if time, which they observed, might have served their devotion. But to let this matter pass of the pope's bull, the time now serveth to treat of pope Julius's death, forasmuch as he made his exit about the latter end of March.

Under this Julius, flourished the archbishop of Beneventanus, a Florentine, named Johannes a Casa, dean of the pope's chamber, and chief legate to the Venetians; who well declaring the fruit of that filthy see, so far forgot both honesty and nature, that he was not ashamed to play the filthy sodomite himself, and to boast openly of the same; but also took upon him most impudently in Italian metre, to all men's ears, to set forth the praise and commendation of that beastly iniquity, saying, That he himself never used other; and this book was printed at Venice by one Trojanus Navus; and yet the pope could suffer this so great iniquity and shameful beastliness, even under his nose in his own chamber, who could not abide the true doctrine of Christ in christian books.

Amongst other pranks and deeds of this pope, in his jubilee, and in the synod of Trent, and in confirming of the idol of Laetane, this is also reported of him in his life, that he delighted greatly in pork-flesh and peacocks. Upon a time when he was admonished by his physician to abstain from all swines-flesh, for that it was hurtful to the gout, and yet would not follow his counsel; the physician afterwards gave warning to his steward, that he should set no more pork-flesh before him. Whereupon when the pope perceived the said pork-flesh to be lacking in his accustomed service: Where, said he, is my pork? And when his steward had answered that his physician had forbidden any pork to be served; the pope burst out into a great rage, and said these words, Bring me, said he, my pork-flesh, in the despite of God.

At another time, at dinner, pointing to a peacock upon his table, which he had not touched; Keep, said he, this cold peacock for me against supper, and let me sup in the garden: for I shall have guests. So when supper came, and amongst other hot peacocks, he saw not his cold peacock brought to his table: the pope, after his wonted manner, most horribly blaspheming God, fell into an extreme rage. Whereupon one of his cardinals, sitting by, desired him, saying, Let not your holiness, I pray you, be moved with a matter of so small weight. Then pope Julius answering again, What, said he, if God was so angry for an apple, that he cast our first parents out of paradise for the same, why may not I, being his vicar, be angry then for a peacock, since a peacock is a greater matter than an apple? Behold here, good reader, by this pope, the holiness of that blasphemous see, and yet what affection was borne to the same in England, by the dirges, (a service for the dead used by the papists) hearfes, and funerals, commanded to be had and celebrated in all churches by the queen and her council, as will appear by the following letters and orders.

A LETTER,

From the Bishop of WINCHESTER (being LORD CHANCELLOR) unto BONNER, Bishop of LONDON, concerning the celebrating of the POPE'S FUNERAL.

AFTER my hearty commendations to your good lordship, the king and queen's majesty having certain knowledge of the death of the pope's holiness, thought good there should be as well solemn obsequies said for him throughout the realm, as also these prayers (which I send you here inclosed) used at mase-time in all places at this time of vacation; and therefore ordered me to signify their pleasures unto you in this behalf, that thereupon you might proceed to the full accomplishment thereof, by putting the same in due execution within your own diocese, and sending word to the rest of the bishops, to do the like in their's.

Thus doubting not but that your lordship will use such diligence in this matter at this time, as shall be necessary, I bid your lordship heartily well to fare. From my house at Ather, the 10th of April, 1555.

Your assured friend and brother,
STEPHANUS WINTON, Chancel.

PRAYERS commanded to be used in the FUNERAL MASSES for the POPE, the APOSTOLIC SEE being Vacant.

WE beseech thee, O Lord, of thy great pity to grant to the holy Roman church a bishop, whose care towards us may be always acceptable to thee, and that he may be revered by thy people for his good government, to the glory of thy name, through our Lord.

A SECRET PRAYER.

MAY thy abundant pity, O Lord, towards us, grant that we may rejoice to have obtained a bishop of our holy mother church acceptable to thy majesty, through our Lord.

After the COMMUNION.

MAY thy wonderful grace, O Lord, rejoice us (being refreshed with the sacrament of thy precious body and blood) in the choice of a bishop who may instruct thy people in all virtue, through our Lord.

In obedience to this command, on Wednesday, in Easter week, there were hearfes set up, and dirges sung for the said Julius in several places. At which time a woman going into St. Magnus' church, at the bridge-foot in London, and there seeing an hearfe and other preparation, asked what it meant: some that stood by, said that it was for the pope, and that she must pray for him. Nay, said she, that I will not, for he needeth not my prayers: and seeing he could forgive us all our sins, I am sure he is clean himself: therefore I need not to pray for him.

Some who stood by, heard her speak these words, and upon their information she was put into the cage, at London-bridge.

The Sudden DEATH of Mr. NIGHTINGALE, a Priest, of CRONDAL, in KENT, who was made Chief Penitentiary of that Deanery by CARDINAL POOLE.

ALmighty GOD by many and sundry ways hath admonished men of all nations in these latter years to embrace, and not violently to resist the light of his gospel; as first, by preaching of his word: secondly, by the blood of the martyrs; and thirdly, by terrible examples from time to time shewed upon his adversaries. In the number of whom cometh here to be remembered, the notable working of God's hand upon a certain priest in Kent, named Nightingale, parson of Crondal, near Canterbury, who upon Shrove-Sunday, which was about the 3d day of the said month of March, rejoicing greatly at the alteration of religion, began to make a sermon to his parishioners, taking his theme out of the words of St. John; "He that saith he hath no sin, is a liar, and the truth is not in him," &c. and upon the same very impertinently declared to them all such articles as were set forth by the pope's authority, and by the commandment of the bishops of this realm; saying moreover unto the people in this wise, Now, masters and neighbours, rejoice and be merry, for the prodigal son is come home. I know that most part of you be as I am, for I know your hearts well enough. And I shall tell you what hath happened in this week past: I was before my lord cardinal Poole, and he made me as free from sin as I was at the font-stone: and on Thursday last being before him, he hath appointed me to notify (I thank him for it) the same unto you. And I will tell you what it is. Then reading the pope's bull of pardon that was sent into England, he said, he thanked God that he had lived to see that day; adding moreover, that he believed by the virtue of that bull he was as clean from sin, as the night that he was born: and immediately upon the same fell suddenly down out of the pulpit, and never stirred hand nor foot. Testified by Robert Austen of Chatham, who both heard and saw the same, and is witnessed also by the country round about:

On the 2d of April, John Awcock died in prison, and was buried in the fields, as the manner of the papists was, to deny christian burial to such as died out of their popish antichristian church.

Having now entered into the month of April, we will set down in order out of the public records what happened in the said month. The 1st of April, 1555, a letter was sent to the sheriff of Kent, to apprehend Thomas Woodgate and William Maynard, for preaching secretly, and to send them up to the council.

The 7th day of the said month, another letter was sent to the sheriff for the apprehension of one Harwich, who went about with a boy with him, preaching from place to place.

The 15 of April, a letter was directed to sir Nicholas Hare, and sir Thomas Cornwallis, requiring them to examine Mr. Flower, alias Branch, what he meant by wearing about his neck this motto, Deum time, idolum fuge, "Fear God, beware of idolatry;" and whom else he knew to wear the like; praying them also to speak to Bonner, bishop of London, speedily to proceed against him for his religion according to the laws, and that the justices of peace of Middlesex should likewise proceed against him for shedding of blood in the church, according to the statute, so as if he continued in his opinion, he might be executed at the farthest by the latter end of this week, and that his right hand be struck off the day before his execution, or the same day.

The 22d of April, there was a like letter sent to the justices of peace of Middlesex, with a writ for the execution of the said Flower, commanding them to see his hand struck off before his burning.

The 29th of April, Mr. Robert Horneby, servant then to the lady Elizabeth, was convened before the council for his religion; and standing constantly to the truth, notwithstanding their threats and other persuasions, was therefore committed to the Marshalsea.

C H A P. VII.

The HISTORY of the LIFE, EXAMINATION, and MARTYRDOM, of the Rev. Mr. GEORGE MARSH, who was burned for, professing the Truth of the GOSPEL, at WEST-CHESTER, April 24th, 1555.

GEORGE MARSH was born in the parish of Deane, in the county of Lancaster, and was well brought up in learning and honest trade of living by his parents; who afterwards, about the 25th year of his age, took to wife an honest maiden of the country; with whom he continued, earning their living upon a farm, having children between them lawfully begotten: and then God taking his wife out of this world, he (leaving his household and children in good order) went unto the university of Cambridge, where he studied, and much increased in learning, and was a minister of God's holy word and sacraments, and for a while was curate to the Rev. Mr. Laurence Saunders, as himself reporteth. In which condition of life he continued for a space, earnestly setting forth God's true religion, to the defacing of Antichrist's false doctrine, by his godly readings and sermons, as well there and in the parish of Deane, as elsewhere in Lancashire.

At length, he was apprehended, and kept close prisoner in Chester, by George Cotes, then bishop of that see, within the precinct of the bishop's house, about the space of four months, being not permitted to have relief and comfort of his friends; but charge being given unto the porter, to mark who they were that asked for him, and to signify their names unto the bishop, as by the particular description of his story, testified and recorded with his own pen, more evidently will appear in what followeth.

The FIRST EXAMINATION of the Rev. Mr. GEORGE MARSH, before the Earl of DERBY and others, written by himself.

ON the Monday before Palm-Sunday, which was the 12th of March, it was told me at my mother's house, that Roger Wrinstone, with other of Mr. Barton's servants, did make diligent search for me in Bolton; and when they perceived that I was not there, they gave strict charge to Robert Ward and Robert Marsh, to find and bring me to Mr. Barton the next day following, with others, to be brought before the honourable earl of Derby, to be examined in matters of religion, &c.

I knowing this, by my friends, was diversely affected; my mother, and other my friends advising me to fly, and to avoid the peril, which thing I had intended, after a week then next ensuing, if this in the mean while had not chanced; seeing that if I were taken, and would not recant in matters of religion, (as they thought I would not, and as God strengthening and assisting me in his Holy Spirit I never will) it would not only have put them to great sorrow, heaviness, and losses, with costs and charges, to their shame and rebuke in this world, but also my own self, after troubles and painful imprisonment, unto shameful death.

This considered, they advised and counselled me to depart and fly the country, as I intended to have done, if this had not happened. To whose counsel my weak flesh would gladly have consented, but my spirit did not fully agree; thinking and saying thus to myself, that if I fled away, it would be thought, reported, and said, that I did not only fly the country, and my nearest and dearest friends, but much rather from Christ's holy word, according as these years past I had with my heart, or at least with mine outward living professed, and with my word and mouth taught, according to the small talent given me of the Lord. I being thus with their counsel and advice, and the thoughts and counsels of my own mind, drawn as it were divers ways, went from my mother's house, saying, I would come again at evening.

In the mean time I ceased not by earnest prayer to ask and seek counsel of God, (who is the giver of all good gifts) and of other my friends, whose pious judgments and knowledge I much trusted to. After this I met with one of my friends on Deane-moor, about sun setting, and after we had consulted together of my business, not without hearty prayer, we departed. I not fully determining what to do, but taking my leave of my friend, said, I doubt not but God (according as our prayer and trust was) would give me such wisdom and counsel, as should be most to his honour and glory, the profit of my neighbours and brethren in the world, and obtaining my eternal salvation by Christ in heaven.

This done, I returned to my mother's house again, where several of Mr. Barton's servants had been seeking after me; who, when they could not find me, strictly charged my brother and William Marsh to seek me that night, and to bring me to Smethchills the next day; who being so charged, were gone to seek me in Adderton, or elsewhere.

Thus intending before to have been all night with my mother, but then considering that my tarrying there would disquiet her with her household, I departed from thence, and went beyond Deane church, and there tarried all night with an old friend of mine, taking little rest, and consulting much with myself of my trouble.

At my first awaking, one came to me from a faithful friend of mine with letters, who said thus: My friend's advice was that I should in no wise fly, but abide and boldly confess the faith of Jesus Christ. At whose words I was so confirmed and established in my conscience, that from thenceforth I consulted no more, whether it were better to fly or to tarry; but was at a point with myself, that I would not fly, but go to Mr. Barton who did seek for me, and there present myself, and patiently bear such cross as it should please God to lay upon my shoulders. Whereupon my mind before being much disquieted and troubled, was now merry and at ease.

I arose early in the morning, and after I had said the English litany (as my custom was) with other prayers, kneeling on my knees by my friend's bed side, I prepared myself to go toward Smethchills; and as I was going thither, I went into the houses of Henry Widdowes, of my mother-in-law, of Ralph Ycton, and of the wife of Thomas Richardson, desiring them to pray for me, and have me commended to all my friends, and comfort my mother, and be good to my little children; for (as I supposed) they should not see my face any more before the last day; and so took my leave of them, not without tears shed on both sides, and came to Smethchills about nine o'clock, and presented myself to Mr. Barton; who shewed me a letter from the earl of Derby, wherein he was commanded to send me with others to Latham.

Whereupon he charged my brother and William Marsh to bring and deliver me the next day by ten o'clock, before the said earl or his council. I made earnest suit, with other special friends, which I had there at the same time, to Mr. Barton, that he would take some one, or all of them, bound by recognizance or otherwise, for my appearing before the said earl or his council, that my brother and William Marsh might be at home, because it was the chief time of seeding, and their ploughs could not go if they were not at home; but nothing could be obtained.

So we went to my mother's, and there I dined and shifted part of my clothes, and praying, took my leave of my mother, the wife of Richard Marsh, and both their households, they and I both weeping, and departing from them, went towards Latham, and lay all night within a mile and a half of it. The next day, which was Wednesday, we arose, prayed, and came to Latham betimes, and tarried there till four o'clock in the afternoon.

O o

Then

Then was I called by Roger Mekinson, to my lord and his council, and was brought into the chamber of p[re]sence, where were present sir William Nores, sir Pierce Alee, Mr. Sherburn, the parson of Grapnal, Mr. Moore, with others. Where when I had tarried a little while, my lord turned himself towards me, and asked what was my name: I answered, Marsh.

Then he asked, whether I was one of those that sowed evil seed and dissention amongst the people: which thing I denied, desiring to know my accusers, and what could be laid against me: but that I could not know.

Then, said he, he would with his council examine me themselves, and asked me whether I was a priest: I said, No. He asked me what had been my living. I answered, I was a minister, served a cure, and kept a school. Then said my lord to his council, This is a wonderful thing: before he said he was no priest, and now he confesseth himself to be one. I answered, By the laws now used in this realm, (as far as I do know) I am none.

They asked me who gave me orders, or whether I had taken any. I answered, I received orders of the bishop of London and Lincoln.

Then said they one to another, those are of these new heretics; and asked me what acquaintance I had with them? I answered, I never saw them but at the time when I received orders.

They asked me how long I had been curate, and whether I had ministered with a good conscience. I answered, I had been curate but one year, and had ministered with a good conscience, I thanked God; and if the laws of the realm would have suffered me, I would have ministered still; and if they at any time hereafter would suffer me to minister after that sort, I would minister again.

At which they murmured, and the parson of Grapnal said, this last communion was the most devilish thing that ever was devised. Then they asked me what my belief was.

I answered, I believed in God the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost, according as the scriptures of the Old and New Testaments do teach, and according as the four symbols or creeds, that is to wit, the creed commonly called the Apostles, the creed of the council of Nice, of Athanasius, and of Austin, and Ambrose, do teach.

After a few words, the parson of Grapnal said, But what is thy belief in the sacrament of the altar?

I answered, I believed that whoever, according to Christ's institution, did receive the holy sacrament of Christ's body and blood, did eat and drink Christ's body, and with all the benefits of his death and resurrection to their eternal salvation; for Christ, said I, is ever present with his sacrament.

They asked me, whether the bread and wine, by virtue of the words pronounced by the priest, were changed into the flesh and blood of Christ, and that the sacrament, whether it were received or reserved, was the very body of Christ.

Whereunto I made answer, I knew no further than I had shewed already. For I said my knowledge was imperfect; desiring them not to ask me such hard and unprofitable questions, whereby to bring my body into danger of death, and to suck my blood. Whereat they were not a little offended, saying, they were no blood-suckers, and intended nothing to me but to make me a good christian.

After many other questions, which I avoided as well as I could, remembering the saying of St. Paul, "Foolish and unlearned questions avoid, knowing they do but ingender strife;" my lord commanded me to come to the board, and gave me pen and ink in my hand, and commanded me to write my answers to the questions of the sacrament above-named; and I wrote as I had answered before. Whereat he being much offended, commanded me to write a more direct answer, saying, I should not chuse but do it.

Then I took the pen and wrote, that further I knew not. Whereat he being sore grieved, after many threatenings, said, I should be put to a shameful death like a traitor, with other like words; and sometimes giving me fair words, if I would turn and be conformable as others were, how glad he would be.

In conclusion, after much ado, he commanded me to ward, in a cold, windy stone-house, where was little room: there I lay two nights without any bed, saving a few great canvas tent clothes, and so continued till Palm-Sunday, occupying myself as well as I could in meditation, prayer, and study; for no man could be suffered to come to me but my keeper twice a day, when he brought me meat and drink.

SECOND EXAMINATION of the R^{ev}. Mr. GEORGE MARSH.

ON Palm-Sunday after dinner, I was sent for to my lord and his council, (saving sir William Nores and sir Pierce Alee were not then present) amongst whom were sir John Beram, and the vicar of Prescot. So they examined me once again of the sacrament. And after I had communed apart with the vicar of Prescot a good while concerning that matter, he returned with me to my lord and his council, saying, That answer which I had made before, and then did make, (as it is above written) was sufficient for a beginner, and as one which did not profess a perfect knowledge in that matter, until such time as I had learned further. Wherewith the earl was very well pleased, saying, he doubted not but by the means and help of the vicar of Prescot I would be conformable in other things: and after many fair words he commanded I should have a bed, with fire, and liberty to go amongst his servants, on condition I would do no harm with my communication amongst them.

And so after much other communication I departed, much more troubled in my mind than before, because I had not with more boldness confessed Christ, but in such sort as mine adversaries thereby thought they should prevail against me; whereat I was much grieved: for hitherto I went about as much as in me lay, to rid myself out of their hands, if by any means without open denying of Christ and his word that could be done.

This considered, I cried more earnestly to God by prayer, desiring him to strengthen me with his Holy Spirit, with boldness to confess him; and to deliver me from their enticing words, and that I might not be spoiled through their philosophy and deceitful vanity, after the traditions of men and ordinances of the world, and not after Christ.

A day or two after I was sent for to the vicar of Prescot, and the parson of Grapnal; where our communication was concerning the mass: and he asked what offended me in the mass. I answered, the whole mass did offend me, first because it was in a strange language, whereby the people were not edified, contrary to St. Paul's doctrine, 1 Cor. xiv. and because of the manifold and intolerable abuses and errors contained therein, contrary to Christ's priesthood and sacrifice.

Then they asked me in what place thereof; and I named several; which places they went about with gentle and far sought interpretations to mitigate, saying, those places were understood far otherwise than the words did purport, or than I did take them.

I answered, I did understand them as they did purport, and as their own books do comment and gloss upon them.

They said, The sacrifice or oblation did not in the mass signify any thing else, than either a sacrifice of praise and thanksgiving, or else a memorial of a sacrifice or oblation. So they caused a mass-book to be sent for, and shewed me where in some places of the mass was written, A sacrifice of praise. Whereto I answered, that it followed not therefore that in all places it signified a sacrifice or oblation of praise or thanksgiving; and although it did, yet was not a sacrifice of praise or thanksgiving to be offered for the people.

After this, Mr. George Marsh was sent to Lancaster castle, and being brought with other prisoners unto the sessions, was made to hold up his hand with the malefactors; at which time the earl of Derby had this conversation with him.

A CONVERSATION between the Rev. Mr. GEORGE MARSH, and the Earl of DERBY.

I said unto my lord, I had not dwelled in the country the three or four years past, and came home but lately to visit my mother, children, and others of my friends, and meant to have departed out of the country before Easter then next, and to have gone out of the realm. Wherefore I trusted, seeing nothing could be laid against me, wherein I had offended against the laws of this realm, his lordship would not with captious questions examine me, to bring my body into danger of death, to the great discomfort of my mother, but suffer me to avoid peaceably, seeing I might have fled out of the country, and yet of my own will came to his lordship.

He said to his council, he had heard tell of me before at London; and intended to make search for me, and take me either in Lancashire or at London, and asked me into what land I would have gone.

I answered, I would have gone either into Almain, or else into Denmark. He said to his council, in Denmark they used such heresy as they have done in England; but as for Almain, he said the emperor had destroyed them.

So after such like words, I said unto him, my trust was that his lordship being of the honourable council of the late king Edward, consenting and agreeing to acts concerning faith towards God and religion, under great pain, would not so soon after consent to put poor men to shameful deaths, as he had threatened me for embracing the same with so good a conscience.

He answered, that he, with the lord Windfor and lord Dacres, with one more whose name I have forgot, did not consent to those acts, and that the names of them four would be seen, as long as the parliament house stood. Then my lord did rehearse the misfortune of the dukes of Northumberland and Suffolk, with others, because they favoured not the true religion; and again the prosperity of the queen's highness, because she favoured the true religion, thereby gathering the one to be good, and of God; and the other to be wicked, and of the devil; and said that the duke of Northumberland confessed so plainly.

The Rev. GEORGE MARSH, to the Reader.

FORASMUCH as not only when I was at Latham, but also since I departed thence, I hear that there be divers reports and opinions of the cause of my imprisonment, as well at Latham as at Lancaster, (as I am informed by credible persons) some saying it was only because I would not do open penance; and some because I could not agree with my lord and his council concerning the sacrament of Christ's body and blood, and the manner of Christ's presence there; some because I would not grant it sufficient, and according to Christ's institution, for the lay-people to receive the said sacrament under one kind only: I thought it good, dearly beloved in Christ, and my bounden duty, to certify you by my own hand writing, of my examination and handling, at Latham, and to tell you the truth as near as I could, to quiet your mind in this behalf; and therefore I have written with my own hand the certainty of those things, as near as I could, here above expressed, not omitting any thing at all concerning religion, whereof they did examine me. Howbeit I perceive in some things I keep not the same order in writing that thing which was asked by them, and answered by me, before or after, as it was in very deed in all points, saving this, telling the truth as near as I can, desiring you to accept in good worth this my good will, and to pray for me and all them that be in bonds, that God would assist us with his Holy Spirit, that we may with boldness confess his holy name; and that Christ may be magnified in our bodies, that we may stand full and perfect in all the will of God; to whom be all honour and glory world without end, Amen.

After remaining some weeks in confinement at Lancaster, he was removed to Chester, and placed in the bishop's liberty, where his lordship frequently conferred with him, and used his utmost endeavours to bring him to an acknowledgment of the corporal presence in the sacrament of the altar, the mass, confession, and in short, of all the tenets and practices of the church of Rome.

When the bishop found he would not assent to a single point, he remanded him back to prison; and in a few days summonsed him before him in the cathedral church of Chester, where, in the presence of the mayor, chancellor, and principal inhabitants of that city, both laity and clergy, he caused him to take a solemn oath to answer truly to such articles as might be alledged against him.

The FIRST APPEARANCE of the Rev. Mr. GEORGE MARSH, before Dr. COTES, Bishop of CHESTER.

WITHIN a few days the Rev. Mr. Marsh was sent for by Dr. Cotes, then bishop, to appear before him in his hall, nobody else being present; and then he asked him certain questions concerning the sacrament: to whom he made such answers as the bishop seemed therewith to be content, saving that he utterly denied transubstantiation, and allowed not the abuse of the mass, nor that the lay-people should receive under one kind only, contrary to Christ's institution; in which point the bishop went about to persuade him: howbeit (God be thanked) all in vain. Other discourse he had with him to submit himself to the universal church of Rome; and when he saw he could not prevail, he sent him to prison again: and after being there, came to him divers times Mr. Massey, a fatherly old man, Mr. Wrench, a schoolmaster, Mr. Henshaw, the bishop's chaplain, and the archdeacon, with many more; who with all plausibility of words, philosophy, and deceitful vanity, after the tradition of men, but not after Christ, went about to persuade him to submit himself to the church of Rome, and to acknowledge the pope to be head thereof, and to interpret the scriptures no otherwise than that church did; with many such like arguments and persuasions of fleshly wisdom.

To whom the said Mr. George Marsh answered, that he did acknowledge and believe one holy catholic and apostolic church, without which there is no salvation, and that this church is but one, because it ever hath, doth, and shall confess and believe one only God, and him only worship, and one only Messiah, and in him only trust for salvation: which church also is ruled and led by one Spirit, one word, and one faith; and that this church is universal and catholic, because it ever hath been since the world's beginning, is, and shall endure to the world's end, and comprehending within it all nations, kindreds, and languages, degrees, states, and conditions of men; and that this church is built only upon the foundation of the prophets and apostles, Jesus Christ himself being the head corner stone, and not upon the Romish laws and decrees, the bishop of Rome being the supreme head.

And where they said the church did stand in ordinary succession of bishops, being ruled by general councils, holy fathers, and the laws of holy church, and so had continued for the space of fifteen hundred years and more; he made answer, that the holy church, which is the body of Christ, and therefore most worthy to be called holy, was before any succession of bishops, general councils, or Romish decrees; neither was it bound to any time or place, ordinary succession, general councils, or traditions of fathers; nor had it any supremacy over empires and kingdoms: but it was a poor simple flock, dispersed and scattered abroad, as sheep without a shepherd in the midst of wolves, or as a flock of orphans and fatherless children; and that this church was led and ruled by the only laws, councils, and word of Christ, he being the supreme head of this church, and assisting, succouring, and defending her from all assaults, errors, and persecutions, wherewith she is ever encompassed about.

He shewed and proved unto them also, by the flood of Noah, the destruction of Sodom, the Israelites departing out of Egypt, by the parable of the sower, of the king's son's marriage, of the great supper, and by other plain sentences of scripture, that this church was of no estimation, and little in comparison with the church of hypocrites, and wicked worldlings.

The SECOND APPEARANCE of the Rev. Mr. GEORGE MARSH, before the Bishop of CHESTER.

AFTER that the said bishop had taken his pleasure in punishing this his prisoner, and often reviling him with the odious names of heretic, &c. he caused him to be brought forth into a chapel in the cathedral church of Chester, called our Lady's-chapel, at two o'clock o'clock in the afternoon, and Fulk Dutton, mayor of the said city, Dr. Wall, and other priests assisting him, placed not far from the bishop; George Wensloe, chancellor, and one John Getham, register, sat directly over-against him.

Then they caused the said Mr. Marsh to take an oath, to answer truly unto such articles as should be objected against him. Upon which oath taken, the chancellor laid to his charge, that he had preached and openly published most heretical and blasphemous doctrines, within the parishes of Deane, Eccles, Bolton, Berry, and many other places within the bishop's diocese, in the months of January, February, or some other time of the year last, proceeding directly against the pope's authority, and catholic church of Rome, the blessed mass, the sacrament of the altar, and many other articles. Unto all which he answered, that he neither heretically nor blasphemously preached or spoke against any of the said articles; but simply and truly, as occasion served, and (as it were thereunto forced in conscience) maintained the truth touching the same articles, as he said all you now present did acknowledge the same in the time of the late king Edward VI.

Then they examined him severally of every article, and bade him answer yes or no, without equivocation; for they were come to examine, and not to dispute at that present.

Then he answered them unto every article very modestly, according to the doctrine by public authority received, and taught in this realm at the death of king Edward; which answers were every one written by the register to the uttermost that could make against him. After this, the company for that time broke up, and he was returned to prison again.

The THIRD and LAST APPEARANCE of the Rev. Mr. GEORGE MARSH, before Dr. COTES.

THE bishop was now determined, if Mr. Marsh would not relent and abjure, to pronounce sentence definitive against him. Wherefore he bade the said George Marsh to be well advised what he would do, for it stood upon his life: and if he would not at that present forsake his heretical opinions, it would (after the sentence given) be too late, though he would ever so gladly desire it.

Then the chancellor first asked him, Whether he were not of the bishop's diocese? To which he answered, that he knew not how large his diocese was at Cambridge. But they asked, whether he had not lately been at Deane parish in Lancashire, and there abode? He answered, Yes.

Then the chancellor read all his answers that he made in that place at his former examination, and at every one he asked him whether he would stick to the same or no? To which he answered again, Yes, yes. Said the chancellor, in your last examination, amongst many other damnable and schismatical heresies, you said, That the church and doctrine taught, and set forth in king Edward's time, was the true church, and the doctrine of the true church, and that the church of Rome was not the true and catholic church.

So said I, replied Mr. Marsh, and I believe it to be true. Here also others took occasion to ask him (for that he denied the bishop of Rome's authority in England) whether Linus, Anacletus, and Clement, that were bishops of Rome, were not good men; and he answered, Yes, and divers others; but he said, they claimed no more authority in England, than the bishop of Canterbury doth at Rome; and I strive not with the place, neither speak I against the person of the bishop, but against his doctrine, which in most points is repugnant to the doctrine of Christ.

Thou art an arrogant fellow indeed, said the bishop. In what article is the doctrine of the church of Rome repugnant to the doctrine of Christ?

To whom Mr. Marsh answered, Oh, my lord, I pray you judge not so of me. I stand now upon the point of my life and death; and a man in my case hath no cause to be arrogant, neither am I, God is my record.

And as concerning the disagreement of the doctrine, among many other things, the church of Rome erreth in the sacrament. For where Christ in the institution thereof did as well deliver the cup as the bread, saying, "Drink ye all of this;" and St. Mark reporteth, that they did drink of it: in like manner St. Paul delivered it unto the Corinthians. And in the same sort also it was used in the primitive church for the space of many hundred years. Now the church of Rome doth take away one part of the sacrament from the laity. Wherefore if I could be persuaded in my conscience by God's word, that it were well done, I could gladly yield in this point.

Then said the bishop, There is no disputing with a heretic. Therefore when all his answers were read, he asked him whether he would stand to the same, being as they were full of heresy, or else forsake them, and come unto the catholic church.

To whom he made this full answer, That he held no heretical opinion, but utterly abhorred all kind of heresy, although they most untruly so did slander him. And he desired all the people there to bear him witness, (if any hereafter should slander him, and say that he held any grievous heresy) that in all articles of religion he held no other opinion than was by law established, and publicly taught in England at the death of king Edward the sixth; and in the same pure religion and doctrine he would, by God's grace, stand, live, and die. Here the chancellor spake to one Leach, who stood near to Mr. Marsh, and bade him stand farther from him; for his presence did him no good.

This being done, the bishop took a writing out of his bosom, and began to read the sentence of condemnation: but when he had read almost half thereof, the chancellor called him, and said, Good my lord, stay, stay: for if you proceed any farther, it will be too late to call it again, and so the bishop stayed. Then his popish priests, and many other of the ignorant people, called upon Mr. Marsh, with many earnest words, to recant; and amongst others, one Pulleyn, a shoe-maker, said to him, For shame man remember thyself, and recant. They bade him kneel down and pray, and they would pray for him: so they kneeled down, and he desired them to pray for him, and he would pray for them.

The bishop then asked him again, whether he would not have the queen's mercy in time; and he answered, he did gladly desire the same, and did love her grace as faithfully as any of them; but yet he durst not deny his Saviour Christ, lest he lose his mercy everlasting, and so win everlasting death.

Then the bishop put his spectacles on, and read forward his sentence about five or six lines, and there again the chancellor with flattering words and smiling countenance called to the bishop, and said, Yet, good my lord, once again stay, for if that word be spoken, all is past, no relenting will then serve; and the bishop (pulling off his spectacles) said, I would stay if it would be.

How sayest thou, said he, wilt thou recant? Many of the priests and ignorant people bade him do so, and call to God for grace; and pulling him by the sleeve, bade him recant and save his life. To whom he answered, I would as fain live as you, if in so doing I should not deny my master Christ, and then he would deny me before his Father in heaven.

Then the bishop read out his sentence unto the end, and afterwards said unto him, Now I will no more pray for thee, than I will for a dog. Mr. Marsh answered, That notwithstanding he would pray for his lordship; and after this the bishop delivered him unto the sheriffs of the city. His late keeper said, Farewel good George, with weeping eyes, which caused the officers to carry him to a prison at the north-gate, where he was very strictly kept until he went to his death, during which time he had small comfort or relief of any worldly creature.

For being in the dungeon or dark prison, none that would do him good could speak with him, or at least durst enterprize so to do, for fear of accusation: and some of the citizens who loved him, for the

the gospel's sake, (whereof there were but few) although they were never acquainted with him, would sometimes in the evening at a hole upon the wall of the city (that went into the said dark prison) call to him and ask him how he did. He would answer them most chearfully, that he did well, and thanked God most highly that he would vouchsafe of his mercy to appoint him to be a witness of his truth, and to suffer for the same, wherein he did most rejoice; beseeching him that he would give him grace not to faint under the cross, but patiently bear the same to his glory, and comfort of his church: with many other such like sayings at sundry times, as one that most desired to be with Christ. Once or twice he had money cast him in at the same hole, about ten pence at one time, and about two shillings at another time; for which he gave God thanks.

When the day and time appointed came that he should suffer, the sheriffs of the city, whose names were Amry and Couper, with their officers, and a great number of poor simple barbers with rusty bills and poll-axes, went to the north-gate, and there took out Mr. George Marsh, who came with them most humbly and meekly, with a lock upon his feet. And as he came upon the way towards the place of execution, some folks proffered him money, and looked that he should have gone with a little purse in his hand (as felons were accustomed in that city in times past, at their going to execution) to the end to gather money to give unto a priest to say masses for them after their death, whereby they might, as they thought, be saved; but Mr. Marsh said, he would not then be troubled to receive money, but desired some good man to take the money, if the people were disposed to give any, and to give it to the prisoners or poor people. So he went all the way with his book in his hand, looking upon the same, and many people said, This man goeth not unto his death as a thief, or as one that deserveth to die.

Now when he came to the place of execution without the city, near unto Spittal-Boughton, one Cawdry, being then a deputy chamberlain of Chester, shewed Mr. Marsh a writing under a great seal, saying, That it was a pardon for him if he would recant. Whereat he answered, That he would gladly accept the same, (and said further, that he loved the queen) but forasmuch as it tended to pluck him from God, he would not receive it upon that condition.

After that he began to speak to the people, shewing the cause of his death, and would have exhorted them to stick unto Christ. Whereupon one of the sheriffs said, George Marsh, we must have no sermoning now. To whom he said, Master, I cry you mercy; and so kneeling down said his prayers, put off his clothes unto his shirt, and then was chained to the post, having a number of faggots under him, and a thing made like a firkin, with pitch and tar in it, over his head; and by reason the fire was unskilfully made, and that the wind did drive the same to and fro, he suffered great extremity in his death, which notwithstanding he bore very patiently.

We must here observe, that when he had been a long time tormented in the fire without moving, having his flesh so broiled and puffed up, that they who stood before him, could see the chain wherewith he was fastened, and therefore supposed no less but that he had been dead; notwithstanding, suddenly he spread abroad his arms, saying, Father of heaven have mercy upon me, and so yielded his spirit into the hands of the Lord.

Upon this, many of the people said he was a martyr, and died marvellously patient. Which caused the bishop shortly after to make a sermon in the cathedral church, and therein affirmed, that the said Marsh was an heretic, burnt as such, and was a fire-brand in hell.

The Rev. Mr. Marsh wrote, besides his examinations while in prison, several letters to divers persons, of which the following are true copies.

No. 13.

LETTER I.

From the Rev. Mr. GEORGE MARSH to his FRIENDS.

HERE you have, dearly beloved friends in Christ, the chief and principal articles of christian doctrine briefly touched, which heretofore I have both believed, professed, and taught, and as yet do believe, profess, and teach; and am surely purposed, by God's grace, to continue in the same until the last day. I do want both time and opportunity to write out at large the probations, causes, parts, effects, and contraries or errors of these articles, which whole desireth to know, let them read over the common places of the pious and learned men, Philip Melancthon, and Erasmus Sarcerius, whose judgment in these matters of religion I do chiefly follow and lean unto. The Lord give us understanding in all things, and deliver us from this evil world, according to his will and pleasure, and bring us again out of this hell of affliction, into which it hath pleased the merciful Lord to throw us down; and deliver us out of the mouth of the lion, and from all evil doing, and keep us unto his everlasting and heavenly kingdom. Amen.

Though Satan be suffered as wheat to sift us for a time, yet our faith faileth not through Christ's aid, but that we are at all times able and ready to confirm the faith of our weak brethren, "and always ready to give an answer to every man that asketh us a reason of the hope that is in us, and that with meekness and reverence, having a good conscience; and whereas they backbite us as evil-doers, they may be ashamed, forasmuch as they have falsely accused our good conversation in Christ." I thought myself now of late years, for the cares of this life, well settled with my loving and faithful wife and children, and also well quieted in the peaceable possession of that pleasant Euphrates, I do confess it: but the Lord, who worketh all things for the best to them that love him, would not there leave me, but did take my dear and beloved wife from me; whose death was a painful cross to my flesh.

Also I thought myself now of late well placed under my most loving and most gentle Mr. Laurence Saunders, in the cure of Langhton. But the Lord of his great mercy would not suffer me long there to continue (although for the small time I was in his vineyard, I was not an idle workman). But he hath provided me, I perceive it, to taste of a far other cup; for by violence hath he yet once again driven me out of that pleasing Babylon, that I should not taste too much of her wanton pleasures, but with his most dearly beloved disciples to have my inward rejoicing in the cross of his Son Jesus Christ: the glory of whose church, I see it well, standeth not in the harmonious sound of bells and organs, nor yet in the glittering of mitres and copes, neither in the shining of gilt images and lights (as the blind papists do judge it) but in continual labours and daily afflictions for his name's sake.

God at this present here in England, hath his fan in his hand, and after his great harvest, whereinto these years past he hath sent his labourers, is now sifting the corn from the chaff, and purging his floor, and ready to gather the wheat into his garner, and burn up the chaff with unquenchable fire.

Take heed and beware of the leaven of the scribes and of the sadducees; I mean the erroneous doctrine of the papists, which with their glosses deprave the scriptures. For as the apostle St. Peter doth teach us, There shall be false teachers amongst us, which privily shall bring in damnable sects: and he saith, that many shall follow their damnable ways, by whom the way of truth shall be evil spoken of, and that through covetousness they shall with feigned words make merchandize of us: and Christ earnestly warneth us, to beware of false prophets, which come to us in sheep's clothing, but inwardly they are ravenous wolves. By their fruits you shall know them. The fruits of the prophets are their doctrine. In this place are we christians taught, that we should try the preachers, and others that come under colour to set forth true religion unto us, according to the saying of St. Paul, Try all things, hold fast that which is good. Also the evangelist St. John saith, Believe not every spirit, but prove the spirits whether they be of God or not; for many false prophets, saith he, are gone out into the world. Therefore if thou wilt know the true prophets from the false, try the doctrine by the true touchstone, which is the word of God: and as the godly Bereans did, search ye the scriptures, whether those things which he preached unto you be even so or not: or else by the outward conversation of them ye may easily be deceived.

LETTER II.

From the Rev. Mr. GEORGE MARSH, to the Faithful Professors of LANGHTON.

GRACE be unto you, and peace be multiplied in the knowledge of Jesus Christ our Lord, Amen.

I thought it my duty to write unto you, my beloved in the Lord at Langhton, to stir up your minds, and to call to your remembrance the words which have been told you before, and to exhort you (as that good man, and full of the Holy Ghost, Barnabas did the Antiochians) that with purpose of heart ye continually continually cleave unto the Lord, and that ye stand fast; and be not moved away from the hope of the gospel, whereof, God be thanked, ye have had plenteous preaching unto you by your late pastor Mr. Saunders, and other faithful ministers of Jesus Christ, who now, when persecution ariseth because of the word, do not fall away like shrinking children, and forsake the truth, being ashamed of the gospel whereof they have been preachers, but are willing and ready for your sakes (which are Christ's mystical body) to forsake not only the principal delights of this life, (I mean) their native countries, friends, livings, &c. but also to fulfil their ministry to the utmost, that is to wit, with their painful imprisonments and blood-sheddings, if need shall require, to confirm and seal Christ's gospel, whereof they have been ministers; and (as St. Paul saith) they are ready not only to be cast into prison, but also to be killed for the name of the Lord Jesus.

Whether these being that good salt of the earth, that is, true ministers of God's word, by whose doctrine, being received through faith, men are made savoury unto God, and which themselves lose not their saltness, now when they be proved by the boisterous storms of adversity and persecution; or others being that unfavoury salt, which hath lost it's saltness, that is to wit, those ungodly ministers, which do fall from the word of God, into the dreams and traditions of Antichrist: whether of these, I say, be more to be credited and believed, let all men judge.

Wherefore, my dearly beloved, receive the word of God with meekness, that is grafted in you, which is able to save your souls: and see that ye be not forgetful hearers, deceiving yourselves with sophistry, but doers of the word, whom Christ doth liken to a wise man, which built his house on a rock, that when the great rain descended, and the floods came and beat upon the house, it fell not, because it was grounded upon a rock: this is to wit, that when Satan, with all his legion of devils, with all their subtle suggestions, and the world with all the mighty princes thereof, with their crafty counsels, do furiously rage against us, we faint not, but abide constant in the truth, being grounded upon a most sure rock, which is Christ, and the doctrine of the gospel, against which the gates of hell, (that is, the power of Satan) cannot prevail.

And be ye followers of Christ and his apostles, and receive the word in affliction, (as the godly Thessalonians did,) for the true followers of Christ and the apostles, are they who receive the word of God. They only receive the word of God, who believe it, and also frame their lives after it, and are ready to suffer all manner of adversity for the name of the Lord, as Christ and all the apostles did, and as all that will live godly in Christ Jesus must do: for there is no other way into the kingdom of heaven, but through much tribulation. And if we suffer any thing for the kingdom of heaven's sake, and for righteousness' sake, we have the prophets, Christ, the apostles, and martyrs, for example to comfort us: for they did enter the kingdom of heaven at the strait gate and narrow way that leadeth unto life, which few do find. And unless we will be content, to deny our own selves, and take up the cross of Christ, and his saints, it is an evident argument, that we shall never reign with him.

And again, If we can find in our hearts patiently to suffer persecutions and tribulations, it is a sure token of the righteous judgment of God, that we are counted worthy of the kingdom of God, for which we also suffer. It is verily (saith the apostle) a righteous thing with God, to recompense tribulation to them that trouble us, and rest to us that be troubled: for after this life, the godly being delivered from their tribulation and pains, shall have a most quiet and joyful rest: whereas the wicked and ungodly contrariwise shall be tormented for evermore with intolerable and unspeakable pains, as Christ, by the parable of the rich glutton and wretched Lazarus, doth plainly declare and teach. These we ought to have before our eyes always, that in the time of adversity and persecution we may stand stedfast in the Lord, and endure even unto the end, that we may be saved. For unless we, like good warriors of Jesus Christ, will endeavour ourselves to please him, who hath chosen us to be soldiers, and fight the good fight of faith even unto the end, we shall not obtain that crown of righteousness, which the Lord, that is a righteous judge, shall give to all them that love his coming.

Let us therefore with meekness receive the word that is grafted in us, which is able to save our souls, and ground ourselves on the sure rock Christ. For (as the apostle saith) other foundation can no man lay, besides that which is laid already, which is Jesus Christ. If any man build on this foundation, gold, silver, precious stones, timber, hay, stubble, every man's work shall appear, for the day shall declare it, and it shall be shewed in the fire. And the fire shall try every man's work what it is. If any man's work that he hath builded upon abide, he shall receive a reward: if any man's work burn, he shall suffer loss; but he shall be saved himself, nevertheless yet as it were through fire.

By fire here doth the apostle understand persecution and trouble, for they which do truly preach and profess the word of God, which is called the word of the cross, shall be railed at and abhorred, hated, thrust out of company; persecuted and tried in the furnace of adversity, as gold and silver are tried in the fire.

By gold, silver, and precious stones, he understandeth them that in the midst of persecutions abide stedfast in the word. By timber, hay, and stubble, are meant such, as in time of persecution do fall away from the truth. And when Christ doth purge his floor with the wind of his adversity, these scatter away from the face of the earth like light chaff which shall be burned with unquenchable fire. If then they who believe, stand stedfastly in the truth, the builder (I mean the preacher of the word) shall receive a reward, and the work shall be preserved and saved; but if so be that they go back and swerve, when persecution ariseth, the builder shall suffer loss, that is to say, shall lose his labour and cost, but yet he shall be saved, if he, being tried in the fire of persecution, do abide fast in the faith.

Wherefore, my beloved, give diligent heed, that ye as living stones be builded upon this rock, and be made a spiritual house and a holy priesthood to offer up spiritual sacrifices, acceptable unto God by Jesus Christ. For we are the true temple of God, and the Spirit of God dwelleth in us, if so be that we continue in the doctrine of the gospel. We are also an holy and royal priesthood, to offer up spiritual sacrifices and oblations; for the sacrifices of the New Testament are spiritual and of three kinds.

The first is the sacrifice of praise and thanksgiving, which St. Paul doth call the fruits of those lips which confess the name of God.

The second is mercy towards our neighbours, as the prophet Hosea saith, "I will have mercy and not sacrifice." Read the 25th of St. Matthew.

The third is when we make our body a living sacrifice, holy and acceptable unto God, that is, when we mortify and kill our fleshly concupiscences and carnal lusts, and so bring our flesh, thro' the help of the Spirit, under the obedience of God's holy law. This is a sacrifice to God most acceptable, which the apostle calleth, "Our reasonable serving of God." And let us be sure, that unless we do now at this present take better heed to ourselves, and use thankfully the grace of God offered to us by the gospel preached these years past, whereby we are induced and brought to the knowledge of the truth; unless, I say, we keep Christ and his holy word dwelling by faith in the house and temple of our hearts, the same thing that Christ threateneth unto the Jews, shall happen unto us; that is to wit, the unclean spirit of ignorance, superstition, idolatry, infidelity, and unbelief, the mother and head of all vices, which by the grace of God was cast out of us, bringing with him seven other spirits worse than himself, shall to our utter destruction return again unto us: and so shall we be in worse case than ever we were before. For if we, after we have escaped from the filthiness of the world, thro' the knowledge of the Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, be yet entangled therein again and overcome, then is the latter end worse than the beginning: and it had been better for us not to have known the way of righteousness, than after we have known it, to turn from the holy commandment given unto us.

For it then happens unto us according to the true proverb, "The dog is turned to his vomit again, and the sow that was washed to wallowing in the mire." And thus to continue and persevere in infidelity, and to kick against the manifest and known truth, and so to die without repentance, and with a despair of the mercy of God in Jesus Christ, is to sin against the Holy Ghost, which shall not be forgiven, neither in this world, nor in the world to come. "For it is not possible (saith St. Paul) that they which were once enlightened, and have tasted of the heavenly gift, and have tasted of the good word of God, and of the power of the world to come; if they fall away, should be renewed again by repentance: forasmuch as they have, as concerning themselves, crucified the Son of God again, making a mocking of him." St. Paul's meaning in this place is, that they that believe truly and unfeignedly God's word, do continue and abide stedfast in the known truth.

If any therefore fall away from Christ and his word, it is a plain token that they were but dissembling hypocrites for all their fair faces outwardly, and never believed truly; as Judas, Simon Magus, Demas, Hymeneus, Philetus, and others were, which all fell away from the known verity, and made a mock of Christ: which St. Paul doth call here, to crucify Christ anew, because that they turning to their old vomit again, did most blasphemously tread the benefit of Christ's death and passion under their feet. They that are such can in no wise be renewed by repentance: for their repentance is fleshly, as the repentance of Cain, Saul, and Judas was, which being without godly comfort, breedeth desperation unto death. These are not of the number of the elect: and as St. John doth say, "They went out from us, but they were not of us: for if they had been of us, they would have remained with us unto the end." Also the apostle saith in another place, "If we sin willingly after we have received the knowledge of the truth, there remaineth no more sacrifice for sin, but a fearful looking for of judgment and violent fire, which shall devour the adversaries."

They

They sin willingly, which of a set malice and purpose do hold the truth in unrighteousness and lying, kicking against the manifest and open truth, which altho' they do perfectly know that in all the world there is none other sacrifice for sin, but only that all-sufficient sacrifice of Christ's death; yet notwithstanding they will not commit themselves wholly unto it, but rather despise it, allowing other sacrifices for sin, invented by the imagination of man, (as we see by daily experience) unto whom, if they abide still in their wickedness and sin, remaineth a most horrible and dreadful judgment. This is that sin unto death, for which St. John would not that a man should pray.

Wherefore, my beloved in Christ, let us, (on whom the ends of the world are come) take diligent heed unto ourselves, that now in these last and perilous times (in which the devil is come down, and hath great wrath, because he knoweth his time is but short, and whereof the prophets, Christ, and the apostles, have so much spoken, and given us an earnest forewarning) we hold not the truth in unrighteousness, believing, doing, or speaking any thing against our knowledge and conscience, or without faith. For if we so do, for whatsoever cause it be, it is a wilful and obstinate infidelity, and a sin unto death: and as our Saviour Christ saith, "If ye believe not, ye shall die in your sins." For unless we hold fast the word of life, both believing it, and also bringing forth fruit worthy of repentance, we shall with the unprofitable fig-tree, which did but cumber the ground, be cut down, and our talent taken from us, and given unto another that shall put it to a better use: and we, through our own unthankfulness put from the mercy of God, shall never be able to pay our debts, that is to say, we shall altogether be lost and undone. For the earth that drinketh in rain that cometh oft-upon it, and bringeth forth herbs meet for them that dress it, receiveth blessing of God: but that ground that beareth thorns and briars, is re-proved and is nigh unto curling, whose end is to be burned.

Nevertheless, dear friends, we trust to see better of you, and things which accompany salvation, and that ye being the good ground, watered with the moistness of God's word plentifully preached among you, will with a good heart hear the word of God and keep it, bringing forth fruit with patience; and be none of those forgetful and hypocritical hearers, which altho' they hear the word, yet the devil cometh, and catcheth away that which was sown in their heart; either having no root in themselves, endure but a season, and as soon as tribulation or persecution ariseth because of the word, by and by they are offended; or with the cares of this world and deceitfulness of riches choke the word, and so are unfruitful. Read the parable of the sower, and among other things note and mark, that the most part of the hearers of God's word are but hypocrites, and hear the word without any fruit or profit, yea, only to their greater condemnation; for only the fourth part of the seed doth bring forth fruit. Therefore let not us that be ministers, or professors, and followers of God's word, be discouraged, though very few do give credit, and follow the doctrine of the gospel, and be saved.

Whosoever therefore hath ears to hear, let him hear: for whosoever hath, to him shall be given, and he shall have abundance: but whosoever hath not, from him shall be taken away, even what he hath: that is to say, they that have a desire of righteousness, and of the truth, shall be more and more illuminated of God: on the contrary part, they that do not covet after righteousness and truth, are more hardened and blind, though they seem unto themselves most wise. For God doth here follow an example of a loving Father, who, when he seeth that fatherly love and correction do not benefit his children, useth another way. He ceaseth to be beneficial unto them, and to minister unto them fatherly correction: he giveth them over unto themselves, suffering them to live as they list.

But we trust to see better of you, my dearly beloved, and that ye like very Gaderenites, for fear of losing your worldly substance or other delights of this life, will not banish away Christ and his gospel from among you: but that ye with all diligence of mind will receive the word of God, taught you by such ministers; as, now when persecution ariseth because of the word, are not ashamed of the testimony of our Lord Jesus, but are content to suffer adversity with the gospel, and therein to suffer trouble as evil doers, even unto bonds. And if ye refuse thus to do, your own blood will be upon your own heads. And as ye have had plentiful preaching of the gospel, more than others have had; so ye shall be sure, if ye repent not, and bring forth fruits worthy of repentance, to be forer plagued, and to receive greater vengeance at God's hand, than others; and the kingdom of God shall be taken from you, and be given to another nation, which will bring forth the fruits thereof.

Wherefore, my dearly beloved in Christ, take heed to yourselves, and ponder well in your minds, how fearful and horrible a thing it is to fall into the hands of the living God. And see that ye receive not the word of God in vain, but continually labour in faith, and declare your faith by your good works, which are infallible witnesses of the true justifying faith, which is never idle, but worketh by charity. And see that ye continually give yourselves unto all manner of good works:

amongst which, the chiefest are to be obedient to the magistrates, (since they are the ordinance of God, whether they be good or evil) unless they command idolatry and ungodliness, that is, things contrary unto true religion. For, then ought we to say with Peter, "We ought more to obey God than man." But in any wise we must beware of tumult, insurrection, rebellion, or resistance.

The weapon of a christian, in this matter, ought to be the sword of the Spirit, which is God's word and prayer, coupled with humility and due submission, and with readiness of heart, rather to die than to do any ungodliness. Christ also doth teach us, that all power is of God, yea even the power of the wicked, which God causeth oftentimes to reign for our sins and disobedience towards him and his word. Whosoever then doth resist any power, doth resist the ordinance of God, and so purchases to himself utter destruction and undoing.

We must also by all means be promoters of unity, peace, and concord. We must honour and reverence princes, and all that be in authority, and pray for them, and be diligent to set forth their profit and commodity.

Secondly, We must obey our parents, or them that be in their rooms, and be careful for our households, that they be provided for and fed, not only with bodily, but much rather with spiritual food, which is the word of God.

Thirdly, We must serve our neighbours by all means we can, remembering well the saying of Christ, "Whatsoever ye would that men should do unto you, do ye likewise unto them, for this is the law and the prophets."

Fourthly, We must diligently exercise the necessary work of prayer for all estates: knowing that God therefore hath so much commanded it, and hath made so great promises unto it, and doth so well accept it. After these works, we must learn to know the cross, and what affection and mind we must bear towards our adversaries and enemies, whatsoever they be, to suffer all adversities and evils patiently, to pray for them that hurt, persecute, and trouble us; and by thus using ourselves, we shall obtain an hope and certainty of our vocation, that we be the elect children of God.

And thus I commend you, brethren, unto God and to the word of his grace, which is able to build further, and to give you an inheritance among all them which are sanctified; beseeching you to help Mr. Saunders and me your late pastors, and all them that be in bonds for the gospel's sake, with your prayers to God for us, that we may be delivered from all them that believe not, and from unreasonable and froward men, and that this our imprisonment and affliction may be to the glory and profit of our christian brethren in the world, and that Christ may be magnified in our bodies, whether it be by death or life. Amen.

Salute from me all the faithful brethren: and because I write not several letters to them, let them either read or hear these my letters. The grace of our Lord be with you all, Amen. The 28th of June, by the unprofitable servant of Jesus Christ, and now also his prisoner,

GEORGE MARSH.

Save yourselves from this untoward generation. Pray, pray, pray: never more need.

LETTER III.

From the Rev. Mr. GEORGE MARSH, to some of his FRIENDS at MANCHESTER, in LANCASHIRE.

GRACE be with you, and peace from God the Father, and from our Lord Jesus Christ, Amen.

After salutations in Christ to you, with thanks for your friendly remembrance of me, desiring and wishing unto you, not only in my letters, but also in my daily prayers, such consolation in spirit, and taste of heavenly treasures, that ye may thereby continually work in faith, labour in love, persevere in hope, and be patient in all your tribulations and persecutions, even unto the end and coming of Christ: these shall be earnestly to exhort and beseech you in Christ, as ye have received the Lord Jesus, even so to walk, rooted in him, and not to be afraid of any terror of your adversaries, be they ever so many and mighty, and you on the other side ever so few and weak: for the battle is the Lord's. And as in times past, God was with Abraham, Moses, Isaac, David, the Maccabees, and others, and fought for them, and delivered all their enemies into their hands, even so hath he promised to be with us also unto the world's end, and so to assist, strengthen, and help us, that no man shall be able to withstand us. "For as I was with Moses, so will I be with thee, saith God, and will never leave thee, nor forsake thee. Be strong and bold; neither fear nor dread: for the Lord thy God is with thee, whithersoever thou goest. Now if God be on our side, who can be against us?"

In this our spiritual warfare is no man overcome, unless he traitorously leave and forsake his captain, either cowardly cast away his weapons; or willingly yield himself to his enemies, or fearfully turn his back and fly. Be strong therefore in the Lord, dear brethren, and in the power of his might, and put on all the armour of God; that ye may be able to stand stedfast against the crafty assaults of the devil.

Now what weapons ye must fight withal, learn of St. Paul, a cham-

a champion both much exercised; and also most valiant and invincible. For we must think none other, but that the life of man is a perpetual warfare upon earth; as the examples of all godly men throughout all ages do declare. The valiant warrior St. Paul being delivered into the hands of the ungodly, and that so many times, and also from so many extreme perils and dangers of death, as he himself doth witness, is fain to commit himself in the end to the rough waters of the sea, where he was in great peril and jeopardy of his own life: yet was God always (to the great comfort of all that hear of it) most ready to comfort and succour him, and gloriously delivered him out of all his troubles; so that no man that invaded him, could do him any harm: and in the end he was compelled to say, I have finished my course, the time of my departing is at hand, I long to be loosed, and to be with Christ, which is the best of all, most heartily desiring death.

These things are written for our learning and comfort, and are to us a sure obligation, that if we submit ourselves to God and his holy word, no man shall be able to hurt us, and that he will deliver us from all troubles, yea, from death also, until such time as we covet and desire to die. "Let us therefore run with patience unto the battle that is set before us, and look unto Jesus the captain and finisher of our faith, and after his example, for the reward that is set before us, patiently bear the cross, and despise the shame. For all that will live godly in Christ Jesus, shall suffer persecution."

Christ was no sooner baptized, and declared to the world to be the Son of God, but Satan was by and by ready to tempt him: which thing we must look for also: yea, the more we increase in faith and virtuous living, the more strongly will Satan assault us: whom we must learn, after the example of Christ to fight against, and overcome with the holy and sacred scriptures, the word of God, (which are our heavenly armour) and sword of the Spirit. And let the fasting of Christ, while he was tempted in the wilderness, be unto us an example of sober living, not for the space of forty days (as the papists do fancy of their own brains) but as long as we are in the wilderness of this wretched life, assaulted of Satan, who like a roaring lion walketh about, and ceaseth not, seeking our utter destruction.

Neither can the servant of God at any time come and stand before God, that is, lead a godly life, and walk innocently before God, but Satan cometh also among them; that is, he daily accuseth, findeth fault, vexeth, persecuteth, and troubleth the godly: for it is the nature and property of the devil always to hurt, and do mischief, unless he be forbidden of God: for unless God doth permit him, he can do nothing at all.

Let us therefore, knowing Satan's deceits and rancour, walk the more warily, and take unto us the shield of faith, wherewith we may be able to quench and to overcome all the fiery and deadly darts of the wicked. Let us take to us the helmet of salvation, and the sword of the Spirit, which is the word of God, and learn to use the same according to the example of our grand captain Christ. Let us fast and pray continually. For this frantic kind of devils goeth not out otherwise, as Christ doth teach us, but by faithful prayer and fasting, which is true abstinence and soberness of living, if we use the same according to the doctrine of the gospel and word of God. Fasting is acceptable to God, if it be done without hypocrisy, that is to say, if we use it to this intent, that thereby this mortal body may be tamed and brought under the subjection of the spirit: and again, if we fast to this intent, that we may spare wherewith to help and succour our poor needy brethren.

This fast do the christians use all the days of their life, altho' among the common sort of people remaineth yet still that superstitious kind of fasting, which God so earnestly reproveth by his prophet Isaiah. For as for true chastening of the body, and abstinence from vice, with shewing mercy to our needy neighbours, we will neither understand nor hear of it, but still think with the Jews, that we do God a great pleasure when we fast, and that we then fast, when we abstain from one thing, and fill our bellies with another. And verily in this point doth our superstition much exceed the superstition of the Jews: for we never read that they ever took it for a fast, to abstain from flesh, and to eat either fish or white-meat, as they call it.

To fasting and prayer must be joined alms, and mercy towards the poor and needy: and that our alms may be acceptable unto God, three things are chiefly required.

First, That we give with a cheerful and joyful heart; for the Lord loveth a cheerful giver.

Secondly, That we give liberally, putting aside all niggardiness, knowing that he that soweth little, shall reap little, and he that soweth plenteously, shall reap plenteously. Let every man therefore do according as he is able. The poorest wretch in the world may give as great and acceptable an alms in the sight of God, as the richest man in the world can do. The poor widow that did offer but two mites, which make a farthing, did highly please Christ: insomuch that he himself affirmed, That she of her penury had added more to the offerings of God, than all the rich men, which of their superfluity had cast in very much. "For if there be first a willing mind, (as St. Paul saith) it is accepted, according to what a man hath, and not according to what a man hath not."

Thirdly, We must give without hypocrisy and ostentation, not seeking the praise of men, or our own glory or profit. And although the scriptures in some places make mention of a reward to our alms and other good works, yet ought we not to think that we do merit or deserve any thing: but rather we ought to acknowledge, that God in his mere mercy rewardeth in us his own gifts. For what hath he that giveth alms, that he hath not received? He then that giveth to a poor man any manner of thing, giveth not of his own, but of those goods which he hath received of God. "What hast thou, saith the apostle, that thou hast not received? If thou hast received it, why rejoicest thou, as tho' thou hadst not received it?"

This sentence ought to be had in remembrance of all men. For if we have nothing, but that which we have received, what can we deserve? or what need we to dispute and reason of our own merits? it cometh of the free gift of God, that we live, that we love God, that we walk in his fear. Where is our deserving then? We must also in this our spiritual warfare arm ourselves with continual prayer, a very necessary, strong, and invincible weapon, and after the example of Christ and all other godly men, cry heartily unto God in faith, in all our distresses and anguishes. Let us go boldly to the seat of grace, where we shall be sure to receive mercy, and find grace to help in time of need. For now is pride and persecution increased: now is the time of destruction and wrathful displeasure.

Wherefore, my dear brethren, be ye fervent in the law of God, and venture your lives, if need shall require, for the testament of the fathers, and so shall ye receive great honour, and an everlasting name. Remember Abraham: was not he found faithful in temptation, and it was reckoned unto him for righteousness? Joseph in time of his trouble kept the commandment, and was made a lord of Egypt. Phineas was so fervent for the honour of God, that he obtained the covenant of an everlasting priesthood. Joshua for the fulfilling of the word of God, was made the captain of Israel. Caleb bare record before the congregation, and received an inheritance. David also in his merciful kindness obtained the throne of an everlasting kingdom. Elias being zealous and fervent in the law, was taken up into heaven. Ananias, Azarias, and Misael, remained stedfast in the faith, and were delivered out of the fire. In like manner Daniel being unguilty, was saved from the mouth of the lions.

And thus ye may consider throughout all ages, since the world began, that whosoever put their trust in God were not overcome. Fear not ye then the words of ungodly men; for their glory is but dung and worms; to-day they are set up, and to-morrow they are gone; for they are turned into earth, and their memorial cometh to nought. Wherefore let us take good hearts unto us, and quit ourselves like men in the Lord: for, if we do the things that are commanded us in the law of the Lord our God, we shall obtain great honour therein.

Beloved in Christ, let us not faint because of affliction, wherewith God trieth all them that are sealed unto life everlasting: for the only way into the kingdom of God is through much tribulation. For the kingdom of heaven (as God teacheth by his prophet Esdras) is like a city built and set upon a broad field, and full of all good things, but the entrance thereof is narrow, (full of sorrow and travail, perils and labours) like as if there were a fire at the right hand, and a deep water at the left; and as it were one strait path between them both, so small, that there could but one man go there. If this city were now given to an heir, and he never went through the perilous way, how could he receive his inheritance? Wherefore seeing we are in this narrow and strait way, which leadeth unto the most joyful and pleasant city of everlasting life; let us not stagger, neither turn back, being afraid of the dangerous and perilous way, but follow our captain Jesus Christ in the narrow and strait way, and be afraid of nothing, no not even of death itself: for it is he that must lead us to our journey's end, and open us the door unto everlasting life. Consider also the course of this world, how many there be which for their master's sake, or for a little promotion's sake, would adventure their lives in worldly affairs, as commonly in wars, and yet is their reward but light and transitory, and our's is unspeakably great, and everlasting. They suffer pains to be made lords on earth for a short season: how much more ought we to endure like pains, yea, peradventure much less, to be made kings in heaven for evermore? Consider also the wicked of this world, which for a little pleasure's sake, or to be avenged on their enemies, will fight with sword and weapons, and put themselves in danger of imprisonment and hanging. So much as virtue is better than vice, and God mightier than the devil, so much ought we to excel them in this our spiritual battle.

And seeing, brethren, it hath pleased God to send me, and that most worthy minister of Christ, John Bradford, your countrymen, in the fore-front of this battle, where (for the time) is most danger, I beseech you all, in the bowels of Christ, to help us, and all our fellow-soldiers standing in like perilous places, with your prayers to God for us, that we may quit ourselves like men in the Lord, and give some example of boldness and constancy mingled with patience in the fear of God, that you and others our brethren, through our example, may be so encouraged and strengthened to follow us, that you also may leave example to your weak brethren in the world to follow you. Amen.

Consider

Consider what I say; the Lord give us understanding in all things. Brethren, the time is short; it remaineth that you use this world as though ye used it not: for the fashion of this world vanisheth away. See that ye love not the world; neither things that are in the world: but set your affections on heavenly things, where Christ sitteth on the right hand of God. Be meek and long-suffering, serve and edify one another, with the gift that God hath given you. Beware of strange doctrine; abide the old conversation of greedy lusts, and walk in a new doctrine. Beware of uncleanness, covetousness; foolish talking; false doctrine, and drunkenness: rejoice and be thankful towards God, and submit yourselves one to another. Cease from sin; spend no more time in vice, be sober and apt to pray, be patient in trouble, love each other, and let the glory of God and profit of your neighbour be the only mark you shoot at in all your doings. Repent ye of the life that is past, and take better heed to your doings hereafter. And above all things cleave ye fast to Christ, who was delivered to death for our sins, and rose again for our justification. To whom with the Father, and the Holy Ghost, be all honour and power for evermore. Amen.

Salute from me in Christ all others which love us in the faith, and at your discretion make them partakers of these letters: and pray ye all for me and others in bonds for the gospel, that the same God (which by grace has called us from wickedness unto true christianity, and now of love proveth our patience by persecution) will of his mercy and favour in the end gloriously deliver us, either by death, or by life, to his glory, Amen. At Lancaster, August 30, 1555.

By me, an unprofitable servant of Christ,
GEORGE MARSH.

LETTER IV.

From the Rev. Mr. GEORGE MARSH, to JENKIN CRAMPTON, JAMES LEIVER, ELICE FOGGE, RALPH BRADSHAW, and others.

THE grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, and the love of God, and the fellowship of the Holy Ghost, be with you all, Amen.

After salutations in Christ, and hearty thanks for your friendly tokens and other remembrances towards me, beseeching God that ye may increase in faith, fear, and love, and all good gifts, and grow up into a perfect man in Christ: These are earnestly to exhort you, yea and to beseech you in the tender mercy of Christ, that with purpose of heart ye continually cleave unto the Lord, and that ye worship and serve him in spirit, in the gospel of his Son. For God will not be worshipped after the commandments and traditions of men, neither yet by any other means appointed, prescribed, and taught us, but by his holy word. And though all men for the most part defile themselves with the wicked traditions of men, and ordinances after the world, and not after Christ; yet do ye after the example of Tobit, Daniel and his three companions, Mattathias and his three sons, be at a point with yourselves, that ye will not be defiled with the unclean meats of the heathen; I do mean the uncleanness of idolatry, and the very heathenish ceremonies of the priests: but as the true worshippers, serve ye God in spirit and truth, according to the sacred scriptures, which I would wish to desire you above all things continually and reverently (as Christ and St. Paul command you) to search and read, with the wholesome monitions of the same: to teach, exhort, comfort, and edify one another, and your brethren and neighbours, now in the time of this our miserable captivity, and great famishing of souls, for want of the food of God's word. And doubt not of the merciful Lord, who hath promised to be with us even unto the world's end, and that whensoever two or three be gathered together in his name, he will be in the midst of them, will assist you, and teach you the right meaning of the sacred word, as he hath faithfully promised.

And though you think yourselves unable to teach, yet at the commandment of Christ, now in time of famine, the hungry people being in a wilderness far from any towns, which if they went away fasting, are sure to faint and perish by the way, employ and bestow those five loaves and two fishes that ye have, upon that hungry multitude, although you think it nothing among so many. And he that increased the five loaves and two fishes to feed five thousand men, besides women and children, will augment his gifts in you, not only to the edifying and winning of others in Christ, but also to an exceeding great increase of your knowledge in God and his holy word. And fear not your adversaries; for either according to his accustomed manner God shall blind their eyes that they shall not spy you, or get you favour in their sight, or else graciously deliver you out of their hands by one means or other.

Obey with reverence all your superiors, unless they command idolatry or ungodliness. Make provision for your households, lest that they be instructed and taught in the law of God. Love your wives even as your own selves, and as Christ loved the congregation. Love your children, but abuse them not, lest they be of a desperate mind: and bring them up in the nurture and information of the Lord, and teach them even as the godly parents of Tobit the younger, and Susanna did teach their children; even from their infancy to reverence God according to his law; and to abstain from sin, providing that in no wise they be brought up in idleness and wantonness, seeing that ye reckon yourselves to be children of God, and look for the life which God shall give to them which never turn their belief from him. See that ye even fear God, and keep his commandments; and though the plague of God chance upon you, yet remain ye steadfast in the faith and fear of God, and thank him, and serve him in such holiness and righteousness as are acceptable before him all the days of your life. Comfort yourselves in all your adversities, and stay yourselves in him, who hath promised not to leave you as fatherless and motherless children without any comfort, but that he will come to you like a most gentle and merciful Lord. He will continually stand by you in all your troubles, assisting, helping, and succouring you at all times. "I will be with you (saith he) unto the end of the world." And cleave you fast unto him, which was incarnate, lived; wrought, taught, and died for your sins; yea, rose again from death, and ascended into heaven for your justification. Repent ye of the life that is past, and cease from sin, and from henceforward live as much time as remaineth in the flesh, not after the lusts of men; but after the will of God. To do good and distribute, forget not: Fast and pray busily, and as every man hath received the gift, minister the same one to another as good ministers of the manifold graces of God, that God in all things may be glorified through Jesus Christ, to whom be praise and dominion for ever, and while the world standeth; Amen.

Your's,
GEORGE MARSH.

LETTER V.

From the Rev. Mr. GEORGE MARSH, to the same.

THE same grace and peace (dearly beloved in Christ) do I intirely desire and wish unto you, which the apostle St. Paul wisheth to all them, unto whom he did write and send his epistles, than which two things no better can be wished and desired of God. Grace is, throughout all the epistles of Paul, taken for the mercy and favour of God, whereby he saveth us freely without any deservings or works of the law. In like manner peace is taken for the quietness and tranquillity of the conscience, being fully persuaded that through the only merits of Christ's death and blood-shedding, there is an atonement and peace made between God and us, so that God will no more impute our sins unto us, nor yet condemn us.

Dearly beloved, I will not be negligent to put you always in remembrance of things, though you know them yourselves, and be also established in the present truth; notwithstanding, I think it meet, as long as I am in this tabernacle, to stir you up by putting you in remembrance. Wherefore I beseech you, brethren, and exhort you in the Lord Jesus, that ye increase more and more, even as ye have received, how ye ought to walk, and to please God. And as Barnabas, that good man, and full of the Holy Ghost, exhorted the Antiochians, with purpose of heart cleave ye continually unto the Lord. And stand fast, and be not moved from the hope of the gospel, whereof, God be thanked, ye have had plenteous preaching unto you these years past, by the faithful ministers of Jesus Christ, Leiver; Pilkinton, Bradford, Saunders, and others, which now, when persecution ariseth, because of the word, do not fall away like shrinking children, and forsake the truth, but are glad and ready for your sakes, which are his mystical body, to forsake the chief and principal delights of this life, and some of them in giving place to the outrageous tyranny of the world, to forsake their livings, friends, native land, and other chief pleasures of this life, and to commit themselves to painful exile, that, if it please God, Christ may come again out of Egypt. And others are ready to fulfil their ministry unto the uttermost; that is to say, with their painful imprisonments and blood-shedding; if need shall require, to confirm and seal Christ's gospel whereof they have been ministers; and as St. Paul saith, not only to be cast into prison, but also to die for the name of the Lord Jesus.

Be ye not therefore ashamed of the testimony of our Lord Jesus, neither be ye ashamed of us which are his prisoners; but suffer ye adversity with the gospel, for which word we suffer as evil doers, even unto bonds; but the word of God is not bound with us. Therefore we suffer all things for the elect's sake, that they also may obtain the salvation that is in Christ Jesus with eternal glory: wherefore stand ye fast in the faith, and be not moved from the hope of the gospel, and so shall ye make us even with joy to suffer for your sakes, and as the apostle saith, to fulfil that which is behind of the passions of Christ in our flesh, for his body's sake, which is the congregation. St. Paul doth not here mean, that there wanteth any thing in the passion of Christ, which may be supplied by man; for the passion of Christ, as touching his own person, is that most perfect and all-sufficient sacrifice, whereby we are all made perfect; as many as are sanctified in his blood: but these his words ought to be understood of the elect and chosen, in whom Christ is, and shall be persecuted unto the world's end. The passion of Christ then, as touching his mystical body, which is the church, shall not be perfect till they have all suffered; whom God hath appointed appointed to suffer for his Son's sake. Wherefore establish yourselves, and be of good comfort, and be not moved in these afflictions, knowing that we are appointed thereunto. For on our parts nothing can be greater consolation and inward joy unto us in our adversity, than to hear of your faith and love, and that ye have a good remembrance of us always, praying for us as we do for you, as the apostle writeth of the Thessalonians, saying, Now are we alive, if ye stand stedfast in the Lord: for good shepherds do always count the welfare and prosperous state of Christ's flock to be their own: for while it goeth well with the congregation, it goeth well with them also in whatsoever affliction or adversity they be: but when they see the church in any peril or weakness, then are they weary of their own lives, then can they have no rest nor joy. "Who is weak," (says St. Paul) and I am not weak? who is offended, and I do not burn?" But this affection is not in them that seek their own lucre and glory.

And forasmuch as the life of man is a perpetual warfare upon earth, let us run with joy unto the battle that is set before us, and like good warriors of Jesus Christ please him, who hath chosen us to be soldiers, and not like shrinking children faint and fall away from the truth now in time of adversity and tribulation, wherewith all that will live godly in Christ Jesus must be tried, even as gold and silver is proved in the fire, and whereof all the scriptures have given us so much forewarning. For God is wont for the most part to warn his elect and chosen, what affliction and trouble shall happen unto them for his sake, not to affright them thereby, but rather to prepare their minds against the boisterous storms of persecution. As we have a notable example in the apostle St. Paul, unto whom God sent Agabus, who prophesied unto him of the imprisonment and bonds that he should suffer at Jerusalem; in whom we have also a good example of constancy and steadfastness, who regarding not the tears of his familiar friends, nor yet the peril of his own life, did through fire and water go on still to set forth the glory of God; and he being delivered from the hands of his wicked and blood-thirsty enemies, and that so many times, is in conclusion fain to commit himself to the rough waters of the sea, where he was a long season in great peril and jeopardy of his own life. But God was always (to the great comfort of all that shall hear it) most ready to help and succour him. First, he did send him a most friendly and sweet company, I mean Aristarchus and Lucas, so ruling the heart of the under captain Julius, that he courteously treated him, and gave him liberty to go to his friends, and to refresh himself; and he was beneficial unto him at all times. In like manner was God with Joseph, and delivered him from all his adversities, and gave him favour and wisdom in the sight of Pharaoh king of Egypt, insomuch that he made him governor over all Egypt, and over all his household. In like manner was he with Jeremy and Daniel, in their great troubles, and appointed men for them in their trials, to relieve, succour, and help them, to their singular comfort.

Also when Peter was in Herod's prison, sleeping between two soldiers, bound with two chains, and the keepers before the door keeping the prison, the same night that Herod had intended to have brought him out to the people the day following, and to have put him to death to please the Jews withal, as a little before he had killed James the brother of John with the sword; God sent his angel, and the chains fell off from Peter's hands, and the iron gate opened unto him by it's own accord, and so was Peter wonderfully delivered by God. For it is the true living God that looseth all hands, and delivereth out of prison, and not that feigned god St. Leonard. On that true God did St. Peter call, unto him did he ascribe the glory of his deliverance, saying, Now I know of a truth, that God hath sent his angel, &c.

These things are written for our learning, that we through patience and comfort of the scriptures might have hope. The God of patience and comfort grant that we be like minded one towards another, after the example of Christ Jesus, that we all agreeing together, may with one mouth glorify God the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ.

A poor prisoner for Christ,

From the Rev. Mr. GEORGE MARSH, to ROBERT LANGLEY and other Friends.

THE grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, and the love of God, and the fellowship of the Holy Ghost, be with you good brother in Christ, Robert Langley, and with all them that love the Lord Jesus unfeignedly, Amen.

After hearty commendations to you, with thanks for that ye do visit me a prisoner in Christ, although unacquainted, to your costs, this shall be to let you know, that ye shall receive from me mine examination and handling at Latham, and the cause of mine imprisonment, according as I did promise you: and this ye shall receive of my brother, or some one of the Bradshaws of Bolton within this sevennight, willing you to shew the same to such faithful men about Manchester or elsewhere, as you do take to be favourers of true religion, and Christ's holy word; and then to deliver it again. And whereas you did put me in comfort, that if I did want any thing necessary unto this life, you with some others would be bearers with me in this my costly and painful affliction; I give you hearty thanks, and rejoice greatly in the Lord, who stirr up the hearts of others to be careful for me in this my great need. I thank God, as yet I do want nothing, and intend to be a little chargeable to others (saving my mother) as I can. I will want; I will be bold with you and others, to send for your relief and help in my necessity; desiring you in the mean while to pray for me, and all others in the bonds of Christ, that God would perform the thing which he hath begun in us, that we may with boldness confess Jesus Christ, and fight the good fight of faith.

Your's,

GEORGE MARSH.

L E T T E R VII.

From the Rev. Mr. GEORGE MARSH, to one of his Benefactors, an unknown pious Friend.

GRACE be with you, and peace be multiplied in the knowledge of God, and Jesus the Lord.

After hearty commendations and thanks to you, not only for your large token, but much more for your loving letters, full of consolation to me as touching my person to you unknown; these shall be to certify you, that I rejoice greatly in the Lord, when I do perceive how my sweet Saviour Christ doth stir up the minds, not only of my familiar friends, but times past, but also of sundry and divers heretofore to me unknown and unacquainted, to bear part with me in this my painful and costly imprisonment, sending me their letters, encouraging and exhorting me to continue grounded and established in the faith, and not to be moved away from the hope of the gospel, whereof, according to my small talent, I have been a minister; and daily I cry and call to the Lord in whom is all my trust, and without whom I can do nothing, that he which hath begun a good work in me, would vouchsafe to go forth with it until the day of Jesus Christ, being fully certified in my conscience of this, that he will so do, forasmuch as he hath given me, that not only should believe on him, but also suffer for his sake. The Lord strengthen me with his Holy Spirit, that I may be one of the number of those blessed, which enduring to the end, shall be saved.

And whereas you say, that my suffering of persecution for Christ is a thing to you most comfortable; I make answer that in all mine adversity and necessity nothing on your behalf is greater consolation unto me, than to hear of the faith and love of others, and how they have good remembrance of us always, even as the apostle reporteth by the Thessalonians, saying, Now are we alive, if ye stand stedfast in the Lord. For my trust in the Lord is, that this tribulation shall happen to be the furtherance of the gospel, and that you will be none of those forgetful and hypocritical hearers, whereof some being but way-side hearers, they do cometh and taketh away the word out of their hearts, but they should believe and be saved: (but let prayer be made without ceasing by the congregation unto God for them, and (no doubt) God will to your consolation gloriously deliver by one means or other his oppressed. Only tarry for the Lord's leisure; be strong, let your heart be of good comfort, and wait ye still for the Lord. He tarrieth not, he will come; look for him therefore and faint not, and he will never fail you.

Your's,

GEORGE MARSH.

A L E T T E R

From JAMES BRADSHAW, a godly Brother, to the Rev. Mr. GEORGE MARSH, when in Prison.

GRACE and peace from God the Father, and the Lord Jesus Christ be with you always, Amen.

We had a letter from you, which is a great comfort to us, to see you take the cross so thankfully. Trials and affliction doth prove, try, instruct, confirm and strengthen the faith, provoke and stir up to prayer, drive and lead us to amendment of life, to the fear of God, to meekness, to patience, to constancy, to gentleness, to soberness, to temperance, and to all manner of virtues, and are the cause of exceeding much good, as well transitory as eternal, in this world as in the world to come. There is neither good nor bad, godly nor ungodly, but he hath one cross or other. And although some there be that can shift for a while, by craft, subtlety, and dissimulation, or by some falsehood in fellowship, (as we call it) yet they bring themselves at length into the big danger, confusion, and shame, both in this world, and in the world to come. And seeing that all the troubles and adversities in this world, are a thousand times more light and easy, yet ing in comparison of the eternal fire, which is prepared for the unfaithful wicked enemies of all faithful and godly persons ought to bear and suffer all transitory affliction, and adversity the more patiently, and thankfully, considering and remembering all the dearly beloved friends of God, which were wonderfully persecuted and plagued of their enemies, Abraham of the Chaldees, Isaac of Ishmael, Jacob of Esau, Moses of the Sodomites, David of Saul, and of his own son. As for Job, he had not a drop of blood in his body. John the Baptist, the first that ever was born of a woman, was without any law, or reason, beheaded in prison, as though God had known him at all of him.

We have many thousand fellow martyrs and companions in our misery and adversity, in respect of whose imprisonment, racking, chains, fire, wild beasts, and other means wherewith they were tormented, all that we suffer is but a blast of wind. Therefore now, whosoever is ashamed of the cross of Christ, and aggrieved therewith, the same is ashamed of Christ for his fellow and companion; and therefore let all the Lord Jesus Christ be ashamed of him again at the last day.

Thus I leave for this time, beseeching you to let me have your advice; because I do not outwardly speak that with my tongue that I do not think in my heart. Pray for me, as I pray for you. I beseech the Holy Ghost have you in his keeping always, Amen.

By your friend,

JAMES BRADSHAW.

A P R A Y E R.

Of the Rev. Mr. GEORGE MARSH, which he used to say daily.

O Lord Jesus Christ, which art the only physician of wounded consciences, we miserable sinners trusting in thy gracious goodness, do briefly open unto thee the evil tree of our heart; with all the roots, boughs, leaves, and fruits, and with all the crooks, knots, and withered ends, all which thou knowest: for thou thoroughly perceivest as well the inward lusts, doubtings, and denying thy providence, as those gross outward sins which we commit openly and daily. Wherefore we beseech thee according to the little measure of our infirmity, although we be very unable and unapt to pray, that thou wouldst mercifully circumcise our stony hearts, and for these old hearts create new within us, and replenish us with a new spirit, and water and moisten us with the juice of heavenly grace, and wells of spiritual waters, whereby the inward venom and noisome juice of the flesh may be dried up, and custom of the old man changed, and our hearts, always bringing forth thorns and briars to be burned with fire, from henceforth may bear spiritual fruits in righteousness and holiness, unto life everlasting, Amen.

Beloved, among other exercises, I do daily on my knees use this confession of sins, willing and exhorting you to do the same, and daily to acknowledge unfeignedly to God your unbelief, unthankfulness, and disobedience against him.

C H A P. VIII.

THE HISTORY of the LIVES, CRUEL TREATMENT, SUFFERINGS, and MARTYRDOM of Mr. WILLIAM FLOWER, the Rev. Mr. JOHN CARDMAKER, Mr. JOHN WARNE, Mr. JOHN SIMSON, and Mr. JOHN ARDELEY, under the Persecution of the Inhuman BONNER, in the Bloody Reign of MARY I.

I.

THE HISTORY of the LIFE, SUFFERINGS, and MARTYRDOM, of Mr. WILLIAM FLOWER, a Monk and Priest, who, for striking a Popish Priest, was apprehended, and, first having his Hand cut off, was martyred for his constant Adherence to the Truth.

WILLIAM FLOWER, otherwise named Branch, was born at Snow-hill, in the county of Cambridge, where he went to school some years, and then came to the abbey of Ely; where, after he had remained a while, he was a professed monk, according to the order and rule of the same house wherein he remained, using and bearing the habit of a monk, and observing the rules and orders of the same house, until he came to twenty-one years of age, or thereabouts; and before he came to that age, and being a professed monk, he was made a priest also in the same house, and there did celebrate and sing mass. After that, by reason of a visitation, and certain injunctions by the authority of Henry the eighth, he forsook the same house, and casting from him the monk's habit and religion, took upon him and used the habit of a secular priest, and returned to Snow-hill, where he was born; and there he did celebrate and sing mass, and taught children about half a year.

He then went to Ludgate, in Suffolk, and there served as a secular priest about a quarter of a year; from thence to Stoniland, where he tarried, and served as a secular priest also, until the coming out of the six articles: and then he departed from thence, and went into Gloucestershire, where after he had made his abode in that country a while, at length in Tewksbury, according to God's holy ordinance, he married a wife, with whom he ever after faithfully and honestly continued: and after his marriage, he tarried in Tewksbury about two years together, and from thence he went to Brosley, where he tarried three quarters of a year, and practised physic and chirurgery. From thence he removed into Northamptonshire, where under a gentleman he taught children to write and read. But departing from those parts, he came to London, and there remained for a certain space. After that, being desirous to see his country, he returned to Snow-hill, where he was born; from thence to Brankstrey in Essex, then to Coxall, where he taught children, and coming to Lambeth near London, he hired a house, where he and his wife did dwell together: however for the most part he was always abroad, except once or twice in a month, to visit and see his wife; where he being at home upon Easter-Sunday, about ten or eleven o'clock in the forenoon of the same day, came over the water from Lambeth into St. Margaret's church at Westminster; when seeing a priest, named John Cheltam, administering and giving the sacrament of the altar to the people, and therewith being greatly offended in his conscience with the priest for the same, did strike and wound him upon the head, and also upon the arm and hand with his wood knife, the priest having the same time in his hand a chalice, with certain consecrated hosts therein, which were sprinkled with the blood of the said priest.

In which action as indeed he did not well or evangelically, so afterwards, being examined before bishop Bonner, he did not less confess his not well doing in the same, submitting therefore himself willingly to punishment, when it should come. Howbeit touching his belief in the sacrament, and the popish ministration, he neither would nor did submit himself.

Whereupon Mr. William Flower, being first apprehended and laid in the Gatchouse at Westminster, (where he had given two groats the same day a little before to the prisoners, saying, he would shortly after come to them) with as many irons as he could bear; afterwards was summoned before bishop Bonner his ordinary, April 19, 1555, where the bishop, after he had sworn him upon a book, (according to his ordinary manner) ministered articles and interrogatories to him. But before we speak of these, we will here relate a conversation that passed between Mr. Flower and Mr. Robert Smith, a fellow-prisoner, the substance of which is as follows.

A CON-

A CONVERSATION between Mr. ROBERT SMITH and Mr. WILLIAM FLOWER, concerning the Crime with which the latter stood charged, of having struck and wounded a Popish Priest, while officiating before the ALTAR, at Westminster.

Smith. FRIEND, forasmuch as I understand that you do profess the gospel, and also have done so a long season, I am bold to come unto you, and in the way of communication to demand and learn a truth at your own mouth, of certain things by you committed, to the astonishment not only of me, but of divers others that also profess the truth.

Flower. I praise God for his great goodness in shewing me the light of his holy word; and I give you hearty thanks for your visitation, intending by God's grace to declare all the truth that you shall demand lawfully of me, in all things.

Smith. Then I desire you to shew me the truth of your deed, committed on John Cheltam, priest, in the church, as near as you can, that I may hear from your own mouth how it was.

Flower. I came from my house at Lambeth over the water, and entering into St. Margaret's church, and there seeing the people falling down before a most detestable idol, being moved with extreme zeal for my God, whom I saw before my face dishonoured, I drew forth my hanger, and struck the priest which ministered the same unto them; whereupon I was immediately apprehended; and this is most true, as the act is manifest.

Smith. Did you not know the person that you struck, or was you not zealous upon him for any evil will or hatred between you at any time?

Flower. No, verily, I never to my knowledge saw the person before that time, neither had evil will or malice; for if he had not had it, another should, if I had at any time come where the like occasion had been ministered, if God had permitted me to do it.

Smith. Do you think that thing to be well done, and after the rule of the gospel?

Flower. I do confess all flesh to be subject to the power of Almighty God, whom he maketh his ministers to do his will and pleasure; as in example, Moses, Aaron, Phineas, Joshua, Zimri, Jehu, Judith, Matthias, with many others, not only changing decrees, but also planting zeals to his honour, against all order and respect of flesh and blood. For, as St. Paul saith, "His works are past finding out:" by whose Spirit I have also given my flesh at this present unto such order, as it shall please the good will of God to appoint, in death, which before the act committed I looked for.

Smith. Think you it convenient for me, or any other, to do the like by your example?

Flower. No verily, neither do I know if it were to do again, whether I could do it again, or no: for I was up very early at St. Paul's church upon Christ's day in the morning, to have done it in my jealousy: but when I came there, I was no more able to do it, than now to undo that which is done; and yet now being compelled by the Spirit, not only to come over the water, and to enter the church, but being in mind fully content to die for the Lord, gave over my flesh willingly without all fear, I praise God. Wherefore I cannot teach you to do the like. First, Because I know not what is in you. Secondly, Because the rules of the gospel command us to suffer with patience all wrongs and injury: yet nevertheless, if he makes you worthy, that hath made me zealous, you shall not be hindered, judged, nor condemned: for he doth in his people his unspeakable works in all ages, which no man can comprehend. I humbly beseech you to judge the best of the Spirit, and condemn not God's doings: for I cannot express with my mouth the great mercies that God hath shewed on me in this thing, which I repent not.

Smith. Are you not assured to have death ministered unto you for the same act committed, and even with extremity?

Flower. I did, before the deed committed, adjudge my body to die for the same: whereupon I carried about me, in writing, my opinion of God and the holy scriptures; that if it had pleased God to have given thee leave to have killed my body in the church, they might in the said writing have seen my hope, which (I praise God) is laid up safe within my breast, notwithstanding any death that may be ministered upon my body in this world; being ascertained of everlasting life through Jesus Christ our Lord, and being most heartily sorry for all my offences committed in this flesh, and trusting shortly, through his mercy, to cease from the same.

Smith. I need not examine or commune with you of the hope that you have any further: for I perceive (God be praised) you are in good state, and therefore beseech God, for his mercies, spread his wings over you, that, as for his love you have been zealous, even to the loss of this life, so he may give you his Holy Spirit to conduct you out of this world into a better life, which I think will be shortly.

Flower. I hunger for the same, dear friend, being fully ascertained that they can kill but the body, which I am assured shall receive life again everlasting, and I no more death; intirely desiring you and all that see the Lord, to pray with me to Almighty God, to perform the same in me shortly.—And thus Robert Smith departed, leaving him in the dungeon, and went again to his ward. And this is the truth, as near as the fact Smith could report it.

Now to return again to the matter of his examination. We shewed before, how this William Flower, after striking the priest, first was laid in the Gatehouse; then being examined before bishop Bonner, had articles ministered against him, the copy whereof here followeth.

ARTICLES exhibited by Bishop BONNER, against Mr. WILLIAM FLOWER, late of LAMBETH in the County of SURRY.

1. THAT thou being of lawful age and discretion at the least seventeen years old, wast a professed monk in the late abbey of Ely, wherein after thy profession thou remainedst until the age of twenty or twenty-one years, using all the mean time the habit and religion of the same house, and wast reputed and taken notoriously for such a person.

2. That thou wast ordained and made priest, according to the laudable custom of the catholic church, and afterwards thou didst execute and minister as a priest, and wast commonly reputed, named, and taken for priest.

3. That after the premises thou, forgetting God thy conscience, honesty, and the laudable order of the catholic church, didst, contrary to thy profession and vow, take, as unto thy wife, one woman, commonly called Alice Pulton, in the parish church of Tewksbury in the diocese of Gloucester, with whom thou hadst mutual cohabitation, as man and wife, and had by her two children.

4. That thou being a religious man and a priest didst, contrary to the order of the ecclesiastical law, take upon thee to practise in divers places within the diocese of London, physic and chirurgery, when thou wast not admitted expert nor learned.

5. That upon Easter day last past, that is to wit the 14th of April, within the parish church of St. Margaret's, at Westminster, within the county of Middlesex, and diocese of London, thou didst maliciously, outrageously, and violently pull out thy wooden knife or hanger. And whereas the priest and minister there, called John Cheltam, was executing his cure and charge, especially in doing his service, and administering the sacrament of the altar to communicants, then didst thou wickedly and abominably smite with thy said weapon, the said priest, first upon the head and afterwards upon his hands or other parts of his body, drawing blood abundantly from him; the said priest then holding the said sacrament in his hands and giving no occasion why thou shouldst so hurt him: the people being grievously offended thereby, and the said church polluted thereby, so that the inhabitants were compelled to repair to another church to communicate, and receive the said sacrament.

6. That by reason of the premises, thou wast and art by the ecclesiastical laws of the church; amongst other penalties, excommunicated and accursed; in very deed, and not to be accompanied withal, neither in the church nor elsewhere, but in special cases.

7. That thou, concerning the truth of Christ's natural body and blood in the sacrament of the altar, hast been by the space of one or more years, and yet at this present, of this opinion, That in the sacrament of the altar, after the words of consecration, there is not really, truly, and in very deed, contained under the form of bread) the very true and natural body of our Saviour Jesus Christ.

8. That thou for the hatred and disdain that thou didst and didst bear against the said sacrament, and the true thereof, and against the said priest administering the same, (as before) didst smite, wound, and hurt him in manner and form as before is declared.

9. That thou, over and besides the pains due unto thee for the doing of the cruel fact, art also by the order of the ecclesiastical laws of the church; and the laudable custom and ordinance of the same, to be reputed, taken, and adjudged (as thou art indeed) a very heretic, and to be punished by and with the pains due for heresy, by reason of the said heresy and damnable opinion.

10. That all the premises be true, manifest, notorious, and famous, and that upon the same, and every part thereof, there was and is within the said parish of St. Margaret's, and other places thereabouts, a public voice and fame.

THE ANSWER of WILLIAM FLOWER to the aforesaid ARTICLES.

TO the first article he answereth and confesseth the same to be true in every part thereof, except that he saith and confesseth that he never consented and agreed in his heart to be a monk.

To the second article he answereth and confesseth the same to be true in every part thereof. Howbeit he saith, that he never did, nor yet doth esteem the said order of priesthood, according to the order of the said catholic church, because he was offended therewith in his conscience.

To the third article he answereth and confesseth, That intending to live in holy matrimony, and not forgetting God, did marry with the said Alice Pulton named in this article, wherein he believed that he did well, and according to God's laws. Further, confessing and believing, that all the time when he was professed monk, and made priest, he did thereby utterly forget God: but when he did so marry the said Alice Pulton, and in continuing with her did beget three children, he did remember God, as he saith, and believeth that he did then lawfully.

To the fourth article he answereth and believeth the same to be true in every part thereof.

To the fifth article he answereth and confesseth, That his conscience being greatly offended with the said John Cheltam, priest, for administering the sacrament of the altar to the people at the place and time specified in this article, he did so smite and strike the same priest with his hanger or wood-knife, as well upon his head, as upon other parts and places of his body, which he remembereth not, whereby the blood ran out, and was shed in the said church, as he believeth, having, as he saith, no other cause or matter so to do, but only that his conscience was offended and grieved, in that the same priest did so give and administer the said sacrament to the people: which people he believeth was greatly abashed and offended with his said fact and doing, and were compelled to go out of the church, and to repair to another to receive the said sacrament. And further, being then demanded and examined, whether he intended to have killed the said priest, or not; he said he could not answer thereunto. And being further examined, whether he did well or evil in striking the said priest, he would make no answer thereunto.

To the sixth he answereth and saith, That whether he be so excommunicated or accursed, as is contained in this article; he referreth himself herein to the ecclesiastical laws.

To the seventh he answereth and saith, That by the space of six and twenty years now past, he hath always been, and yet is of this opinion touching the said sacrament of the altar, as followeth; namely, that in the sacrament of the altar, after the words of consecration, there is not really, truly, and in very deed; contained, under the form of bread; the very true and natural body of our Saviour Jesus Christ.

To the eighth he answereth and believeth the same to be true in every part thereof.

To the ninth he answereth, and herein he referreth himself to the said laws, custom, and ordinance specified in this article, that is to say, the canonical laws.

To the last he answereth and believeth, That those things before by him confessed be true, and those which he hath denied, be untrue; and that the said common voice and fame hath and doth only labour and go upon those things by him before confessed.

By me WILLIAM FLOWER.

After this examination, the bishop began to instruct him, and to exhort him to return again to the unity of his mother the catholic church, with such reasons as he is commonly wont to use to others, promising many fair things if he would do so, besides the forgiving of what was past.

To this William Flower answering again, thanked him for his offer: and where it was in his power to kill or not to kill his body, he stood therewith contented, let him do therein what he thought; yet over his soul he had no such power, which being once separated from the body, is in the hands of no man, but only of God, either to save or destroy. As concerning his opinion of the sacrament, he said he would never go from what he had spoken, do he with him what he would.

Then the bishop assigned him again to appear in the same place in the afternoon, betwixt three and four; in the mean time to consider well of his former answers, whether he would stand to the same his opinions or not: which if he so did, he would further proceed against him, &c.

In the afternoon the said William Flower appeared again before the said bishop, at the hour and place appointed. To whom the bishop sitting in his consistory, spake these words: Flower, you was this forenoon here before me, and made answer to certain articles; and thereupon I respited you till now, to the intent you should consider and weigh with yourself your state, and to remember while you have time, both your abominable act, and also that evil opinion which you have conceived touching the verity of Christ's true natural body in the sacrament of the altar.

To whom the said Flower answered as followeth: That which I have said, I will stand to; and therefore I require that the law may be put in force against me. Whereupon the bishop commanded his notary (Harward by name) to read to him again his articles, as before. Which being read, the said William Flower persisting in his sentence, answered to all parts of the articles, as in the forenoon before, save only that he requested the bishop concerning the fifth article, he might alter something his answer therein, after this tenor and manner of words, to wit, "And moreover confesseth and saith, that whereas he struck the priest on Easter day last past, in St. Margaret's church in Westminster, he hath since that time, and yet doth mislike himself in that doing, and doth now judge and believe that the same act was evil and wrong. Howbeit he saith and believeth, that for the matter and cause whereof he so struck the said priest, (which was for ministering the sacrament of the altar, which he taketh and judgeth abominable) he neither did, nor doth mislike himself at all therein."

Moreover, he desireth of the said bishop licence to be granted him, to alter and take out some of the ninth article, and in place thereof, these words to be inserted; to wit, "Herein he referreth himself to the laws, custom, and ordinances specified in this article, &c." At which request, Bonner granted to the altering of both the articles according as he desired, and so put in the acts.

After this, the bishop turning again to his old manner of exhorting, endeavoured with fair words to persuade him to submit himself to the catholic church, and to the faith thereof. Notwithstanding all his persuasions, he still remained constant and firm, saying, that he would not be removed from what he had spoken, though he should suffer death for it. Whereupon the bishop assigned him the next day (being the twentieth of April) to appear in the same place, between eight and nine o'clock in the morning, then and there to hear the sentence pronounced in case he would not relent, &c.

The next morning the said William Flower was brought by the keeper belonging to the warden of the Fleet, before bishop Bonner, who, according to his usual manner, endeavoured to reduce him to his catholic church and the unity thereof, that is, from Christ to Antichrist; sometimes alluring him with fair promises, and sometimes with menaces, terrors, and threatenings. To which he answered, Do what you will, I am at a point: for the heavens shall as soon fall, as I will forsake my opinion, &c. Whereupon the bishop, after he had commanded these words to be registered, called for the depositions of certain witnesses, produced for the better information of this matter, the names of which witnesses were these; William Jennings, John Bray, Robert Graunt, Richard Dod, William Pampion, Robert Smalwood, the parish priest of St. Margaret's at Westminster. The sum and effect of whose depositions here ensueth.

Robert Graunt of Westminster, examined upon the said answers of William Flower, faith and depose, That he did hear and see the said Flower acknowledge and recognize the said answers, and subscribe to the same with his own hand, and also was present in the church of St. Margaret's in Westminster, when the said William Flower did smite and wound the priest, when he was administering the sacrament; and how this examinant among others pressed towards him to take him, and was hurt thereby upon his chin, and after he was taken, this examinant did help to conduct him to the Gatehouse.

Richard Dod of Westminster, examined upon the said answers, faith and depose, That he did hear and see the said Flower acknowledge and recognize the said answers, and subscribe to the same with his own hand; and also did see and was present, when the said Flower upon Easter day last past drew his wood-knife, and struck the priest upon the head, hand, and arm: who being wounded therewith, and having a chalice with consecrated hosts there in his hand, sprinkled with the said priest's blood, was rescued by this examinant, and the said Flower carried to the Gatehouse, and the wood-knife taken away by this examinant.

William Pampion, one of the church-wardens of the said parish church of St. Margaret's in Westminster, examined upon the said answers of the said Flower, faith and depose, That the same answers be true, and in his sight were subscribed with the hand of the said Flower. And that, upon Easter day last past, about eleven o'clock in the forenoon, in the parish church of St. Margaret's in Westminster, among a great number of the people ready to receive the sacrament, the priest's back being turned towards the said Flower, he the said Flower suddenly drew forth his wood-knife, and struck John Cheltam the priest both upon his head, hand, and arm, whereby he was wounded, and bled abundantly, and the chalice with consecrated hosts being in his hand, were sprinkled with his blood, and the people in great fear cried out lamentably, as though they should presently have been killed.

Robert Smalwood of Westminster, examined upon the said answers, faith and depose, That he did hear and see the said Flower acknowledge and recognize the said answers, and subscribe the same with his own hand; and touching the striking and wounding the priest in St. Margaret's church in Westminster, upon Easter day last, this examinant faith, he was not there when the fact was done, but immediately after he came to the church, and found the priest hurt, and wounded in the head, hand, and arm, by the said Flower, and the people in great heaviness by reason thereof. Also the people did report, as this examinant faith, that Flower did the deed, as the priest had the chalice in his hand, administering the sacrament to the people.

William Jennings of Westminster, being examined upon the answers of the said William Flower, faith and depose, by virtue of his oath, That he did hear and see the said Flower acknowledge and recognize the said answers, and subscribe the same with his own hand in the consistory place: and further depose, That he upon Easter day last was present in the church of St. Margaret's in Westminster, where Flower struck the said John Cheltam, priest, first upon the head, and afterwards upon his arm, whereby the said priest is thought to lose his hand. Also this jurate depose, that the said John Cheltam had a chalice with certain consecrated hosts therein in his hand, which were sprinkled with the blood of the said priest, and after the said Flower was apprehended by this examinant and others, they carried him immediately to the Gatehouse in Westminster.

John Bray, one of the church-wardens of the parish church of St. Margaret's in Westminster, sworn and examined upon the said answers, faith and depose, That he did hear and see the said Flower acknowledge and recognize the said answers, and also subscribe to the same: and further depose of Flower's striking the priest, in effect, as the rest of the examiners do, and that this said jurate was present there at the doing thereof.

After the depositions of these witnesses were taken, published, and denounced, the said bishop spake to William Flower, and asked him, if he knew any matter or cause why sentence should not be read, and he to be pronounced as an heretic. Whereunto he answered as followeth: I have nothing at all to say, for I have already said unto you all that I have to say; and what I have said, I will not go from: and therefore do what you will, &c.

Which when he had spoken, the bishop proceeded to the sentence, condemning and excommunicating him for an heretic, and after pronounced him also to be degraded, and so committed him to the secular power. Upon the 24th day of the aforesaid month of April, which was St. Mark's eve, he was brought to the place of martyrdom, which was in St. Margaret's churchyard at Westminster, where the fact was committed, and there coming to the stake where he should be burned, first he maketh his prayer to Almighty God with a confession of his faith, in manner as followeth.

O Eternal God, most mighty and merciful Father, who hast sent down thy Son upon the earth, to save me and all mankind, who ascended up into heaven again, and left his blood upon the earth behind him, for the redemption of our sins, have mercy upon me, have mercy upon me, for thy dear Son our Saviour Jesus Christ's sake, in whom I confess only to be all salvation and justification, and that there is no other means nor way, nor holiness, in which or by which any man can be saved in this world. This is my faith, which I beseech all men here to bear witness of.

Then he said the Lord's prayer, and so made an end.

Then Mr. Cholmeley came to him, desiring him to recant his heresy, whereby he might do good to the people, or else he would be damned.

Flower answered as followeth: Sir, I beseech you for God's sake to be contented: for what I have said, I have said, and I have been of this faith from the beginning, and I trust to the living God he will give me his Holy Spirit to continue to the end. Then he desired all the world to forgive him whom he had offended, as he forgave all the world.

This done, first his hand being held up against the stake, was struck off, his left hand being fastened behind him. At which striking off of his hand, some that were present, and purposely observing the same, credibly informed us, that he in no part of his body did once shrink at the striking thereof, but once a little he stirred his shoulders.

And thus fire was set unto him, who, burning therein, cried with a loud voice, O thou Son of God have mercy upon me, O thou Son of God receive my soul, three times, and so his speech being taken from him, he spake no more, lifting up notwithstanding his stump with his other arm as long as he could.

And thus he endured the extremity of the fire, being therein cruelly handled, by reason that the few faggots that were brought being not sufficient to burn him, they were fain to strike him down into the fire. Where he lying along (which was doleful to behold) upon the ground, his lower part was consumed in the fire, whilst his upper part was without the fire, his tongue in all men's sight still moving in his mouth.

May 3, 1555, a letter was sent to George Colt and Thomas Daniel, to make search for and apprehend John Bernard and John Walsh, who used to repair to Sudbury, and carrying about with them the bones of Pygot that was burned, shewed them to the people, persuading them to be constant in his religion; and upon examination to commit them to further ordering, according to the laws.

This day Stephen Appes was committed to the Little Ease in the Tower, there to remain two or three days till further examination.

The 12th day, Mr. Thomas Rofs, preacher, was by the council's letters delivered from the Tower to the sheriff of Norfolk, to be conveyed and delivered to the bishop of Norwich, and he either to reduce him to recant, or else proceed against him according to the law.

The 16th, a letter was sent to the lord treasurer, signifying what the lord lieutenant had done for Rofs; and that order should be given, according to his lordship's request, for letters to the bishops: and as for Appes, whom the lieutenant of the Tower reporteth to be mad, his lordship perceiving the same to be true, should commit him to Bedlam, there to remain till their further order.

The 26th, a letter was sent to the lord treasurer, to confer with the bishop of London, and the justices of the peace of that county, wherein they were to be executed that were already condemned for religion, and upon agreement of places, to give order for their execution accordingly.

The 28th, a letter was sent to the lord treasurer, to cause speedy preparation to be made of such money as was appointed for such persons as should carry the joyful tidings of queen Mary's good delivery of child, to divers princes, that they be not compelled to stay when the time shall come. The ambassadors were, the lord admiral to the emperor, the lord Fitzwalter to the French king, sir Henry Sidney to the king of the Romans, Richard Shelley to the king of Portugal, whose free passage through France Dr. Wotton was ordered to procure.

The 29th, a letter was directed to sir Francis Inglesfield to make search for one John D. at London, and to apprehend him, and send him to the council, and to make search for such papers and books as he thinketh may touch the same D. or one Bengier.

The MARTYRDOM of Mr. JOHN CARDMAKER, and Mr. JOHN WARNE, who suffered both together in SMITHFIELD, May 30, 1555.

UPON the 30th day of May, John Cardmaker, otherwise called Taylor, prebendary of the church of Wells; and John Warne, upholsterer, of the parish of St. John in Walbrook, suffered together in Smithfield. Of whom it remaineth now particularly to treat, beginning with Mr. Cardmaker, who first was an observant frier before the dissolution of the abbeyes: afterwards was a married minister, and in king Edward's time appointed to be a reader in St. Paul's, where the papists were so enraged against him for his doctrine's sake, that in his reading they cut and mangled his gown with their knives. Mr. Cardmaker being apprehended in the beginning of queen Mary's reign, with Mr. Barlow, bishop of Bath, was brought to London, and put in the Fleet prison, king Edward's laws being yet in force. But after the parliament was ended, in which the pope was again admitted as supreme head of the church, and the bishops had also gotten power and authority, officially, to exercise their tyranny, these two were brought before the bishop of Winchester, lord chancellor, and others appointed by commission, (as before is mentioned) to examine the faith of such as were then prisoners; and as unto others before, so now unto them the chancellor offered the queen's mercy, if they would agree, and be conformable, &c.

To this they both made such an answer, as the chancellor with his fellow commissioners allowed them for catholics. Whether they of weakness so answered, or he of subtlety would so understand their answer, that he might have some forged example of a shrinking brother to lay in the dish of the rest, which were to be examined; it may easily be perceived by this, that to all them which followed in examination, he objected the example of Barlow and Cardmaker, commending their soberness, discretion, and learning. But whatsoever their answer was, yet notwithstanding Barlow was led again to the Fleet, from whence he afterwards being delivered, did by exile constantly bear witness to the truth of the gospel. Cardmaker was conveyed to the Compter in Bread-street, the bishop of London procuring it to be published, that he should shortly be delivered, after he had subscribed to transubstantiation and certain other articles. To the same prison where Cardmaker was, Laurence Saunders was brought, (after the sentence of excommunication and condemnation was pronounced against him) where these two prisoners had such christian conference, that whatsoever the breath of the bishop blustered, and the fickle ears of the people too lightly believed, in the end they both shewed themselves constant confessors and worthy martyrs of Christ; as of Laurence Saunders is already written. After whose departure Cardmaker remained there prisoner, to be baited by the papists, who would needs seem to have a certain hope that Cardmaker was become their's. Continual and great conferences divers of them had with him, with reasonings, persuadings, and threatenings, but all to no effect. To the end that their doings might appear, he required them to put their reasons in writing, and promised by writing to answer them.

Dr. Martin, who bare also a part in those pageants, took upon him to be the chief doer by writing, whose long unfavoury letters and simple reasons for transubstantiation, and such papistical trash, Mr. Cardmaker answered largely, learnedly, and substantially, confuting the same, opening the falshood of his arguments, and delivering the sentences of the fathers (which Martin abused for his purpose) to their true understandings; which answers I would had come to our hands. Thus constantly abode this good man all their doings, as he did also the death which he suffered in Smithfield in London: whereof an account shall be given. But first we will survey the matter and manner of the articles objected against him by bishop Bonner, with his answers annexed to the same, as followeth.

ARTICLES objected by Bishop BONNER against JOHN TAYLOR, alias CARDMAKER.

1. I Edmund, bishop of London, object against thee, John Taylor, alias Cardmaker, that thou wast and art of the city and diocese of London, and so of the jurisdiction of me Edmund, bishop of London.

2. Item, That thou in times past didst profess the rule of St. Francis, and didst by vow promise to keep keep poverty, chastity, and obedience, according to the rule of St. Francis.

3. Item, That thou in times past didst receive all the orders of the church then used; to wit, both greater and lesser.

4. Item, That thou after thy said entry into religion, and profession and orders aforesaid, didst take to wife a widow, and with her hadst carnal copulation, and didst get of her a woman child, breaking thereby thy vow and order, and also the ordinance of the church.

5. Item, That thou hast believed and taught, and dost believe, that in the sacrament of the altar, under the visible signs there, that is to say, under the forms of bread and wine, there is really and truly the true and very natural body and blood of our Saviour Jesus Christ.

6. Item, That the belief of the catholic church is, that in having the body and blood of Christ really and truly contained in the sacrament of the altar, is to have (by the omnipotent power of Almighty God) the body and blood of Christ invisibly and really present under the said sacrament, and not to make thereby a new God, or a new Christ, or a new body of Christ.

7. Item, That it may stand well together, and so is the faith of the catholic church, that the body of Christ is visibly and truly ascended into heaven, and there is in the visible form of his humanity; and yet the same body in substance is invisibly and truly contained in the said sacrament of the altar.

8. Item, That Christ at his last supper taking bread into his hands, blessing it, breaking it, giving it to his apostles, and saying, Take, eat, this is my body; did institute a sacrament there, willing that his body really and truly should be contained in the said sacrament, no substance of bread and wine there remaining, but only the accidents thereof.

Mr. CARDMAKER's ANSWERS to the aforesaid ARTICLES.

TO the first article he answereth, and confesseth the same to be true in every part thereof.

To the second article he answereth and confesseth, That he being under age, did profess the said order and religion, and afterwards by the authority of king Henry VIII. he was dispensed with for the same religion.

To the third he answereth, and confesseth the same to be true in every part thereof.

To the fourth he answereth, and confesseth the first part thereof to be true; and to the second part of the same article he answereth and saith, that in marriage he brake no vow, because he was set at liberty to marry, both by the laws of this realm, and also by the laws and ordinances of the church of the same.

To the fifth he answereth and confesseth, That he hath believed and taught as it is contained in this article, but he doth not now so believe or teach.

To the sixth he answereth, That he doth not believe the same to be true in any part thereof.

To the seventh he answereth, That he doth not believe the same to be true in any part thereof.

To the eighth he answereth and doth believe, that it is true; that is to say, that Christ taking bread at his last supper into his hands, blessing it, breaking it, giving it to his disciples, and saying, Take, eat, this is my body, did institute a sacrament there. And to the other part of this article, namely, Willing that his body really and truly should be contained in the said sacrament, no substance of bread and wine there remaining, but only the accidents thereof, he answereth, that he doth not believe the same to be true.

By me
JOHN CARDMAKER.

Mr. Cardmaker calling to mind afterwards the ready cavillings of the papists, and thinking himself not to have fully, and according to his true meaning answered the latter part of the last article, did the next day, after the aforesaid answers, exhibit unto the bishop in a schedule this here following.

"Where in my answer to your articles I deny the presence of Christ in the sacrament, I mean not the sacramental presence, for that I confess; but my denial is of his carnal presence in the same. But yet further, because this word is oftentimes taken by the holy fathers; not only for bread and wine, but also for the whole administration and receiving of the same according to Christ's institution; so I say, that Christ is present spiritually too, and in all them which worthily receive the sacrament: so that my denial is full of the real, carnal, and corporal presence in the sacrament, and not of the sacramental nor spiritual presence.

This I have thought good to add to my former answer, because no man should misunderstand it.

By me
JOHN CARDMAKER.

ARTICLES objected against JOHN WARNE, Upholder, of the Parish of St. JOHN, in WALBROOK with his ANSWERS to the same.

FIRST, That you John Warne, being of the age of 29 years, and of the parish of St. John of Walbrook, in London, hast believed, and dost believe firmly and stedfastly, that in the sacrament of the altar there is not the very true and natural body of our Saviour Christ in substance, under the forms of bread and wine.

Item, That thou hast believed, and dost believe, that after the words of consecration spoken by the priest there is not (as the church of England doth believe and teach) the body of Christ; but that there doth only remain the substance of material bread, as it was before the consecration, or speaking the words of consecration; and that the said bread is in no wise altered or changed.

Item, That thou hast said and dost believe, that the catholic church do believe and teach, that there is in the mass now used in England, and in other places of Christendom, a sacrifice containing the body and blood of Christ really and truly; then that belief and faith of the church is naught, and against God's truth and the scripture.

Item, That thou hast said, that about a twelve-month ago and more, a rough spaniel of thine was shorn on the head, and had a crown like a priest made on the same; thou didst laugh at it and like it, though thou didst it not thyself, nor knewest who did it.

Item, That thou neither this Lent last past, nor any time since the queen's majesty's reign, hast come into the church, or heard mass, or been confessed, or received the sacrament of the altar; and hast said that thou art not sorry that thou hast so done, but that thou art glad, because thou hast not therewith defiled thy conscience, which otherwise thou shouldst have done.

Upon all which articles John Warne being examined by the said bishop Bonner, in the presence of divers witnesses, May 23, 1555, did confess and believe the same, and subscribe hereunto his name with his own hand.

By me, JOHN WARNE

It was also objected against the said John Warne by the aforesaid bishop, as followeth.

Item, That thou John Warne wast in time past here in the city of London, accused in Guildhall of heresy against the sacrament of the altar, according to the order of the laws of this realm of England in the time of king Henry VIII. and when alderman Barnes was then sheriff, and the Thursday after that Anne Askew was burnt in Smithfield; and thereupon thou wast sent a prisoner to Newgate, to whom Edmund, bishop of London, did repair with his chaplains, to instruct thee in the true faith of Christ, touching the said sacrament of the altar, and to bring thee from error, which was, that in the sacrament of the altar there is not the body of Christ, nor any corporal presence of Christ's body and blood; under the forms of bread and wine; but that in the said sacrament there is only material bread and wine; without any substance of Christ's body and blood at all: and because thou wouldst not leave and forsake thy said heresy therein, but persist and abide obstinately and wilfully therein, thou wert, according to the said laws condemned to death and to be burnt; and thereupon suit being made for thee to the king and others in the court, thou hadst a pardon of king Henry VIII. and thereby didst save thy life.

Nevertheless, in thy heart, conscience, and mind, thou didst both then, and also afore believe no otherwise than at this present thou dost believe; that is to say, that in the sacrament of the altar there is neither the very true body or blood of Christ, nor any other substance but the substance of material bread and wine; and to receive the said material bread and wine, and to break it, and to distribute it among the people, only is the true receiving of Christ's body; and no otherwise: so that thy faith and belief is, that in the said sacrament there is no substance of Christ's material body and blood; but all the thing that is there is material bread, and the receiving of it as before; and that the substance of the natural and true body of Christ, born of the virgin Mary, is only in heaven and not in the sacrament of the altar. In which thine opinion thou hast ever hitherto since continued, and so dost continue at this present, thou confessing all this to be true, and in witness thereof subscribing thy name thereunto, as followeth.

By me, JOHN WARNE.

John Warne being examined upon the aforesaid articles by the bishop before certain witnesses, whose names were John Roswell, John Heywood, and Robert Ravens, the 23d of May, did answer for the same; confessing and granting the articles and contents thereof to be true, according as they were objected in every part, subscribing also the same with his hand. Such strength and fortitude God's Holy Spirit wrought in him, to stand stoutly and confidently to the defence of the sincere doctrine of his Son.

Whereupon the bishop exhorting him with many words to leave his heresies, (as he called them) and to return to the bosom of his mother the holy church, commanded him to appear again the next day, being the 24th of May.

Who so doing (and answering as he did before) was ordered to come thither again in the afternoon, and so he did: at which time he was earnestly exhorting by the said bishop to recant his opinions. To whom he answered, that he would not depart from his received profession, unless he were thereunto thoroughly persuaded by the holy scriptures.

Upon which answer he was ordered to come again the next day, being the 25th of May, at one of the clock in the afternoon. At which day and hour the bishop examined him again upon all his former articles objected, to which he most constantly adhered with this further answer added thereunto: I am persuaded (said he) that I am in the right opinion, and I see no cause to recant; for all the filthiness and idolatry is in the church of Rome.

The bishop then seeing that notwithstanding all his fair promises and terrible threatnings, (whereof he used many) he could not prevail; finished this examination with the definitive sentence of condemnation pronounced against the said John Warne, and charged the sheriffs of London with him, under whose custody he remained in the prison of Newgate, until the 30th day of May.

Which day being appointed for their execution, John Cardmaker, and the said John Warne, were brought by the sheriffs to the place where they should suffer; who being come to the stake, first the sheriffs called Mr. Cardmaker aside, and talked with him secretly, during which time Mr. Warne had said his prayers, was chained to the stake, and had wood and faggots set about him, while Mr. Cardmaker was talking with the sheriffs.

No. 14.

The people who before had heard that Mr. Cardmaker would recant; and beholding this, were greatly afflicted, thinking indeed that Mr. Cardmaker would now recant at the burning of Mr. Warne. At length Mr. Cardmaker departed from the sheriffs, and came towards the stake, and (in his garments as he was) kneeled down and made a long prayer in silence to himself. His prayers being ended; he rose up, put off his clothes unto his shirt, and went with a bold courage unto the stake, and kissed it: and taking Mr. Warne by the hand, he heartily comforted him, and so gave himself to be bound to the stake most gladly. The people seeing this so suddenly done; contrary to their fearful expectation, as men delivered out of a great doubt, cried out for joy, saying, God be praised, the Lord strengthen thee, Cardmaker, the Lord Jesus receive thy spirit. And this continued while the executioner put fire to them, and both passed through the fire to the blessed rest and peace among God's holy saints and martyrs, to enjoy the crown of triumph and victory prepared for the elect soldiers and warriors of Christ Jesus in his blessed kingdom. To whom be glory and majesty for ever. Amen.

The CONFESSION and FAITH of Mr. JOHN WARNE; which he wrote the Day before he suffered, May 30, 1555.

“ I Believe in God the Father Almighty; maker of heaven and earth.”

A Father, because he is the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who is the everlasting word, whom before all worlds he hath begotten of himself, which word was made flesh and therein also manifested to be his Son; in whom he hath adopted us to be his children, the inheritors of his kingdom, and therefore he is our Father: an Almighty God, because he hath of nothing created all things visible and invisible, both in heaven and in earth; even all creatures contained therein, and governeth them.

“ And in Jesus Christ his only Son our Lord.”

The eternal word; perfect God with his Father, of equal power in all things, of the same substance; of like glory, by whom all things were made and have life, and without whom nothing liveth: he was made also perfect man, and so being very God, and very man in one person, is the only Saviour, Redeemer, and Ransomer of them which were lost in Adam our forefather. He is the only means of our deliverance, the hope of our health, the surety of our salvation.

According to the Father's most merciful promise, this eternal Son of God, forsaking the heavenly glory, humbled himself to take flesh of a virgin, according to the scriptures, uniting the substance of the Godhead to the substance of the manhood which he took of the substance of that blessed virgin Mary in one person, to become therein the very Messiah, the anointed king and priest, for ever appointed to pacify the Father's wrath, which was justly gone out against us all for sin.

“ Suffered under Pontius Pilate, was crucified, dead, and buried, and descended into hell.”

He was arraigned before Pontius Pilate the ruler of Jewry, and so unjustly accused of many crimes, that the ruler judged him innocent, and sought means to deliver him; but contrary to known justice, he did let go Barabbas who had deserved death, and delivered Christ to be crucified, who deserved no death: which doth manifestly declare unto us, that he suffered for our sins, and was buffeted for our offences, as the prophets do witness, thereby to have it manifested to all men, that he is that Lamb of God that taketh away the sins of the world. Therefore suffering for our sins, he received and did bear our deserved condemnation, the pains of death, the taste of abjection, the very terror of hell, yielding his Spirit to his Father, his body to be buried in the earth.

“ The third day he rose again from death to life.”

To make full and perfect the whole work of our redemption and justification, the same crucified body which was laid in the grave, was raised up the third day from death, by the power of his Father, and glory of his Godhead: he became the first fruits of the resurrection, and got the victory over death, that all by him might be raised up from death. Through whom all true penitent sinners may now boldly come unto the Father, and have remission of their sins.

“ He

"He ascended into heaven and sitteth at the right hand of God the Father Almighty."

After that in his death and resurrection he had conquered sin, death, and the devil, and had been conversant forty days in the earth, being seen of the apostles, and more than five hundred brethren at once, in the same body in which he wrought the work of our salvation, he ascended into heaven with eternal triumph, for the victory over death, sin, and hell, leaving the passage open, by which all true believers may and shall enter into his kingdom, where he now sitteth at his Father's right hand, that is to say, in power and glory equal, in majesty co-eternal.

"From thence he shall come to judge the quick and the dead."

He shall appear again in great glory to receive his elect unto himself, and to put his enemies under his feet, changing all living men in a moment, and raising up all that be dead, that all may be brought to his judgment. In this shall he give to each man according to his deeds. They which have followed him in regeneration, which have their sins washed away in his blood, and are clothed with righteousness, shall receive the everlasting kingdom, and reign with him for ever; and they which after the race of the corrupt generation of Adam have followed flesh and blood, shall receive everlasting damnation with the devil and his angels.

"I believe in the Holy Ghost."

I do believe that the Holy Ghost is God, the third person in the Trinity, in unity of the Godhead equal with the Father and the Son, given through Christ to inhabit our spirits, by which we are made to feel and understand the great power, virtue, and loving kindness of Christ our Lord. For he illuminateth, quickeneth, and certifieth our spirit, that by him we are sealed up unto the day of redemption, by whom we are regenerate and made new creatures, so that by him and through him we do receive all the abundant goodness promised us in Jesus Christ.

"The holy catholic church."

This is an holy number of Adam's posterity, elected, gathered, washed, and purified by the blood of the Lamb from the beginning of the world, and is dispersed through the same by the tyranny of Gog and Magog; that is to say, the Turk and his tyranny, and Antichrist, otherwise named the bishop of Rome, and his angels, as this day also doth teach.

"The communion of saints."

Which most holy congregation, (being, as St. Paul teacheth, built upon the foundation of the apostles and prophets, Christ being the head corner stone) tho' it be by tyranny of Satan and his ministers persecuted, some by imprisonment, some by death, and some by other afflictions and painful torments; yet doth it remain in one perfect unity, both in faith and fellowship: which unity is knit in an unspeakable knot, as well of them which are departed from this mortal life, as of them which now be living, and hereafter shall be in the same, and so shall continue until they all do meet in the kingdom, where the head Jesus Christ, with all his holy members, (of which number thro' Christ I assuredly believe I am one) shall be fully complete, knit, and united together for evermore.

"The forgiveness of sins."

I do believe that my sins, and all their sins which do rightly believe the holy scripture, are forgiven only thro' Jesus Christ, of whom only I do profess that I have my whole and full salvation and redemption, which St. Paul saith, cometh not thro' our works and deservings, but freely by grace, lest any should boast himself. Thro' the blood of the cross all things in heaven and earth are reconciled, and set at peace with the Father; without him no heavenly life given, nor sin forgiven.

"The resurrection of the body."

I do believe, that by the same my Saviour Christ, I and all men shall rise again from death; for he, as St. Paul saith, is risen again from the dead, and is become the first fruits of them which sleep. For by a man came death, and by a man cometh the resurrection from death. This man is Christ, through the power of whose resurrection I believe that we shall all rise again in these our bodies; the godly clothed with immortality to live with Christ for ever; the wicked also shall rise immortal to live with the devil and his angels in death everlasting.

"And the life everlasting."

Thro' the same Jesus, and by none other, I am sure to have life everlasting. He only is the way and entrance into the kingdom of heaven. "For God so loved the world, that he did give his only Son Jesus Christ, to the end that so many as do believe in him might have everlasting life." Which I am sure to possess so soon as I am dissolved, and departed out of this tabernacle, and in the last day both body and soul shall possess the same for ever, to which God grant all men to come.

I believe, that the sacraments, that is to say, of baptism and of the Lord's supper, are seals of God's most merciful promises towards mankind. In baptism, as by the outward creature of water I am washed from the filthiness which hangeth on my flesh, so do I assuredly believe, that I am by Christ's blood washed clean from my sins, thro' which I have sure confidence of my certain salvation. In the partaking of the Lord's supper, as I receive the substance of bread and wine (the nature of which is to strengthen the body) so do I by faith receive the redemption wrought in Christ's body broken on the cross, life by his death, resurrection by his resurrection, and in sum, all that ever of my faith in the same. And I believe, that God hath appointed the eating and drinking of the creatures of bread and wine in his holy supper according to his word, to move and to stir up my mind to believe these articles above-written.

This is my faith; this do I believe; and I am content by God's grace to confirm and seal the truth of the same with my blood.

By me, JOHN WARNE.

Mr. CARDMAKER's LETTER to his FRIEND.

THE peace of God be with you. You shall right well perceive that I am not gone back, as some men do report of me, but as ready to give my life, as any of my brethren, that are gone before me, altho' by a policy I have a little prolonged it, and that for the best, as already it appeareth unto me, and shall shortly appear unto all. That day that I recant any point of doctrine, I shall suffer twenty kinds of death, the Lord being mine assistance, as I doubt not but he will. Commend me to my friend, and tell him no less. May the Lord strengthen you, me, and all his elect: my riches and poverty are as they were wont to be, and I have learned to rejoice in poverty as well as riches, for that I account now to be very riches. Thus fare you well in Christ. Salute all my brethren in my name. I have conferred with some of my adversaries, learned men, and I find that they be but sophists and shadows.

Mr. Cardmaker being condemned, and in Newgate one Mr. Beard came to him two or three days before he suffered death, and said unto him, Sir, I am sent unto you by the council, to know whether you will recant or no?

Cardmaker. From which council are you come? I think you are not come, nor yet sent from the queen's council, but rather from the commissioners, unto whom (as I suppose) you belong. And whereas you would know whether I will recant or no, thus I pray you report of me to those whom you said sent you. I know you are a taylor by your occupation, and have endeavoured yourself to be a cunning workman, and thereby to get your living: so I have been a preacher these twenty years, and ever since that God by his great mercy hath opened mine eyes to see his eternal truth, I have by his grace endeavoured myself to call upon him, to give me the true understanding of his holy word, and I thank him for his great mercy; I hope I have discharged my conscience in the setting forth of the same, to that little talent that I have received.

Beard. Yea, sir; but what say you to the blessed sacrament of the altar?

Cardmaker. I say, and mark it well, that Christ, the night before his bitter passion, ordained the holy and blessed communion, and hath given commandment that his death should be preached before the receiving thereof, in remembrance of his body broken, and his precious blood shed for the forgiveness of our sins, to as many as faithfully believe and trust in him.

And furthermore, to conclude the matter briefly with him, he asked of him, Whether the sacrament he spoke of, had a beginning or no? Whereunto when he had granted and affirmed the same to be, then Mr. Cardmaker again thus inferred therefrom: If the sacrament (said he) as you confess, have a beginning and ending, then it cannot be God; for God had no beginning nor ending: and so desiring him well to note the same, he departed from him.

The fifth day, Mr. Secretary Bourne, the master of the rolls, sir Francis Englefield, sir Richard Read, and Dr. Hughes, authorising them, or two or three of them at the least, to proceed to further examination of Beard, Cary, D. and Field, upon such points as they should her out of their former confessions, concerning their and vain practice of calculating or conjuring, presently sent unto them with the said letters.

The seventh day, another letter was sent to sir John Egonwel, willing him to join in commission with the lord North, and others above-named, about the examination of the said parties and others, for conjuring and witchcraft.

And the 29th of August, Cary and D. were set at liberty upon bonds for their good appearance until christmas after.

The twelfth day a letter was sent to the lord treasurer, cause writs to be made to the sheriff of Suffex, for the arresting and executing of Dirike, a brewer, at Lewes, and two others, the one at Stainings, the other at Chichester.

The 23d of June a letter was sent to Bonner, to examine a report given to the council of four parishes in the county of Essex, that still used the English service, and to punish the offenders, if any such be.

HISTORY of JOHN SIMSON and JOHN ARDELEY, of the Parish of WIGBOROW-
THE-GREAT, in ESSEX.

JOHN SIMSON and JOHN ARDELEY were condemned for the same cause and on the same day with Mr. Cardmaker and John Warne, which was the 14th day of May. But before we come to the story of them, first here is to be noted the copy of the king and queen's letter directed from the court the same day, and sent by a post early in the morning to bishop Bonner, in tenor and form as followeth.

RIGHT reverend father in God, right trusty and well beloved, we greet you well. And where of late we addressed our letters to the justice of peace within every of the counties of this our realm, whereby amongst other instructions given them for the good order and quiet government of the country and about them, they are willed to have a special regard unto such disorderd persons as (forgetting their duties towards God and us) do lean to any erroneous and heretical opinions, refusing to shew themselves conformable to the catholic religion of Christ's church; wherein if they cannot by good admonitions and fair means reform them, they are willed to deliver them to the ordinary, to be by him charitably travelled withal, and reformed (if it may be) from their naughty opinions; or else, if they continue obstinate, to be ordered according to the laws provided in that behalf: understanding now, to our no little grief, that divers of the said disorderd persons, being by the offices of peace, for their contempt and obstinacy, brought to the ordinaries to be used as aforesaid, are either refused to be received at their hands, or if they be received, are neither so travelled with, as christian charity requireth, nor yet proceeded withal according to the order of justice, but are suffered to continue in their errors, to the dishonour of Almighty God, and dangerous example of others; like as we find this matter very trange, so we have thought convenient both to signify our knowledge, and therewith also to admonish you to have in this half such regard henceforth to the office of a good pastor and shop, as when any such offenders shall be by the said officers or offices of the peace brought unto you, you to use your good wisdom and discretion in procuring to remove them from their errors, if it may be, or else in proceeding against them (if they will continue obstinate) according to the order of the laws; so thru' your good furtherance, both God's glory may be better advanced, and the common-wealth more quietly governed.
Given under our signet, at our manor of Hampton-court, the 14th of May, the first and second years of our reign.

This letter coming from the court to the bishop, made in the more earnest and hasty to the condemnation, as well of others, as of these men, of whom we are now speaking, namely, Mr. John Simson and Mr. John Ar-deley; who being both of one country, of one town, and of one trade, that is, being both husbandmen in the town of Wigborow in Essex, and also almost both of one age, Simson being of the age of 34, the other of 30, were brought up both together by the under-sheriff of Essex, before Bonner, bishop of London, upon the accusation of heresy, as in that time it was called.

As concerning the order and manner of their examination before the bishop, as the articles objected against them were much alike, so their answers again to the same were not much different in manner and form, as they followeth, taken out of the bishop's own registers.

ARTICLES objected by BISHOP BONNER, against JOHN SIMSON and JOHN ARDELEY, Hus-bandmen, at FULHAM.

1. THAT thou John Simson (or John Ardeley) husbandman, of the age of 34 years or thereabouts, wast and art of the parish of Great-Wigborow, within the diocese of London, and thou hast not believed, nor dost believe, that there is here on earth one catholic and universal whole church, which doth hold and believe all the faith and religion of Christ, and all the necessary articles and sacraments of the same.

2. Item, That thou hast not believed, nor dost believe, that thou art necessarily bounden, under the pain of damnation of thy soul, to give full faith and credence unto the said catholic and universal church, and to the religion of the same, in all necessary points of the said faith and religion, without wavering or doubting in the said faith or religion, or in any part thereof.

3. Item, That thou hast not believed, nor dost believe, that that faith and religion, which both the church of Rome, Italy, Spain, England, France, Ireland, Scotland, and all other churches in Europe, being the members and parts of the said catholic and universal church, do believe and teach, is both agreeing with the said catholic and universal church, and the faith and religion of Christ, and also is the very true faith and religion which all christian people ought to believe, observe, follow, and keep: but to the contrary, thou hast believed, and dost believe, that that faith and religion, which the said church of Rome, and all the other churches aforesaid have heretofore believed, and do now believe, is false, erroneous, and naught, and in no wise ought to be believed, observed, kept,
and followed by any christian man.

4. Item, That albeit it be true, that in the sacrament of the altar there is in substance the very body and blood of Christ under the forms of bread and wine, and albeit that it be so believed, taught, and preached undoubtedly in the said church of Rome, and all other the churches aforesaid, yet thou hast not so believed, nor dost so believe; but contrariwise, thou hast and dost believe firmly and stedfastly, that there is not in the said sacrament of the altar, under the said forms of bread and wine, the very substance of Christ's body and blood, but that there is only the substance of material and common bread and wine, with the forms thereof; and that the said material and common bread and wine, are only the signs and tokens of Christ's body and blood, and by faith to be received, only for a remembrance of Christ's passion and death, without any such substance of Christ's body and blood at all.

5. Item, That thou hast believed and taught, and thou hast openly spoken, and to thy power maintained and defended, and so dost believe, think, maintain, and defend, that the very true receiving and eating of Christ's body and blood, is only to take material and common bread, and to break it, and to distribute it amongst the people, remembering thereby the passion and death of Christ only.

6. Item, That thou hast likewise believed, taught, and spoken, that the mass now used in this realm of England, and other the churches aforesaid, is abominable and naught, and full of idolatry, and is of the ordinance of the pope, and not of the institution of Christ, and hath no goodness in it, saving the Glory in the highest, and the epistle and the gospel: and that therefore thou hast not, and wilt not come to be present at the mass, nor receive the sacrament of the altar, or any other sacrament of the church, as they are now used in this realm of England, and other the churches aforesaid.

7. Item, That thou hast in time past believed precisely, and obstinately affirmed and said, and so dost now believe and think, that auricular confession is not needful to be made unto the priest, but it is a thing superfluous and vain, and ought only to be made to God, and to none other person: and likewise thou hast condemned as superfluous, vain, and unprofitable, all the ceremonies of the church and the service of the same, and hast said, that no service in the church ought to be said

saïd but in the English tongue, and if it be otherwise saïd, it is unlawful and naught.

JOHN SIMSON and JOHN ARDELEY's ANSWERS to the aforesaid ARTICLES.

TO the first, they believe, that here on earth there is one catholic and universal holy church, which doth hold and believe as is contained in the first article, and that this church is dispersed and scattered abroad throughout the whole world.

To the second, they believe, that they be bound to give faith and credence unto it, as is contained in the second article.

To the third, as concerning the faith and religion of the church of Rome, of Italy, Spain, France, Ireland, Scotland, and other churches in Europe, they say, they have nothing to do with that faith and religion: but as concerning the faith and religion of England, that if the saïd church of England be ruled and governed by the word of life, then the church of England hath the faith and religion of the catholic church, and not otherwise; and do say also, that if the church of England were ruled by the word of life, it would not go about to condemn them and others of this heresy.

To the fourth they answer, that in the sacrament, commonly called the sacrament of the altar, there is very bread and very wine, not altered nor changed in substance in any wise, and that he receiveth the saïd bread and wine, doth spiritually and by faith only receive the body and blood of Christ, but not the very natural body and blood of Christ in substance under the forms of bread and wine.

To the fifth they say, they have answered, in answering to the saïd fourth article, and yet nevertheless they say, that they have believed, and do believe, that in the sacrament of the altar there is not the very substance of Christ's body and blood, but only the substance of the natural bread and wine.

To the sixth they say, that they believe, that the mass is of the pope, and not of Christ; and therefore it is not good, nor having in it any goodnes, saving the Glory in the highest, the epistle and gospel, the creed, and the Lord's-prayer; and for this cause they say they have not, nor will they come and hear mass.

To the seventh John Ardeley answereth and saith, That he believeth the contents of the same to be true; but John Simson doth answer, that he is not as yet fully resolved with himself, what answer to make thereunto; and further, that as touching the common and daily service saïd and used in the church, he saith that he never saïd that service in the church ought to be saïd but in the English tongue; neither did he ever say, that if it be otherwise saïd and used than in English, it is unlawful and naught.

JOHN ARDELEY and JOHN SIMSON.

These articles being thus objected to them, and their answers made unto the same, as before, the bishop, according to his usual manner, respited them to the afternoon, between the hours of two and three. At which time the bishop repeating again the saïd articles unto them, and beginning with John Ardeley, did urge and solicit him to recant.

To whom John Ardeley answered in the following words: My lord, saïd he, neither you nor any other of your religion, is of the catholic church; for you be of a false faith: and I doubt not but you shall be deceived at length, bear as good a face as you can. You will shed the innocent blood, and you have killed many, and yet go about to kill more, &c.

He added further, saying, If every hair of my head were a man, I would suffer death in the opinion and faith I now profess. These with many other words he spake. Then the bishop yet demanded if he would relinquish his erroneous opinions (as he called them) and be reduced again to the unity of the church. He answered, No, God forbid that I should so do, for then I should lose my soul.

After this the saïd bishop read the sentence of condemnation against him, as he also did against John Simson, standing likewise in the same cause and constancy with John Ardeley, after asking them in his formal manner, if they knew any cause why sentence should not be pronounced against them: which was done the 25th of May, and so were both committed to the secular power, that is, to the hands of the sheriff, to be conveyed to the place where they should be executed. But before I come to their execution, I must not omit what happened in the closing up the examination of these good men, which is this.

At the time of the examination of John Simson and John Ardeley aforesaid, there were assembled such a great multitude of people, that because the consistory was not able to hold them, they were fain to stand in the church, near about the saïd consistory, waiting to see the prisoners when they should depart. It happened in the mean time, that the bishop being set in a heat with the stout and bold answers of the saïd two prisoners, (especially of John Simson) burst out in his loud and angry voice, and saïd, Have him away, have him away.

The people in the church hearing these words, and thinking (because the day was far spent) that the prisoners had their judgment, they being desirous to see the prisoners had to Newgate, severed themselves some running one way, others another way, which caused such a noise in the church, that they in the consistory were all amazed, and marvelled what it should mean: wherefore the bishop also being somewhat afraid of this sudden stir, asked what there was to do. The standers-by answering, saïd, That there was like to be some insurrection or tumult, for they were all together by the ears.

When the bishop heard this, by and by his heart was in his heels, and leaving his seat, he with the rest of the court betook them to their legs, hastening with all speed possible to recover the door that went into the bishop's house: but the rest being somewhat lighter of foot than my lord, did sooner recover the door, and thronging hastily to get in, kept the bishop still out, and cried, Save my lord, save my lord; but meaning yet first to save themselves if any danger should come, whereby they gave the standers-by good matter to laugh at. But of this enough is saïd.

Now John Simson and John Ardeley being delivered (as is aforesaid) to the sheriffs, were shortly after sent down from London to Essex, where they were both put to death in one day, but not in the same place, for John Simson suffered at Rochford, and John Ardeley at Railey.

For the better consideration of the rigorous cruelty of these catholic days, this is furthermore worthy of all men to be noted, and known to all posterity, concerning the examinations of John Ardeley and his company, how that they being brought before the commissioners, were by them greatly charged of stubbornness and vain-glory. Unto whom they answered in defence of their own simplicity, that they were content willingly to yield to the queen all their goods and lands, that they might be suffered to live under her, in keeping their conscience free from all idolatry and popery. Yet this could not be granted, although they had offered all to their heart's blood; so greedy and so thirsty are the persecutors of christian blood. The Lord give us such repentance if it be his will, and keep from them the just reward of such cruel dealing. Amen.

C H A P. IX.

Further PROCEEDINGS of Bishop BONNER against the PROTESTANTS, together with the LIVES, EXAMINATIONS, and MARTYRDOMS of THOMAS HAUKEs, THOMAS WATS, THOMAS OS-MOND, WILLIAM BAMFORD, and NICHOLAS CHAMBERLAIN; who were all inhumanly Burnt in the Bloody Reign of Queen MARY I.

The ridiculous PROCEEDING of Bishop BONNER, against JOHN TOOLY, whose Body being taken up out of his Grave, was given to the secular Power, and so burned for an HERETIC.

ABOUT the same time of the burning of John Simson and John Ardeley, in the beginning of the month of June, fell out a solemn process, and much ado was made about the pope's spirituality, against John Tooly in a case of heresy. The story is this: There was about the time that the Spaniards began first to make a stir in England, one John Tooly, a citizen and poulterer in London, who conspired with others of this society, to rob a Spaniard at St. James's: and altho' the deed was heinous and wicked of itself, yet was it aggravated and made greater than it was by others, being committed against such a person, and against such a country, which both the queen and her whole court did highly favour. The robbery being known, and brought into judgment, Tooly was found guilty, and adjudged to be hanged, whereas notwithstanding in this realm there are many more thefts committed than thieves executed.

The aforesaid Tooly being led to the gallows, (which stood near Charing-Cross) a little before he died, standing upon the cart, read a certain prayer in a printed book, and two other prayers written in two several papers: who then having the halter about his neck, desired the people there present to pray for him, and to bear him witness that he died a true christian man, and that he trusted to be saved only by the merits of Christ's passion, and shedding of his precious blood, and not by any masses, or trentals, images, or saints, which were, as he said, mere idolatry and superstition, and devised by the bishop of Rome: and as the same Tooly, and two others his fellows which were there hanged with him, did steal and rob for covetousness, so the bishop of Rome did sell his masses and trentals, with such paltry, for covetousness; and there being in a great anger (as appeared) against the bishop of Rome, spake with a loud voice the following words: "From the tyranny of the bishop of Rome, and all his detestable enormities; from false doctrine and heresy, and from the contempt of thy word and commandment, good Lord deliver us."

And then adding further to the same, he spoke unto the people; All you that be true christian men, say with me, Amen. And immediately thereupon three hundred persons and more, to the judgment and estimation of those that were there present, answered and said, Amen, three times together at least.

After this it happened, that when John Tooly had read the bill the first time, it fell from him, and a certain young man (who was thought to be an apprentice) stooped down and took up the bill, and climbed up by the cart, and delivered it to Tooly again, which he again did read to the people. That done, he delivered unto one of the marshal's officers, the book aforesaid, and desired him to deliver it to one Mr. Haukes, saying, that it was his book. Furthermore, he delivered one of the prayers, written in a paper, to one Robert Bromely, serjeant, who desired to have it of him; on the top of which was written a line, containing these words, Beware of Antichrist; and subscribed underneath, By me Thomas Harold, prisoner in the Marshalsea, enemy to Antichrist. For the bill aforesaid, Robert Bromely was afterwards brought, and was fain to ask pardon of the bishop, and to detest all the words of Tooly, and glad so to escape.

Thus while Tooly had made his prayers, as is above-said, to be delivered from the pope's tyranny, by the same prayer he fell into great tyranny. For so soon as the report of this fact came to the ears of the priests and mitred prelates, they were not a little mad thereat, thinking it not tolerable that so great a reproach should be done against the holy father. Calling therefore for a council together, as though it had been a matter of great importance, Tooly's talk at his death was debated among them.

At last (after much pro and con) they all consented to those men's judgment, who thought it meet that the violating of the pope's holiness should be revenged with fire and faggot. And it is very probable that cardinal Poole was no small doer in this sentence; for as Winchester and Bonner did always thirst after the blood of the living, so Poole's lightning was for the most part kindled against the dead; and he reserved this charge only to himself, I know not for what purpose, except peradventure being loth to be so cruel as the other, he thought nevertheless by this means to discharge his duty towards the pope. By the same cardinal's orders, the bones of Martin Bucer and Paulus Phagius, which had been almost two years in their graves, were taken up and burned at Cambridge, as Tooly's carcass was at London. And besides this, because he would shew some token of his diligence in both universities, he caused Peter Martyr's wife, a woman of worthy memory, to be digged out of the church-yard, and to be buried on the dunghill. Of these two prodigious acts you shall hear more hereafter. But now to our purpose of Tooly, who having ended his prayer, was hanged and put into his grave, out of which he was digged again, by the command of the bishops; and because he was so bold as to deny the authority of the bishop of Rome, at the time of his death, it pleased them to judge and condemn him as an heretic, upon the commandment of the council's letter, as here appeareth.

The COUNCIL's LETTER to Bishop BONNER.

AFTER our very hearty commendations to your lordship, understanding that of late amongst others that have suffered about London for their offences, one lewd person that was condemned for felony, died very obstinately, professing at the time of his death sundry heretical and erroneous opinions; like as we think it not convenient that such a matter should be overpassed without some example to the world, so we thought good to pray your lordship to cause further inquiry to be made thereof, and thereupon to proceed to the making out of such process as by the ecclesiastical laws is provided in that behalf. And so we bid your lordship heartily well to fare. From Hampton-Court, April 28, 1555.

Your lordship's loving friends,
STEPH. WINTON, Chan. R. ROCHESTER
F. SHREWSBURY WILLIAM PETER
JOHN GAGE R. SOUTHWELL.
THOMAS CHENEY

Soon after a citation was set up upon St. Paul's church door, under the bishop of London's great seal; the tenor whereof here ensueth.

The WRIT or MANDATE of Bishop BONNER, set up at Charing-cross, St. Paul's Church Door, and at St. Martin's in the Fields, for the citing and further inquiring into the CASE of JOHN TOOLY.

EDMUND, by the sufferance of God, bishop of London, to all and singular parsons, vicars, curates, and others, clerks and learned men, being within our diocese of London, and especially unto Richard Clony, our sworn sumner, greeting, salutation, and benediction. Forasmuch as it is come to our hearing by common fame, and the declaration of several credible persons, that one John Tooly, late citizen and poulterer of London, the son of perdition and iniquity, coming to the profundity of malice at the self same time in which he should go to hanging, according to the laws of the realm, for the great theft lately by him committed, at which time chiefly he should have cared for the wealth of his soul, and to have died in the unity of the catholic church, did utter divers and sundry damnable, blasphemous, and heretical opinions and errors, utterly contrary and repugnant to the verity of the catholic faith, and unity of the same, and did exhort, stir up, and encourage the people, there standing in great multitude, to hold and defend the same errors and opinions: and moreover, certain of the people there standing, as it did appear, affected with errors and heresies, as favourers and defenders of the said Tooley, did confirm and give express consent to the aforesaid words, propositions, and affirmations: which thing we do utter with sorrow and bitterness of heart.

We therefore the aforesaid Edmund, and bishop aforesaid, not being able, nor daring to pass over in silence, nor wink at the aforesaid heinous act, left by our negligence and slackness the blood of them might be required at our hands at the most terrible day of judgment, desiring to be certified and informed whether the premises declared unto us be of the truth, and lest that any scabbed sheep, lurking amongst the simple flock of our Lord, do infect them with deadly heresy: to you therefore we straitly charge and command, that you cite, or cause to be cited, all and singular, having or knowing the truth of the premises, by setting up this citation upon the church door of St. Martin's in the fields, being within our diocese of London, and also upon the cathedral church door of St. Paul's in London, leaving there the copy hereof, or by any other means or ways, the best you can, that this citation and monition may come to their knowledge.

All which and singular by the tenor of these presents we cite and admonish that they appear, and every one of them do appear before us, our vicar general, or commissary, whatsoever he be in that behalf, in our cathedral church of St. Paul's in London, in the consistory place, upon Thursday the second day of May, now next ensuing, betwixt the hours of nine and ten of the clock in the forenoon the same day, to bear witness of the truth in this behalf, and to depose and declare faithfully the truth that they know or have heard of the premises, and moreover to do and receive what law and reason doth require.

Further we commit unto you as before, and straitly enjoining you do command, that ye will generally cite the wife of the said Tooley that is dead, and his children, and his kindred by father and mother, his friends and familiars especially, and all other and every of them, if there be any perhaps that desire to defend and purge the remembrance of the person in the premises, that ye admonish them after the manner and form aforesaid, whom we likewise, by the tenor of these presents, do in such sort cite and admonish that they appear all, and that every one of them do appear (under pain to be compelled to keep silence for ever hereafter in this behalf) before us, or our vicar general in spiritual matters, or such our commissary, at the day, hour, and place aforesaid, to defend the good name and remembrance of him that is dead, and to say, alledge, and propose in due form of law a cause reasonable, if they have or can tell of any, why the said John Tooley, that is dead, ought not to be determined, and declared for such an heretic and excommunicate person, and his remembrance condemned, in the detesting and condemning of so heinous a deed and crime, and his body or carcase to lack church burial, as a rotten member cut off from the church, and the same to be committed to the arm and power secular, and they compelled hereafter for ever to hold their peace.

And furthermore, to do, receive, and to suffer as law and reason will, and as the quality of such matter, and the nature themselves do constrain and require; and moreover, that you cite and admonish, after the manner aforesaid, all and every of the receivers, favourers, and creditors of the said John Tooley that is dead, especially if any of them do incline and give consent to those wicked and detestable affirmations, propositions, and rehearsals aforesaid, that on this side the said Thursday they return and submit themselves unto us, and to the lap of the mother holy church: which thing if they do, we trusting upon the mercy of Almighty God, do promise that we will receive them being penitent for such their errors and faults, with thanks, benignity, mercy, and favour, to the comfort and health of their own souls, and in that behalf save their honesties to the uttermost of our power; otherwise, if they will not provide thus to come of their own accord, but to abide the ordinary process of the law, let those men know that we will punish more severely this offence, according to the uttermost of the law, and as far as the law will bear it; and what ye shall do in the premises, let him among you, which shall execute this our present mandate, certify us, or our vicar general in spiritual matters, either by his own person, or by his letters patent, together with these authentically sealed.

Dated at London under our seal, the last day of April, 1555, and of our translation the 11th.

When the time of this citation was expired, and this Tooley being cited did not appear; next in order of law came the suspension, (whereas one suspension had been enough for him) and after that cometh the excommunication, that is, that no man should eat or drink with him; or if any met him by the way, he should not bid him good morrow, and besides that, he should be excluded from the communion of the church. These things being prepared in such a manner, as in such cases full wisely they use to do, at length one stood up that made answer to certain articles, rehearsed in judgment openly, and that in the behalf of the dead man. But when the poor dead man could neither speak for himself, nor did (as they said) sufficiently answer them by the other, to avoid the name of an heretic; first witnesses were provided against him, whose names were Henry Clark, Esq. Thomas Way, keeper of the Marshalsea; Philip Andrew, under-marshal; William Holingworth, fishmonger; William Gellard, William Walker, chandlers; Richard Longman, merchant-taylor; Philip Britten, John Burton, brewers; Thomas Smith, sergeant. Then he was condemned for an heretic, and so committed to the secular power, namely to the sheriffs of London, who with the like diligence went about to execute their charge. Therefore receiving the man, being suspended, excommunicated, condemned as an heretic, and besides that, dead, they laid him on the fire to be burned, namely, for a continual remembrance thereof: this was done the fourth day of June.

The LIFE and MARTYRDOM of THOMAS HAUKES, Gentleman.

Immediately after the story of Dr. Taylor, mention was made of six men brought before bishop Bonner upon the eighth day of February, whose names were Stephen Knight, W. Pygot, Thomas Tomkins, J. Lawrence, William Hunter. In which number was also Thomas Haukes, and condemned likewise with them the 9th day of February. But because his execution did not so shortly follow their's, but was prolonged to the 10th day of June, it followeth therefore now consequently to give an account thereof; first beginning briefly with his pious conversation and institution of life, then shewing of his troubles, also of his examinations and conflicts with the bishop and other adversaries, according as the order of the story doth require.

As touching therefore his education and order of life, first he was of the county of Essex, born of an honest stock, in calling and profession a courtier, brought up daintily from his childhood, and like a gentleman. Besides that, he was of such comeliness of stature, so well endued with excellent qualities, that he might seem on every side a man (as it were) made for the purpose. But his gentle behaviour towards others, and especially his fervent study and singular love unto true religion and piety did surmount all the rest. Wherein as God did singularly adorn him; even so he, being such a valiant martyr of God, may seem to make famous the whole company of other holy martyrs, and as a bright star to make the church of God and his truth, of themselves bright and clear, more gloriously to shine by his example.

For if the conquests of martyrs are the triumphs of Christ, (as St. Ambrose doth notably and truly write) undoubtedly Christ in few men hath either conquered more notably, or triumphed more gloriously, than in this young man: he stood so wisely in his cause, so pious in his life, and so constantly in his death.

But to the declaration of the matter: first Mr. Haukes following the fashion of the court, as he grew in years, entered service with the lord of Oxford, where he remained a good space, being there right well esteemed and loved by all the household, so long as Edward the sixth lived. But he dying, all things began to go backward, religion to decay, true piety not only to wax cold, but also to be in danger every-where, and chiefly in the houses of great men. Haukes mistaking the state of things, and especially in such men's houses, rather than he would change the profession of true godliness, which he had tasted, thought to change the place; and so, forsaking the nobleman's house, departed thence to his own home, where more freely he might give himself to God, and use his own conscience.

But what place in this world shall a man find so secret himself, whether the old wicked serpent cannot creep, whereby he may have some matter to overthrow the quietness of the godly? Now in the mean time, Haukes keeping his house at home, had born unto him a young son, whose baptism was deferred to the third week, for that he would not suffer him to be baptized in the papistical manner, which thing the adversaries were able to suffer, laying hands upon him, did bring him to the earl of Oxford, there to be reasoned with, as not sound in religion, in that he seemed to contemn the sagements of the church.
The earl either intending not to trouble himself in such matters, or else seeing himself not able to weigh him in such cases of religion, sent him up to London with a messenger, and letters, and so, willing to do his own hands, put him in the hands of Bonner, Bishop of London; the contents of which his letter sent Bonner, are as follow.

MOST reverend father in God, be it known unto you, that I have sent you one Thomas Haukes, dwelling in the county of Essex, who hath a child that hath remained un-baptized more then three weeks; who, being upon the same point, hath denied to have it baptized, as it is now used in the church, whereupon I have sent him to your good lordship, as you think best, by your good discretion.

When the bishop had perused this letter, and afterwards read it to Mr. Haukes, he hearing the same, thought with himself that he should not be very much used, seeing he was put to his discretion. Then he wrote the bishop a letter again to him that sent the Haukes, with many great thanks for his diligence in setting forth the queen's proceedings. Then the bishop began to enter communication with Mr. Haukes, asking, what should move him to leave his child unbaptized so long? To whom Mr. Haukes answered as again as followeth.

Haukes. Because we are bound to do nothing contrary to the word of God.

Bonner. Why, baptism is commanded by the word of God.

Haukes. His institution therein I do not deny.

Bonner. What deny you then?

Haukes. I deny all things invented and devised by man.

Bonner. What things are those that be devised by man, that you are so offended withal?

Haukes. Your oil, cream, salt, spittle, candle, and pouring of water, &c.

Bonner. Will you deny that which all the whole world and your fathers have been contented withal?

Haukes. What my father and all the whole world have done, I have nothing to do with: but what God hath commanded me to do, to that stand I.

Bonner. The catholic church hath taught it.

Haukes. What is the catholic church?

Bonner. It is the faithful congregation, wheresoever it is dispersed throughout the whole world.

Haukes. Who is the head thereof?

Bonner. Christ is the head thereof.

Haukes. Are we taught in Christ, or in the church of man?

Bonner. Have you not read in the eighth of St. John where he said, He would send his Comforter which should teach you all things?

Haukes. I grant you it is so, that he would send his Comforter, but to what end? Forsooth to this end, that he should lead you into all truth and verity, and that is to teach a new doctrine.

Bonner. Ah sir, you are a right scripture man. For I will have nothing but the scripture. There is a great number of your countrymen of your opinion.
Do you know one Knight and Pygot?

Haukes. Knight I know, but Pygot I do not know.

Bonner. I thought you were acquainted with him: it meth so by your judgment. What preachers do you know in Essex?

Haukes. I know none.

Bonner. Do you know one Baget?

Haukes. Yes, forsooth, I know him.

Bonner. What manner of man is he?

Haukes. An honest man so far as I know.

Bonner. Do you know him if you see him?

Haukes. Yes, that I do. [Then said he to one of his servants, Go call me Baget hither; and then said to me, You seem to be a very proud man and stubborn.
He that brought me up, stood all this while by.]

Haukes. What should move your lordship so to say?

Bonner. Because I see in a man that came with you much humility and lowliness.

Haukes. It seemeth your lordship speaketh that to me, because I make no courtesy to you: and with that came Baget. Then the bishop said to Baget, How say you, sir, know you this man?

Baget. Yes, forsooth, my lord; with that Baget and I shook hands. Then said the bishop to Baget, Sir, this man hath a child which hath lain three weeks unbaptized, (as I have letters to shew) who refuseth to have it baptized, as it is now used in the church:
how say you thereto?

Bonner. Forsooth, my lord, I say nothing thereto (with low courtesy to the hard ground).

Bonner. Say you nothing thereto? I will make you tell me whether it be laudable, and to be frequented and used in the church or not.

Baget. I beseech your lordship to pardon me, he is old enough, let him answer for himself.

Bonner. Ah knave, are you at that point with me?
Go call me the porter, said he, to one of his men, thou shalt sit in the stocks, and have nothing but bread and water. I perceive I have kept you too well. Have
I made thus much of you, and are you at this point?
Then came the bishop's man, and said, The porter is gone to London: then said the bishop to Baget, Come with me, and he went away with him, and commanded me away, and bade one of his gentlemen to talk with me, (who was one of his own teaching) who desired amongst other things to know of me, with whom I was acquainted in Essex, and what men they were that were my teachers.

Haukes. When I see your commission, I will make you answer. And then immediately came the bishop again: but before he came, his man and I had much talk. Then the bishop sat down under a vine in his orchard, and called Baget to him, whom he carried away, and brought again, and called me also, and said to Baget, How say you now unto baptism? Say whether it be to be frequented and used in the church, as it is now, or no?

Baget. Forsooth, my lord, I say it is good.

Bonner. I befool your heart, could you not have said so before? You have wounded this man's conscience.
Then the bishop turned to me, and said; How say you now, sir? this man is turned and converted.

Haukes. I build not my faith upon this man, neither upon you, but only upon Christ Jesus, who (as St.
Paul saith) is the founder and author of all men's faith.

Bonner. I perceive you are a stubborn fellow. I must therefore go to work another way with you, to win you.

Haukes. Whatsoever you do, I am ready to suffer it; for I am in your hands to abide it.

Bonner. Well, you are so, come on your ways, you shall go in, and I will use you christian-like: you shall have meat and drink, such as I have in my house: but in any wise talk not.

Haukes. I purpose to talk nothing but the word of God and truth.

Bonner. I will have no heresy talked on in my house.

Haukes. Why, is the truth become heresy? God hath commanded that we should have none other talk in our houses, in our beds, at our meat, and by the way, but all truth.

Bonner. If you will have my favour, be ruled by my counsel.

Haukes. Then I trust you will grant me my request.

Bonner. What is that?

Haukes.

Haukes. That your doctors and servants give me no occasion: for if they do, I will surely utter my conscience. Then he commanded his men to take in Baget, that Haukes and he might not have an opportunity to talk together. And so thus we departed, and went to dinner, and I dined at the steward's table.

After dinner, his chaplains and his men began to talk with me. But, amongst others, there was one named Darbishire, principal of Broadgates in Oxford, and the bishop's kinsman, who said to me, that I was too curious: for you will have (said he) nothing but your little pretty God's book.

Haukes. And is it not sufficient for my salvation?

Bonner. Yes, it is sufficient for our salvation, but not for our instruction.

Haukes. God send me the salvation, and you the instruction. And as we thus reasoned came the bishop, who said unto me; I gave you a commandment that you should not talk.

Haukes. and I desired of you that your doctors and servants should give me no occasion. Then we went into his orchard again, he and I and his doctors.

Bonner. Would not you be contented, provided your child should be christened after the book that was set out by king Edward?

Haukes. Yes, with a good will; it is the thing that I desire.

Bonner. I thought so: you would have the same thing. The principal is in the name of the Father, the Son, and of the Holy Ghost, and in necessity it may serve.

Haukes. Christ did use it without any such necessity: and yet we lack the chiefest point.

Bonner. What is that?

Haukes. "Go teach all nations, baptizing them, &c."

Bonner. Thou speakest that because I am no preacher.

Haukes. I speak the text: I do not mean you. Then said all the doctors, and his men that were with him, He spake it of you, my lord (with a great noise that they made).

Bonner. Will you be content to tarry here, and your child shall be baptized, and you shall not know of it, so that you will agree to it?

Haukes. If I would so have done, I needed not to have come to you: for I had the same counsel given before.

Bonner. You seem to be a lusty young man; you will not give your head for the washing; you will stand in the defence of it for the honour of your country. Do you think that the queen and I cannot command it to be done in spite of your teeth.

Haukes. What the queen and you can do, I will not stand in it: but you get my consent never the sooner.

Bonner. Well, you are a stubborn young man: I perceive I must work another way with you.

Haukes. You are in the hands of God, and so am I.

Bonner. Whatsoever you think, I will not have you speak such words unto me. And so we departed until even-song time: and before even-song was begun, my lord called for me to come to him in the chapel, and said; Haukes, thou art a proper young man, and God hath done his part unto thee; I would be glad to do thee good. Thou knowest that I am thy pastor, and one that should answer for thee. If I would not teach thee well, I should answer for thy soul.

Haukes. What I have said, I will stand to, God willing; there is no way to remove it.

Bonner. Nay, nay, Haukes, thou shalt not be so wilful. Remember Christ bade two go into his vineyard: the one said he would, and went not; the other said he would not, and went.

Haukes. The last went.

Bonner. Do thou likewise, and I will talk friendly with thee; how sayest thou? It is in the sixth of St. John; "I am the bread of life, and the bread that I will give is my flesh, which I will give for the life of the world. And whosoever eateth my flesh and drinketh my blood, hath everlasting life. My flesh is very meat indeed, and my blood is drink indeed. And he that eateth my flesh and drinketh my blood, dwelleth in me, and I in him." Do you believe this?

Haukes. Yes, I must needs believe the scriptures.

Bonner. Why, then, I trust that you be found in the blessed sacrament.

Haukes. I beseech your lordship to feel my conscience no farther than in that which I was accused in unto you.

Bonner. Well, well, let us go unto even-song.

Haukes. With that I turned my back to go out of the chapel.

Bonner. Why, will you not tarry even-song?

Haukes. No, forsooth.

Bonner. And why?

Haukes. For I will not.

Bonner. And why will you not?

Haukes. Because I have no edifying thereby, for I understand no Latin.

Bonner. Why, you may pray by yourself. What books have you?

Haukes. I have the New Testament, the books of Solomon, and the Psalter.

Bonner. Then I pray you tarry here, and pray you on your Psalter.

Haukes. I will not pray in this place, nor in any such. Then said one of his chaplains, Let him go, my lord, and he shall be no partaker with us in our prayers.

Haukes. I think myself best at ease when I am farthest from you, and so the bishop went to even-song, and I came down and walked between the hall and the chapel in the court, and tarried there till even-song was done; and within an hour after even-song was done the bishop sent for me into his chamber where he lay himself, and when I came, there was he and three of his chaplains.

Bonner. You know of the talk that was between you and me, as concerning the sacrament. You would not have your conscience sought any farther, than in that you were accused of.

Haukes. I thought you would not be both mine accuser and judge.

Bonner. Well, you shall answer me to the sacrament of the altar, the sacrament of baptism, the sacrament of penance, and the sacrament of matrimony.

Haukes. There is none of these, but I dare speak my conscience in them.

Bonner. The sacrament of the altar you seem to be found in.

Haukes. In the sacrament of the altar? why, sir, I do not know it.

Bonner. Well, we will make you to know it, and believe in it too, before we have done with you.

Haukes. No, that shall ye never do.

Bonner. Yes, a faggot will make you do it.

Haukes. No, no, a fig for your faggot. What God thinketh meet to be done, that shall ye do, and me ye shall not do.

Bonner. Do you not believe that there remaineth the blessed sacrament of the altar, after the words of consecration be spoken, no more bread, but the very body and blood of Christ? And at that word he put on his cap.

Haukes. I do believe as Christ hath taught me.

Bonner. Why, did not Christ say, "Take, eat, this is my body?"

Haukes. Christ said so: but therefore it followeth not that the sacrament of the altar is so as you teach, neither did Christ ever teach it so to be.

Bonner. Why, the catholic church taught it so, and they were of Christ's church.

Haukes. How prove you it? The apostles never taught it so. Read the Acts, the second and the twentieth. Neither St. Peter nor St. Paul ever taught nor instituted it so.

Bonner. Ah sir, you will have no more than the scripture teacheth, but even as Christ hath left it bare.

Haukes. He that teacheth me any otherwise, I will not believe him.

Bonner. Why, then you must eat a lamb, if you will have but Christ's institution only.

Haukes. Nay, that is not so, for before Christ instituted the sacrament, that ceremony ceased, and he began the sacrament.

Bonner. Alas, you know not how it began, neither of the institution.

Haukes. Then I would be glad to learn.

Bonner. Marry, we will teach you; but you are so stubborn you will not learn.

Haukes. Except you teach me by the word of God, never will credit you, nor believe you: and thus we concluded. Then the bishop and his chaplains laughed and said; Jesu, Jesu, what a stubbornness and arrogance is this? and this was in his chamber where he lay. Then said the bishop to me, Go you down and drink, for it is fasting day: it is midsummer eve, but I think you love neither fasting nor praying.

Haukes. I will never deny either fasting or praying, so that it be done as it ought to be done, and without hypocrisy or vain glory.

Bonner. I like you the better for that: and so we slept for that night.

The next day the bishop went to London: for Mr. Becknam was made dean that day, and I tarried still at Fulham.

Then did the bishop's men desire me to come to Mass, but I utterly refused it, answering them as I did my master.

The same night the bishop came home to Fulham again.

CONVERSATION between Mr. HARPSFIELD and Mr. THOMAS HAUKEs.

UPON Monday morning very early, the bishop called for me. There was with him Mr. Harpsfield, archdeacon of London, to whom the bishop said, This is the man which I told you of, who would not have his child christened, nor will have any ceremonies.

Harpsfield. Christ used ceremonies. Did he not take away from the ground, and took spittle, and made the blind man to see?

Haukes. That I well know, but Christ did never use it in baptism. If ye will needs have it, put it to the use that Christ put it unto.

Harpsfield. Admit your child die unchristened: what heavy case you stand in!

Haukes. I admit if it do, what then?

Harpsfield. Marry, then are you damned, and your child both.

Haukes. Judge you no farther than you may by the scriptures.

Harpsfield. Do you not know that your child is born original sin?

Haukes. Yes, that I do.

Harpsfield. How is original sin washed away?

Haukes. By true faith and belief in Christ Jesus.

Harpsfield. How can your child being an infant believe?

Haukes. The deliverance of it from sin standeth in the faith of his parents.

Harpsfield. How prove you that?

Haukes. By St. Paul, 1 Cor. vii. 14. "The unbelieving man is sanctified by the believing woman, and the unbelieving woman is sanctified by the believing man, or else were your children unclean."

Harpsfield. I will prove that they whom thou puttest thy trust in, will be against thee in this opinion.

Haukes. Who are those?

Harpsfield. Your great learned men in Oxford.

Haukes. If they do it by the scriptures, I will believe them.

Bonner. Recant, recant: do you not know that Christ said, Except ye be baptized, ye cannot be saved?

Haukes. Doth christianity consist in outward ceremonies, or no?

Bonner. Partly it doth: what say you to that?

Haukes. I say as St. Peter saith, "Not the washing with water purgeth the filthiness of the flesh, but a good conscience consenting unto God."

Harpsfield. Beware of pride, brother, beware of pride.

Haukes. It is written, "Pride serveth not for men, yet for the sons of men."

Bonner. Let us make an end here. How say you to Mass, sirrah?

No. 15.

Haukes. I say it is detestable, abominable, and unprofitable.

Bonner. What nothing profitable in it? what say you to the epistle and gospel?

Haukes. It is good if it be used as Christ left it to be used.

Bonner. Well, I am glad that you somewhat recant: recant all, recant all.

Haukes. I have recanted nothing, nor will do.

Bonner. How say you to the Confiteor?

Haukes. I say it is abominable and detestable, yea, and a blasphemy against God, and his Son Jesus Christ, to call upon any, to trust to any, or to pray to any, save only Christ Jesus.

Bonner. To trust to any we bid you not: but to call upon them, and to pray to them, we bid you. Do you not know when you come into court, you cannot speak with the king and queen, unless you call to some of the privy chamber that are next to the king and queen.

Haukes. They that list receive your doctrine. You teach me that I should not believe nor trust in any, but to call on them; and St. Paul saith, "How should I call upon him on whom I believe not?"

Bonner. Will you have nobody to pray for you when you be dead?

Haukes. No surely, except you can prove it by the scriptures. Then the bishop pointed unto Harpsfield, and said unto me, Is it not well done to desire this man to pray for me?

Haukes. Yes, surely, so long as we live, prayers of the righteous man are available: but this man's prayers, you being dead, profit nothing at all.

Bonner. Will you grant the prayer of the righteous man to prevail?

Haukes. I grant it doth for the living, but not for the dead.

Bonner. Not for the dead?

Haukes. No forsooth, for David saith, "No man can deliver his brother from death, nor make agreement with God for him: for it cost more to redeem their souls, so that ye must let that alone for ever."

Also Ezekiel saith, "Though Noah, Daniel, or Job dwelt among them, yet can they in their righteousness exceed no farther than themselves." Then the bishop said to Harpsfield, Sir, you see this man hath no need of our lady, neither of any of the blessed saints. Well, I will trouble you no longer; I did call you, hoping that you should do some good on him, but it will not be. And he said to me, Sir, it is time to begin with you; we will rid you away, and then we shall have one heretic less.

Harpsfield. What books have you?

Haukes. The New Testament, Solomon's books, and the Psalter.

Harpsfield. Will you read any other books?

Haukes. Yes; Latimer's books, my lord of Canterbury's book, Bradford's sermons, and Ridley's books.

Bonner. Away, away, he will have no books but such as maintain his heresies: so they departed, for Harpsfield was booted to ride unto Oxford, and I went to the porter's lodge again.

The next day came thither an old bishop, who had a pearl in his eye, and he brought with him unto my lord a dish of apples, and a bottle of wine. For he had lost his living because he had a wife. Then the bishop called me again into the orchard, and said to the old bishop, This young man hath a child, and will not have it christened.

Haukes. I deny not baptism.

Bonner. Thou art a fool, thou canst not tell what thou wouldst have. This he spake with much anger.

Haukes. A bishop must be blameless or faultless, sober, discreet, no chider, nor given to anger.

Bonner. Thou judgest me to be angry: no by my faith I am not, and struck himself upon the breast.

Then said the old bishop, Alas good young man, you must be taught by the church, and by your elders, and do as your forefathers have done before you.

U u

Bonner.

Bonner. No, no, he will have nothing but the scriptures, and God knows he doth not understand them. He will have no ceremonies in the church, no not one: what say you to holy water?

Haukes. I say to it as to the rest, and to all that be of his making that made them.

Bonner. Why, the scriptures do allow it?

Haukes. Where prove you that?

Bonner. In the book of Kings, where Elisha threw salt into the water.

Haukes. You say truth, that it is written in 2 Kings, chap. ii. the children of the prophets came to Elisha, saying, "The dwelling of the city is pleasant, but the waters be corrupted." This was the cause that Elisha threw salt into the water, and it became sweet and good: and so when our waters be corrupted, if you can by putting in of salt make them sweet, clear, and wholesome, we will the better believe your ceremonies.

Bonner. How say you to holy bread?

Haukes. Even as I said to the other. What scripture have you to defend it?

Bonner. Have you not read where Christ fed five thousand men with five loaves and three fishes?

Haukes. Will ye make that holy bread? There Christ dealt fish with his holy bread.

Bonner. Look, I pray you, how captious this man is.

Haukes. Christ did not this miracle, or other, because we should do the like miracle, but because we should believe and credit his doctrine thereby.

Bonner. We believe no doctrine, but that which is wrought by miracles.

Haukes. No forsooth, for Christ saith, "These tokens shall follow them that believe in me: they shall speak with new tongues, they shall cast out devils, and if they drink any deadly poison, it shall not hurt them."

Bonner. With what new tongues do ye speak?

Haukes. Forsooth, where before that I came to the knowledge of God's word, I was a foul blasphemer and filthy talker; since I came to the knowledge thereof, I have lauded God, praised God, given thanks to God even with the same tongue, and is not this a new tongue?

Bonner. How do you cast out devils?

Haukes. Christ did cast them out by his word, and he hath left the same word, that whosoever doth credit and believe it, shall cast out devils.

Bonner. Did you ever drink any deadly poison?

Haukes. Yea forsooth, that I have; for I have drank of the pestilential traditions and ceremonies of the bishop of Rome.

Bonner. Now you shew yourself to be a right heretic?

Haukes. I pray you, what is heresy?

Bonner. All things that are contrary to God's word.

Haukes. If I stand in any thing contrary thereto, then I am worthy to be so called.

Bonner. Thou art one, and thou shalt be burned, if thou stand and continue in this opinion. You think we are afraid to put one of you to death: yes, yes, there is a brotherhood of you, but I will break it, I warrant you.

Haukes. Where prove you that Christ or his apostles did kill any man for his faith?

Bonner. Did not Paul excommunicate?

Haukes. Yes, my lord; but there is a great difference between excommunicating and burning.

Bonner. Have you not read of the man and the woman in the Acts of the apostles, whom Peter destroyed.

Haukes. Yes forsooth, I have read of one Ananias, and Sapphira his wife, who were destroyed for lying against the Holy Ghost, which serveth nothing to your purpose.

Bonner. Well, you will grant one yet.

Haukes. Well, if you will have us to grant you be of God, then shew mercy unto us: for that God requireth.

Bonner. We will shew such mercy unto you as ye shewed unto us: for my benefice or bishopric was taken away from me, so that I had not one penny to live upon.

Haukes. I pray you, my lord, what do you give him now that was in the bishopric or benefice before you came again to it? Whereunto he answered me never a word; for he turned his back upon me, and talked with other men, saying that he was very sorry for me, because he trusted that I would turn with St. Paul, because I was so earnest; and so he departed and went to dinner, and I to the porter's lodge again.

After dinner I was called into the hall again, and the bishop desired the old bishop to take me into his chamber; for I would be glad (said he) if you could convert him. So he took me into his chamber, and sat himself down in a chair, and said to me; I would to God I could do you some good: you are a young man, and I would not wish you to go too far, but learn of your elders to bear somewhat.

Haukes. I will bear nothing that is contrary to the word of God. And I looked that the old bishop should have made me an answer, but he was fast asleep.

Then I departed out of the chamber alone, and went to the porter's lodge again, and there I saw the old bishop last: I suppose he is not yet awake.

The next day Dr. Fecknam came to me and said, Are you he that will have no ceremonies?

Haukes. What mean you by that?

Fecknam. You will not have your child christened, but in English, and you will have no ceremonies.

Haukes. Whatsoever the scripture commandeth to be done, I refuse not.

Fecknam. Ceremonies are to be used by the scriptures.

Haukes. Which be those?

Fecknam. How say you by Paul's breeches?

Haukes. I have read no such thing.

Fecknam. Have you not read in the Acts of the apostles, how things went from Paul's body, and they received health thereby?

Haukes. I have read in the 19th ch. of the Acts, how there went handkerchiefs and napkins from Paul's body; is it that you mean?

Fecknam. Yes, the same it is: what say you to the ceremonies?

Haukes. I say nothing to the ceremonies: for the scripture saith, that God did so work by the hands of Paul, that there went handkerchiefs and napkins from him, &c. So that it seemed by the text, that it was God that wrought, and not the ceremonies.

Fecknam. How say you to the woman that came behind Christ, and touched the hem of his vesture? Did not her disease depart from her by that ceremony?

Haukes. No forsooth: for Christ turned back and said to Peter, "Who is it that touched me?" And Peter said, "Thou seest the people thrust thee; and askest thou, who touched me?" "Some body hath touched me, saith Christ, for virtue hath gone out of me." I pray you, whether was it the virtue that healed this woman, or his vesture?

Fecknam. Both.

Haukes. Then is not Christ true: for he said, "O man, thy way, thy faith hath made thee whole."

Bonner. Away, away to the sacrament, for these be but mere trifles to that.

Fecknam. How say you, sirrah? Christ took bread and brake it, and said, "Take, eat, this is my body."

Haukes. I grant Christ said so.

Fecknam. And is it not so?

Haukes. No forsooth, I do not understand it so.

Fecknam. Why, then, is Christ a liar?

Haukes. I think you will so prove him.

Fecknam. Will I? why, I have spoken the words that Christ spake.

Haukes. Is every word to be understood as Christ spake it? Christ said, I am a door, a vine, I am a king, a way, &c.

Fecknam. Christ spake these words in parables.

Haukes. And why speaketh he this in parables? he said, I am a door, a vine, a king, a way, &c. more than when he said, This is my body? For after the same phrase of speech, as he saith, This is my body, so saith he, I am a door, a vine, a king, a way; saith not, I am like a door, like a vine, &c.

Then Fecknam stood up, and said, I had such a vision before me the other day. Alas! those places serve nothing for your purposes. But I perceive you hang your build on them that be at Oxford.

Haukes. What mean you by that?

Fecknam. I mean Latimer, Cranmer, and Ridley.

Haukes. I know nothing else by them, but that they be both godly and learned.

Fecknam. Wilt thou trust to such dolts? One of them has written a book wherein he affirmeth a real presence in the sacrament.

Haukes. What he hath done I know not, but what he doth I know.

Fecknam. Ridley hath preached at Paul's Crofs openly, that the devil believeth better than you: for he believeth that Christ is able of stones to make bread, and you will not believe Christ's body in the sacrament, and yet thou buildest thy faith upon them.

Haukes. I build my faith upon no man, and that ye well know; for if those men, and as many more as they be, should recant and deny what they have said or done, yet will I stand to it, and by this ye shall know that I build my faith upon no man.

Bonner. If any of those recant, what will you say to it?

Haukes. When they recant, I will make you an answer.

Bonner. Then thou wilt say as thou dost now for all that?

Haukes. Yes indeed will I, and that trust to it by God's grace.

Bonner. I dare say, Cranmer would recant, so that he might have his living. And so the bishop and Fecknam departed from me with great laughing, and I went again to the porter's lodge.

The next day Dr. Chedsey came to the bishop and him. They declared unto him that I had stood stubbornly in the defence against the christening of my child, and against the ceremonies of the church, and that I would not have it christened but in English.

Then said Dr. Chedsey, he denies the order of the catholic church.

Bonner. Yes, he thinketh there is no church but in England and Germany.

Haukes. And you think that there is no church, but the church of Rome.

Chedsey. What say you to the church of Rome?

Haukes. I say it is a church of a sort of vicious cardinals, priests, monks, and friars, which I will never credit, nor believe.

Chedsey. What say you to the bishop of Rome?

Haukes. From him and all his detestable enormities, good Lord deliver us.

Chedsey. Marry, so may we say, From king Henry VIII. and all his detestable enormities, good Lord deliver us.

Haukes. Where were you while he lived, that you would not say so?

Chedsey. I was not far.

Haukes. Where was you in his son's days?

Chedsey. In prison.

Haukes. It was not for your well doing.

Bonner. He will by no means come within my chapel, nor hear mass: for neither the mass, nor the sacrament of the altar can he abide, neither will he have any service but in English.

Chedsey. Christ never spake in English.

Haukes. Neither did he ever speak any Latin, but always in such a tongue as the people might be edified thereby. And St. Paul saith, "That tongues profit us nothing." He maketh a similitude between the pipe and the harp, and except it be understood what the trumpet meaneth, who can prepare himself to the battle? So if I hear a tongue that I do not understand, what profit have I thereby? no more than he hath by the trumpet, that knoweth not what it meaneth.

Chedsey. If you understand St. Paul's saying, he speaketh it under a prophecy, "If one prophesy to you in tongues," &c.

Haukes. Forsooth St. Paul speaketh plainly of tongues: for tongues serve not for them that believe.

Chedsey. I tell you St. Paul speaketh altogether upon prophecy.

Haukes. St. Paul maketh a distinction between prophesying and tongues, saying, "That if any man speak with tongues, let it be two or three at the most; and let another interpret it. But if there be no interpreter, let them keep silence in the congregation, and let himself pray unto God: and then let the prophets speak two or three, and that by course, and let the others judge: and if any revelation be made to him that sitteth by, let the first hold his peace:" so that it seemeth that St. Paul maketh a distinction between tongues and prophesying.

Bonner. The order was taken in the catholic church that the Latin tongue should serve through the whole world, because that they should pray all generally together in one tongue, and that to avoid all contention and strife, and to have one universal order through the whole world.

Haukes. This did your councils of Rome conclude.

Bonner. Understand ye what the general councils of Rome mean?

Haukes. Indeed all your general councils of Rome be in Latin, and I am an Englishman; therefore I have nothing to do with them.

Chedsey. You are to blame, being an unlearned man, to reprove all the councils throughout all the world.

Haukes. I reprove them not, but St. Paul rebuketh them, saying, "If any man preach any other doctrine than that which I have taught, do you hold him accursed."

Chedsey. Hath any man preached any other doctrine unto you?

Haukes. Yes, I have been taught another gospel since I came into this house.

Chedsey. What gospel have you been taught?

Haukes. Praying to saints, and to our lady, and trusting in the mass, holy bread, holy water, and in idols.

Chedsey. He that teaches you so, teaches you not amiss.

Haukes. Cursed be he that teacheth me so: for I will not trust him, nor believe him.

Bonner. You speak of idols, and you know not what they mean.

Haukes. God hath taught us what they be: for, whatsoever is made, graven, or devised by man's hand, contrary to God's word, the same is an idol. What say you to that?

Chedsey. What be those that you are so offended withal?

Haukes. The cross of wood, silver, copper, or gold, &c.

Bonner. What say you to that?

Haukes. I say it is an idol. What say you to it?

Bonner. I say, every idol is an image, but every image is not an idol.

Haukes. I say, what difference is there between an idol and an image?

Bonner. If it be a false god, and an image made of him, that is an idol: but if an image be made of God himself, it is no idol but an image, because he is a true God.

Haukes. Lay your image of a true God and of your false god together, and you shall see no difference. Have not your images feet, and go not; eyes and see not; ears and hear not; hands and feel not; mouths and speak not? and even so have your idols.

Chedsey. "God forbid, saith St. Paul, that I should rejoice in any thing else, but in the cross of Jesus Christ."

Haukes. Do you understand St. Paul so? Do you understand St. Paul? Unto which he answered nothing.

Bonner. Where can we have a godlier remembrance when we ride by the way, than to see the cross?

Haukes. If the cross was such a profit unto us, why did not Christ's disciples take it up, and set it on a pole, and carry it in procession?

Chedsey. It was taken up.

Haukes. Who took it up? Helene, as you say; for she sent a piece of it to a place of religion, where I was with the visitors when that house was suppressed, and the piece of the holy cross (which the religious had in such estimation, and had robbed many a soul, committing idolatry to it) was called for, and when it was proved, and all come to all, it was but a piece of a lath covered over with copper, double gilded, as it had been clean gold.

Bonner.

Bonner. Fie, fie, I dare say thou slanderest it.

Haukes. I know it to be true, and do not believe the contrary. And thus did the bishop and the doctor depart in a great fume: and Chedsey said unto me, as he was about to depart, It is a pity thou shouldst live, or any such as thou art. I answered, In this case I desire not to live, but rather to die.

Chedsey. You die boldly, because you would glory in your death, as Joan Butcher did.

Haukes. What Joan Butcher did, I have nothing to do withal: but I would my part might be to-morrow. God make you in a better mind, said they both, and so they departed, and I went to the porter's lodge with my keeper.

The next day Dr. Chedsey preached in the bishop's chapel, and did not begin his sermon until all the service was done: and then came the porter for me, and said, My lord would have you come to the sermon, and so I went to the chapel door, and stood without the door.

Bonner. Is not this fellow come?

Haukes. Yes, I am here.

Bonner. Come in, man.

Haukes. No, that I will not. He called again, and I answered I will come no nearer, and so I stood at the door. Then said the bishop, Go to your sermon.

Then Dr. Chedsey put the stole about his neck, and carried the holy water-sprinkle unto the bishop, who blessed him and gave him holy water, and so he went to his sermon.

The text that he treated on was the 16th of St. Matthew, "Whom do men say that I the Son of Man am? Peter said, Some say that thou art Elias, some say that thou art John the Baptist, some say thou art one of the prophets. But whom say ye that I am? Then said Peter, Thou art Christ the Son of the living God." Then he left the text there, and said, Whose sins soever ye bind, are bound: which authority (said he) is left to the heads of the church, as my lord here is one, and so unto all the rest that be underneath him. But the church hath been much kicked at since the beginning: yet kick the heretics, spurn the heretics ever so much, the church doth stand and flourish. And then he went straitway to the sacrament, and said his mind on it, exalting it above heaven, (as most of them do) and so returned to his place again, saying, Whose sins do ye remit, are remitted and forgiven: and so he applied it to the bishops and priests to forgive sins, and said, All that be of the church will come and receive the same. And this he proved by St. John, chap. xi. saying that Christ came to raise Lazarus, who when he was risen was bound in bands: then said Christ to them that were in authority, (who were his disciples) Go ye and loose him, let him go. And this was the effect of his sermon, applying all to them, that they have the same authority that Christ spake of to his apostles! and so ended his sermon, and they went to dinner.

Another CONVERSATION between THOMAS HAUKES, BISHOP BONNER, and Others.

AFTER dinner I was called into the chapel, where were several of the queen's servants, and other strangers whom I did not know.

Bonner. Haukes, How like you the sermon?

Haukes. As I like all the rest of his doctrine.

Bonner. What, are you not edified thereby?

Haukes. No, surely.

Bonner. It was made only because of you.

Haukes. Why, then I am sorry that you had no more heretics here, as you call them: I am sorry that you have bestowed so much labour on one, and so little regarded.

Bonner. Well, I will leave you here, for I have business, I pray you talk with him: for if you could do him good, said he, I would be glad.

This the bishop spake to the queen's men, who said unto me, Alas! what mean you to trouble yourself about such matters against the queen's proceedings?

Haukes. Those matters have I answered before them that be in authority: and unless I see you have a further commission, I will answer you nothing at all. Then said the bishop's men, (which were many) My lord hath commanded you to talk with us.

Haukes. If my lord will talk with me himself, I will answer him. They cried, Faggots, burn him, hang him, to prison with him, it is pity that he liveth, lay irons upon him; and with a great noise they spake these words. Then in the midst of all their rage I departed from them, and went to the porter's lodge again.

The next day the bishop called me into his chamber, and said, You have been with me a great while, and you are never the better, but worse and worse: and therefore I will delay the time no longer, but send you to Newgate.

Haukes. My lord, you can do me no better pleasure.

Bonner. Why would you so fain go to prison?

Haukes. Truly I did look for none other when I came to your hands.

Bonner. Come on your ways, you shall see what I have written. Then did he shew me certain articles, and these are the contents of them:

Whether the catholic church do teach and believe, that Christ's real presence doth remain in the sacrament or no, after the words of consecration, according to the words of St. Paul, which are these; "Is not the bread which we break the partaking of the body of Christ, and the cup which we bless, the partaking of the blood of Christ?" which if it were not so, St. Paul would never have said it.

Haukes. What your church doth, I cannot tell: but I am sure that the holy catholic church doth never so take it, nor believe it.

Bonner. Whether doth the catholic church teach and believe the baptism that now is used in the church, or no?

Haukes. I answered to it as I did to the other question before. Then did the bishop with much flattery counsel me to be persuaded, and to keep me out of prison, which I utterly refused, and so we departed. And I supposed that the next day I should have gone to prison, and so I had, except for the archdeacon of Canterbury, whose name is Harpsfield, whom the bishop had desired to talk with me, and began to persuade me concerning the sacrament and the ceremonies: and after much talk he said, that the sacrament of the altar was the same body that was born of the virgin Mary, which did hang upon the cross.

Haukes. He was upon the cross both alive and dead: which of them was the sacrament?

Harpsfield. The archdeacon answered, alive.

Haukes. How do you prove that?

Harpsfield. You must believe. Doth not St. John say, "He is condemned already that believeth not?"

Haukes. St. John saith, "He that believeth not in the Son of God, is already condemned;" but he saith not, He that believeth not in the sacrament, is already condemned.

Harpsfield. There is no talk with you: for you are both without faith and learning, and therefore I will talk no more with you from scripture.

Haukes. Then two that stood by bade me enter further in talk with him; and I said unto him, Why is the rood-lost set betwixt the body of the church and the chancel?

Harpsfield. I cannot tell: for you have asked me a question which you cannot answer yourself.

Haukes. Yes, that I can: for this saith one of your own doctors, That the body of the church doth represent the church militant, and the chancel the church triumphant: and so because we cannot go from the church militant to the church triumphant, but that we must bear the cross of Christ; this is the cause of the rood-lost being between the body of the church and the chancel.

Harpsfield. This is well and learnedly concluded.

Haukes. As all the rest of your doctrine is; and with many persuasions on his part we ended, and departed: and I to the porter's lodge again.

The next day in the morning, which was the 1st of July ly, the bishop called me himself from the porter's lodge, commanding me to make myself ready to go to prison, and to take such things with me as I had of my own. And I said, I do neither intend to bribe, neither steal, God willing. Then he did write my warrant to the keeper of the Gate-house at Westminster, and delivered it to Harpsfield, who with his own man and one of the bishop's men brought me to prison, and delivered the warrant and me to the keeper: and this was contained in the warrant:

"I will and command you, that you receive him who is named in this warrant, and that he be kept as a prisoner, and that no man speak with him, and that you deliver him to no man, except it be the council, or a justice: for he is a sacramentary, and one that speaketh against baptism, a seditious man, a perilous man to be abroad in these perilous days." And thus as I received, and they departed. And there I remained thirteen days, and then the bishop sent two of his men unto me, saying, My lord would be glad to know how you do. I answered them, I do like a poor prisoner. They said, My lord would know, whether you be the same man that you were when you departed. I said, I am no changeling. They said, My lord would be glad that you should do well. I said, If my lord will do me any good, I pray you desire him to suffer my friends to come to me. So they said they would speak for me, but I heard no more of them.

This is the first examination of me Thomas Haukes, being examined by Edmund Bonner, then bishop of London, and by his chaplains and doctors at Fulham, four miles from London, where I lay, till I came to prison at Westminster: and after his two men had been with me, I heard no more of him till the 3d of September.

Here followeth the second examination, which was on the 3d of September, for the bishop sent his men for me to come to his palace of London; and so my keeper and his men brought me to his palace the same day.

SECOND EXAMINATION of Mr. THOMAS HAUKEs.

THE bishop of Winchester, then being chancellor, preached that day at Paul's Cross, and the bishop of London said to my keeper, I think your man will not be to the sermon to-day.

Haukes. Yes, my lord, I pray you let me go; and at which is good I will receive, and the rest I will leave behind me; and so I went. And when the sermon was done, I and my keeper came to the bishop's house, and there we remained till dinner was done: and after dinner the bishop called for me, and asked me if I was the same man that I was before.

Haukes. I am no changeling, nor none will be.

Bonner. You shall find me no changeling neither. And he returned into his chamber, and there he did write the side of a sheet of paper, and all that while I stood in the great chamber, and as many with me as might well stand in the chamber. And as I stood there, Dr. Smith came unto me, (who once recanted as it appeared in print) saying, he would be glad to talk brotherly with me. I asked him what he was? Then said they that stood by, he is Dr. Smith. Then said I, Are you he that did recant? And he said, It was no recantation, but a declaration.

Haukes. You were best to term it well for your own honesty.

Smith. Shall I term it as it pleaseth you?

Haukes. To be short with you, I will know whether you will recant any more or no, before that I talk with you, credit you, or believe you: and so I departed from him to the other side of the chamber. Then said the bishop's men and his chaplains, that my lord commanded me to talk with him. Then they that stood by, cried with a great noise, Hang him, burn him; it is a pity that he lives, that disobeyes my lord's commandment.

Then said one Miles Huggard, Where prove you that infants were baptized?

No. 15.

Haukes. "Go teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost." Sir, here is none excepted.

Mr. Huggard. What shall we go to teach children?

Haukes. That word doth trouble you; it might be left out full well: it is too much for you to teach. Is not your name Miles Huggard?

Mr. Huggard. So I am called.

Haukes. Be you not a hofier, and dwell in Pudding-lane?

Mr. Huggard. Yes that I am, and there I do dwell.

Haukes. It should seem so, for you have more skill in eating pudding, and selling stockings, than in disputing from the scriptures. With that he was in a great rage, and chafed up and down. Then I desired that some person would take pains to appease the gentleman, he did so fret for anger. Then one that stood by me (who was parson of Horn-church and Rumford in Essex) said, Alas, what do you mean? A young man to be so stubborn? there seemeth too much pride in you.

Haukes. Are you not the parson of Horn-church?

Parson. Yes; that I am.

Haukes. Did you not set such a priest in your benefice?

Parson. Yes, for a shift.

Haukes. Like master, like man. For I know the priest to be as vile a man as can be. I asked the parson, what kin he was to the weather-cock of St. Paul's? and he fell into a great laughter with the rest of his companions. He said I did rail.

Then said another that stood by unto me, What books have you here? I answered, the New Testament. May I look in it, said he? Yes, that you may, said I; and so he looked into my book, and said it was corrupt. I answered him, if the things contained in it be true, then ye are false prophets. He said that he would oppose me in the first word of the Testament, saying, Here is the generation of Christ; and Isaiah saith, no man can tell his generation.

Haukes. What meaneth Isaiah by that?

I would learn of you; said he.

Haukes. You would be angry if the scholar should teach the master: but if you will have me to teach you, I will tell you Isaiah's meaning.

Then said he, No man can tell the generation between the Father and the Son: but you (I dare say) did know it before.

Haukes. Isaiah denieth not the generation.

Then said he, why is Christ called Christ?

Haukes. Because he is the Messiah.

Then said he, Why is he called the Messiah?

Haukes. Because he was so prophesied by the prophets.

Then said he, Why is your book called a book?

Haukes. These words do breed more strife than godly edifying.

Beware, said he, that you do not decline from the church, for if you do, you will prove yourself an heretic.

Haukes. Even as you do call us heretics, that do incline to Christ's church from your church; so are ye all false prophets that do decline from Christ's church to your own church. And by this shall all men know you to be false prophets, if ye say, This saith the church: and will not say, This saith our Lord. And so he went away as though he had a flea in his ear.

Then came another, and said unto me, he would talk with me; for he perceived (as he said) that I was angry, and out of patience.

Haukes. I will see your commission, before I talk with you, or with any more. For I knew not how to be rid of them, they came so thick about me. And I said, I came to talk with my lord, and not with any of them.

With that came the bishop, bringing a letter in his hand, which he had written in my name, and read it unto me, after this manner: I Thomas Haukes do here confess and declare before my said ordinary Edmund, bishop of London, that the mass is abominable and detestable, and full of all superstition; and also as concerning the sacrament of the body and blood of Christ (commonly monly called the sacrament of the altar) that Christ is in no part thereof, but only in heaven: this I have believed, and this I do believe, &c.

Haukes. Stop there, my lord: what I have believed, what have you to do withal? But what I do believe, to that stand I, and will. Then he took his pen, and said that he would scrape it out for my pleasure, and so he did to my thinking.

Then he went further with his writing, and said, I Thomas Haukes have talked with my said ordinary, and with certain good, godly, and learned men. Notwithstanding I stand still in mine opinion.

Haukes. Shall I grant you to be good, godly, and learned men, and yet grant myself to stand in a contrary opinion? No, I will not grant you to be good, godly, and learned men.

Bonner. You will grant that you have talked with us: the other I will put out for your pleasure. Then said all his doctors, If your lordship be ruled by him, he will cause you to put out all together: and then read more to me. Here unto this bill have I set my hand; and then he offered me the bill and his pen, and bade me set my hand to it.

Haukes. You shall not have my hand to any thing of your making or devising.

Bonner. Wilt thou not set to thy hand? It shall be to thy shame for the denying it.

And then he called all his doctors, and said, he would have every man's hand to it that was in the chamber; and so he had all their hands to it, and said, He that will not set his hand to it, I would he were hanged; and so said all his chaplains with a great noise.

Then the bishop thrust me on the breast with great anger; and said he would be even with me, and with all such proud knaves in Essex.

Haukes. You shall do no more than God shall give you leave.

Bonner. This jeer shall not be unpunished, trust to it.

Haukes. As for your cursing, railings, and blasphemings, I care not for them: for I know the moths and worms shall eat you, as they eat cloth or wool.

Bonner. I will be even with you at a future time.

Haukes. You may in your malice destroy a man: but when you have done, you cannot do so much as make a finger; and you be meetly even with some of us already.

Bonner. If I do thee any wrong, take the law of me.

Haukes. Solomon saith, "Go not to law with a judge; for he will judge according to his honour."

Bonner. Solomon saith, "Give not a fool an answer."

Haukes. What, do you count me a fool?

Bonner. Yes, by my troth do I, and so dost thou me too: but God forgive thee, and so do I.

Haukes. Thought is free, my lord. Then the bishop took the bill and read it again; and when he saw that he could not have my hand to it, then he would have had me to take it into my hand, and to give it him again.

Haukes. What needeth that ceremony? neither shall it come into my hand, heart, or mind. Then he wrapt it up, and put it in his bosom, and went away in great anger, and called for his horse, for the same day he rode on his visitation into Essex: and so I went to prison again with my keeper. This was the second time of my examination.

Written by me Thomas Haukes, who desireth all faithful men and brethren to pray unto God, to strengthen me in his truth unto the end. Pray, pray, pray, gentle brethren, pray.

After all these private conferences, persuasions, and long debates with Mr. Haukes in the bishop's house, as hitherto hath been declared, the bishop seeing no hope to win him to his wicked ways, was determined to proceed openly against him after the ordinary course of his popish law. Whereupon Mr. Haukes was shortly after cited with the rest of his other companions abovementioned, namely, T. Tomkins, S. Knight, W. Pygot, J. Lawrence, and W. Hunter, to appear in the bishop's consistory, the eighth day of February, 1555. Upon which appearance was laid against him, in like order as to the others, first the bill of his confession, written with Bonner's own hand, to which bill you heard before how this worthy man refused to subscribe.

This bill of confession being read, and he standing stedfastly to the same, the bishop then assigned him with the other five the next day following, which was the 9th of February, to appear before him again, to give a resolute answer what they would stick to. Which day being come, and the aforesaid six prisoners being severally called before the bishop, at the coming of Thomas Haukes, the bishop desired him to remember what was said to him yesterday, and now while he had time and space, to advise with himself what he would answer, for he stood upon life and death. Well, said Mr. Haukes again, I will willingly receive whatsoever shall be put upon me. Then certain interrogatories or articles were commenced against him by the said bishop, (in like manner as to the others) to the number of four, with another bill also which bishop Bonner brought out of his bosom, containing private matters against the said Thomas Haukes, which the bishop called heresies and errors, but we may better call them christian verities. To which matter being read, the said Haukes answered openly again, saying that it was true, and that he was glad it was so true as it was, with more words to the like effect. And this was in the forenoon, the 9th day of February. In the afternoon again, the said Haukes appearing and hearing the aforesaid bill of his confession, with the articles and interrogatories read unto him, with like constancy in answering again to the bishop: My lord (saith he) as you being my friend have caused these my sayings to be written; so do you cause them to be read; and yet I will never go from them. And then being exhorted by the bishop, with many fair words, to return again to the bosom of the mother church: No, my lord, (said he) that will I not: for if I had an hundred bodies, I would suffer them all to be torn in pieces rather than I will abjure or recant. And so continuing still in the same song, notwithstanding that the doctors and lawyers were ever calling upon him to come again to the unity of the church, he ever kept them off with this answer, that he would never go from the belief he was in, so long as he lived. Whereupon bishop Bonner at last read the sentence of death upon him, and so was he condemned the same day with the residue of his fellows, which was the 9th of February. Nevertheless his execution was prolonged, and he remained in prison till the 10th day of June. Then was he committed to the hands and charge of the lord Rich, who being sufficiently assisted with power by the worshipful of the shire, had the aforesaid Thomas Haukes down into Essex, with six other fellow prisoners whose stories hereafter follow, there to suffer martyrdom, Haukes at Coxehall, the others in several other places.

Thomas Haukes by the way used much exhortation to his friends, and whensoever opportunity served to talk with them, he would familiarly admonish them.

A little before his death, there were several of his familiar acquaintance and friends, who frequented his company more familiarly, and seemed to be greatly confirmed both by the example of his constancy, and by his talk; yet notwithstanding, being terrified by the sharpness of the punishment which he was going to suffer, privately desired that in the midst of the flame he would shew them some token, if he could, whereby they might be more certain, whether the pain of such burning was so great, that a man might not therein keep his mind quiet and patient. Which thing he promised them to do; and so secretly between them it was agreed, that if the rage of the pain were tolerable and might be suffered, then he should lift up his hands above his head towards heaven, before he gave up the ghost.

Not long after, when the hour was come, Mr. Haukes was led away to the place appointed for the slaughter, by the lord Rich and his assistants, who being now come to the stake, there mildly and patiently prepared himself for the fire, having a strait chain cast about his middle, with a multitude of people on every side compassing him about. Unto whom after he had spoken many things, especially unto the lord Rich, reasoning with him of the innocent blood of saints, at length, after his fervent prayer ayers first made and poured out unto God, the fire as kindled.

In which when he continued long, and when his speech was taken away by violence of the flame, his hands also drawn together, and his fingers consumed with the fire, so that now all men thought certainly he had been gone, suddenly and contrary to all expectation this good man being mindful of his promise before made, reached up his hands burning on a light fire, which was marvellous to behold, over his head to the living God, and with great rejoicing, as it seemed, struck or clapped them three times together. At the sight whereof there followed such applause and out-cry of the people, and especially of them which understood the matter, that the like hath not commonly been heard: and so the blessed martyr of Christ, straitway sinking down into the fire, gave up his spirit, June 10, 1555. And thus have we plainly and expressly described unto you the whole story, as well of the life, as of the death of Mr. Haukes, a most constant and faithful witness of Christ's holy gospel.

LETTER I.

From Mr. THOMAS HAUKES to the CONGREGATION.

GRACE, mercy, and peace, from God the Father, and from our Lord Jesus Christ, be always with you all (my dear brethren and sisters in the Lord Jesus Christ) for ever; and the Holy Spirit conduct and lead you all in all your doings, that you may always direct your deeds according to his holy word; and when he shall appear to reward every man according to his works, you may, as obedient children, be found watching, ready to enter into his everlasting kingdom, with your lamps burning; and when the bridegroom shall shew himself, you need not be ashamed of this life which God hath lent you, which is but transitory, vain, and like unto a vapour, that for a season appeareth and vanisheth away: so soon passeth away all our earthly honour, glory, and felicity. "For all flesh (saith the prophet) is grass, and all his glory as the flower of the field, which for a season sheweth her beauty, and as soon as the Lord bloweth on it, it withereth away, and departeth." For in this transitory and dangerous wilderness, we are as pilgrims and strangers following the footsteps of Moses, among many unreckonable dangers, beholding nothing with our outward man, but idle vanities and vexation of mind, subject to hunger, cold, nakedness, bonds, sickness, loss, labour, banishment, in danger of that dreadful dragon, and his sinful seed, to be devoured, tempted and tormented, who ceaseth not behind every bush to lay a bait, when we walk awry, to have his pleasure upon us; and casting abroad his apples in all places, times, and seasons, to see if Adam will be allured and enticed to leave the living God and his most holy commandments, whereby he is assured of everlasting life, promising the world at will, to all that will fall down in all ages, and for a mess of pottage sell and set at naught the everlasting kingdom of heaven. So frail is flesh and blood; and in especial Israel is most ready to walk awry, when he is filled with all manner of riches," as saith the prophet. Therefore I am bold in bonds (as intirely desiring your everlasting health and felicity) to warn you, and most heartily desire you to watch and pray: for our state is dangerous, and requiring continual prayer. For on the high mountains doth not grow most plenty of grass, neither are the highest trees farthest from danger, but seldom sure, and always shaken by every wind that bloweth. Such a deceitful thing (saith our Saviour) is honour and riches, that without grace it choketh up the good seed sown on his creatures, and so blindeth their eyes, that they are groping at noon-day in darkness: it maketh a man think himself somewhat, that is nothing at all. For though for our honour we esteem ourselves and stand in our own light, yet when we shall stand before the living God, there shall be no respect of persons. For riches help not in the day of vengeance: neither can we make the Lord partial for money. But if ye have ministered unto the faint, so shall you receive the reward, which I am fully persuaded and assured shall be plentifully poured upon you all, for the great goodness shewed unto the servants of the living God. And I most heartily beseech Almighty God to pour forth a plenteous reward upon you for the same, and that he will assist you with his Holy Spirit in all your doings, that you may grow as you have begun, unto such a perfection as may be to God's honour, your own salvation, and the strengthening of the weak members of Christ. For though the world rage, and blaspheme the elect of God, you know that he did so unto Christ, his apostles, and to all that were in the primitive church, and shall be unto the world's end. Therefore believe in the light while you have it, lest it be taken away from you; if you shall seem to neglect the great mercy of God that hath been opened unto you, and your hearts presented unto it, that it is the very and only truth pronounced of God's only Son Jesus Christ, by the good will of our heavenly Father. Therefore I say in the bowels of my Lord Jesus Christ, stick fast unto it; let it never depart out of our hearts and conversation, that you with us and we with you at the great day, being one flock, as we have one shepherd, may rise to the life immortal, through Jesus Christ our only Saviour. Amen.

Your's in him that liveth for ever,
THOMAS HAUKES.

LETTER II.

From Mr. HAUKES to his WIFE.

GRACE be with you, and peace from God the Father, and from our Lord Jesus Christ, which gave himself for our sins, to deliver us from this present evil world, through the good will of God our Father, to whom be praise for ever and ever, Amen.

My dear yoke-fellow in the Lord, forasmuch as the Lord hath not only called me to work in his vineyard, but hath also fulfilled his good work in me, (I trust to his glory, and to the comfort of all those that look for his coming) I thought it my duty, dear yoke-fellow, to write unto you some lessons out of God's book: and if you will direct yourself thereafter, doubt not of it but God, who refuseth none that will come to him with their whole heart, will assist you with his Holy Spirit, and direct you in all his ways, to his honour and glory, who grant it for his mercy's sake. Amen.

First, I exhort you to fear God, to serve and honour his holy name, to love him with all your heart, soul, and mind, to believe faithfully all his promises, to lay sure hold upon them, that in all your troubles, whatsoever they are, you may run strait to the great mercy of God, and he will bring you out of them. Keep you within his wings; then shall you be sure that neither the devil, flesh, nor hell shall be able to hurt you.

But take heed; if you will not keep his holy precepts and laws, and to the uttermost of your power call for the help of God to walk in the same, but will leave them, and run to all abominations with the wicked world, and do as they do; then be sure to have your part with the wicked world in the burning lake that never shall be quenched. Therefore beware of idolatry, which doth most of all stink before the face of Almighty God, and was by all good men most detested from the beginning of the world. For which, what kingdoms, nations, and realms God had punished with most terrible plagues, with fire, brimstone, hunger, sword and pestilence, &c. to the utter subversion of them, is manifestly to be seen through the whole Bible. Yea, his own peculiar people, whom he had done so much for, when they fell from him, and went and served other gods, contrary to his commandment, he utterly destroyed and rooted them out from off the earth: and as many as died in that damnable state, not repenting their abominable evil, he threw them into the pit of hell. Again, how he hath preserved those that abhor superstition and idolatry, and that have only taken hold upon them with their whole heart, to serve him, to love him, and to fear him, &c. is most manifestly to be seen even from the beginning, out of what great dangers he hath always delivered them: yea when all hope of deliverance was past, as touching their expectation, even then in the sight of all his enemies would he work his godly will and purpose, to the utter destruction of all those that were his manifest enemies.

Further, I exhort you in the bowels of Christ that you will exercise and be steadfast in prayer; for prayer is the only means to pierce the heavens, to obtain at the hand of God whatsoever we desire, so that it be asked in faith. Oh what notable things do we read in the scriptures that have been obtained through fervent prayer! We are commanded to call upon him for help, aid, and succour in necessities and troubles; and he hath promised to help us. Again, they that will not call upon him with their whole heart, but upon other dead creatures, in whom there is no help, (for there was none found worthy to open the book, but only the Lamb Christ which was killed for our sins) I say, they that will refuse his help, must even by the terrible judgments of God come utterly to confusion: as it hath, and is daily manifest to be seen. And whatsoever you desire of God in your prayer, ask it for Jesus Christ's sake, for whom and in whom, God hath promised to give us all things necessary. And though that which we ask come not at the first and second calling, yet continue still knocking, and he will at length open his treasures of mercy, so that you will be sure to obtain; for he hath so promised, if you continue in faith, hoping surely in him. These former lessons, with all such instructions as I have told you by mouth, I do wish that you would most earnestly learn; and then I doubt not, but God, who is the giver of all grace, will assist you in all your doings, that you may be found worthy of his kingdom, which is prepared through Christ.

Further, whereas it pleased God to send us children; my desire is that they may be brought up in the fear of God, and in his laws. And this is to certify you, that you deliver in any wise my eldest son unto Mr. Throgmorton, who upon his good will hath promised me to bring him up according to my desire; and I trust as God hath put into his heart. See therefore that you deliver him in any wise without delay: and as for the other, if you shall seem to be burdened with him, which I think nature will not suffer) my desire is, that it be brought up in the fear of God to the uttermost of your endeavour, with some honest man that hath the fear of God before his eyes; and let us give thanks unto God which hath given them unto us, beseeching him that they may be of that flock that shall stand on the right hand of the majesty of God, when he shall judge the world, Amen.

Yet once again I warn you, that you continue in fervent prayer, as I said before; then shall you be sure, that God even of his own mercy, according as he hath promised, will be an husband unto you, and provide better for you than ever I was able to do; yea, he will cause all men that fear him to pity you, to help you, to succour you in all your necessities, so that if any do you wrong, he will be avenged on him. Moreover, I wish you to keep company with those of whom you may learn to come to a more perfect knowledge of God, and I doubt not but God will provide that such will be glad to receive you, if you shall profess and go forward in his truth.

Finally, and to make an end, I desire you that you take heed with whom you couple yourself. See that he be a man that feareth God, loveth his laws, and will walk in the same to the uttermost of his power; such a one as can be content to love you, and to care for you. Take heed he be no brawler, no drunkard, no wicked person, not given to filthiness, no worldling, no dicer, nor carder: in fine, no filthy person; but chuse such a one as God may be glorified in both your lives. And again on your part, love him, serve him, obey him in all godliness, as long as God shall give you life in this world. Then shall you both be sure to obtain that kingdom which God the Father hath prepared, and Jesus Christ obtained for you, that never shall have an end, where I trust to abide your coming. Amen.

By your husband,

THOMAS HAUKEs.

LETTER III.

From Mr. THOMAS HAUKEs, to Mr. CLEMENT THROGMORTON.

GRACE, mercy, and peace from God the Father, and from our Lord Jesus Christ, be with you, and assist you in all your thoughts, words, and works, that he in all things, as most worthy, may be glorified, and that the blessing of Abraham may be poured plentifully on you and all your posterity.

Whereas the love of God hath moved you to require my son to be brought up before your eyes, and the self same love hath also moved me in like case to leave him in your hands, as unto a father in my absence, I shall require you in God's behalf according to your promises, that you will see him brought up in the fear of the Lord, and instructed in the knowledge of his holy word, that he may thereby learn to leave the evil, and to know the good, and always to be pricked forward with fatherly instructions to follow my footsteps, that as Almighty God hath made me worthy, through his special grace, to work his will in obedience, he may learn to follow me his father in the like, to God's honour and praise: and this I require you in God's behalf to fulfil, or cause to be fulfilled, as you before the living God must make answer for the same. I have left for the child certain books which shall be delivered unto you, wherein his instruction and salvation lieth, if he learn and practise the same. And thus most humbly beseeching you once again, to be as good unto him, as your promise was unto me, that is, to be a father, and a wall of defence unto him in all troubles, I leave him in your hand through the Lord Jesus, and desire him to bless both him and you according to his good promise: and all that good which you shall do unto him, I shall most heartily desire the everlasting God to recompense unto you in his kingdom, where I hope to meet both him and you among all God's elect. To which God be all praise, honour, and glory, Amen.

Your's, and all men's in Christ Jesus,
THOMAS HAUKEs.

The History of Mr. THOMAS WATs.

THOMAS WATs, of Billerica within the county of Essex, of the diocese of London, was by his occupation a linen-draper; who, before he was apprehended, had sold and made away his cloth in his shop, his things being set in order for his wife and children, and gave away much of his cloth unto the poor. For he daily expected to be taken by God's adversaries and his, as shortly after came to pass; so that upon the 26th day of April, he was apprehended and brought before the lord Rich, and other commissioners at Chelmsford, and there being accused for not coming to the church, was upon the same examined before the lord Rich, Henry Tyrel, sir Anthony Brown, Edmund Tyrel, Thomas Mildman, John Wiseman, Roger Appleton, Richard Weston, justice Gaudy, &c. The sum and principal effect of which examination hereunder followeth, briefly expressed.

When Thomas Wats came before the lord Rich and the justices, whose names are specified in the following letter, (which they sent unto the bishop of London against him) at the sessions at Chelmsford, the lord Rich spoke to him as follows:

Wats, you be brought hither, as I understand, because of disobedience to the king and queen's laws. You will not come to the church; you will not be at mass, &c. but have your conventicles a sort of your corners, contrary to the king's and queen's proceedings. To which Mr. Wats answered and said:

My lord, if I have offended a law, I am subject to the law. Then Anthony Brown, justice, said unto him; Wats, I pray thee, tell me who hath been your schoolmaster to teach thee this religion, or where dost thou first learn it? Forsooth, said Wats, even of your fir, you taught it me, and none more than you. For during king Edward's days in open sessions you spake against this religion now used, no preacher more. You said the mass was abominable, and all their trumpets besides, wishing and earnestly exhorting that none should believe therein, and that our belief should be only in Christ: and you said then, whosoever should bring any strange nation to rule here, it were treason, and to be suffered. Then Mr. Brown said to my lord Rich: He belies me, my lord. What a knave is this! He will soon bely me behind my back, when he doth before my face. And my lord Rich said again, I do say he doth so.

After these words, Mr. Wats took occasion to speak somewhat of king Philip and of his coming in, but what it was I could not justly learn. But this more was heard, that after those words spoken, the bench among themselves stood up, and said one to another: Treason; except one good man called justice Gaudy who a little before was about to speak; but when he heard them cry Treason, he held down his head, and one grieved and troubled at their doings.

In conclusion, the commissioners being weary of him, or else not willing to meddle further in such matters, sent him up to the bishop of London, together with a letter, declaring the cause of his being sent up, as the contents thereof may be seen.

A LETTER,

Sent by certain Justices in ESSEX, to BONNE BISHOP of LONDON.

AFTER our most hearty commendations to your good lordship, these shall be to advertise you, that at our sessions of oyer and terminer held at Chelmsford, the 26th day of April last past, there came before us in open court, Thomas Wats of Billerica within your diocese, by ordinance procees, and then and there being examined why he refused to come to his parish church, and there to receive the sacrament at the altar, and hear divine service, according to the institution of the holy church, he openly there answered generally: That as the service of the church set out in the days of the late king Edward VI. was said by us now to be abominable, heretical, schismatical, and naught; so he said, that all that is now used and done in the church, is abominable, heretical, schismatical, and wicked; with divers other erroneous and arrogant words: and therefore we have thought proper to send him to your lordship, to be further examined by you of his particular opinions, as to your pastoral office shall seem convenient; certifying you further, that in our opinion he is one of the most arrogant heretics, that hath been heard speak, or ever came before you, and not meet to be kept here in any jail, as well for fear of corrupting others, as divers and sundry other special causes hereafter to be more declared. Thus leaving to your good lordship, we commit you to the Holy Ghost.

Given at Chelmsford, April 27, 1555.

Your good lordship's most assured,

R. RICH THOMAS MILDMAN
HENRY TYREL JOHN WISEMAN
ANTHONY BROWN ROGER APPLETON
EDMUND TYREL RICHARD WESTON.

Now when the bishop had received him, how he used him it is easy (by his common practice with others) to judge. What his private conferences were, I know not; but what was publicly done in the consistory at Paul's, (the common stage for these tragedies) you shall here see.

FIRST APPEARANCE of Mr. THOMAS WATS, in the BISHOP'S CONSISTORY.

FIRST upon Thursday, the 2d of May, Mr. Thomas Wats was brought before the bishop of London, and there being examined upon his words said before lord Rich, and others, as contained in their letters, he did earnestly affirm the same to be true. Whereupon the bishop objected, and examined him upon these articles following, to which he answered as hereafter shall appear.

ARTICLES objected against Mr. THOMAS WATS, of BILLERICA, in the County of ESSEX, within the Diocese of LONDON, by BISHOP BONNER.

THAT the said Thomas Wats is of Billerica, and so of the jurisdiction of the bishop of London.

2. Item, That he believeth not in the sacraments of the holy and catholic church, as the catholic church of Rome, and all other churches, members of the same, have hitherto have believed, and is taught by all good and faithful people: nor hath allowed the sacraments, rites, usages, or ceremonies of the said church, but hath despised the same.

3. Item, That he believeth, and also hath taught others, that the substance of material bread and wine do remain in the sacrament of the altar after the consecration, and that the said material bread and wine are the signs and tokens of Christ's body hanged upon the cross, and of his blood there shed; and that in the said sacrament there is only a memory or remembrance of Christ's body and blood, and nothing else.

4. Item, That he believeth, and doth precisely affirm, that the very true presence of Christ's body and blood in substance, is not in the sacrament of the altar, but only in heaven, and no where else.

5. Item, That he believeth, affirmeth, and faith, the mass now used in the church of Rome, here in England, and other places, is full of idolatry, abomination, and wickedness, and that Christ did never institute it, nor ordain it, nor yet allow it, as a good and laudable thing to be used in his church.

6. Item, That he believeth, and affirmeth, that auricular confession to be made unto the priest is not necessary, but superfluous: and that it is enough for a man to believe only, and to confess himself unto God, without any priest or minister at any time, though he may have the priest to confess him unto.

7. Item, That he believeth that Luther, Wickliffe, Barnes, and all others that have held against the sacrament of the altar, and suffered death by fire or otherwise for the maintenance of the said opinion, were good men, and faithful servants and martyrs of Christ in so living and dying.

8. Item, That he hath and doth believe, that no fast, prayer, or to do alms-deeds, is a thing utterly unprofitable; for if a man shall be saved, he shall be saved without doing of them; and if he shall be damned, they shall not help him, or do him any good at all.

9. Item, That the said Wats of late coming into open court at the sessions before the lord Rich, sir Henry Tyndal, knight, Anthony Brown, esquire, and others, and being then and there examined, did openly confess, that he had refused to come to the church, and to hear there the divine service, and to receive the sacrament of the altar, according to the order of the church: because that he thought the service of the church set out in the days of the late king Edward VI. was said and alledged to be abominable, heretical, schismatical, and altogether naught; and that the said Thomas Wats, then and there said openly before the said commissioners, that all that is now used and done in the church, is abominable, heretical, schismatical, and altogether naught: and that he did also utter, before the said commissioners, other erroneous and arrogant words, to the hurt of his soul, and the evil example of the people there present.

10. Item, That he the said Thomas, by reason of the premises, was, and is to be taken, had, reputed, and judged as an heretic, and for the same, by order of ecclesiastical laws, is to be declared accursed; and No. 16.

being obstinate and incorrigible, is to be delivered to the secular power, to be punished as an heretic.

11. Item, That he, over and above all these offences and trespasses aforesaid, had also added this trespass, namely, That he had believed and deliberately said, that the church of Rome, in her rites, ceremonies, sacraments, institutions, and traditions, is the synagogue of Satan; and therefore that he had assented and agreed in opinion with one John Tooly, of late hanged at Charing-cross, who at the time of his execution desired the people to pray to be delivered from the tyranny of the bishop of Rome, with all his enormities; as much as to say, that his authority and doings were tyranny, and had all enormities and iniquities in them.

12. Item, That the premises and every part thereof be true, notorious, manifest, and openly spoken and talked of amongst the honest and credible persons in great multitude; and that of all and singular the same within Billerica aforesaid, and other places thereabout, being of the diocese of London, there is a common voice and fame thereof.

The ANSWER of Mr. THOMAS WATS to the aforesaid ARTICLES.

TO the first he said and confessed the same to be true in every part thereof.

To the second article he answered, that he believeth in all the sacraments according to Christ's institution, and the catholic church; but not according to the bishop of Rome's church: and further said, that he doth not believe now as he had done in times past; for in times past he believed as the church then believed, but now he doth not so believe; for the church of Rome had deceived us, and therefore he said he did not believe as the church of Rome believeth, but as Christ hath taught him; and further said, that he was so taught to believe by the preaching of Mr. Alvey, and others whose names he remembereth not, who did preach the word of God truly and sincerely.

To the third he answered, that he hath and doth believe, that Christ's body is in heaven, and no where else: and further, that he never will believe that Christ's body is in the sacrament.

To the fourth he answered, confessing and firmly believing the same to be true.

To the fifth, That he did believe that the mass is abominable, and that he will not go one jot from that his belief.

To the sixth, That he neither did, nor yet doth believe, that the priest can absolve him from his sins: howbeit, he denieth not that it is good to ask counsel at the priest's mouth.

To the seventh he said, That he knew not what the opinions of the said persons named in the said article were; and in case the said persons did believe, that the body and blood of Christ were really and in very deed in the sacrament of the altar, then that they were not good men. But in case they did believe that the body and blood of Christ was not in the sacrament of the altar really and truly, then he believed that they were good men.

To the eighth he said, That he had not spoken as is contained in this article; but he hath and doth believe, that fasting, prayers, and alms-deeds be works of a lively faith.

To the ninth he confessed, That he did utter and speak, as in this article is contained, and further he desired God that he might die in that faith and belief wherein he now is.

To the tenth he answered and said, That he will submit himself herein to the order of the law: and further said, that he trusteth that with God he shall be blessed, although with men he be accursed.

To the eleventh he said, he believed that the bishop of Rome is a mortal enemy to Christ and his church. And as for Tooly he said, he did never see or know him: but in case the said Tooly did wish and pray as is contained in the article, then he did likewise wish and consent with him therein.

To the twelfth he answered, That all which before he confessed to be true, is also true; and all that he hath denied to be true, he denieth again to be true, and believeth the same to be according to such things as he hath confessed.

By me THOMAS WATS.

These articles thus propounded and answered, the bishop commanded him to appear again in the same place at three o'clock in the afternoon, upon the same day. At which our being brought thither by his keeper, the bishop began with him in this wise:

Wats, you know what I said unto you to-day, and what I appointed unto you at this time. The time is now come; weigh and consider with yourself, that you are but a man, and albeit that you will wilfully cast away your body, yet cast not away your soul, but while you have time return and confess the truth.

Whereunto Thomas Wats answered and said, I am weary to live in such idolatry as you would have me to live in. Upon which answer the bishop caused his articles again to be read. He thereto answered as before, and farther, subscribed the same with his own hand.

The bishop, after many persuasions to cause him to recant, ordered him to depart, and to come again on Saturday at eight o'clock in the morning. Where the bishop being absent, Dr. Nicholas Harpsfield, as then being his deputy, did sit, and earnestly exhorted him to deny his opinions. To whom in the end he answered thus:

Well, you have a law to condemn me, and I submit myself to the laws of the church (as you call it): and farther I do affirm, and still stand to the answers I have made.

Whereupon Dr. Harpsfield ordered him to appear there again upon Friday, being the 10th day of the same month of May. Upon which day the bishop privately sent for the said Thomas Wats into his chamber, and there with many fair promises tempted and tried him, whether he would revoke his errors, as he then termed them. But Wats answered him in this sort; I will not believe your church, neither the Romish church, and therefore you do but labour in vain thus to travail with me. He was hereupon again dismissed for that time until Friday the 17th of May, and then commanded to appear in the consistory; which command he obeyed, and having the accustomed former articles ministered unto him, made them such answers as before.

Being thus to and fro from day to day, and hour to hour, he was at the last, the 18th of May, brought into the consistory, where first was made a brief recital of all the former process: and there the said Wats being (by the bishop and others) desired to deny his profession, made this final answer; God keep me from the doctrine that you would have me come unto, which you have now declared. And I beseech God that I may persevere in that, that I have done; for I will stand to mine answers.

The bishop perceiving his fair flattering promises prevailed not, (and having no great store of other reasons to persuade with) put forth his last and strongest argument of condemnation. Which being ended, he was delivered to the sheriffs of London, and by them was sent to Newgate, where he remained until the 9th of June, or (as some assert) to the 22d of May: at which time he was carried to Chelmsford, and there was brought to Mr. Scot's house, keeping then an inn in Chelmsford, where, as they were eating with Mr. Haukes and the rest that came down to their burning, they prayed together both before and after their meat.

Then Mr. Wats went and prayed privately by himself, and afterwards came to his wife and his six children being there, and said these words in effect: Wife, and my good children, I must now depart from you. Therefore henceforth know I you no more, but as the Lord hath given you unto me, so I give you again unto the Lord, whom I charge you ever to obey, and fear: and beware you turn not to this abominable popery, against which I shall anon, by God's grace, give my blood. Let not the murdering of God's people cause you to relent, but take occasion thereby to be the stronger in the Lord's quarrel, and I doubt not but he will be a merciful Father unto you. All these and such like words he spake he unto them, and they unto him: of whom two as it is said, offered to be burnt with him. In the end he bade them farewell, and kissed them all, and was carried to the fire.

At the stake, after he had kissed it, he spake to the lord Rich these or the like words: My lord, said he, beware, beware, for you do against your own conscience herein, and without you repent, the Lord will avenge it: for you are the cause of this my death. Thus did this good martyr offer his body to the fire, in defence of the true gospel of Jesus Christ.

We will now return to the proceedings of the court in the case of queen Mary's supposed child, where we have already treated in a former part of this work.

Long persuasion had been in England with great expectation, for the space of half a year or more, that the queen was conceived with child. This report was made by the queen's physicians, and others about the court, so that several were punished for saying the contrary. And a command was given, that in all churches supplication and prayer should be made for the queen's good delivery: the certificate whereof you may read before in the letter of the council sent to bishop Burnet. And also the same moreover may appear by provisions made before by act of parliament for the child.

And now forasmuch as in the beginning of this month of June, about Whitsuntide, the time was thought to be nigh that this young master should come into the world, and that midwives, rockers, nurses, with cradle and all, were prepared and in readiness; suddenly, upon what cause or occasion is unknown, a certain vain rumour was spread about in London of the delivery of the queen, and the birth of the child. Infomuch that the bells were rung, bonfires and processions made, not only in the city of London, and most other parts of the realm, but also in the town of Antwerp, guns were shot off upon the river by the English ships, and the mariners thereof rewarded with hundred pistolets or Italian crowns by the lady regent who was the queen of Hungary. Such great rejoicing and triumph was made for the queen's delivery, that there was a prince born. Yea, divers preached particularly the parson of St. Ann within Aldersgate after procession and Te Deum sung, took upon him to describe the proportion of the child, how fair, beautiful, and great a prince he was, as the like had been seen.

In the midst of this great ado, there was a simple man, dwelling within four miles of Berwick, that had been half way to London, who said concerning bonfires made for queen Mary's child, "Here is a joy triumph, but at length all will not prove worth a penny of pottage," as indeed it came to pass: for in the end all proved clean contrary, and the joy and expectation of men were much deceived. For the people were satisfied, that the queen neither was as then delivered, nor after was in hope to have any child.

At this time many talked diversly. Some said the rumour of the queen's conception was spread for a policy; others affirmed, that she was deceived by a tyrant or some other like disease, to think herself with child, and was not; some thought she was with child, that it did by some chance miscarry, or else that she was bewitched; but what was the truth thereof the Lord knoweth, to whom nothing is secret. One of mine own hearing and seeing, I cannot pass unwitnessed.

There came to me, (says Mr. Fox) whom I did hear and see, one Isabel Malt, a woman dwelling in Horn-alley, Aldersgate-street, who before witnessed this declaration unto us, That she being delivered of a man-child upon Whitsunday in the morning, which was the 11th day of June, 1555, there came to her the lord North, and another lord to her unknown, dwelling about Old Fish-street, demanding of her if she would part with her child, and would swear that she never nor had any such child. Which, if she would, her son, they said, should be well provided for, she should take no care for it, with many fair offers if she would part with the child.

After that came some women also, of whom one they said should have been the rocker; but she in no wise would let go her son, who at the writing hereof being alive, and called Timothy Malt, was of the age of 13 years, and upwards.

Thus much, I say, I heard of the woman herself. What credit is to be given to her relation, I deal not withal, but leave to the liberty of the reader, to believe it they that list; to them that list not, I have no further warrant to assure them.

Among many other great preparations made for the queen's deliverance of child, there was a cradle very sumptuously and gorgeously trimmed, upon which cradle for the child appointed, these verses were written, both in Latin and English.

Quam Maria sobolem, Deus optime, summe dedisti, Anglis incolumem redde, tuere, Rege.

The child which thou to Mary, O Lord of might, dost fend,

To England's joy, in health preserve, keep and defend."

About this time there came over into England a certain English book, giving warning to Englishmen of Spaniards, and disclosing some secret practices for the recovery of abbey-lands, which book was called "A Warning for England." In consequence of which, on the 13th of this month, the following proclamation was issued.

PROCLAMATION issued by the KING and QUEEN for the restraining of all BOOKS and WRITINGS, tending against the Doctrine of the POPE and his CHURCH.

Whereas by the statute made in the second year of king Henry IV. concerning the repressing of heresy, there is ordained and provided a great punishment, not only for the authors, makers, and writers of books containing wicked doctrine, and erroneous and heretical opinions, contrary to the catholic faith and determination of the holy church, and likewise for their favourers and supporters; but also for such as shall have or keep any such books or writings, and not make delivery of them to the ordinary of the diocese or his ministers, within a certain time limited in the said statute, which act or statute being by authority of parliament of late revived, was also openly proclaimed, to the intent the subjects of the realm upon such proclamation should the rather eschew the danger and penalty of the said statute; and as yet nevertheless in most parts of the realm the same is neglected, and little regarded; the king and queen our sovereign lord and lady, therefore, &c. straitly charge and command, that no person or persons, of what estate, degree, or condition soever he or they be, from henceforth presume to bring or convey, or cause to be brought or conveyed into this realm, any books, writings, or works hereafter mentioned; that is to say, any book or books, writings or works made or set forth, by, or in the name of Martin Luther, or any book or books, writings or works made and set forth, by, or in the name of Oecolampadius, Zuinglius, John Calvin, Pomerane, John Alasco, Bullinger, Bucer, Melancthon, Bernardino, Ochinus, Erasmus, Sarcerius, Peter Martyr, Hugh Latimer, Robert Barnes, otherwise called Friar Barnes, John Bale, otherwise called Friar Bale, Justus Jonas, John Hooper, Miles Coverdale, William Tindal, Thomas Cranmer, late archbishop of Canterbury, William Turner, Theodore Basil, otherwise called Thomas Beacon, John Frith, Roy, and the book commonly called Hall's Chronicle, or any of them in the Latin tongue, Dutch tongue, English tongue, Italian tongue, or French tongue, or any other like book, paper, writing, or work, made, printed, or set forth, by any other person or persons, containing false doctrine contrary and against the catholic faith, and the doctrine of the catholic church. And also that no person or persons presume to write, print, utter, sell, read, or keep any, or cause to be written, printed, uttered, or kept any of the said books, papers, works, or writings, or any book or books written or printed in the Latin or English tongue, concerning the common service and administration set forth in English to be used in the churches of this realm, in the time of king Edward VI. commonly called the communion book, or book of common service and ordering of ministers, otherwise called, The book set forth by the authority of parliament, for common prayer and administration of the sacraments, or to be used in the mother tongue within the church of England, but shall within the space of fifteen days next after the publication of this proclamation, bring or deliver, or cause the said books, writings, and works, and every of them remaining in their custody and keeping, to be brought and delivered to the ordinary of the diocese, where such books, works, or writings be or remain, or to his chancellor or commissaries, without fraud, colour or deceit, at the said ordinaries will and disposition to be burnt, or otherwise to be used or ordered by the said ordinaries, as by the canons or spiritual laws it is in that case limited and appointed, upon pain that every offender contrary to this proclamation, shall incur the danger and penalties contained in the said statute, and as they will avoid their majesties high indignation and displeasure, and further answer to their uttermost perils.

And their majesties by this proclamation give full power and authority to all bishops and ordinaries, and all justices of the peace, mayors, sheriffs, bailiffs of cities and towns corporate, and other head officers within this realm and the dominions thereof, and expressly commandeth and willeth the same and every of them, that they and every of them, within their several limits and jurisdictions, shall in the default and negligence of the said subjects, after the said fifteen days expired, inquire and search out the said books, writings, and works; and for this purpose enter into the house or houses, closet and secret places of every person, of whatsoever degree, being negligent in this behalf, and suspected to keep any such book, writings, or works, contrary to this proclamation: and that the said justices, mayors, sheriffs, bailiffs, and other head officers above specified, and every of them within their said limits and jurisdictions finding any of the said subjects negligent and faulty in this behalf, shall commit every such offender to ward, there to remain without bail or main-prize, till the same offender or offenders have received such punishment as the said statute doth limit and appoint in this behalf. Given under our signs manual, at our manor of Hampton-court, the 13th day of June, the first and second years of our reign.

ARTICLES to be inquired upon by the Wardens of every Company, touching seditious Books, especially concerning the Book called, A WARNING for ENGLAND.

1. Whether they have seen any of the aforesaid books.
2. Whether they have heard of any of the said books.
3. Where they were, and in what place they have seen them.
4. Whom they know to have lately come from beyond the sea, especially from Zurich, Strasburgh, Frankfort, Wesel, Embden, and Doesburg.
5. Whom they know or vehemently suspect to be common carriers of letters, or money thither from hence.
6. That they bring to my lord mayor all such seditious books as they have, or shall have found hereafter.

In this proclamation the reader will easily discover the profound and learned censure of the Roman catholic church, what books they dislike and reject as heretical, schismatical, and pernicious. On which catholic censure of the learned fathers, we have not leisure at present to enlarge; neither is it necessary in this place to enter into a particular defence of the authors here condemned. Suffice it therefore to take a general view of the ridiculous (not to say blasphemous) matter contained in some of the popish books; which by being contrasted with the doctrines of the opposite side, may give an opportunity of judging the better, which is most agreeable to God's holy word and truth, and of discerning between the true catholic church and the mother of abominations.

And first to begin with the primmer in English, for children, printed with a privilege according to the king and queen's majesty's letters patent, in the reign of queen Mary. Let us repeat and survey some part of the said primmer, (for to express all, would be too tedious) beginning with the first lesson of our lady, in these words:

"Holy Mary, mother of virgins all;
Mother and daughter of the king celestial,
So comfort us in our desolation,
That by thy prayer and special mediation,
We may enjoy the reward of thy heavenly reign."

Compare this with the scriptures, good reader, and judge uprightly whether this doctrine be tolerable in the church or not.

It followeth, in the second Lesson.

"Holy Mary, of all godly the godliest,
Pray for us, of all holy the holiest;

That

That he our prayers may accept in good wife,
Which of thee was born, and reigneth above the skies," &c.

In the third Lesson.

"Thy Son beseech with humble intercession,
To purge us clean of our transgression;
That so being redeemed we may the place ascend,
Where thou dwellest with him world without end."

The Versicle.

"Pray for the people, intreat for the clergy, make intercession for the devout woman-kind; let all feel thy help, that worthily solemnize thy memorial," &c.

Another Versicle.

"Holy mother of God, make thy petition, that we may deserve Christ's promise," &c.

And in the Anthem after Benedictus, thus it followeth:

"We beseech thee of thy pity to have us in remembrance and to make means for us unto Christ, that we being supported by thy help, may deserve to attain the kingdom of heaven."

Furthermore in the Collect after it followeth:

"And grant, that through the gracious intercession of the virgin thy mother, we may be delivered from this present heaviness, and have the fruition of eternal gladness."

It followeth moreover in the said Primer thus, concerning the material cross.

"O God, which hast ascended thy most holy cross, and hast given light to the darkness of the world, vouchsafe by the virtue of thy cross to illuminate, visit, and comfort both our hearts and bodies," &c.

Moreover, in the name of St. John the Baptist, thus it prayeth:

"O Lord, defend us always through the continual succours of St. John the Baptist. For the more frail we be, the more need we have to be delivered with necessary prayers," &c.

In which words note (good reader) not only the absurdity of doctrine, but also the foolishness of the reason. For where the doctrine pretendeth that St. John the Baptist should pray for us, here we pray to God for St. John the Baptist, that he will hear his prayer praying for us. It followeth furthermore in the name of Peter and Paul:

"Hear us mercifully, and grant that through the merits of them both, we may obtain the glory everlasting," &c.

Of St. Andrew.

"So let him, O Lord, be a continual petitioner for us," &c.

Of St. Laurence, thus.

"St. Laurence the deacon did work a great work. For by the virtue of the holy cross, he gave sight to the blind," &c.

But how can this be true, when the holy cross was not yet found in the time of St. Laurence? For Helen which first found the cross, as they say, came after St. Laurence more than forty years.

To Thomas Becket, Archbishop of Canterbury.

"By the blood of Thomas, which he for thee did spend, Make us, Christ, to climb, where Thomas did ascend."

Of St. Nicholas.

"O God, which hast glorified blessed St. Nicholas, thy holy bishop, with innumerable miracles, grant, we beseech thee, that by his merits and prayers we may be delivered from the fire of hell."

Of Mary Magdalen.

"Grant, we beseech thee, thy mercy, to let her purchase for us the bliss everlasting," &c.

Another Prayer to our Lady.

"The dolorous passion of God's sweet mother, Bring us to the bliss of Almighty God the Father," &c.

Another Prayer in the said Primer to our Lady.

"Establish us in peace and tranquillity,
And change the name of sinful Eve:
Loose thy prisoners from captivity,
Unto the blind give sight again.
Deliver us from malignity,
To the end we may some grace obtain.
Shew thyself to be a mother,
So that he accept our petition.
Deliver us from bondage of sin," &c.

Item.

"Holy mother, succour the miserable, comfort the weeper, give courage to the desperate, pray for the people, make intercession for the clergy, and be a mean for the devout woman-kind," &c.

Another blasphemous Prayer.

"O thou meek mother, have mercy therefore On wretches for whom thou hadst these pains all, Seeing thy Son that vine-cluster pressed fore, And from the pestilence of death eternal Keep us, by voiding the fiend infernal, And join us with them which rewarded be With eternal life, seeing the Deity."

Another Blasphemy in the said Primer.

"Hail queen, mother of mercy, our life, our sweetness, our hope. Unto thee do we cry and sigh, weeping and wailing. Come off therefore our patroness; call upon us thy pitiful ears and after this our banishment shew to us the blessed fruit of thy womb. O gate of glory, be for us a reconciliation unto the Father and the Son. From the wretched their faults expect to wipe the spot of sins unclean," &c.

Item, to our Lady.

"The fruit of thy womb everlasting,
We may behold through thy deserving," &c.

Item.

"Grant, we beseech thee, that by her merits and prayers we may attain to that unspeakable joy, where she be ascended doth now rejoice with thee in heaven for ever."

And thus much hitherto of this catholic Primer called our Lady's Mattins. Whereunto, if it were not tedious for the reader, we would also adjoin our Lady's Psalter, to the intent that all indifferent readers, as they have seen what books these catholic others have condemned and do condemn for heretical, they may also see and judge, what books on the other side they approve as lawful and catholic. And forasmuch as it is not known to all men what our Lady's Psalter is, or what it meaneth; yea, and forasmuch as peradventure will deny any such book as our Lady's Psalter to be written or approved, here first we will produce the name of the author, who was Bonaventure a seraphical doctor, bishop also and cardinal, canonized moreover by pope Sixtus IV. in the year 1482, for his faint in the kalendar. In the second part of his whole works, (which were printed at Argentine, and 1495) to shew himself a devout servant of his lady, he hath taken every psalm of David's Psalter, (which is peculiarly made and referred to Almighty God) and hath in several of the said psalms, put out the name of the Lord, and hath substituted the name of our Lady. This being done through the whole Psalms and every one of them, it is now called our Lady's Psalter, used to be sung and said in the praise and service of our Lady. A brief specimen whereof, for the reader's sake, we thought proper here to exhibit unto the reader, as followeth.

The Title of the Psalter in English.

"Here beginneth the Psalter of the blessed virgin, made by the seraphical doctor St. Bonaventure, bishop of Alban, and cardinal of the holy church of Rome."

1. "BLESSED is the man which understandeth thy name. Thou shalt bring forth in him the most plentiful fruit of justice, being watered as it were with fountains of water. All women thou surpassest in beauty of thy body; all angels and archangels in the excellency of thy holiness. Thy mercy and thy grace is magnified every-where. Glory be to the Father, &c."

2. Why do our enemies fret and imagine vain things against us? Let thy right hand defend us, O mother of God, terrify, confounding and destroying them as a sword. Come unto us all ye that labour and are troubled, and she will give rest unto your souls. Come unto her in your temptations, and her low countenance shall establish and comfort you. Bless her with your heart, for the earth is full of her mercy. Glory be to the Father, &c."

3. Why are they so many, O lady, that trouble me with thy fury thou shalt persecute and destroy them. Loose me from the burden of our impiety, and take away the burden of our sins. Have mercy upon me, O lady, and heal my infirmity. Take away sorrow, and the anguish of my heart. Deliver me not into the hands of mine enemies, and in the day of my death comfort

oul. Bring me unto the haven of salvation, and restore my spirit unto my maker and creator. Glory be to the Father," &c.
 4. "When I called to thee, thou heardest, O my lady, and out of thy high throne thou didst vouchsafe to think upon me. From the roaring of them that prepare themselves to devour me, and out of the hands of such as seek after my life, thy grace shall deliver me: because thy mercy and thy pity are great towards all them that call upon thy holy name. Blessed be thou, O lady, for ever, and thy majesty for ever and ever. Glorify all nations of the earth," &c.

5. "Hear my words, O lady, &c. turn our mourning into gladness, and our trouble into rejoicing. Let our enemies fall before our feet, and with thy power dash their heads in pieces."

6. "O lady, suffer me not to be rebuked in God's anger, nor to be chastened in his heavy displeasure, &c. From the late and deep pit of hell, with thy holy prayers deliver us. Let the everlasting gates be opened, that we may shew forth thy marvellous works for ever. Because the dead, nor they that be in hell, shall not praise thee, O lady, but they which obtain by thy grace life everlasting."

7. "O my lady, in thee will I put my trust; deliver me from mine enemies, O my lady. Stop the mouth of the lion, and bind the lips of the persecutors. Make no tarrying for thy name's sake, to shew thy mercy upon me. Let the brightness of thy countenance shine upon us, that our conscience may be saved before the most high. If the enemy do persecute my soul, O lady, help me that he destroy me not."

9. "I will give thanks to thee, O lady, with my whole heart, and will shew forth among the nations thy praise and glory, &c. They shall find grace through thee, the finder out of grace and salvation: the humble and penitent groan for pardon and forgiveness; heal thou the sores of their heart," &c.

11. "In thee, O lady, do I put my trust, &c. Seek her even from your youth, and she shall glorify you, &c. In mercy take from us the multitude of our sins, and give unto us plenteousness of merits," &c.

12. "Save me, O mother of love, and fountain of mercy, &c. Thou thyself alone hast gone about the compass of the earth, to help them that call upon thee."

13. "How long dost thou forget me, O lady, and dost not deliver me in the day of my trouble? How long shall mine enemy triumph over me? With thy mighty power destroy him, &c. We magnify thee the finder and the author of grace, by whom the world is repaired," &c.

16. "Preserve me, O lady, for in thee have I put my trust, &c. Blessed be thy breasts, which with thy deifying milk did nourish the Saviour," &c.

18. "I will love thee, O lady of heaven and earth; I will call upon thy name among the nations. Confess yourselves unto her, ye that are troubled in heart, and she shall strengthen you against your enemies, &c. All ye cloisterers honour her, for she is your helper and special advocate. Be thou our refreshing and rest, for thou art the marvellous foundation of all religion."

20. "Hear us, O lady, in the day of trouble, &c. Cast us away in the time of our death, but succour our soul when it forsaketh the body. Send an angel to meet it, that it may be defended from the enemies, &c. In torments and pain let it feel thy comfort, and grant to it a place among the elect of God."

25. "To thee, O lady, do I lift up my soul, &c. Let not the snares of death prevail against me, &c. Be thou my guide to the heavenly rest, and to the company of angels associate me."

26. "Judge thou me, O lady, for I am fallen from my iniquity: but because I put my trust in thee, therefore I shall not fall," &c.

27. "O lady, let the brightness of thy face be my sight, and let the clearness of thy grace shine into my mind," &c.

28. "To thee, O lady, &c. Have mercy upon me in the day of my trouble, and in the light of thy truth deliver me," &c.

31. "In thee, O lady, do I put my trust, let me not be confounded for ever; in thy glory receive me. Thou art my strength and my refuge, my consolation and protection, &c. Deliver me from the snare that they have laid for me, because thou art my helper. Into thy hands I commend my spirit," &c.

34. "I will always praise our lady, &c. In perils, in adversity call upon her, and in time of need ye shall find succour. Let her conversation be an example unto you, and follow the virtue of her humility. Because therefore, O lady, thou art humble and lowly, thou didst compel the word increate to take flesh of thee."

39. "The wicked man said, &c. Let him depart from his evil purpose; O mother of God, turn the countenance of God towards us: compel him to be merciful unto sinners. Blessed be thy power and dominion in heaven, and blessed be thy magnificence upon the earth."

45. "My heart is inditing a good matter, O lady, &c. By thy holiness let my sins be purged, by thy integrity let me obtain incorruption," &c.

47. "Clap your hands all ye people, &c. For she is the door of life, the door of salvation, the reconciler of our life, the hope of the penitent, the comfort of the sorrowful, the blessed place of hearts and salvation. Have mercy upon me, No. 16.

O lady, have mercy upon me; for thou art the light and hope of all that put their trust in thee."

51. "Have mercy upon me, O lady, which art called the mother of mercy, and in the bowels of thy great compassion cleanse me from mine iniquities."

54. "O lady, in thy name save me, and from mine unrighteousness deliver me," &c.

70. "Make haste, O lady, to help me, &c. Have mercy on thy servants, by whom thy name is invocated," &c.

71. "In thee, lady, have I put my trust: let me not be confounded for ever, in thy mercy deliver me."

79. "O lady, the Gentiles are come into the inheritance of God, whom thou didst join unto Christ by thy merits," &c.

89. "Thou that rulest Israel, &c. The favour of life cometh from her, and all health floweth out of her heart," &c.

91. "Whoso dwelleth in the help of the mother of God, shall dwell in the shadow of her protection, &c. Cry unto her in your dangers, and the scourge shall not come near your tabernacle. The fruit of grace shall be to him whoso trusteth in her, and the gate of paradise shall be open unto him."

95. Come let us rejoice to our lady, &c. Receive our souls at our last end, and bring them into everlasting rest," &c.

105. "Praise our lady, and call upon her name, &c. Everlasting salvation is in thy hand, O lady," &c.

110. "The Lord said unto our lady, Sit here, my mother, on my right hand," &c.

114. "In the passing of my soul out of this world, come and meet it, O lady, and receive it, &c. Be to it a ladder to the kingdom of heaven, and a right way to the paradise of God," &c.

119. "The whole earth is full of thy mercies, and therefore I will search out the way of thy justifications, &c. I will cover for ever to praise thee, O lady, when thou shalt teach me thy justifications," &c.

125. "They that put their trust in thee, O mother of God, shall not be afraid of the face of their enemy," &c.

127. "Except our lady shall build the house of our heart, the building thereof shall not continue."

128. "Blessed is every one that feareth our lady, and blessed be all they which know to do her will," &c.

130. "Out of the deep I have called unto thee, O lady; O lady, hear my voice," &c.

132. "O lady, remember David, and all them that call upon thy name," &c.

134. "Behold and bless now our lady, all ye that put your trust in her holy name," &c.

136. "At the floods of Babylon, &c. There is no propitiation to be found without her," &c.

140. "Deliver me, O lady, from all evil, and from the infernal enemy defend me," &c.

145. "Our eyes look up and trust in thee. Do thou send us meat and food convenient, &c. My tongue shall speak thy praise, and shall bless thee for ever."

148. "Praise thou our lady, O Jerusalem, and glorify her also, O thou Sion; for she buildeth up thy walls, and blesteth thy children. Her grace maketh thee fat, and giveth peace unto thy coasts," &c.

I could recite other things of like blasphemy, following immediately after this psalter of our lady, in the seraphical doctor aforesaid, as these:

"Behold my lady my Saviour, I will be bold in thee, and will not fear, &c. Because thou art my strength, &c. And art become my salvation," &c.

"Rejoice, O all mankind, because the Lord thy God hath given unto thee such a mediatrix," &c.

"I will confess to thee, O lady, because thou hast hid these things from the wise, and hast revealed them to the little ones."

"O thou wicked and peevish generation, acknowledge our lady thy Saviour. Is not she the mother that hath possessed thee, and in faith hath begotten thee?"

"O thou blessed, in thy hands is laid up our salvation," &c.

"To thy name, let every knee bend, in heaven and earth, and in hell."

"Like as an infant cannot live without the nurse, so neither canst thou have salvation without our lady."

"Whoso will be saved, before all things he must needs hold this belief of our lady: which belief, unless every one shall hold perfect and sound, he shall perish without doubt for ever."

Moreover, after these so horrible things and intolerable to be heard, in the next place followeth the rosary or garland of our lady, compiled by the said Bonaventure; wherein these words are to be read as followeth:

"O mediatrix between God and man, the Lord hath worthily magnified thee, that thou only shouldst conceive his Son. Wherefore, O good Mary our mediatrix, mother of grace, and mother of mercy," &c.

And moreover, within few lines we find these following words:

Y y

"Therefore,

"Therefore, O our empress and lady most bountiful, by the authority of a mother command, command (I say) thy well beloved Son, that he will stir up our minds from the love of worldly things, to heavenly desires," &c.

Item, "O thou advocate of the miserable, the eyes of thy servant be directed to thee," &c.

To these premises, I might also join the following blasphemous words of the said Bonaventure in the said book.

"What greater goodness can be, than that Christ is content to be captive upon the altar?"

Whereupon he speaketh in the person of Jeremy, saying,

"Behold I am in your hands, do with me as you see good, &c. Where note, saith he, that when any duke or prince is taken prisoner for his subjects, he is not let go, before he pay some great sum of money for his ransom. Even so neither we ought to let Christ go out of our hands being our prisoner and captive, except he grant to us remission of our sins and his heavenly kingdom. The priest therefore listeth up the body of Christ upon the altar, as though he said thus, Behold him whom the whole world is not able to comprehend, he is holden here our captive, wherefore let us hold him fast, and not let him go before we obtain of him our requests," &c.

Is not here good catholic stuff, (christian reader) think you? Compare, I beseech you, this doctrine with the doctrine of the apostles, which teach us that we are fully complete in Christ, and I will refer me to no better judge than to your own conscience. And now therefore if any man have been in doubt in times past of the doctrine and proceeding of the church of Rome, whether it be rightly charged with blind errors, with blasphemy intolerable, and idolatry abominable or not, here now he may be fully certified and resolved. For where was ever idolatry or blasphemy to be found, if it be not here in this matins and psalter of our lady? If idolatry be to make an idol to be worshipped as God, which is no god, what do we here but make an idol of our lady, (as we call her) to be worshipped with no less dignity, glory, authority, reverence, and service, than is the Lord God himself? And as he is called our Lord, so she is called our Lady. And if he be king, yet she is the queen of heaven. And though he have the name of God, yet she beareth so the title of the mother of God: that as mothers have authority over their children, so she is willed to shew herself to be his mother, to cause him to grant our petitions. Finally, if he be our patron, yet she is our patroness. The commandment saith, "Thou shalt worship the Lord thy God, and him only shalt thou serve." And what worship or service can we give to God, more than we do ascribe unto her? and what benefit is to be asked at the hands of Christ our Saviour, which is not equally asked of her? to save our souls, to give us peace, to grant grace, to comfort the hopeless, to loose our captivity, to release our sins, to deliver from the fiend, to bring to heaven, &c. To her we pray, we cry, we weep, we sigh, we groan, we knock and kneel, to her we trust, and if we believe not also in our lady, we are no less than heretics.

Furthermore, as Christ our only Lord and Saviour hath his church and congregation which profess his name, of whom we are called christians; so neither is she likewise without her chapels, her cloisters, her chapters, fraternities, and brotherhoods, which professing her name in like sort, are called our lady's brethren, or white friars, besides an innumerable sort of other patrons of churches, of whom every one hath his peculiar church and religion by himself; yet all these together be included under the general devotion of our lady their supreme patroness and governess.

Now to proceed further to the other part of the commandment, which saith, "Him only shalt thou serve." What service hath the Lord in all the church, but our lady also jointly with him hath the like? her mass, her matins, her even-song, her hours and compline, her rosaries, her anthems, her collects, her primmer, her psalter, her holy-days likewise, yea five to one. Finally, as the Lord hath his prayer called the Lord's-prayer, so hath she her Ave Marys, yea ten Aves to one Pater-noster; yea, and read further in the said Bonaventure, and you shall see her also to have her Te Deum, her Benedictus, her Magnificat, and also her Quicumque vult.

If the Lord our God had not expressed unto us his own will by plain words, limiting unto us by express injunction what to believe, what to follow, and how to worship and serve him, and how to receive from him salvation; but had left us to the imagination of our own inventions, every man to shift for himself after his own policy, then peradventure this way taken by the pope's church, to make friends and mediators between God and us, for reconciliation, remission, and salvation, might have some shadow of reason; but now God's word doth bind us, doth prescribe and limit us precisely in every point touching salvation, what to believe, and what to do, shewing us plainly that we cannot be saved but by the blood of his Son only, neither can be justified but by faith only in the same Christ his Son. Wherefore none believe that which he hath promised, is infidelity, and to follow any other belief than he hath set us, is plain idolatry. Which two special errors most commonly do follow the doctrine of the Romish church, as not only in this primmer and psalter of our Lady afore said, but also in all their proceedings, teachings, and preachings besides may well appear. For where the scripture doth perfectly promise and pronounce us to be justified through our faith in Christ, and willeth us to seek our salvation no where else, but only in the merits of Jesus the institution of the church of Rome neither will receive what God hath freely given, (wherein standeth infidelity) neither yet will seek the same there where they should, but in the merits and prayers of our Lady, St. John Baptist, St. Peter and Paul, St. Andrew, St. Nicholas, St. Thomas of Canterbury, and by the worthiness of the material cross, and such other unlawful means, which is no less than plain idolatry. And in such books as these can be suffered among the catholics to be current, as good wholesome and lawful books whereas the others, which lead us the true way from infidelity and blind idolatry to true christianity, in no wise can be suffered. But of this to complain, is needless. Wherefore to pass from this proclamation, let us proceed (God willing) in the course of our history.

The History of THOMAS OSMOND, WILLIAM BAMFORD, and THOMAS OSBORNE, &c.

MENTION was made before in the story of Thomas Haukes, of six prisoners besides, which were sent down with him to Essex the same time as he went to execution. Of which six prisoners, three were sent to be burnt, the other three to recant, and to do penance: of whom it followeth next to treat. The names of the six were these, Thomas Osmond, fuller, William Bamford, alias Butler, weaver, Thomas Osborne, fuller, Nicholas Chamberlain, weaver, Thomas Brodehill, weaver, Richard Web, weaver, being all of the town of Coxhall. All which men, next after the examination of Thomas Haukes and Thomas Wats, were sent up to bishop Bonner to be examined, by the earl of Oxford and sir Philip Paris, knight, a letter also being sent with them, the copy whereof here followeth.

The EARL of OXFORD's Letter to Bishop BONNER

AFTER our hearty commendations unto your good lordship, this shall be to advertise the same, that the constable of Coxhall within your diocese, have brought before us this day six persons dwelling in the town of Coxhall afore said, whose names do follow, to wit, Nicholas Chamberlain, weaver, John Waller, fuller, Thomas Brodehill, weaver, Richard Web, weaver, William Bamford, alias Butler, weaver, and Thomas Osborne, fuller, for that they at the least of Easter now last have not obeyed the order of the holy catholic church in receiving of the sacraments, but obstinately refuse the same besides of holding divers other opinions contrary to the faith of the said church. Wherefore we have thought it good to send the same persons unto your good lordship further to be ordered as in such case shall appertain. Thus we commit your good lordship to the keeping of Almighty God. From Hedingham the first of May, 1555.

Your lordship's assuredly,
OXFORD,
PHILIP PARIS.

The said prisoners being sent up the first of May re brought before the said bishop the 17th of the said month, to be examined upon divers and sundry articles considered and objected against them; whereunto they were compelled to answer, and to put their hands to the same: the copy of which their articles and answers, being all in one form and effect, here followeth.

COPY of the ARTICLES objected against THOMAS OSMOND, WILLIAM BAMFORD, and NICHOLAS CHAMBERLAIN.

FIRST, That thou Thomas Osmond, fuller, wast and art of the parish of Coxhall, within the diocese of London, and thou hast not believed nor dost believe, that there is here in the earth one catholic and universal whole church, which doth hold and believe all the faith and religion of Christ, and all the necessary articles and sacraments of the same.

2. Item, That thou hast not believed nor dost believe, that thou art necessarily bounded under the pain of the damnation of thy soul, to give full faith and credence to the said catholic and universal church, and to the faith and religion of the same in all necessary points of the said faith and religion, without doubting or wavering in the said faith and religion, or in any part thereof.

3. Item, That thou hast not believed that the faith and religion, which both the church of Rome, Italy, England, France, Ireland, Scotland, and all other churches in Europe, being true members and parts of the said catholic and universal church, do believe and teach, is both agreeing with the faith and religion of Christ, and also is the very true faith and religion which all christian people ought to believe, observe, follow, and keep; but contrariwise, thou hast believed and dost believe, that that faith and religion which the said church of Rome, and all the other churches aforesaid, have heretofore believed, and do believe, is false, erroneous, and naught, and in no wise ought to be believed, observed, kept, and followed of any christian person.

4. Item, That albeit it be true, that in the sacrament of the altar there is in substance the very body and blood of our Saviour Christ under the forms of bread and wine; albeit that it be so believed, taught and preached undoubtedly in the said church of Rome, and all other churches aforesaid, yet thou hast not so believed, nor dost believe, but contrariwise, thou hast believed, dost believe firmly and stedfastly, that there is not in the said sacrament of the altar, under the said forms of bread and wine, the very substance of Christ's body and blood, but that there is only the substance of material common bread and wine, with the form thereof, and that the said material and common bread and wine are only the signs and tokens of Christ's body and blood, and are by faith received only for a remembrance of Christ's body and blood, and are by faith to be received only for a remembrance of Christ's passion and death, without any such substance of Christ's body and blood at all.

5. Item, That thou hast believed and taught, and dost openly spoke and defended, and so dost believe, maintain, and defend, that the very true receiving and eating of Christ's body and blood is only to take material and common bread, and to break it and distribute it among the people, remembering thereby the passion and death of Christ only.

6. Item, That thou hast likewise believed, thought, and spoken, that the mass, now used in the realm of England, and other the churches aforesaid, is abominable and naught, and full of idolatry, and is of the ordinance of the pope, and not of the institution of Christ, hath no goodness in it, saving the Gloria in Excelsis, the epistle and gospel, and therefore thou hast not, wilt come to be present at mass, nor receive the sacrament of the altar, nor any other sacrament of the church, as they are now used in the realm of England, &c.

7. Item, That thou hast in times past believed, and dost now believe, that auricular confession is not necessary to be made unto the priest, but is a thing superfluous, void, and naught, only to be made to God and some other person. And likewise thou hast condemned as superfluous, vain, and unprofitable, all the ceremonies of the church, and the service of the same, and hast said that no service in the church ought to be said but in the English tongue, and if it be otherwise, it is unlawful and naught.

8. Item, That thou being notoriously and openly suspected for an heretic, and a person culpable in the premises, wast of late called and brought before the earl of Oxford, and Mr. Philip Paris, and there wast charged with the said heresies, and wouldst not come to the church to be confessed, and receive the said sacrament as other christian people did, but utterly didst refuse to do the same, thou wast by the said earl of Oxford, and Mr. Philip Paris, sent up by a constable unto me bishop of London, and was by them denounced, detected, and put up to me as an heretic and misbelieving person.

6. Item, That thou hast known and believed, thou dost know and believe, or at least thou hast credibly heard reported, spoken, and said, that all and all manner of persons, which do teach, preach, or hold any thing concerning the sacraments of the church, or any of the articles of faith, otherwise than is found already discussed and determined by our mother the holy church, or doth call into doubt or question that thing which is already decided or determined by the church, or that willingly or wittingly do utter, openly or privily, any slanderous or blasphemous words concerning the said sacraments or any of them, or that do preach, teach, or keep any sect or kind of heresy against the wholesome doctrine of the church, and do wittingly or obstinately defend the sect or kind of heresy, are by the canons of the whole and universal catholic church, and also by the ecclesiastical laws of this church of England, by their so doing, accursed with that curse, which doth separate them from the entry into the church, from the receiving of the sacraments, and from the company of faithful people, and are (in continuing in this said sect and heresy) to be pronounced, declared, and taken for heretics, and to be delivered to the secular power, and by the laws temporal of this realm of England, and the custom of the same, to be by the said secular power put to death, and burnt for this said sect and heresy.

10. Item, That thou by reason of the premises wast and art to be pronounced, taken, had, reputed, and judged for a manifest and open, wilful and obstinate heretic, for a wicked and cursed person, and to be punished accordingly for the same, according to the said canon laws, usages, and customs.

The ANSWERS of THOMAS OSMOND, WILLIAM BAMFORD, and NICHOLAS CHAMBERLAIN, to the aforesaid ARTICLES.

TO the first they answered and confessed the same to be true, except that they do believe that there is here in earth one catholic and whole church, and that the same church doth hold and believe, as is contained in this article.

To the second they answer and believe the said article not to be true; for they say, that they have and do believe that they are necessarily bounden, under pain of damnation of their soul, to give full faith and credence unto the said catholic church, and to the faith and religion of the same, in all necessary points of the same faith and religion, without wavering or doubting in any part thereof.

To the third they answer, That the church of Rome, and other churches mentioned in this article, be not true members and parts (as they be used in faith and religion) of the catholic church of Christ, and that the faith and religion used in the said churches, is not agreeable with the church of Christ, but is false and erroneous.

To the fourth they answer and say, That howsoever the said churches of Rome and others of Christendom have and do believe touching the sacrament of the altar, yet they do believe that in the sacrament, under the forms of bread and wine, there is not the very substance of Christ's body and blood, but that there is only the substance of material bread and wine, and that the same material bread and wine be only the signs and tokens of

of Christ's body and blood, and are to be received only for a remembrance of Christ's passion and death, without any substance of Christ's body and blood at all.

To the fifth article they answer, That the true receiving and eating of Christ's body, according to Christ's institution, is to take, distribute, and eat material bread, and thereby to remember the passion and death of Christ, and so receive by faith (as they believe) Christ's body and blood, and not otherwise.

To the sixth they answer, The same to be true in every part thereof, except that over and besides the Gloria in Excelsis, the epistle and gospel, which they believe to be good, they believe the Pater-noster and Creed used in the mass, to be also good.

To the seventh they answer and confess, That auricular confession is not necessary to be made to the priest; nevertheless they think it is necessary to go to such a priest as is able to give good counsel; and that for counsel only, and not otherwise. And as concerning the ceremonies of the church, they answer the same to be vain and unprofitable. No service in the church ought to be said, but only in the English tongue.

To the eighth they answer, and believe the same to be true in every part thereof, except that they do not believe that they be heretics, or suspected of heresy.

To the ninth Osmond and Bamford answered, That they referred themselves to the said laws mentioned in that article; but Chamberlain made no answer at all to this article.

To the tenth, the said Osmond and Bamford answered and said, That by reason of their belief before by them confessed, they are not to be reputed, taken, or adjudged for wilful and obstinate heretics, nor to be punished therefore, as is declared in that article. The other answered nothing.

REMARKS upon the aforesaid ARTICLES.

THESE articles, in the same form and manner of words, are commonly objected to all others that follow after, with the same answers thereunto annexed. In which articles thou mayest note, reader, the crafty and subtle handling of these lawyers and registers, who so deceitfully frame their articles and positions, that unless a man do advisedly consider them, it is hard for a simple man to answer to them, but he shall be ensnared and entangled. So they paint their church with such a visage of universal, holy, catholic, as it should seem, he that denieth Rome, denieth the holy church of Christ here on earth. Likewise in examining them, and especially the simple sort, the matter of the sacrament, to the material bread in the sacrament they put the word [only] very captiously and fraudulently, to take them at the worst advantage, making the people believe that they take the holy sacrament to be no better than only common bread: when they are not so, but make a difference between the same, both in the use, honour, and name thereof.

Again, when the examiners hold only against the erroneous points of Romish religion, these bishops in their interrogatories give out the matter so generally as though the said examiners in general spake against all the articles taught in Rome, Spain, England, France, Scotland, &c.

Moreover, concerning Latin service, in such crafty form of words they propound their article, that it might appear to the people these men do deny as service to be lawful in any place, country, or language, but only in English.

And as these articles are craftily, captiously, and deceitfully in form of words devised by the bishops and their notaries; so the answers again to the same be no less subtilly framed, and after the most odious manner put down in the name of the examiners, which being thus read unto them, without further advice they were constrained upon a sudden to subscribe the same with their hands. Whereby if any word escaped their hands peradventure not considerably subscribed, there the papists took advantage against them, to defame them and to bring them into hatred with the people.

These articles thus propounded and answered, they were dismissed till the afternoon. At which time they did again appear, and there were examined and persuaded by fair and flattering speeches, as well by the bishop as others his assistants, to recant and revoke their opinions, who notwithstanding remained constant and firm; and therefore, after the common usage of their ecclesiastical laws, were sent away again until the next day, being Saturday, the 18th of May. Then in the forenoon, the bishop used his accustomed manner of proceeding, which he had used before, as well with them as with others, did likewise dismiss them, and at last in the afternoon did condemn them as heretics and so delivered them to the sheriffs, in whose custody they remained till they were delivered to the sheriff of Essex, and by him were executed, Chamberlain at Colchester, the 14th of June; Thomas Osmond at Manningtree; and William Bamford, alias Butler, at Harwich, the 15th of June.

C H A P. X.

The LIFE, ACTS, and MARTYRDOM of the Rev. Mr. JOHN BRADFORD, who, together with JOHN LEAF, was burned in SMITHFIELD, in the Bloody Reign of QUEEN MARY I.

The LIFE and ACTS of the Rev. Mr. JOHN BRADFORD.

MR. John Bradford was born at Manchester in Lancashire; his parents brought him up in learning from his infancy, until he attained such knowledge in the Latin tongue, and skill in writing, that he was able to gain his own living in some honest condition. Then he became servant to sir John Harrington, knight, who in the great affairs of king Henry VIII. and Edward VI. which he had in hand when he was treasurer of the king's camps and buildings, at divers times in Boulognois, had such experience of Mr. Bradford's activity in writing, his expertness in the art of auditors, as also his faithful trustiness, that not only in those affairs, but in many others of his private business, he trusted Mr. Bradford before others.

Mr. Bradford continued several years in an honest and thriving way, after the course of this world, if his mind could have so liked, or had been given to the world as many others be. But the Lord which had elected him unto a better function, and pre-ordained him to preach the gospel of Christ, called this his chosen servant to understanding and partaking of the same gospel. which call he was so truly taught, that forthwith effectual call was perceived by the fruits. For then he forsook his worldly affairs and forwardness in worldly wealth, and after a just account given to his master, all his doings, he departed from him, and with marvellous favour to further the kingdom of God by the ministry of his holy word, he gave himself wholly to study of the holy scriptures. And the better to accomplish his design, he departed from the Temple at London, and went to the university of Cambridge, to learn by God's law how to further the building of the Lord's temple. In Cambridge his diligence in study, his profiting in knowledge and pious conversation, so pleased all men, that within a few years after he had been there the university gave him the degree of master of arts.

Immediately after, the master and fellows of Pembroke Hall gave him fellowship in their college with them:

at good man, Martin Bucer, so liked him, that he held him not only most dear unto him, but also sometimes exhorted him to bestow his talent in preaching. To which Mr. Bradford always answered, that he was unable to serve in that office through want of learning. To which Bucer was wont to reply, saying, thou hast not fine wheat bread, yet give the poor people barley bread, or whatsoever else the Lord hath committed unto thee. And while Mr. Bradford was thus persuaded to enter into the ministry, Dr. Ridley, that worthy bishop of London, and glorious martyr of Christ, according to the order that then was in the church of England, called him to take the degree of a deacon. Which order, because it was not without some abuse, to which Mr. Bradford would not consent, and the bishop perceiving that he was willing to enter into the ministry, was content to ordain him deacon without any abuse, even as he desired. This being done, he obtained from him a licence to preach, and gave him a rebend in his cathedral church of St. Paul's.

In this preaching office Mr. Bradford diligently laboured for the space of three years. Sharply he reproveth, sweetly he preached Christ crucified, ably he disproved heresies and errors, earnestly he persuaded to godly life. After the death of blessed king Edward VI. when queen Mary had gotten the crown, Mr. Bradford continued diligent in preaching, till he was unjustly deprived both of his office and liberty by the queen and her council. To the doing whereof, because they had a private cause, they took occasion to add this injury for an act, as among Turks and Infidels would have been rewarded with thankfulness, and with great favour accepted, as indeed it did no less deserve.

The fact was this: The 13th of August, in the first year of the reign of queen Mary, Mr. Bourne, then bishop of Bath, made a seditious sermon at Paul's Cross in London, as partly is declared before, to set popery abroad in such sort, that it moved the people to great indignation, being almost ready to pull him out of the pulpit. Neither could the reverence of the place, nor the presence of bishop Bonner, who was then his master, nor yet the command of the mayor of London, whom the people ought to have obeyed, stay their rage: but the more they spake, the more the people were incensed. At length Mr. Bourne seeing the people in such a mood, and himself in such peril, (whereof we was sufficiently warned by the hurling of a drawn dagger at him as he stood in the pulpit) and that he was hindered from ending his sermon, fearing lest (against his will) he should there end his wretched life, desired Mr. Bradford, who stood in the pulpit behind him, to come forth, and to stand in his place and spake to the people. Good Mr. Bradford at his request was content, and there spake to the people of godly and quiet obedience. Whom as soon as the people heard begin to speak unto them, they were so glad, that they gave a great shout, and cried, Bradford, Bradford, God save thy life, Bradford: well declaring not only what affection they bare unto him, but also what regard they gave unto his words. For after he had begun to preach a little to them, and to exhort them, unto quietness and patience, the tumult soon ceased, and in the end each man departed quietly to his house. Yet in the mean season, (for it was a long time ere so great a multitude could all depart) Mr. Bourne sought, and truly, himself not yet full sure of his life till he was safely housed, notwithstanding that the mayor and sheriffs of London were there at hand to help him: wherefore he desired Mr. Bradford not to depart from him till he were in safety; which Mr. Bradford according to his promise performed. For while the mayor and sheriffs did lead Mr. Bourne to the school-master's house, which is next to the pulpit, Mr. Bradford went behind his back, shadowing him from the people with his own, and so set him safe.

Let the reader now consider the peril of Mr. Bourne, the charity of Mr. Bradford, and the headiness of the multitude, and also the grudging minds of some, who yet still there remained behind, greatly grieved in their minds, to see that so good a man should save the life of such a popish priest, so impudently and openly railing against king Edward. Among whom one gentleman said these words; "Ah Bradford, Bradford, thou savest him that will burn thee. I give thee his life: if it were not for thee, I would, I assure thee, run him through with my sword." Thus Bourne for that time, through Bradford's means, escaped bodily death: but God hath his judgment to be shewed in the time appointed.

The same Sunday in the afternoon, Mr. Bradford preached at Bow church in Cheapside, and reproveth the people sharply for their seditious misdemeanor. After this, he abode still in London with an innocent conscience, to try what would come of his just doing.

Within three days after, he was sent for to the Tower of London, where the queen then was, to appear before the council. There was he charged with this act of saving of Bourne, which act they there called seditious, and also objected against him for preaching, and so by them he was committed first to the Tower, then unto other prisons, out of which neither his innocence, piety, nor charitable dealing could purchase to him liberty of body, till by death (which he suffered for Christ's cause) he obtained the heavenly liberty, of which neither pope nor papist shall ever deprive him. From the Tower he came to the King's-Bench in Southwark; and after his condemnation, he was sent to the Compter in the Poultry in London: in which two places, for the time he did remain prisoner, he preached twice a day continually, unless sickness hindered him; where also the sacrament was often administered; and through his means (the keepers so well did bear with him) such resort of goodfolks were daily at his lecture, and the administration of the sacrament, that commonly his chamber was well nigh filled therewith. Preaching, reading, and praying, was all his whole life. He did not eat above one meal a day, which was but very little when he took it; and his continual study was upon his knees. In the midst of dinner he used often to muse with himself, having his hat over his eyes, from whence came commonly plenty of tears. Very gently he was to man and child, and in so good credit with his keeper, that as his desire in an evening (being prisoner in the King's-Bench, Southwark) he had licence, upon his promise to return again that night, to go into London without any keeper, to visit one that was sick, lying by the Still-yard. Neither did he fail his promise, but returned to his prison again, rather preventing his hour, than breaking his fidelity: so constant was he in word and in deed.

He was somewhat tall and slender of body, of a faint sanguine colour, with a dark brown beard. He slept not commonly above four hours in the night; and in his bed, till sleep came, his book went not out of his hand. His chief recreation was in no gaming or other pastime, but only in honest company, and comely talk, wherein he would spend a little time after dinner, at the table, and so to prayer and his book again. He counted that hour not well spent, wherein he did not some good, either with his pen, study, or in exhorting of others, &c. He was not sparing of his purse, but would liberally give of what he had to his fellow prisoners. And commonly once a week he visited the thieves, pick-pockets, and such others that were with him in prison where he lay on the other side, unto whom he would give pious exhortation, to learn the amendment of their lives by their trouble, and after that so done, distribute among them some portion of money to their comfort.

While he was in the king's-bench, and Mr. Saunders in the marshalsea, both prisoners, on the backside of those two prisons they met many time, and conferred together when they could; so mercifully did the Lord work for them, even in the midst of their trouble; and the said Bradford was so trusted by his keeper, and had such liberty in the backside, that there was no day, but that he might have easily escaped away, if he would; but the Lord had another work to do for him. In the summer time, while he was in the king's-bench, he had liberty of his keeper to ride into Oxfordshire, to a merchant's house of his acquaintance, and horse and all things prepared for him for that journey, and the party in readines that should ride with him: but God prevented him by sickness that he went not at all.

One of his old friends and acquaintance came unto him whilst he was prisoner, and asked him, if he sued to get him out, what then he would do, or whither he would go? Unto whom he made answer, as not caring whether he went out or no: but if he did, he said he would marry, and abide still in England secretly, teaching the people as the time would suffer him, and occupy himself that way. He was had in so great reverence and admiration with all good men, that a multitude, which never knew him but by fame, greatly lamented his death: yea, and a number also of the papists themselves wished heartily his life. There were few days in which he was thought not to spend some tears before he went to bed, neither was there ever any prisoner with him, but greatly profited by his company.

One circumstance, which ought not to be omitted, is the following. Bishop Farrar being prisoner in the King's-Bench, as before you have heard, was persuaded by the papists in the end of Lent, to receive the sacrament at Easter in one kind, who after much persuasion yielded to them, and promised so to do. Then, (so it happened by God's providence) the Easter-eve, the day before he should have done it, Mr. Bradford was brought prisoner to the King's-Bench, where the Lord making him his instrument, Mr. Bradford only was the means that the said bishop Farrar revoked his promise and word, and would never after yield to be spotted with that papistical pitch; so effectually the Lord wrought by this worthy servant of his.

The night before he was had to Newgate, which was the Saturday night, he was sore troubled divers times in his sleep by dreams, how the chain for his burning was brought to the Compter gate, and how the next day being Sunday he should be had to Newgate, and on the Monday after burned in Smithfield, as indeed came to pass accordingly, as shall hereafter be shewed. Now he being vexed oftentime in this sort with these dreams, about three o'clock in the morning he awaked him that lay with him, and told him his unquiet sleep, and what he was troubled withal. Then after a little talk, Mr. Bradford rose out of the bed, and gave himself to his old exercise of reading and praying, as always he had used before: and at dinner according to his accustomed manner he did eat his meat, and was very merry, no body being with him from morning till night but he that lay with him, with whom he had many times on that day godly discourse of death, of the kingdom of heaven, and of the ripeness of sin in that time.

In the afternoon they two walking together in the keeper's chamber, suddenly the keeper's wife came up as one half amazed, and seeming much troubled, being almost out of breath, said, Oh Mr. Bradford, I come to bring you heavy news. What is that? said he. To-morrow, said she, you must be burned; and your chain is now a-buying, and you must soon go to Newgate. With that Mr. Bradford put off his cap, and lifting up his eyes to heaven, said, I thank God for it; I have looked for the same a long time, and therefore it cometh not now to me suddenly, but as a thing waited for every day and hour; the Lord made me worthy thereof! And so thanking her for her kindness, departed up unto his chamber, where he continued in private prayer for some time; which done, he called to his friend in the same chamber, and took divers writings and papers, and shewed him his mind in those things what he would have done; and after they had thus spent the afternoon, at night half a dozen of his friends came to him, with whom he spent all the evening in prayer and other good exercises.

A little before he went out of the Compter, he made a notable prayer of his farewell, with such plenty of tears, and abundant spirit of prayer, that it ravished the minds of the hearers. Also when he shifted himself with a clean shirt that was made for his burning (by Mr. Walter Marlar's wife, who was a good nurse to him) he made such a prayer of the wedding garment, that some of those that were present were struck with admiration, so that their eyes were as thoroughly occupied in looking on him, as their ears gave place to hear his prayer. At his departing out of his chamber, he made likewise a prayer and gave money to every servant and officer in the house, with exhortation to them to fear and serve God, continually labouring to eschew all manner of evil. Being beneath in the court, all the prisoners cried out to him and bade him farewell, as the rest of the house had done before with weeping eyes.

The time they carried him to Newgate was about 11 or 12 o'clock at night, when it was thought none would be stirring abroad; and yet, contrary to their expectation, there was in Cheapside and other places (between the Compter and Newgate) a great multitude of people that came to see him, who most gently bade him farewell, praying for him with most lamentable and pious tears; and he again as gently bade them farewell, praying most heartily for them and their welfare. No whether it were a command from the queen and her council, or from Bonner and his adherents, or whether it were merrily devised by the lord mayor, aldermen and sheriffs of London, I cannot tell; but a great noise there was over night about the city by several, that Mr. Bradford should be burnt the next day in Smithfield, before four o'clock in the morning, before it should be generally known to any. In which rumour many heads had divers minds; some thinking the fear of the people to be the cause thereof: others thought, that it was because the papists judged his death would convert many to the truth, and give a great overthrow to their kingdom. Some thought one thing, and some another, that no just conjecture of the cause could be known that ever was heard yet. But this was certain, the people prevented the advice suspected; for the next day, at the said hour of four o'clock in the morning, there was in Smithfield such a multitude of men and women, that many were in admiration thereat, thought it was not possible that they could have notice of his death, being so great a number in such short time, unless it were by the singular providence of Almighty God.

Well, this took not effect as the people thought, for it was nine o'clock in the morning before Mr. Bradford was brought into Smithfield; who, in going from Newgate thitherward, espied a friend of his whom he loved, standing on one side of the way, unto whom he reached his hand over the people, and plucked him to him, and delivered to him from his head his velvet night cap, and also his handkerchief, with other things. After a little private talk with him, they parted, where immediately came to him a brother in law of his, called Roger Bewick, who as soon as he had taken the hand of Mr. Bradford by the hand, one of the sheriffs of London, Mr. Woodrofe, came with his staff and brake to the said Roger Bewick's head, that the blood ran about his shoulders. Which sight Mr. Bradford beholding with grief, bade his brother farewell, desiring him to commend him to his mother, and the rest of his friends, and speedily to go to some surgeon; so they parting, had little or no talk together. Then was he led forth to Smithfield, with a great company of armed men to guard him thither, as the like was not seen at any man's burning: for in every corner of Smithfield there were some, besides those that stood about the stake. Mr. Bradford being come to the place, fell flat to the ground secretly making his prayers to Almighty God. Then rising again, and putting off his clothes unto his shirt, he went to the stake, and there suffered with a young man of twenty years of age, joyfully and constantly whose name was John Leaf. Concerning the manner and order of whose burning, more shall be said (God willing) hereafter. In the mean time we will shew forth the sundry examinations, conflicts, and conferences between Mr. Bradford and his adversaries during his imprisonment, which was in all two years lacking one month and a half. Which examinations here follow.

It was a little above declared, that John Bradford was within three days after the sermon of Mr. Bourne, by order of the council committed to the Tower, where he remained from the month of August, 1553, unto the 22d of January, 1555, upon which day he was called out to examination before Stephen, bishop of Winchester, and other commissioners. The effect which examination and communication which passed between him and them, proceeded in manner as followeth.

The FIRST EXAMINATION of Mr. JOHN BRADFORD before the LORD CHANCELLOR, and others of the COUNCIL.

AFTER the lord chancellor, and the rest of the queen's council in commission with him, had ended their talk with Farrar, late bishop of St. David's, the under-marshal of the King's-Bench was commanded to bring in John Bradford; who being come into the presence of the council sitting at a table, kneeled down on his knee; but the lord chancellor immediately commanded him to stand up, and so he did.

When he was risen, the lord chancellor spake thus to him in effect: That he had been a long time justly imprisoned for his seditious behaviour at Paul's-cross, the 13th of August, in the year 1553, for his false preaching and arrogancy, taking upon him to preach without authority. But now, said he, the time of mercy is come, and therefore the queen's highness, minding to offer unto you mercy, hath by us sent for you, to declare and give the same, if so be you will with us return: and if you will do as we have done, you shall find as we have found, I warrant you. This was the sum of his words, and in manner the same words which he spake.

To these words Mr. John Bradford spake (after reverent obeisance made) in this manner: My lord and lords, I confess that I have been long imprisoned, and with humble reverence be it spoken) unjustly, for that I did nothing seditiously, falsely, or arrogantly, in word or fact, by preaching or otherwise, but rather sought truth, peace, and all godly quietness, as an obedient and faithful subject, both in going about to save the shop of Bath now, then Mr. Bourne, the preacher the cross, and in preaching for quietness accordingly. At these words, or rather before he had fully finished the said lord chancellor something snuffed, and declared to be a lye: for, said he, the fact was seditious, as you my lord of London can bear witness.

Bonner. You say true, my lord, I saw him with mine own eyes, when he took upon him to rule and lead the people impudently, thereby declaring that he was the author of the sedition.

Bradford. My lords, notwithstanding my lord bishop's seeing and saying, yet the truth I have told, as the day the Lord God Almighty shall reveal to all the world, when we shall all come to appear before him: the mean season, because I cannot be believed by you, I must and am ready to suffer, as now your sayings be, whatsoever God shall license you to do unto me.

Lord Chancellor. I know thou hast a glorious tongue, and goodly thews thou makest; but all is lies thou speakst. And again, I have not forgot how stubborn thou wast when thou wast before us in the Tower, whereupon thou wast committed to prison concerning religion; I have not forgotten thy behaviour and talk, for which cause thou hast been kept in prison, as one that would have done more hurt than I will speak of.

Bradford. My lord, as I said I say again, that I stand before you, so before God, and one day we shall all stand before him: the truth then will be the truth, though now ye will not so take it. Yea, my lord, I say, that my lord of Bath, Mr. Bourne, will witness with me, that I sought his safeguard with the peril of mine own life, I thank God therefore.

Bonner. That is not true: for I myself did see thee stand upon thee too much.

Bradford. No, I took nothing upon me undesired, and that of Mr. Bourne himself, as, if he were present, I dare say he would affirm. For he desired me to help him, to pacify the people, and also not leave him till he was in safety. And as for my behaviour in the Tower, and talk before your honours, I did or said any thing that did not beseech me, if your lordships would tell me wherein it was, I should and would presently make you answer.

Lord Chancellor. Well, to leave this matter: how sayest thou now? wilt thou return again, and do as we have, and thou shalt receive the queen's mercy and pardon.

Bradford. My lord, I desire mercy with God's mercy, but mercy with God's wrath; God keep me from: although (I thank God therefore) my conscience doth not accuse, that I did speak any thing why I should need to receive the queen's mercy or pardon. For all that ever I did or spake, was both agreeable to God's laws, and the laws of the realm at that present, and did tend much to quietness.

Lord Chancellor. Well, if thou make this babbling rolling in thy eloquent tongue, and yet being altogether ignorant and vain-glorious, and wilt not receive mercy offered to thee, know for truth, that the queen is minded to make a riddance of all such as thou art.

Bradford. The Lord before whom I stand, as well as before you, knoweth what vain-glory I have sought, and seek in this behalf: his mercy I desire, and also would be glad of the queen's favour to live as a subject without a clog of conscience. But otherwise the Lord's mercy is better to me than life. And I know to whom I have committed my life, even into his hands which will keep it, so that no man may take it away before it be his pleasure. There are twelve hours in the day, and as long as they last, so long shall no man have power thereon. Therefore his good will be done; life in his displeasure is worse than death, and death with his true favour, is true life.

Lord Chancellor. I know well enough, that we shall have glorious talk enough of thee: be sure, that as thou hast deceived the people with false and devilish doctrine, so shalt thou receive.

Bradford. I have not deceived the people, nor taught any other doctrine, than by God's grace I am, and hope shall be ready to confirm with my blood. And as for the devilishness and falseness in the doctrine, I would be sorry you could so prove it.

Durham. Why, tell me, what say you by the ministration of the communion, as now you know it is?

Bradford. My lord, here I must desire of your lordship and of all your honours a question, before I dare make you an answer to any interrogatory or question, wherewith you now begin. I have been six times sworn that I shall in no case consent to the practising of any jurisdiction, or any authority on the bishop of Rome's behalf within this realm of England. Now, before God, I humbly pray your honours to tell me whether you ask me this question by his authority, or no? If you do, I dare not, nor may answer you any thing in his authority, which you shall demand of me, except I would be forsworn, which God forbid.

Secretary Bourne. Hast thou been sworn six times? what office hast thou borne?

Bradford. I was thrice sworn in Cambridge, when I was admitted master of arts, when I was admitted fellow of Pembroke-hall, and when I was there, the visitors came thither, and swore the university. Again, I was sworn when I entered into the ministry, when I had a prebend given me, and when I was sworn to serve the king a little before his death.

Lord Chancellor. Tush, Herod's oaths a man should make no conscience at.

Bradford. But, my lord, these were no Herod's oaths, no unlawful oaths, but oaths according to God's word, as you yourself have well affirmed in your book, "Of true obedience."

Mr. Rochester. My lords, (said another of the council that stood by the table, Mr. Rochester I think) I never knew wherefore this man was in prison before now: but I see well that it had not been good that this man had been abroad: what the cause was that he was put in prison, I know not; but I now well know that not without a cause he was, and is to be kept in prison.

Secretary Bourne. Yea, it was reported this parliament time by the earl of Derby, that he hath done more hurt by letters, and exhorting those that have come to him in religion, than ever he did when he was abroad by preaching. In his letters he curseth all that teach any false doctrine, (for so he calleth that which is not according ing to that he taught) and most heartily exhorteth them to whom he writeth to continue still in that they have received by him, and such like as he is. All which words several of the council affirmed. Whereunto the said Mr. Bourne added, saying, How say you, sir, have you not thus seditiously written and exhorted the people?

Bradford. I have not written, nor spoken any thing seditiously, neither (I thank God therefore) have I admitted any seditious thought, nor trust ever shall do.

Secretary Bourne. Yea, thou hast written letters.

Lord Chancellor. Why spakest thou not? Hast thou not written as he saith?

Bradford. What I have written, I have written.

Southwell. Lord God, what an arrogant and stubborn boy is this, that thus stoutly and dallyingly behaveth himself before the queen's council? Whereat one looked upon another with disdainful countenances.

Bradford. My lords and masters, the Lord God which is, and will be judge of us all, knoweth, that as I am certain I stand now before his Majesty, so with reverence in his sight I stand before you, and unto you accordingly in words and gesture I desire to behave myself. If you otherwise take it, I doubt not but God in his time will reveal it: in the mean season, I shall suffer with all due obedience your sayings and doings too, I hope.

Lord Chancellor. These be gay and glorious words of reverence, but as in all other things, so herein also thou doest nothing but lye.

Bradford. Well, I would God the author of truth, and abhorrer of lies, would pull my tongue out of my head before you all, and shew a terrible judgment on me here present, if I have purposed, or do purpose to lye before you, whatsoever you shall ask me.

Lord Chancellor. Why then dost thou not answer? Hast thou written such letters as here are objected against thee?

Bradford. As I said, my lord, what I have written, I have written: I stand now before you, which either can lay my letters to my charge, or no: if you can lay any thing to my charge that I have written, if I deny it, I am then a liar.

Lord Chancellor. We shall never have done with thee, I perceive now: be short, be short, wilt thou have mercy?

Bradford. I pray God give me his mercy, and if therewith you will extend your's, I will not refuse it, but otherwise I will have none.

Here now was much ado, one speaking this, and another that of his arrogancy, in refusing the queen's pardon, which she so lovingly did offer unto him; whereto Mr. Bradford answered thus:

My lords, if I may live as a quiet subject without clog of conscience, I shall heartily thank you for your pardon; if otherwise I behave myself, than I am in danger of the law: in the mean season I ask no more than the benefit of a subject till I be convicted of transgression. If I cannot have this, as hitherto I have not had, God's good will be done.

Upon these words my lord chancellor began a long process of the false doctrine wherewith the people were deceived in the days of king Edward, and so turned the end of his talk to Bradford, saying, How say'st thou?

Bradford. My lord, the doctrine taught in king Edward's days was God's pure religion: which as I then believed, so do I now more believe it than ever I did, and therein I am more confirmed, and ready to declare it by God's grace even as he will, to the world, than I was when I first came into prison.

Durham. What religion mean you in king Edward's days? What year of his reign.

Bradford. Forsooth, even the same year, my lord, that the king died, and I was a preacher. Here wrote secretary Bourne I know not what.

Now after a little pausing, my lord chancellor began again to declare, that the doctrine taught in king Edward's days was heresy, using for probation and demonstration thereof, no scripture nor reason, but this; that it ended with treason and rebellion, so that (said he) the very end were enough to prove that doctrine to be naught.

Bradford. Ah my lord, that you could enter into God's sanctuary, and mark the end of this present doctrine that you now so magnify.

Lord Chancellor. What meanest thou by that? I am of opinion we shall have a snatch of rebellion even now.

Bradford. My lord, I mean no such end you would gather: I mean an end which no man seeth, but such as enter into God's sanctuary. If a man look on present things, he will soon deceive himself.

Here my lord chancellor again offered mercy, and Bradford answered as before: Mercy with God's mercy should be welcome, but otherwise he should have none. Whereupon the lord chancellor rang a little bell, to call in some body: for there were few present besides those before named, and the bishop of Worcester. Now when one was come in; it is best, said Mr. secretary Bourne, that you give the keeper a charge of this fellow. So the under marshal was called in.

Lord Chancellor. You shall take this man to you, and keep him close without conference with any man, but by your knowledge, and suffer him not to write any letters, &c. for he is of another manner of charge to you now than he was before. And so they departed, Bradford looking as cheerfully as any man could do, declaring thereby even a desire to give his life for the confirmation of his faith and doctrine.

The SECOND EXAMINATION of the Rev. Mr. JOHN BRADFORD, in St. MARY OVERY CHURCH, before the Lord Chancellor, and the Bishops, January 29, 1555.

AFTER the excommunication of Mr. John Rogers, Mr. John Bradford was called in, and standing before the lord chancellor and other bishops the said lord chancellor spake thus in effect.

Lord Chancellor. Whereas before the 22d of January the said Bradford was called before them, (said he) and they offered unto him the queen's pardon, although he had contemned the same; and further said, that he would stiffly and stoutly maintain and defend the erroneous doctrine taught in the days of king Edward VI. in consideration that the queen's highness was wonderfully merciful, they thought good to offer the same mercy again, before it was too late: therefore advise you well, said he, there is yet space and grace before we proceed, that you be committed to the secular power as we must, and will do, if you will not follow the example of Mr. Barlow and Mr. Cardmaker, whom he there commended, adding many arguments to induce the said Mr. Bradford to yield to the religion then set forth.

After the lord chancellor's long talk, Mr. Bradford began to speak in this manner: My lord, and my lords all, as I now stand in your sight before you, so I humbly beseech your honours to consider, that you sit in the seat of the Lord, who (as David doth witness) is in the congregation of judges, and sitteth in the midst of them judging: and as you would have your place to be by you taken as God's place, so demonstrate yourselves to follow him in your sitting; that is, seek no guiltless blood, neither hunt by questions to bring into a snare them which are out of the same. At this present I stand before you guilty or guiltless, then proceed and give sentence accordingly: if guiltless, then give me the benefit of a subject, which hitherto I could not have.

Here the lord chancellor replied, and said, that the said Bradford began with a true sentence, That the Lord is in the midst of them that judge. But, said he, this and all thy gesture declareth but hypocrisy and vainglory. And further he endeavoured to clear himself, that he sought not guiltless blood, and so began a long process how that Bradford's fact at St. Paul's-Cross was presumptuous and arrogant, and declared a taking upon him to lead the people, which could not but turn much disquietness, in that thou (speaking to Bradford) was so refractory and stout in religion at that present. For which as thou wert then committed to prison, so hitherto thou hast been kept in prison, where thou hast written letters to the great hurt of the queen's subjects as was credibly declared by the earl of Derby in the parliament-house. And to this he added, that the said Mr. Bradford

Bradford did stubbornly behave himself the last time he was before them; and therefore not for any other thing I demand of thee, said he, but of and for thy doctrine and religion.

Bradford. My lord, where you accuse me of hypocrisy and vain-glory, I must and will leave it to the Lord's determination, who will one day open your's and my truth and hearty meanings: in the mean season, I will content myself with the testimony of my own conscience, which if it yield to hypocrisy, could not but have led to be my foe also; and so both God and man are against me. And as for my fact at St. Paul's cross, and behaviour before you at the Tower, I doubt not but God will reveal it to my comfort. For if ever I did any thing which God used to public benefit, I think that my deed was one, and yet for it I have been and am kept a long time in prison. And as for letters and religion, I answer as I did the last time I was before you.

Lord Chancellor. There didst thou say stubbornly and faultily, that thou wouldst manly maintain the erroneous doctrine in king Edward's days.

Bradford. My lord, I said the last time I was before you, that I had six times taken an oath, that I should never consent to the practising of any jurisdiction on the behalf of Rome's behalf, and therefore I durst not answer to any thing that should be so demanded, lest I should be forsworn, which God forbid. Howbeit, saving my oath, I said I was more confirmed in the doctrine set forth publicly in the days of king Edward, than ever I was before I was put in prison: and so I thought I should be, and yet think still shall be found ready to give my life as God will, for the confirmation of the same.

Lord Chancellor. I remember well that thou madest much ado about needless matter, as though the oath against the bishop of Rome were so great a matter. So others have done before thee, but yet not in such sort as thou hast done: for thou pretendest a conscience in it, which is nothing else but mere hypocrisy.

Bradford. My conscience is known to the Lord; and whether I deal herein hypocritically or no, he knoweth. Therefore I said then, my lord, so I say again now, that for fear lest I should be perjured, I dare not give answer to any thing you shall demand of me, my answering should consent to the confirming or practising of any jurisdiction for the bishop of Rome in England.

Lord Chancellor. Why didst thou begin to tell that we are Gods, and sit in God's place, and now wilt thou make us an answer?

Bradford. My lord, I said, you would have your place as of us now, as God's place: and therefore I brought that piece of scripture, that you might the more admonished to follow God and his ways at this present, who seeth us all, and well perceiveth whether our conscience I pretend this matter of the oath or not.

Lord Chancellor. No, all men may well see thy hypocrisy: for if for thine oath's sake, thou didst not answer, thou wouldst thou not have spoken as thou didst, and have answered me at the first: but now men well perceive, that this is but a starting-hole to hide thyself in, because thou dardest not answer, and so wouldst escape, blinding simple people's eyes, as though of conscience you should all you do.

Bradford. That which I spake at the first was not a lie or an answer to what you spake to me: and therefore I needed not to lay for me mine oath. For I thought I would have more weighed what I did speak, than I did: but when I perceived you did not consider that I came to ask matter, whereto by answering I should consent to the practising of jurisdiction on the behalf of Rome's behalf here in England, and so be forsworn; then of conscience and simplicity I spake and do yet again speak, that I dare not for conscience answer you. And therefore I seek no starting-holes, but go about to blind the people, as God knoweth. For one of your honours shall tell me, that you do not ask any thing, whereby mine answering should consent to the practising of the bishop of Rome's jurisdiction, ask me wherein you will; and you shall hear that I will answer you as flatly as ever any did that came before you. I am not afraid of death, I thank God; for I look, and have looked for nothing else at your hands a long time: but I am afraid when death cometh, I should have matter to trouble my conscience by the guiltiness of perjury, and therefore do I answer as I do.

Lord Chancellor. These are gay glorious words, full of hypocrisy and vain-glory, and yet dost thou not know that I sit here as bishop of Winchester in mine own diocese, and therefore may do this which I do, and more too?

Bradford. My lord, give me leave to ask you this question, that my conscience may be out of doubt in this matter. Tell me here before God, all this audience being witnesses, that you demand of me nothing whereby mine answering should consent to and confirm the practice of jurisdiction for the bishop of Rome here in England, and then your honour shall hear me give as flat and plain answers briefly, to whatsoever you shall demand of me, as ever any did.

Here the lord chancellor was greatly offended, and said that truly the bishop of Rome's authority needed no confirmation of Mr. Bradford's answering, nor any such as he was; and turned his discourse to the people, saying, that Mr. Bradford followed crafty covetous merchants, which because they would lend no money to their neighbours when they were in need, would say that they had often sworn, that they would never lend any more money, because their debtors had so often deceived them. Even so thou, said he to Mr. Bradford, dost at this present, to cast a mist in the people's eyes, to blear them with an heresy, (which is greater and more hurtful to the common-wealth than the other is) pretend thy oath, whereby the people might make a conscience, whereas they should not. Why speakest thou not?

Bradford. My lord, as I said, I say again, I dare not answer you for fear of perjury, from which God defend me, or else I could tell you that there is a difference between oaths. Some are according to faith and charity, as the oath against the bishop of Rome; and some against faith and charity, as this, to deny by oath my help to my brother in his need.

Here my lord chancellor again was much offended, still saying that Bradford durst not answer, and further endeavoured to prove that the oath against the bishop of Rome was against charity.

But Bradford answered, that howsoever his honour took him, yet he was assured of his meaning, that no fear but the fear of perjury made him unwilling to answer: for as for death, my lord, said he, as I know there are twelve hours in the day, so with the Lord my time is appointed. And when it shall be his good time, then I shall depart hence: but in the mean season I am safe enough, though all the people had sworn my death. Into his hands I have committed it, and do; his good will be done. And saving mine oath, I will answer you in this behalf, that the oath against the bishop of Rome was not, nor is against charity.

Lord Chancellor. How prove you that?

Bradford. Forsooth, I prove it thus:

Nothing is against charity, which is with God's word, and not against it.

The oath against the bishop of Rome's authority in England, is with God's word, and is not against it.

Therefore the oath against the bishop of Rome's authority in England, is not against charity.

Lord Chancellor. Is it against God's word, that a man should take a king to be supreme head of the church in this realm?

Bradford. No, saving still mine oath, it is not against God's word, but with it, being taken in such sense as it may well be taken: that is, attributing to the king's power, the sovereignty in all his dominion.

Lord Chancellor. I pray you, where find you that?

Bradford. I find it in many places, but especially in the 13th chap. of the Romans, where St. Paul exhorteth "every soul to be subject to the higher powers:" but what power? "The power verily which beareth the sword; which is not the spiritual, but the temporal power." As Chrysostom full well noteth upon the same place, which your honour knoweth better than I. He, (Chrysostom I mean) there plainly sheweth that bishops, prophets, and apostles, are obedient to the temporal magistrates.

Here the lord chancellor was angered yet more, and said, how that Mr. Bradford went about to deny all obedience to the queen for his oath: and so, said he, this man would make God's word a warrant of his disobedience; for he will answer the queen on this sort, that when she says, Now swear to the bishop of Rome, or obey his authority: No, (will he say) for I should be forsworn, and so he makes the queen no queen.

Bradford. No, I go not about to deny all obedience to the queen's highness, but deny obedience in this part, if she should demand. For I was sworn to king Edward, not simply, that is, not only concerning his own person, but also concerning his successors, and therefore in denying the queen's request herein, I deny not her authority, nor become disobedient.

Lord Chancellor. Yes, that thou dost; and so he began to tell a long tale, how if a man should make an oath to pay me a hundred pounds by such a day, and the man to whom it was due would forget the debt, the debtor should say, No, you cannot do it; for I am forsworn then.

Here Mr. Bradford desired my lord chancellor not to trifle it, saying, that he wondered his honour would make solemn oaths made to God trifles in that sort; and make so great a matter concerning vows (as they call it) made to the bishop for marriage of priests.

At these words the lord chancellor was much offended, and said he did not trifle; but, says he, thou goest about to deny obedience to the queen, who now requires obedience to the bishop of Rome.

Bradford. No, my lord, I do not deny obedience to the queen, if you would discern between genus and species. Because I may not obey in this, therefore I may not obey in the other, is no good reason. As if a man lett or sell a piece of his inheritance, yet this notwithstanding, all his inheritance is not lett or sold: and so in this case, all obedience I deny not, because I deny obedience in this branch.

Lord Chancellor. I will have none of these similitudes.

Bradford. I would not use them, if you went not about to persuade the people, that I meant that which I never meant: for I myself not only mean obedience, but will give example of all most humble obedience to the queen's highness, so long as she requires not disobedience against God.

Lord Chancellor. No, no, all men may see your meaning well enough. There is no man, though he be sworn to the king, that doth therefore break his oath, if he afterwards be sworn to the French king and to the emperor.

Bradford. It is true, my lord, but the cases be not alike; for here is an exception: Thou shalt not swear to the bishop of Rome at any time. If we in like manner were sworn; Thou shalt not serve the emperor, &c. you see there were some alteration and more doubt. But I beseech your honour remember what you yourself have written, answering the objections against this in your book, Of true obedience: "Let God's word, and the reason thereof, bear the bell away."

Here the lord chancellor was greatly moved, and said still, how that Mr. Bradford had written seditious letters, and perverted the people thereby, and did stoutly stand, as though he would defend the erroneous doctrine in king Edward's time, against all men: and now, says he, he says he dare not answer.

Bradford. I have written no seditious letters, I have not perverted the people: but that which I have written and spoken, that will I never deny, by God's grace. And where your lordship says, that I dare not answer you; that all men may know that I am not afraid, save mine oath, ask me what you will, and I will plainly make you answer, by God's grace, although I now see my lieth thereon. But, O Lord, into thy hands I commit it, come what will: only sanctify thy name in me, and an instrument of thy grace, Amen. Now ask what you will, and you shall see I am not afraid, by God's grace flatly to answer.

Lord Chancellor. Well then, how say you to the blessed sacrament? Do you not believe there Christ to be present concerning his natural body?

Bradford. My lord, I do believe that Christ is corporally present at and in the due administration of the sacrament. By this word (corporally) I mean that Christ is there present corporally unto faith.

Lord Chancellor. Unto faith! we must have more words to make it plain.

Bradford. You shall: but first give me leave to speak two words.

Lord Chancellor. Speak on.

Bradford. I have now been a year and almost three quarters in prison, and in all this time you have never questioned me hereabout, when I might have spoken my conscience frankly without peril; but now you have law to hang up and put to death, if a man answer freely and not to your liking, and so now you come to demand this question. Ah, my lord, Christ used not this way to bring men to faith. No more did the prophets and apostles. Remember what Bernard writes to Eugenius the pope; "I read, that the apostles stood to be judged, but I read not, that they sat to judge. This shall be that was," &c.

Here the lord chancellor was appalled, as it seemed, and said most gently that he used not this means, was not my doing, said he, although some there be that think this to be the best way: for I, for my part, have been challenged for being too gentle oftentimes: which thing the bishop of London confirmed, and so did most all the audience, that he had been too mild and too gentle.

At which words Mr. Bradford spake thus: My lord, I pray you stretch out your gentleness that I may feel for hitherto I have never felt it.

As soon as ever he had spoke thus, the lord chancellor, perhaps thinking that Mr. Bradford would have had mercy and pardon, said that with all his heart, only he, but the queen's highness would stretch mercy, if with them he would return.

Bradford. Return, my lord? God save me from going back: I mean it not so, but I mean, that I was three quarters of a year in the Tower; you forbade me pen, and ink, and never in all that time, nor since, I feel any gentleness from you. I have rather hitherto found, as I looked for, extremity. And I thank God that I perceive now you have kept me in prison so long, not for any matter you had, but for matter you would have; God's good will be done.

Here now were divers telling my lord it was dinner time. And so he rose up, leaving Mr. Bradford speaking, saying, in the afternoon they would speak more with him, and he was had into the vestry, and was there all that day until night, when he was carried to prison again.

In the mean time, about four o'clock in the afternoon, a gentleman, called Mr. Thomas Husley, of Lincolnshire, who was once an officer in the duke of Norfolk's house, came into the vestry to inquire for Stoning; and when it was answered him by the under marshal's officers of the King's-bench, that there was none such, he entered into the house, and made acquaintance with Mr. John Bradford, saying, that he would commune and speak with him the next morning for old acquaintance.

The next morning about seven o'clock, this gentleman came into the chamber wherein Mr. John Bradford lay, and being with him, he began a long oration of love and acquaintance he came to him, and that which he would further utter. You did (said he) so wonderfully behave yourself before the lord chancellor, and other bishops yesterday, that even the greatest enemies you have, did see that they have no matter against you: and therefore I advise you, (speaking thus) ough it came of his own good will, without making any other man privy, or any other procuring him as he did) this day, for anon you shall be called before them again, to desire a time, and men to confer withal, so that all men think a wonderful wisdom, gravity, and gravity in you; and by this means you shall escape present danger, which else is nearer than you are aware of. To this Mr. Bradford answered, I neither can nor will make such request. For then shall I give occasion to the people, and to all others to think that I doubt of the doctrine which I confess, which thing I do not, for thereof I am most assured, and therefore will give no such offence. As they were thus talking, the chamber door was unlocked, and Dr. Seton came in, whom when Mr. Bradford saw, he spake thus in his own mind: What, sir, both the matter thus? This man told me, no man knew of his coming: Lord, give me grace to remember my lesson, "Beware of those men, &c. Cast not your pearls before dogs:" for I see these men be come to hunt for matter, that the one may bear witness to the other.

Dr. Seton, after some by-talk of Mr. Bradford's age, of his country, and such like, began a gay and long discourse of my lord of Canterbury, Mr. Latimer, and Mr. Ridley, and how they at Oxford were not able to answer any thing at all; and that therefore my lord of Canterbury desired to confer with the bishop of Durham and others; all which talk tended to this end, that Mr. Bradford should make the like suit, being nothing to be compared in learning to my lord of Canterbury.

To this Mr. Bradford briefly answered as he did before to Mr. Hufsey.

With this answer neither the doctor nor the gentleman being contented, after many persuasions, Mr. Doctor said, I have heard much good talk of you, and even last night a gentleman made report of you at the lord chancellor's table, that you were able to persuade as much as any that he knew. And I (though I never heard you preach, and to my knowledge did never see you before yesterday) yet methought your modesty was such, your behaviour and talk so without malice and impatience, that I would be sorry you should do worse than myself. And I tell you further, I do perceive my lord chancellor hath a favour towards you: wherefore be not so obstinate, but desire respite and some learned man to confer withal, &c.

But Mr. Bradford kept still one answer; I cannot, nor will I so offend the people. I doubt not, but I am most certain of the doctrine I have taught.

Here Mr. Doctor waxed hot, and called Mr. Bradford arrogant, proud, and vain-glorious.

But Mr. Bradford answered, Beware of judging, lest you condemn yourself. But still Dr. Seton urged him, shewing him how merciful my lord chancellor was, and how charitably they entertained him.

Bradford. I never saw any justice, much less love, (I speak for my part, said Mr. Bradford) in my lord chancellor. Long have I been unjustly imprisoned, and handled in the same uncharitably: and now my lord hath no just matter against me.

This talk served not the doctor's purpose: wherefore he went from matter to matter, from this point to that point. Bradford still gave him the hearing, and answered not: for he perceived that they both did come only to fish for some things which might make a shew that my lord chancellor had justly kept him in prison.

When all their discourse took no such effect as they expected, Mr. Hufsey asked Mr. Bradford, will you not admit conference, if my lord chancellor should offer it publicly?

Bradford. Conference, if it had been offered before the law had been made, or if it were offered so that I might be at liberty to confer, and as sure as he with whom I should confer, then it were something: but else I see not what other purpose conference should be offered, but to defer that which at length will come, and the lingering may give more offence than do good. Howbeit, if my lord should make such an offer of his own motion, I will not refuse to confer with any he may appoint.

Dr. Seton hearing this, called Bradford arrogant, proud, and whatsoever it pleased him.

Then Bradford perceiving by them that he should shortly be called for, besought them both to give him leave to talk with God, and to beg wisdom and grace of him; for, said he, otherwise I am helpless: and so they with much ado departed. Then Mr. Bradford went and made his prayers to God, which the Lord of his goodness did graciously accept in his need, praised therefore be his holy name. Shortly after they were gone, Mr. Bradford was led to the aforesaid church, and there remained uncalled for till eleven o'clock, that is, till Mr. Saunders was excommunicated.

The Last EXAMINATION of Mr. BRADFORD, in the CHURCH of St. MARY OVERIES.

AFTER the excommunication of Laurence Saunders, John Bradford was called in, and being brought in before the lord chancellor and other bishops there sitting, the lord chancellor began to speak thus in effect: That if Bradford, being now come before them, would answer with modesty and humility, and conform himself to the catholic church with them, he yet might find mercy, because they would be loth to use extremity. Therefore he concluded with an exhortation, that Bradford would recant his doctrine.

After the lord chancellor had ended his long oration, Mr. Bradford began to speak thus: As yesterday I besought your honours to set in your fight the majesty and presence of God to follow him, who seeketh not to subvert the simple by subtle questions; so I humbly beseech every one of you to do this day: for you know well enough, that guiltless blood will cry for vengeance. And this I pray not your lordships to do, as one that taketh upon me to condemn you utterly herein, but that ye might be more admonished to do that, which none doth so much as he should do: for our nature is so much corrupt, that we are very forgetful of God. Again, as yesterday I pleaded mine oath and oaths against the bishop of Rome, that I should never consent to the practising of any jurisdiction for him, or on his behalf in the realm of England; so do I again at this day, lest I should be perjured. And last of all, as yesterday the answers I made, were by protestation and saving mine oath, so I would your honours should know that mine answers shall be this day: and this I do, that when death (which I look for at your hands) shall come, I may not be troubled with the guilt of perjury.

At which words the lord chancellor was wroth, and said, that they had given him respite to deliberate till this day, whether he would recant his errors of the blessed sacrament, which yesterday, said he, before us you uttered.

Bradford. My lord, you gave me no time for any such deliberation, neither did I speak any thing of the sacrament which you do disallow. For when I had declared a presence of Christ to be there to faith, you went from that matter, to clear yourself that you were not cruel, and so went to dinner.

Lord Chancellor. What? I perceive we must begin all again with thee. Did I not yesterday tell thee plainly, that thou madest a conscience where none should be? Did I not make it plain, that the oath against the bishop of Rome was an unlawful oath?

Bradford. No, indeed, my lord: you said so, but you have not proved it yet, nor ever can do.

Lord Chancellor. O Lord God, what a fellow art thou! Thou wouldst go about to bring into the people's heads, that we, all the lords of the parliament house, the knights and burgeses, and all the whole realm be perjured. O what an heretic is this! here good people, you may see what a senseless heretic this fellow is. If I should make an oath I would never help my brother, nor lend him money in his need; were this a good answer to tell my neighbour desiring my help, that I had made an oath to the contrary? or that I could not do it?

Bradford. O my lord, discern betwixt oaths that be against charity and faith, and oaths that be according ing to faith and charity, as this is against the bishop of Rome.

Here the lord chancellor made much ado, and a long time was spent about oaths, which were good, and which were evil, he captiously asking often of Bradford a direct answer concerning oaths: which Bradford would not give simply, but with a distinction. Whereat the chancellor was much offended: but Bradford still kept him at bay, that the oath against the bishop of Rome was a lawful oath, using thereto the lord chancellor's own book, Of true obedience, for confirmation.

At length they came to this issue, who should be judge of the lawfulness of the oath; and Bradford said, the word of God, according to Christ's word, John xii. My word shall judge; and according to the testimony of Isaiah and Micah, That God's word, coming out of Jerusalem, shall give sentence among the Gentiles. By this word, (said Bradford) my lord, I will prove the oath against the bishop of Rome's authority, to be a good, a godly, and a lawful oath. So that the lord chancellor left his hold, and as the other day he pretended a denial of the queen's authority and obedience to her highness, so did he now.

But Bradford, as the day before, proved, that obedience in this point to the queen's highness, if she should demand an oath to the bishop of Rome, being denied, was not a general denial of her authority, and of obedience to her; no more, said he, than the sale, gift, or lease of a piece of a man's inheritance, proveth it a sale, gift, or lease of the whole inheritance.

And thus much ado was made about this matter: the lord chancellor talking much, and using many examples of debt, of going out of town to-morrow by oath, and yet tarrying till Friday, and such like. Which trifling talk Bradford did touch, saying, That it was a wonder his honour weighed conscience no more in this, and would be so earnest in vows of priests marriages made to bishops, and be careless for solemn oaths made to God and to princes. In short this was the end. The lord chancellor said, the queen might dispense with it, and did so to the whole realm. But Bradford said, that the queen's highness could do no more but remit her right; as for the oath made to God, she could never remit, forasmuch as it was made unto God.

At which words the lord chancellor chafed wonderfully, and said, that in plain sense I slandered the realm with perjury; and therefore, said he to the people, you may see how this fellow taketh upon him to have more knowledge and conscience than all the wise men of England, and yet he hath no conscience at all.

Bradford. Well, my lord, let all the standers-by see who hath conscience: I have been a year and a half in prison: now before all these people, declare wherefore I was imprisoned, or what cause you had to punish me. You said the other day in your own house, my lord of London witnessing with you, that I took upon me to speak to the people undesired. There he sitteth by you, I mean my lord of Bath, who desired me himself, for the passion of Christ, I would speak to the people. Upon whose words I coming into the pulpit, had like to have been slain with a dagger, (which was hurled at him, I think) for it touched my sleeve. He then prayed me I would not leave him, and I promised him, as long as I lived, I would take hurt before him that day, and so went out of the pulpit and intreated with the people, and at length brought him myself into an house.

Besides this, in the afternoon I preached at Bow church, and there going up into the pulpit, one desired me not to reprove the people; for, said he, you will never come down alive, if you do it. And yet notwithstanding I did in that sermon reprove their fact, and called it sedition at least twenty times. For all which my doing, I have received this recompence, imprisonment for a year and a half and more, and death now, which you are plotting. Let all men be judges where conscience is.

They endeavoured to interrupt him while he was speaking these words, but Mr. Bradford still spake on, and gave no place till he had made an end. And then the lord chancellor said, that for all that fair tale, his fact at the cross was culpable.

Bradford. No, my fact was good, as you yourself do bear me witness. For when I was at first before you in the Tower, you yourself did say, that my fact was good but my mind evil. Well, said I, then my lord, in that case you allow the fact, and condemn my mind; but how can I otherwise declare my mind to man but by saying and doing? God one day, I trust, will open to my comfort, what my mind was, and your's is.

Here the lord chancellor was offended, and said, that he never said so. I had not so little wit, said he, as not to discern betwixt meaning and doing: and so brought forth many examples little to the purpose, to prove that men construe things by the meaning of men, and not by their doings. But when this would not serve, then came he to another matter, and said, that Bradford was put in prison at first because he would not yield, nor be conformable to the queen's religion.

Bradford. Why, my lord, your honour knoweth that you would not reason with me on religion, but said a time should afterwards be found out, when I should be talked withal. But if it were as your lordship saith, that I was put in prison for religion, in that my religion was then authorized by public laws of the realm, could conscience punish, or cast me in prison therefore? Wherefore let all men be judges, in whom conscience is wanting.

Here came forth Mr. Chamberlain of Woodstock, and told my lord chancellor, that Bradford had been a serving-man, and was with Mr. Harrington.

Lord Chancellor. True, and did deceive his master of seven-score pounds, and because of this, he went to be a gospeller and a preacher, good people, and yet you see how he pretendeth conscience.

Bradford. My lord, I am ready to face him, whoever he be, that can come forth and justly vouch, that ever I deceived my master. And as you are chief justice by office in England, I desire justice upon them that so slander me, because they cannot prove it.

Here my lord chancellor and Mr. Chamberlain were smitten blank, and said they heard it. But, said my lord chancellor, we have another manner of matter than this against you: for you are an heretic.

Yea, added the bishop of London, he wrote letters to Mr. Pendleton, who knoweth his hand as well as his own; your honour did see the letters.

Bradford. This is not true. I never did write to Pendleton since I came to prison, and therefore I am not justly spoken of.

London. But you indited it.

Bradford. I did not, nor know not what you mean, and this I offer to prove.

Then came in another, (I believe they call him Mr. Allen, one of the clerks of the council) putting the lord chancellor in remembrance of letters written into Lancashire.

Lord Chancellor. You say true: for we have his hand to shew.

Bradford. I deny that you have my hand to shew of letters sent into Lancashire, otherwise than before you all I will stand to, and prove them to be good and lawful.

Here was all answered, and then the lord chancellor began a new matter. Sir, said he, in my house the other day you did most contemptuously despise the queen's mercy, and you would maintain the erroneous doctrine in king Edward's days against all men, and this you do most stoutly.

Bradford. Well, I am glad that all men see now you have no matter to imprison me before that day justly. Now say I, that I did not contemptuously despise the queen's mercy, but would have had it, (though if justice might take place, I need it not) so that I might have had it with God's mercy, that is, without doing or saying any thing against God and his truth. And as for maintenance of doctrine, because I cannot tell how you will stretch this word maintenance, I will repeat again that which I spake. I said I was more confirmed in the religion set forth in king Edward's days, than ever I was: and if God so would, I trust I should declare it by giving my life for the confirmation and testification thereof. So I said then, and so I say now. As for other-se to maintain it, than pertaining to a private person confession, I thought not, nor think not.

Lord Chancellor. Well, yesterday thou didst maintain heresy concerning the blessed sacrament, and therefore we gave thee respite till this day to deliberate.

Bradford. My lord, as I said at the first, I spake nothing of the sacrament, but that which you allowed, and therefore reproved it not, nor gave me any thing to deliberate.

Lord Chancellor. Why? didst thou not deny Christ's presence in the sacrament?

Bradford. No, I never denied nor taught, but that faith, whole Christ, body and blood, was as present the bread and wine to the due receiver.

Lord Chancellor. Yea; but dost thou not believe that Christ's body naturally and really is there, under the forms of bread and wine?

Bradford. My lord, I believe Christ is present there to the faith of the due receiver: as for transubstantia-tion, I plainly and flatly tell you, I believe it not.

Here was Bradford called Diabolus, a slanderer; for he ask no question, said my lord chancellor, of trans-ubstantiation, but of Christ's presence.

Bradford. I deny not his presence to the faith of the receiver, but deny that he is included in the bread, or that the bread was transubstantiated.

Worcester. If he be not included, how is he then present?

Bradford. Indeed, though my faith can tell how, yet my tongue cannot express it, nor you otherwise than by faith hear it, or understand it.

Here was much ado, now one doctor standing up and speaking this, and others speaking that; and the lord chancellor talking much of Luther, Zuinglius, Oeco-lampadius: but still Bradford kept him at that point, that Christ is present to faith; and that there is no transub-stantiation nor including of Christ in the bread: but all this would not serve them.

Therefore another bishop asked this question, Whether the wicked man received Christ's very body, or no?

And Bradford answered plainly, No. Whereat the lord chancellor made a long oration, how that it could not be that Christ was present, except that the evil man received it. But Bradford put away all his oration in few words, that grace was at that time offered to his lordship, although he received it not: so that, said he, the receiving maketh not the presence, as your lordship should infer; but God's grace, truth, and power, is the cause of the presence, which grace, the wicked that lack faith cannot receive. And here Bradford prayed my lord not to divorce that which God hath coupled together.
He hath coupled all these together; "Take, eat, this is my body." He saith not, See, peep, this is my body; but, Take, eat. So that it appeareth, this is a promise depending upon condition, if we take and eat.

Here the lord chancellor and other bishops made a great ado, that Bradford had found out a toy that no man else ever did, of the condition; and the lord chancellor made many words to the people thereabout.

But Bradford said thus: My lord, are not these words,
Take, eat, a commandment? and are not these words,
This is my body, a promise? If you will challenge the promise, and do not the commandment, may you not deceive yourself?

Here the lord chancellor denied Christ to have commanded the sacrament, and the use of it.

Bradford. Why, my lord, I pray you tell the people what mood accipite, manducate, is; is it not plain to children, that Christ, in so saying, commandeth?

At these words the lord chancellor made a great toying and trifling at the Imperative mood, and fell to parling and examining, as he should teach a child, and so concluded it was no commandment, but such a phrase as this, I pray you give me drink, which, said he, is no commandment, I think.

But Bradford prayed him to leave toying and trifling, and said thus: My lord, if it be not a commandment of Christ to take and eat the sacrament, why dare any take upon them to command and make that of necessity,

No. 17.

which God leaveth free? as you do in making it a necessary commandment, once a year for all that be of discretion, to receive the sacrament.

Here the lord chancellor called him again Diabolus or Calumniator, and began, from these words, "Let a man prove himself, and so eat of the bread, (yea bread, said Bradford) and drink of the cup," to prove that it was no commandment to receive the sacrament:
for then (said he) if it were a commandment, it should bind all men, in all places, and all times.

Bradford. O my lord, discern between commandments: some be general, as the ten commandments, that they bind always, in all places, and all persons: some be not so general, as this of the supper, the sacrament of baptism, of the thrice appearing before the Lord at Jerusalem, of Abraham offering of Isaac, &c.

Here the lord chancellor denied the cup to be commanded by Christ: for then, said he, we should have eleven commandments.

Bradford. Indeed I believe you think as you speak:
for else you would not take the cup from the people, in that Christ saith, "Drink ye all of it." But how say you, my lords? Christ saith to you bishops especially, "Go and preach the gospel: feed Christ's flock," &c. Is this a commandment, or no?

Here was my lord chancellor in a heat, and said as pleased him.

Then the bishop of Durham asked Bradford, when Christ began to be present in the sacrament? whether before the receiver received it, or no?

Mr. Bradford answered, that the question was curious, and not necessary; and further said, that as the cup was the New Testament, so the bread was Christ's body to him that received it duly, but yet so that the bread is bread. For, said he, in all the scripture ye shall not find this proposition, There is no bread. And so he quoted Chrysostom, to prove his assertions. Much ado was here, they calling Bradford heretic, and he desiring them to proceed in God's name, he looked for that which God appointed for them to do.

Lord Chancellor. This fellow is now in another heresy of fatal necessity, as though all things were so tied together, that of mere necessity all things must come to pass.

But Mr. Bradford desired him to take things as they be spoken, and not wrest them to a contrary sense. Your lordship, said he, doth discern betwixt God and man.
Things are not by fortune to God at any time; though to man they seem so sometimes. I speak but as the apostles did, "Lord (said they) see how Herod and Pontius Pilate, with the prelates, are gathered together against thy Christ, to do that which thy hand and counsel hath before ordained for them to do."

Here the lord chancellor began to read the excommunication. And in the excommunication, when he came to the name of John Bradford, lay-man: Why, (said he) art thou no priest?

Bradford. No, nor ever was either priest, or beneficed, or married, or any preacher, before public authority had established religion, or preacher after public authority had altered religion, and yet I am thus handled at your hands: but God, I doubt not, will give his blessing where you curse. And so he fell down on his knees, and heartily thanked God that he had counted him worthy to suffer for his name's sake; and prayed to God to give him repentance and a good mind. After the excommunication was read, he was delivered to the sheriff of London, and so had to the Clink, and afterwards to the Compter in the Poultry, in the City of London, this being proposed by his murderers, that he should be delivered from thence to the earl of Derby, to be conveyed into Lancashire, and there to be burned in the town of Manchester, where he was born: but their purpose concerning the place was afterwards altered, for he suffered in London.

After the condemnation of Mr. Bradford, which was the last day of January, Mr. Bradford being sent to prison, remained there till the first of July, during which time he sustained divers other conferences and conflicts with sundry adversaries, who repaired to him in the prison.

son. Of whom first bishop Bonner, coming to the Compter to degrade Dr. Taylor, the 4th day of February, began to discourse with the said Mr. Bradford; the effect whereof here ensueth.

A CONVERSATION between BISHOP BONNER and Mr. BRADFORD.

ON the 4th of February, the same day Mr. Rogers was burned, Bonner, bishop of London, came to the Poultry Compter to degrade Dr. Taylor, about one o'clock in the afternoon. But before he spake to Dr. Taylor, he called for John Bradford who was prisoner there, whom when he saw, he put off his cap, and gave him his hand, saying, Because I perceive that you are desirous to converse with some learned men, therefore I have brought Mr. Archdeacon Harpsfield to you. And I tell you, you do like a wise man. But I pray go roundly to work, for the time is but short.

Bradford. My lord, as roundly as I can I will go to work with you: I never desired to confer with any man, nor yet do. Howbeit, if you will have any one to talk with me, I am ready.

Bonner. What! (said the bishop in a fume to the keeper) did you not tell me that this man desired conference?

Keeper. No, my lord, I told you that he would not refuse to confer with any; but I did not say that it was his desire.

Bonner. Well, Mr. Bradford, you are well beloved, I pray you consider yourself, and refuse not charity when it is offered.

Bradford. Indeed, my lord, this is small charity, to condemn a man as you have condemned me, who never brake your laws. In Turkey a man may have charity, but in England I could not yet find it. I was condemned for my faith as soon as I uttered it at your requests, before I had committed anything against the laws. And as for conference, I am not afraid to talk with whom you will. But to say that I desire to confer, that do I not.

Bonner. Well, well. And so he called for Dr. Taylor, and Bradford went his way.

Upon another day in February, Mr. Willerton, chaplain to the bishop of London, came to confer with Mr. Bradford; but when he perceived that Mr. Bradford desired not his company, and therefore rather wished for his departing than his stay: Well, Mr. Bradford, said he, I pray you let us confer a little, perchance you may do me good, if I can do you none. Upon which words Mr. Bradford was content, and so they began to talk. Willerton spake much of the doctors, of the fathers, of the bread in the sixth of St. John, &c. labouring to prove transubstantiation, and that wicked men do receive Christ.

But Bradford on the contrary disproved his authorities, so that they came to this issue, that Willerton should draw his reasons out of the scriptures and doctors, and Bradford would peruse them; and if he could not answer them, then he would give place. Likewise also Mr. Bradford should draw his reasons out of the scriptures and doctors, to which Willerton should answer if he could: and so they departed for that day.

The next morning Mr. Willerton sent half a sheet of paper written on both sides, containing no reasons how he gathered his doctrine, but only bare sentences; "The bread which I will give is my flesh:" and the places in the xxvi. of Matthew, the xiv. of Mark, the xxii. of Luke, and the x. and xi. of the Corinthians, with some sentences of the doctors, all which made as much against him as for him.

In the afternoon he came himself, and there they had a long talk to little effect. At length Willerton began to talk of the church, saying, that Bradford swerved from the church.

Bradford. No, that I do not, but you do. For the church is Christ's spouse, and Christ's obedient spouse, which your church is not, which robbeth the people of the Lord's cup, and of service in the English tongue.

Willerton. Why? It is not profitable to have the service in English, for it is written, "The lips of the priest should keep the law, and out of his mouth man must look for knowledge."

Bradford. Should not the people then have the scriptures? Wherefore serveth this saying of Christ, "Search the scriptures?"

Willerton. This was not spoke to the people, but to the scribes and learned men.

Bradford. Then the people must not have the scriptures?

Willerton. No, for it is written, "They shall be taught of God."

Bradford. And must we learn all from the priests?

Willerton. Yea.

Bradford. Then I see you would bring the people to hang up Christ, and let Barabbas go, as the priests do then persuade the people. At which words Mr. Willerton was so offended, that he had no desire to talk any more. In the end Mr. Bradford gave him the reasons which he had gathered against transubstantiation, and desired him to frame his into the form of reasons, and then, said Bradford, I will answer them.

Willerton. Well, I will do so: but first I will answer your's. Which he never performed.

On the 12th of February, one of the earl of Derby's servants came to Mr. Bradford, saying, My lord hath sent me to you. he desireth you to tender yourself, and he will be a good lord to you.

Bradford. I thank his lordship for his good will towards me: but in this case I cannot tender myself more than God's honour will allow.

Servant. Ah, Mr. Bradford, consider your mother, sisters, friends, kinsfolk, and country, what a great discomfort will it be unto them to see you die as an heretic.

Bradford. I have learned to forsake father, mother, brother, sister, friends, and all that ever I have, yea even mine ownself; for else I cannot be Christ's disciple.

Servant. If my lord should obtain for you that you might depart the realm, would you not be content to be at the queen's appointment, where she would appoint you beyond the sea?

Bradford. No, I had rather be burned in England, than be burned beyond the seas. For I know if she should send me to Paris, Louvain, or some such place, immediately they would burn me.

Upon the 14th of February, Percival Creswell, an old acquaintance of Mr. Bradford's, came to him bringing with him a kinsman of Mr. Fecknam's, who after many words said:

Creswell. I pray you let me intercede for you.

Bradford. You may do what you will.

Creswell. But tell me what suit I shall make for you.

Bradford. Forsooth, what you please; do it not at my request, for I desire nothing at your hands. If the queen will give me life, I will thank her. If she will banish me, I will thank her. If she will burn me, I will thank her. If she will condemn me to perpetual imprisonment, I will thank her.

Hereupon Creswell went away, and about 11 o'clock he and the other man came again, and brought a book written by one More, desiring Mr. Bradford to read it over.

Bradford, taking the book, said, Good Percival, I am immoveably settled in this article.

Creswell. O, if every one loved me, do one thing for me.

Bradford. What is that?

Creswell. Desire and name what learned man or men you will have to come unto you. My lord of York, my lord of Lincoln, my lord of Bath, and others will gladly come unto you.

Bradford. No, never will I desire them, or any other to come to confer with me; for I am as certain of my doctrine as I am of any thing. But for your pleasure, and also that all men may know that I am not ashamed to have my faith sifted and tried, bring whom ye will, and I will talk with them. So they went their way.

About three o'clock in the afternoon, Dr. Harding who was then the bishop of Lincoln's chaplain, came to Mr. Bradford, and after a great and solemn protestation declaring that he had prayed to God before he came, to turn his talk to Bradford's good, he began to tell the good opinion he had of Bradford, and spent the time ch tattling, so that their talk was to little purpose; so that Mr. Bradford prayed him to consider from whence he was fallen, and not follow the world, nor to love it: for the love of God is not where the world is. But Harding counted Mr. Bradford in a damnable way, as one being out of the church, and therefore fired him to take care of his soul, and not to die in such an opinion.

What? Mr. Harding, said Mr. Bradford, I have heard with these ears maintain this what I now stand in.

Harding. I grant that I have taught the doctrine of substantiation was subtle doctrine, but otherwise I never taught it. And so he inveighing against marriages of priests, and namely against Peter Martyr, Martin Bucer, Luther, and such, who for breaking their vows were fully given up into heresies (as he said); Mr. Bradford taking him altogether given up to popery, after admonishing him thereof, bade him farewell.

Upon the 25th of February, Percival Creswell came with Mr. Harpsfield, archdeacon of London, and a servant waiting upon him. After formal salutations, he made a long oration, of which this is a short sum; that all men, even the Infidels, Jews, Turks, Anabaptists, and Libertines, desire happiness as well as the Christians, and that every one thinketh they shall attain to it by their religion. To which Mr. Bradford answered briefly, that he spake not far amiss.

Then said Harpsfield, But the way thither is not like: for the Infidels by Jupiter, Juno, &c. the Turk by his Alcoran, the Jew by his Talmud, do believe to me to heaven. For so may I speak of such as believe in immortality of the soul.

Bradford. You speak truly.

Harpsfield. Well, then, here is the matter, to know the way to this heaven.

Bradford. We are not to invent ways. There is but one way, and that is Jesus Christ, as he himself doth witness: "I am the way."

Harpsfield. What you say is true, and also false. I suppose what you mean by Christ, is believing in Christ.

Bradford. I have learned to discern betwixt faith and Christ. Albeit I confess; that whoso believeth in Christ, the same shall be saved.

Harpsfield. No, not all that believe in Christ; for some shall say, "Lord, Lord, have we not cast out devils?" &c. but Christ will answer in the day of judgment to these, "Depart from me, I know you not."

Bradford. You must make a difference betwixt believing, and saying I believe: as for example, if one should say and swear he loveth you, for all his saying and swearing you will not believe him, when you see he goeth about to utter and do all the evil against you that he can.

Harpsfield. Well, this is not very material. There is but one way, Christ. How came we to know him? Where shall we seek to find him?

Bradford. Forsooth, we must seek him by his word, and in his word, and after his word.

Harpsfield. Very good: but tell me how first we came into the company of them that could tell us this, but by baptism.

Bradford. Baptism is the sacrament, by which outwardly we are ingrafted into Christ: I say outwardly, because I dare not exclude from Christ all that die without baptism. I will not tie God, where he is not bound. Some infants die, whose parents desire baptism for them, and cannot have it.

Harpsfield. To these we may think perchance that God will shew mercy.

Bradford. Yes, the children whose parents do condemn baptism will not I condemn, because the child shall not bear the father's offence.

Harpsfield. Well, we agree, that by baptism then we are brought, and (as man would say) begotten to Christ. For Christ is our father, and the church his mother. As all men naturally have Adam for their father, and Eve for their mother; and as Eve was taken out of Adam's side, so was the church taken out of Christ's side; whereout flowed blood for the salvation and purgation of our sins.

Bradford. All this is truly spoken.

Harpsfield. Now then tell me whether this church of Christ hath not been always?

Bradford. Yes, since the creation of man, and shall be for ever.

Harpsfield. Very good. But tell me whether this church is a visible church, or no?

Bradford. It is no otherwise visible, than Christ was here on earth; that is, by no exterior pomp or shew that setteth her forth commonly, and therefore to see her we must put on such eyes, as good men put on to see and know Christ when he walked here on earth: for as Eve was of the same substance that Adam was of, so was the church of the same substance that Christ was of, "Flesh of his flesh, and bone of his bone;" as St. Paul saith, Ephes. v. Look therefore how Christ was visibly known to be Christ when he was on earth, that is, by considering him after the word of God; so is the church known.

Harpsfield. I do not come to reason at this present, and therefore I will go on forward. Is not this church a multitude?

Bradford. Yes, that it is. Howbeit, the snake lies hid in the grass, as the proverb is. For in your question is a subtlety. What visible multitude was there in Elijah's time, or when Moses was on the mount, Aaron and all Israel worshipping the calf?

Harpsfield. You wander from the matter.

Bradford. No, nothing at all. For I do prevent you, knowing well whereabouts you go. And therefore fewer words might very well serve.

Harpsfield. Well, I perceive you have knowledge, and by a little I see the more. Tell me yet further whether this multitude have not the ministry or preaching of God's word.

Bradford. Sir, you go about the bush. If you understand preaching for the confessing of the gospel, I will go with you: for else if you will, you may know that persecution often hindereth preaching.

Harpsfield. Well, I mean it so. Tell me yet more, hath it not the sacraments administered?

Bradford. It hath the sacraments, howbeit the administration of them is often hindered. But I will put you from your purpose, because I see whereabouts you go. If heretics have baptism, and do baptize, as they did in St. Cyprian's time, you know this baptism is baptism, and not to be reiterated. This Mr. Bradford spake that the standers by might observe, that though the popish church hath baptism, which we have received of them, yet notwithstanding it is not the true church, neither need we be baptized again.

Harpsfield. You go far from the matter, and I perceive you have more errors than one.

Bradford. So you say, but that is not enough till you prove it.

Harpsfield. Well, this church is a multitude. Hath it not the preaching of the gospel, and the administration of the sacraments? And yet more, hath it not the power of jurisdiction?

Bradford. What jurisdiction is exercised in persecution and affliction?

Harpsfield. I mean by jurisdiction, admonishing one another, and so forth.

Bradford. Well, go on, what then?

Harpsfield. It hath also succession of bishops. And here he made much ado to prove that this was an essential point.

Bradford. You say as you would have it; for if this part fail you, all the church you go about to set up will fall down. You shall not find in all the scripture, this your essential part of succession of bishops. In Christ's church Antichrist will sit. And Peter tells us, as it will be in the new church since Christ's coming: that is, as there were false prophets, and such as bear rule were adversaries to the true prophets; so shall there be (said he) false teachers, even of such as are bishops, and bear rule amongst the people.

Harpsfield. You go always out of the matter: but I will prove a further succession of bishops.

Bradford.

Bradford. Do so.

Harpsfield. Tell me, were not the apostles bishops?

Bradford. No, unless you will make a new definition of a bishop; that is, give him no certain place.

Harpsfield. Indeed, the apostles office was not the bishop's office; for it was universal, but yet Christ instituted bishops in his church, as St. Paul saith, he hath given pastors, prophets, &c. So that I think it may be proved from scripture, that the succession of bishops is an essential point.

Bradford. The ministry of God's word, and ministers, are an essential point. But to translate this to the bishops and their succession, is a plain subtlety: and therefore that it may be plain, I will ask you a question. Tell me, whether the scripture knew any difference between bishops and ministers, which ye call priests?

Harpsfield. No.

Bradford. Well then, go on forwards, and let us see what you shall get now by the succession of bishops: that is, of ministers which can be understood of such bishops as minister not, but lord it.

Harpsfield. I perceive that you are far out of the way. By your doctrine you can never shew in your church, a multitude which ministereth God's word and his sacraments, which hath jurisdiction and succession of bishops, which hath from time to time believed as you believe, beginning now, and so going upwards, as I will do of our doctrine: and therefore are you out of the church, and so cannot be saved. Perhaps you will bring me downwards a shew to blind people's eyes; but to go upwards, that you can never do, and this is the true trial.

Bradford. You must and will, I am assured, give me leave to follow the scriptures and examples of good men.

Harpsfield. Yes.

Bradford. Well then, Stephen was accused and condemned as I am, that he had taught new and false doctrine, before the fathers of the church then as they were taken. Stephen for his defence disproveth their accusation. But how? doth he it by going upwards? no, but by coming downwards, beginning at Abraham, and continuing still till Esaias's time, and the people's captivity. From whence he maketh a great leap until the time he was in, which was about 400 years, and called them by their right names, hell-hounds, rather than heaven-hounds. In this manner will I prove my faith, and that you can never do your's.

Harpsfield. Yes sir, if we knew that you had the Holy Ghost, then could we believe you. Here Bradford would have answered, that Stephen's enemies would not believe he had the Holy Ghost, and therefore they did as they did: but as he was speaking, Mr. Harpsfield rose up, and the keeper and others that stood by, began to talk gently, praying Mr. Bradford to take heed to what Mr. Archdeacon spake, who still said that Mr. Bradford was out of the church.

Bradford. Sir, I am most certain that I am in Christ's church, and I can shew a demonstration of my religion from time to time continually. So saying, Mr. Bradford uttered this short prayer.

"God our Father, for the name and blood of his Son Christ, be merciful unto us, and unto all his people, and deliver them from all false teachers, and blind guides, through whom, alas! I fear, much hurt will come to this realm of England. God our Father blest us, and keep us in his truth and poor church for ever." Amen.

Then the archdeacon departed, saying, that he would come again the next morning.

Upon the 16th of February, in the morning, the archdeacon, and the other two with him, came again, and after a few introductory words they sat down.

Mr. Archdeacon began a very long oration, first repeating what they had said, and how far they had gone over night, and therewith began to prove upwards, a succession of bishops here in England for 800 years; in France, at Lyons, for 1200 years; in Spain, at Hispalen, for 800 years; in Italy, at Milan, for 1200 years, labouring by this to prove his church. He used all his succession of bishops in the East church for the better confirmation of his words, and so concluded with an exhortation and an interrogation: the exhortation was, that Mr. Bradford would obey the church; the interrogation, whether Mr. Bradford could shew any such succession, for the demonstration of his church (for so he called it)?

Unto this long oration Mr. Bradford made this short answer; My memory is bad, so that I cannot particularly answer your oration.

Therefore I will do it generally, because your oration is rather to persuade than to prove, and therefore a small answer will serve. If Christ or his apostles, being here on earth, had been required by the prelates of the church then, to have made a demonstration of that church by succession of such high priests as had approved the doctrine which he taught, I think that Christ would have done as I do: that is, have alledged that which upholdeth the church, even the verity, the word of God, taught and believed, not by the high priests, which of long time had persecuted it, but by the prophets and other good simple men which perchance were counted heretics of the church: which church was not tied to succession, but to the word of God. And thus to think St. Peter giveth me occasion, when he saith that as I went in the church before Christ's coming, so shall I go in the church after his coming: but then the pillars of the church were persecutors of the church: therefore the like we must look for now.

Harpsfield. I can gather and prove succession in Jerusalem of the high-priests from Aaron's time.

Bradford. I grant it, but not such succession as allowed the truth.

Harpsfield. Why, did they not allow Moses's law?

Bradford. Yes, and keep it, as touching the books thereof, as you do the bible and holy scriptures. But the true interpretation and meaning of it they did corrupt as you have done and do, and therefore the persecution which they stirred up against the prophets and Christ was not for the law, but the interpretation of it. For they taught as you do now, that we must fetch the interpretation of the scriptures at your hands. But to make an end, death I look for daily, yea hourly, and I think my time is but very short; therefore I had need to spend as much time with God as I can whilst I have it, for his help and comfort; and therefore I pray you bear with me, that I do not now particularly and in more words answer your long talk. If I saw death not so near me as it is, I would then weigh every piece of your oration, you would give me the sum of it, and I would answer accordingly: but because I dare not, and will not leave off looking and preparing for that which is at hand, shall desire you to hold me excused, though I do as I do, and I heartily thank you for your gentle good will: I shall heartily pray God our Father to give you the same light and life which I wish to myself. And so Bradford began to rise up.

But then Mr. Archdeacon began to tell him he was in a very perilous case, and that he was sorry to see him so settled. As for death, whether it be nigh or far off, he knew not, neither matters it, so that you die well.

Bradford. I doubt not in this case, but that I shall die well: for as I hope and am certain my death shall please the Lord, so I trust I shall die cheerfully to the comfort of his children.

Harpsfield. But what if you be deceived?

Bradford. What if you should say the sun doth not now shine? (The sun shone through the window where they sat.)

Harpsfield. Well, I am sorry to see you so secure and careless.

Bradford. I am more carnally secure, and careless than I should be: God make me more vigilant. But in this case, I cannot be so secure, for I am most assured I am in the truth.

Harpsfield. That you are not; for you are out of the catholic church.

Bradford. No, though you have excommunicated me out of your church, yet I am in the catholic church by Christ, and am, and by God's grace shall be a child and an obedient child of it for ever. I hope Christ will have no less care for me, than he had for the blind man excommunicated out of the synagogue: and further, sure that the necessary articles of the faith, I mean twelve articles of the creed, I confess and believe that which you call the holy church, so that even the church hath taken too much upon her to excommunicate me for that, which by the testimony of my brother of Durham, in the book of the sacrament lately forth, was free many hundred years after Christ, to believe or not believe.

Harpsfield. What is that?

Bradford. Transubstantiation.

Harpsfield. Why, you are not condemned only for that.

Bradford. For that, and because I deny that wicked men do receive Christ's body.

Harpsfield. You agree not with us in the presence, in any thing else.

Bradford. How you believe you know: for my part, I confess a presence of whole Christ, God and man, to the faith of the receiver.

Harpsfield. Nay, you must believe a real presence in the sacrament.

Bradford. In the sacrament? Nay, I will not shut him in, nor tie him to it otherwise than faith seeth and receiveth. If I should include Christ really present in the sacrament, or tie him to it otherwise than to the faith of the receiver, then the wicked man would receive him, which I do not believe, and by God's grace never will.

Harpsfield. More is the pity: but a man may easily perceive you make no presence at all, and therefore you agree not therein with us.

Bradford. I confess a presence, and a true presence, not to the faith of the receiver.

What, (said one that stood by) of Christ's very body which died for us?

Bradford. Yes, even of whole Christ, God and man, to feed the faith of the receiver.

Harpsfield. Why, this is nothing else but to exclude the omnipotency of God, and all kind of miracle in the sacrament.

Bradford. I do not exclude his omnipotency, but you do it rather: for I believe that Christ can accomplish his promise, the substance of bread and wine being there, as well as the accidents, which you believe not. When we come to the sacrament, we come not to feed our bodies, and therefore we have but a little piece of bread; but we come to feed our souls with Christ by faith, which the wicked do want, and therefore they receive nothing but the bread of the Lord, as Judas did, and not bread the Lord, as the other apostles did.

Harpsfield. The wicked do receive the very body of Christ, but not the grace of his body.

Bradford. They receive not the body. For Christ's body is no dead carcase, he that receiveth it, receiveth the spirit, which is not without grace.

Harpsfield. Well, you have many errors. You count the mass an abomination, and yet St. Ambrose said mass, and so he read out of a written book, a sentence of St. Ambrose to prove it.

Bradford. Why, sir, the mass as it is now, was nothing so in St. Ambrose's time. Was not the most part of the canon made since by Gregory and Scholasticus?

Harpsfield. Indeed a great part of it was made (as you say) by Gregory; but Scholasticus was before St. Ambrose's time.

Bradford. I think not: however I will not contend. St. Gregory says, that the apostles said mass without the canon, only with the Lord's prayer.

Harpsfield. You say true: for the canon is not the greatest part of the mass, the greatest part is the sacrifice, elevation, transubstantiation, and adoration.

Bradford. I can away with none of them.

Harpsfield. No, I think the same: but yet "This do," tells plainly the sacrifice of the church.

Bradford. You confound sacrifices, not discerning betwixt the sacrifice of the church, and for the church. The sacrifice of the church is no propitiatory sacrifice, but a gratulatory sacrifice. And as for "This do," it is not referred to any sacrificing, but to the whole action of taking, eating, &c.

Harpsfield. You speak not learnedly now: for Christ made his supper only to the twelve apostles, not admitting his mother or any of the seventy disciples to it. Now the apostles do signify the priests.

Bradford. I think you speak as you would men should understand it: for else you would not keep the cup away from the laity. We have great cause to thank you, that you will give us of your bread. For I perceive you order the matter so, as though Christ had not commanded it to his whole church.

Then Harpsfield would have proved elevation by a place of Basilus.

Bradford. I have read the place, which seems to make nothing for elevation: but be it as it is, this is no time for me to scan the doubtful places of the doctors with you. I have been in prison long without books and all necessities for study, and now death draweth nigh, and by your leave I must now leave off, to prepare for it.

Harpsfield. If I could do you good, I would be right glad, either in soul or body. For you are in a perilous case both ways.

Bradford. Sir, I thank you for your good will. My case is as it is. I thank God it was never so well with me; for death shall be life.

Cresswell. It were best for you to desire Mr. Archdeacon that he would make suit for you, that you might have a time to confer.

Harpsfield. I will do the best I can; for I pity his case.

Bradford. Sir, I will not desire any body to sue for time for me. I am not wavering, neither would I that any body should think I were so. But if you have the charity and love you pretend towards me, and do think I am in an error, I think the same should move you to do as you would be done to. As you think of me, so do I of you, and that you are far out of the way, and I do not only think it, but am also thereof most assured. And with this and such like talk they departed.

On the 23d of the month, the archbishop of York, and the bishop of Chichester came to the Compter to speak with Mr. Bradford. When he was come before them, they both, and especially the bishop of York, used him very gently: they desired him to sit down, and because he would not, they also would not sit. So they all stood, and whether he would or not, they would needs have him put on, not only his night-cap, but his upper-cap also, saying unto him, That obedience was better than sacrifice.

While they were thus standing together, my lord of York began to tell Mr. Bradford that they came to him out of pure love and charity, without being sent; and himself also, for the acquaintance he had with Mr. Bradford, more than the bishop of Chichester had: and after commending Mr. Bradford's godly life, he concluded with this question, How he was certain of salvation and of his religion?

After thanks for their good will, Mr. Bradford answered, By the word of God, even by the scriptures, I am certain of salvation and religion.

York. Very well said: but how do you know the word of God and the scriptures, but by the church?

Bradford. Indeed my lord, the church was and is a means to bring a man to know the scriptures and the word of God, as the woman of Samaria was the means by which the Samaritans knew Christ: but when they had heard him speak, they said, Now we know that he is Christ, not because of thy words, but because we ourselves have heard; so after we come to the hearing and reading of the scriptures shewed unto us, and discerned by the church, we do believe them, and know them as Christ's sheep, not because the church saith they are the scriptures, but because they be so, being assured thereof by the same spirit which wrote and spake them.

York. You know in the apostles time at first the word was not written.

Bradford. True, if you mean it for some books of the New Testament; but else for the Old Testament St. Peter tells us, "We have a more sure word of prophecy;"

not that it is simply so, but in respect of the apostles, which being alive and subject to infirmity, attributed to the written word more weight, as where-with no fault can be found, whereas for the infirmity of their persons men perchance might have found some fault at their preaching; although in very deed no less obedience and faith ought to have been given to the one, than to the other; for all proceedeth from one spirit of truth.

York. That place of St. Peter is not so to be understood of the word written.

Bradford. Yes, sir, that it is, and of none other.

Chichester. Yes, indeed, Mr. Bradford doth tell you truly in that point.

York. Well, you know that Irenæus and others do magnify much, and alledge the church against the heretics, and not the scripture.

Bradford. True, for they had to do with such heretics as did deny the scriptures, and yet did magnify the apostles, so they were enforced to use the authority of those churches wherein the apostles had taught, and had still retained the same doctrine.

Chichester. You speak the very truth; for the heretics did refuse all scriptures, except it were a piece of St. Luke's gospel.

Bradford. Then the alledging of the church cannot be principally used against me, which am so far from denying of the scriptures, that I appeal to them utterly, as to the only judge.

York. A pretty matter, that you will take upon you to judge the church! I pray you, where hath your church been hitherto? For the church of Christ is catholic and visible hitherto.

Bradford. My lord, I do not judge the church when I discern it from the congregation, and those which be not the church; and I never denied the church to be catholic and visible, although at some times it is more visible than at others.

Chichester. I pray you tell me where the church which allowed your doctrine, was these 400 years?

Bradford. I will tell you my lord, or rather you shall tell yourself, if you will tell this one thing, Where the church was in Elijah's time, when Elijah said he was left alone?

Chichester. That is no answer.

Bradford. I am sorry that you say so: but this I will tell your lordship, that if you had the same eyes where-with a man might have espied the church then, you would not say it were no answer. The fault why the church is not seen by you, is not because the church is not visible, but because your eyes are not clear enough to see it.

Chichester. You are much deceived in making this comparison betwixt the church then and now.

York. Very well spoken, my lord; for Christ said, "I will build my church;" and not I do, or have built it: but I will build it.

Bradford. My lords, St. Peter teacheth me to make this comparison, saying, "As in the people there were false prophets, which were most in estimation before Christ's coming, so shall there be false teachers amongst the people after Christ's coming, and very many shall follow them." And as for your future tense, I hope your grace will not thereby conclude Christ's church not to have been before, but rather that there is no building in the church but Christ's work only: for Paul and Apollos be but waterers.

Chichester. In good faith I am sorry to see you so light in judging the church.

York. He hath taken upon him as they do all to judge the church. A man shall never come to certainty that doth as they do.

Bradford. My lords, I speak simply what I think, and desire reason to answer my objections. Your affections and sorrows cannot be my rules. If you consider the order and case of my condemnation, I cannot think but that it shall something move your honours. You know it well enough, (for you have heard it) no matter was laid against me, but was gathered upon mine own confession. Because I denied transubstantiation, and the wicked to receive Christ's body in the sacrament, therefore I was condemned and excommunicated, but not the church, although the pillars of the church (as they be accounted) did it.

Chichester. No; I heard say the cause of your imprisonment was, for that you exhorted the people to take the sword in one hand, and the mattock in the other.

York. Yea, and you behaved yourself before the council so stoutly at first, that you would defend the religion then; and therefore worthily were you imprisoned.

Bradford. Your grace heard me answer my lord chancellor to that point. But suppose I had been so far as they and your grace make it, were not the laws of the realm then on my side? Wherefore unjustly then was I imprisoned: only that which my lord chancellor pronounced, was my confession of Christ's truth against transubstantiation, and of that which the wicked do receive, as I said.

York. You deny the presence.

Bradford. I do not, to the faith of the worthy receivers.

York. Why? what is that to say other, than that Christ lieth not on the altar?

Bradford. My lord, I believe no such presence.

Chichester. It seemeth that you have not read Chrysostom: for he proveth it.

Bradford. Hitherto I have been kept well enough without books: howbeit this I do remember of Chrysostom, that he saith that Christ lieth upon the altar, and the seraphims with their tongues touch our lips with the coals of the altar in heaven, which is an hyperbolic speech, of which you know Chrysostom is full.

York. It is evident that you are too far gone; but let us come then to the church, out of which you are excommunicated.

Bradford. I am not excommunicated out of Christ's church, my lord, although they which seem to be of the church, and of the church, have excommunicated me, as the poor blind man was, John ix. I am sure Christ receiveth me.

Here, after much talk of excommunication, at length Mr. Bradford said:

Affuredly, as I think you did well to depart from the Romish church, so I think you have done wickedly to couple yourselves to it again; for you can never prove that, which you call the mother church, to be Christ's church.

Chichester. Ah, Mr. Bradford, you were but a child when this matter began. I was a young man, and then coming from the university, I went with the world; but I tell you it was always against my conscience.

Bradford. I was but a child then, howbeit as I told you, I think you have done evil. For you are come and have brought others to that wicked man which sitteth in the temple of God, that is, in the church: for it cannot be understood of Mahomet, or any out of the church, but of such as bear rule in the church.

York. See how you build your faith upon such places of scriptures as are most obscure, to deceive yourself, as though you were in the church, where you are not.

Bradford. Well, my lord, though I might by fruit judge of you and others, yet will I not utterly exclude you out of the church. And if I were in your case, I would not condemn him utterly that is of my faith in the sacrament, knowing as you know, that at least 800 years after Christ, as my lord of Durham writeth, I was free to believe or not believe transubstantiation.

York. This is a toy that you have found out of your own brain; as though a man not believing as the church doth, that is, transubstantiation, were of the church.

Chichester. He is an heretic, and so none of the church, that doth hold any doctrine against the definition of the church, as a man to hold against transubstantiation. Cyprian was no heretic, though he believed re-baptizing of them who were baptized by heretics, because he held it before the church had defined it, whereas if he had held it after, then had he been a heretic.

Bradford

Bradford. Oh my lord, will you condemn to the any man that believeth truly the twelve articles of faith, (wherein I take the unity of Christ's church to consist) although in some points he believe not the definition of that which you call the church? I doubt not that he which holdeth firmly the articles of our belief, though in other things he dissent from your definitions, yet he shall be saved.

York. Chichester. Yea, said both the bishops, this is our divinity.

Bradford. No, it is St. Paul's, who saith, that if they build upon the foundation, Christ, though they build upon straw and stubble, yet they shall be saved.

York. Lord God, how you delight to lean to so hard dark places of the scriptures.

Chichester. I will shew you that Luther did excommunicate Zuinglius for this matter, and so he read a piece of Luther making for his purpose.

Bradford. My lord, what Luther writeth, as you mind not, no more do I in this case. My faith is not built upon Luther, Zuinglius, or Oecolampadius, in this point:

I indeed to tell you truly, I never read any of their works in this matter. As for them, I do think assuredly that they were God's children, and are saints with him.

York. Well, you are out of the communion of the church.

Bradford. I am not, for it consisteth and is in faith.

York. Lo, how you make your church invisible; for it would have the communion of it consist in faith.

Bradford. For to have communion with the church consisteth no visibleness of it; for communion consisteth, I said, in faith, and not in exterior ceremonies, as appeareth both by St. Paul, who would have one faith, and by Irenæus to Victor, for the observation of Easter, saying, that disagreeing about fasting should not break agreement of faith.

Chichester. The same place hath often even wounded conscience, because we separated ourselves from the church of Rome.

Bradford. Well, God forgive you, for you have done ill in bringing England thither again.

Here my lord of York took a paper-book of common places, and read a piece of St. Augustine, how that there were many things that held St. Augustine in the bosom of the church; consent of people and nations, authority confirmed with miracles, nourished with peace, increased with charity, established with antiquity: besides this, there holdeth me in the church, said St. Augustine, the succession of priests from Peter's seat until his present bishop. Last of all, the very name of catholic did hold me, &c. Lo (said he) how say you to this St. Augustine? Paint me out your church thus.

Bradford. My lord, the words of St. Augustine make much for me as for you: although I might answer, at all this, if they had been so firm as you make them, might have been alledged against Christ and his apostles. For there was the law and the ceremonies consented to by the whole people, confirmed with miracles, antiquity, and continual succession of bishops from Aaron's time until that present.

Chichester. In good faith, Mr. Bradford, you make too much of the state of the church before Christ's coming.

Bradford. Therein I do but as St. Peter teacheth, 2 Cor. ii. and St Paul very often. You would gladly have your church here very glorious, like a most pleasant city. But Christ saith, and so may his church say, blessed are they that are not offended at me."

York. Yea, you think that none is of the church, that such as suffer persecution.

Bradford. What I think, God knoweth: I pray your grace to judge me by my words, and mark what St. Paul saith; "All that will live godly in Christ Jesus, shall suffer persecution." Sometimes Christ's church hath rest here; but commonly it is not so, and especially towards the end her form will be more unseemly.

York. But what say you to St. Augustine? Where your church that hath the consent of the people and bishops?

Bradford. Even all people and nations that be God's people have consented with me, and I with them in the doctrine of faith.

York. Lo; you go about to shift off all things.

Bradford. No, my lord; I mean simply, and God knoweth I so speak.

York. St. Augustine doth here talk of succession; even from St. Peter's seat.

Bradford. Yea, that seat then was not so much corrupt as it is now.

York. Well, you always judge the church.

Bradford. No, my lord; Christ's sheep discern Christ's voice, but they judge it not; so they discern the church, but judge her not.

York. Yes, that they do.

Bradford. Not so, please your grace: and yet full well may one not only doubt, but judge also of the Romish church; for she obeyeth not Christ's voice, as Christ's true church doth.

York. Wherein?

Bradford. In Latin service, and robbing the laity of Christ's cup in the sacrament, and in many other things, in which it committeth most horrible sacrilege.

Chichester. Why? Latin service was in England when the pope was gone.

Bradford. True; the time was in England when the pope was away, but not all popery; as in king Henry's days.

York. Latin service was appointed to be sung and had in the choir, where only were the clergy, that is, such as understood Latin, the people sitting in the body of the church praying their own private prayers; and this may well be yet seen by making of the chancel and choir, so as the people could not come in, or hear them.

Bradford. Yea, but in St. Chrysostom's time, and also in the Latin church in St. Jerom's time, all the church, said he, answereth again mightily, Amen. Whereby we may see that the prayers were made so, that both the people heard them and understood them.

Chichester. You are to blame; to say that the church robbeth the people of the cup.

Bradford. Well, my lord, term it as you please: all men know that the laity hath none of it.

Chichester. Indeed I wish the church would define again, that they might have it, for my part.

Bradford. If God make it free, who can define to make it bond?

York. Well, Mr. Bradford, we lose our labour; for you seek to put away all things which are told you for your good: your church no man can know.

Bradford. Yes, that you well may.

York. I pray you whereby?

Bradford. Forsooth Chrysostom saith, only by the scriptures: and this you well know he speaketh very often.

York. Indeed that of Chrysostom is an imperfect work, which may be doubted of. The church is best known by succession of bishops.

Bradford. No, my lord, Lyra upon Matthew writeth full well, that "The church consisteth not in men by reason either of secular or temporal power, but in men endued with true knowledge, and confession of faith, and of verity."

And in Hilary's time; you know he writeth to Auxentius, that the church was hidden rather in caves and holes, than did glister and shine in thrones of pre-eminence.

Then came one of the servants, and told them, that my lord of Durham tarried for them at the archbishop of York's house; and this was after that they had been three hours with Mr. Bradford. And after the man was come, they put up their written books of common places, and said that they lamented his case: they desired him to read over a book which did Mr. Crome good; and so wishing him good in words, they went their way, and poor Bradford to his prison.

After this communication with the bishops was ended; within two days following came into the Compter two Spanish friars to talk with Mr. Bradford, sent (as they said) by the earl of Derby; of whom one was the king's confessor, the other was Alphonsus, who had before written a popish book against heresies, the effect of which their reasoning here likewise followeth.

Upon the 25th day of February, about eight o'clock in the morning, when these two friars came to the Compter where Mr. Bradford was prisoner, they desired he might be called. Then one friar, who was the king's confessor, asked in Latin (for all their discourse was in Latin) of Bradford, whether he had not seen or heard of one Alphonfus that had written against heresies.

Bradford. I do not know him.

Confessor. Well, this man (pointing to Alphonfus) is he. We are come to you of love and charity, by the means of the earl of Derby, because you desire to confer with us.

Bradford. I never desired your coming, nor to confer with you, or any other. But seeing you are come of charity, as you say, I cannot but thank you: and as concerning conference, though I desire it not, yet I will not refuse to talk with you if you will.

Alphonfus. It were requisite that you did pray to God, that you might follow the direction of God's Spirit, that he would inspire you, so that you be not addicted to your own self-will or wit.

Whereupon Mr. Bradford made a prayer, and besought God to direct all their wills, words, and works, as the will, words, and works of his children for ever.

Alphonfus. Yea, you must pray with your heart. For if you speak with the tongue only, God will not give you his grace.

Bradford. Sir, do not judge, lest you be judged. You have heard my words; now charity would have you leave the judgment of the heart to God.

Alphonfus. You must be as it were a neuter, and not wedded to yourself, but as one standing in doubt: pray and be ready to receive what God shall inspire; for in vain labourereth our tongue to speak else.

Bradford. Sir, my sentence, if you mean it for religion, must not be in doubting or uncertainty, as I thank God I am certain in that for which I am condemned: I have no cause to doubt of it, but rather to be more certain of it; and therefore I pray God confirm me more in it, for it is his truth; and because it is so certain and true that it may abide the light, I dare be bold to have it looked on, and confer it with you, or any man; in respect whereof I am both glad of your coming, and thank you for it.

Alphonfus. What is the matter whereof you were condemned? we know not.

Bradford. Sir, I have been in prison almost two years: I never transgressed any of their laws for which I might justly be imprisoned, and now I am condemned, only because I frankly confessed, whereof I repent not, my faith concerning the sacrament, when I was demanded in these two points; one, that there is no transubstantiation; the other, that the wicked do not receive Christ's body.

Alphonfus. Let us look a little on the first. Do you not believe that Christ is present really and corporally in the form of bread?

Bradford. No, I do believe that Christ is present to the faith of the worthy receiver, as there is present bread and wine to the senses and outward man: as for any such presence of including and placing Christ, I believe not, nor dare I believe.

Alphonfus. I am sure you believe Christ's natural body is circumscribable.

And here he made much ado of the two natures of Christ, how that the one is every-where, and the other is in his proper place, demanding such questions as no wise man would have spent any time about. At length, because the friar had forgot to conclude, Mr. Bradford put him in mind of it, and thus then at last he concluded, How that because Christ's body was circumscribable; concerning the human nature in heaven, therefore it was so in the bread.

Bradford. How hangeth this together? Even as if you should say; Because you are here, therefore it must needs follow that you are at Rome. For thus you reason; Because Christ's body is in heaven, therefore it is in the sacrament under the form of bread: which no wise man will grant.

Alphonfus. Why? will you believe nothing but that which is expressly spoken in the scriptures?

Bradford. Yes, sir, I will believe whatsoever you shall by demonstration out of the scriptures declare unto me.

He is obstinate, quoth Alphonfus to his fellow: then turning to Bradford, said, Is not God able to do what he will?

Bradford. Yes, but here the question is of God's power, and not of his power.

Alphonfus. Why? doth he not say plainly, This is my body?

Bradford. Yes, and I deny not but that it is so, the faith of the worthy receiver.

Alphonfus. To the faith! how is that?

Bradford. Forsooth sir, as I have no tongue to express it: so I know you have no ears to hear and understand it. For faith is more than man can utter.

Alphonfus. But I can tell all that I believe.

Bradford. You believe not much then. For if you believe the joys of heaven, and believe no more than you can tell, you will not yet desire to come thither. For as the mind is more capable and received than the mouth, so it conceiveth more than the tongue can express.

Alphonfus. Christ saith it is his body.

Bradford. And so say I, after a certain manner.

Alphonfus. After a certain manner! that is, after another manner than it is in heaven.

Bradford. St. Augustine telleth it more plainly, that it is Christ's body after the same manner as circumcision was the covenant of God, and the sacrament of faith; or to make it more plain, as baptism and water of baptism is regeneration.

Alphonfus. Very well said: baptism and the water thereof, is a sacrament of God's grace and Spirit in the water cleansing the baptized.

Bradford. No, sir, away with your inclosing: but I grant, that after the same sort Christ's body is in the bread, in which sort the grace and Spirit of God is in the water.

Alphonfus. God's grace is in the water by signification.

Bradford. So is the body in the bread in the sacrament.

Alphonfus. You are much deceived, in that you make no difference between the sacraments that be by-standers and the sacraments that are transitory and passers by. As for example, the sacrament of orders, which you deny, though St. Augustine affirmeth it, is a stander although the ceremony be past. But in baptism, so long as the body is washed, the water ceaseth to be a sacrament.

Bradford. Very good, and so it is in the supper of the Lord; no longer than it is in use, is it Christ's sacrament.

Here the friar was in a wonderful rage, and spake loud (as he had often done before) that the whole house rang again. This friar had the character of being a very learned man, but surely by his behaviour here he had very little patience, for if Bradford had been a thing hot, one house could not have held them. At length they came to this point, That Bradford could find in scripture that baptism and the Lord's supper bare any similitude together. And here he triumphed before the conquest, saying, that these men would have nothing but scripture, and yet are able to prove nothing by the scripture.

Bradford. Be patient, and you shall see that by scripture I will find baptism and the Lord's supper coupled together.

Alphonfus. No, that thou canst never do. Let me have a text of it.

Bradford. St. Paul saith, "That as we are baptized into one body, so were we Potati in uno spiritu, i. e. we have drank of one spirit," meaning the cup in the Lord's supper.

Alphonfus. St. Paul hath no such words.

Bradford. Yes, that he hath.

Confessor. I think he hath not.

Bradford. Give me a Testament, and I will shew you So a priest that sat by them gave him his Testament and he shewed them the plain text. Then they looked one upon another. In fine, the friar made this shift, that St. Paul spake not of the sacrament.

Bradford. Well, the text is plain enough, and there any of the fathers which do so understand the place :

Chrysoſtom doth expound it ſo.

Alphonſus which had the Teſtament in his hand, devoutly ſuppreſs this foil, turned the leaves of the book from leaf to leaf, till he came to the place, 1 Cor. xi.
and there he read how that he was guilty, which made difference of the Lord's body.

Bradford Yea, but therewith he ſaith, "He that eat-eth of the bread :" calling it bread ſtill : and that after conſecration (as you call it), as in the tenth of the Corinthians he ſaith, "The bread which we break," &c.

Alphonſus. Oh how ignorant are you, who know not at things after their conversion do retain the ſame things which they had before, as Moſes's rod : and ſtill for a bible, after he had found the place he gan to triumph. But Bradford cooled him quickly, ſaying,

Sir, there is mention made of the conversion, as well that the ſame appeared to the ſenſe. But here you cannot find it ſo. Find me one word how the bread is converted, and I will then ſay, you bring ſome matter to maketh for you.

At theſe words Alphonſus was troubled, and at length
ſaid, That Bradford hanged on his own ſenſe.

Bradford. No, that do I not : for I will bring you the writings of the church 800 years after Chriſt, to confirm what I ſpeak.

Alphonſus. No, you have the church againſt you.

Bradford. I have not Chriſt's church againſt me.

Alphonſus. Yes, that you have. What is the church ?

Bradford. Chriſt's wife, the chair and ſeat of truth.

Alphonſus. Is ſhe viſible ?

Bradford. Yes, ſhe is ſo to them that will put on the ſpectacles of God's word to look on her.

Alphonſus. This church hath defined the contrary, and that I will prove by all the good fathers from Chriſt's aſcension, even for 800 years at leaſt continually.

Bradford. What will you ſo prove ? Tranſubſtantiation ?

Alphonſus. Yea, that the bread is turned into Chriſt's body.

Bradford. You ſpeak more than you can do.

Alphonſus. That do I not.

Bradford. Then will I give place.

Alphonſus. Will you believe ?

Bradford. Belief is God's gift ; therefore I cannot promiſe : but I tell you I will give place : and I hope I will believe his truth always, ſo good is he to me in Chriſt my Saviour.

Here the friar found great fault with Mr. Bradford's ſwer. But this he let paſs, and repeated his queſtion, he could prove it as he ſaid, whether he would give place ?

Bradford. Yes, that I will. Then called he for paper, pen, and ink, to write ; and then ſaid I, Suppoſe that I prove by the teſtimony of the fathers, that continually for 800 years after Chriſt at leaſt, they did believe that the ſubſtance of bread doth remain in the ſa-crament, what will you do ?

Alphonſus. I will give place.

Bradford. Then write you here that you will give place if I ſo prove, and I will write that I will give place if you ſo prove ; becauſe you are the elder, you will have the pre-eminency.

Here the friar fumed marvellouſly, and ſaid ; I came to learn from thee ; are not here witneſſes ? (meaning the prieſts) are not they ſufficient ? But the man was ſo angry, that if Mr. Bradford had not paſſed over this matter of writing, the friar would have gone plain ſcolding.

At length the king's confeſſor asked Bradford what his ſecond queſtion was ?

Bradford. That wicked men receive not Chriſt's body in the ſacrament, as St. Auguſtine ſpeaketh of Judas, that he received the bread of the Lord, but not bread of the Lord.

Alphonſus. St. Auguſtine ſaith not ſo.

Bradford. Yes, that he does. So they aroſe and talked no more of the matter. Thus went they away, without ſaying Bradford farewell.

After they were gone, one of the prieſts came, and ſaid Bradford not to be ſo obſtinate.

Bradford. Sir, be not you ſo wavering : in all the ſcriptures you cannot find theſe words. There is not bread.

Prieſt. Yes, that I can, in five places.

Bradford. Then I will eat your book. So the book was opened, but no place found : and he went his way ſmiling. God help us !

It followed after this, upon the 21ſt of March, that by means of one of the earl of Derby's men, there came to the Compter to dinner one Mr. Collier, once warden of Manchester, and the ſaid ſervant of the earl of Derby, of whom Mr. Bradford learned, that Dr.
Weſton, dean of Weſtminſter, would be with him in the afternoon about two o'clock. At dinner time, when the ſaid warden diſcommended king Edward, and went about to ſet forth the authority of the pope, which Bradford withſtood, defending the king's faith, that it was catholic ; and that the authority of the biſhop of Rome's ſupremacy was uſurped, bringing forth the teſtimony of Gregory, which affirmeth the name of ſupreme head, to be a title of the forerunner to Antichriſt ; a woman prisoner was brought in, whereupon the ſaid Bradford took occaſion to riſe from the table, and ſo went to his prison chamber to pray to God for his grace and aſſiſtance therein, continuing there till he was called down to ſpeak with Dr. Weſton, who was then come in.

Mr. Bradford then being called down, as ſoon as he entered into the hall, Dr. Weſton very gently took him by the hand, and asked how he did, with ſuch other talk. At length he deſired them to go out of the chamber : ſo they all went out, ſave Dr. Weſton himſelf, Mr.
Collier, the earl of Derby's ſervant, the ſub-dean of Weſtminſter, the keeper, Mr. Claydon, and the parſon of the church near the Compter.

Now when he began with Mr. Bradford, to tell how that he had often intended to have come unto him, being deſired by the earl of Derby : and (ſaid he) after I perceived by this man, that you could be contented rather to ſpeak with me, than any other, I could not but come to do you all the good I can ; for you may be ſure I will never hurt you.

Sir, replied Mr. Bradford, when I perceived by the report of my lord's ſervant, that you did bear me good will, more (as he ſaid) than any other of your ſort, I told him then, that I could be better content and more willing to talk with you, if you ſhould come unto me.
This did I ſay : otherwiſe I deſired not your coming.

Weſton. Well, Mr. Bradford, now I am come to talk with you : but before we enter into any talk, certain principles we muſt agree upon, which ſhall be this day's work.

Fiſt, ſaid he, I ſhall deſire you to put away all vain glory, and not hold any thing for the praiſe of the world.

Bradford. Sir, St. Auguſtine maketh that indeed a piece of the definition of an heretic ; which if I cannot put away clean, (for I think there will be a ſpice of it remain in us, as long as this fleſh liveth) yet I promiſe you by the grace of God, that I purpoſe not to yield to it. God I hope will never ſuffer it to bear rule in them that ſtrive againſt it, and deſire all the dregs of it utterly to be driven out of us.

Weſton. I am glad to hear you ſay ſo, although indeed
I think you do not ſo much eſteem it as others do.

Secondly, I would deſire you that you will put away ſingularity in your judgment and opinions.

Bradford. Sir, God forbid that I ſhould ſtick to my ſin-gularity or private judgment in God's religion. Hitherto I have not deſired it, neither do, nor mind at any time to hold any other doctrine than is public and catholic, (underſtand catholic as good men do) according to God's word.

Weſton. Very well, this is a good day's work, I hope to do you good : and therefore now thirdly, I ſhall pray you to write me the heads of thoſe things whereupon you ſtand in the ſacrament, and to ſend them to me betwixt this and Wedneſday next : until which time, yea, until I come to you again, be aſſured that you are without all peril of death. Of my fidelity, I warrant you, therefore away with all doubts, &c.

Bradford. Sir, I will write to you the grounds I lean to in this matter. As for death, if it come, welcome be it; this which you require of me, shall be no great hindrance to me therein.

Weston. You know that St. Augustine was a Manichean, yet was he converted at length; so that I have good hope of you.

Bradford. Sir; because I will not flatter you, I would you should flatly know, that I am even settled in that religion for which I am condemned.

Weston. Yea, but if it be not the truth, and you see evident matter to the contrary, will you not then give place?

Bradford. God forbid, but that I should always give place to the truth.

Weston. I would have you so to pray.

Bradford. So I do, and that he will more and more confirm me in it, as I thank God he hath done and doth.

Weston. Yea, but pray with a condition, if you be in it.

Bradford. No, sir, I cannot pray so, because I am settled and assured of his truth.

Well, said Weston, as the learned bishop answered St. Augustine's mother, that though he was obstinate, yet the tears of such a mother could not but win her son: so also I hope your prayers (for then Bradford's eyes did shew that he had wept in prayer) cannot but be heard by God, though not as you would, yet as best shall please him. Do you not remember the history thereof?

Bradford. Yea, sir, I think it is of St. Ambrose.

Weston. No, that it is not. And here Weston would have laid a wager, and began to triumph, saying to Bradford, As you are overseen herein, so are you in other things.

Bradford. Well, sir, I will not contend with you for the name. This (I remember) St. Augustine writeth in his confessions.

After this talk Dr. Weston began to tell Mr. Bradford, that the people were persuaded by him to withstand the queen.

Whereunto Bradford answering again, bade him hang him up as a traitor and a thief, if ever he encouraged any to rebellion: his keeper and the priests that were there, affirmed the same. At that time there was much talk to little purpose. Dr. Weston declared moreover, that he had saved men going in the cart to be hanged, and such like.

The end was this, that Bradford should send unto him the heads of the doctrine of the supper, and after Wednesday he would come unto him again; and thus he departed, after he had drunk to him in beer and wine.

We omit here talk of Oxford, of books of German writers, the fear of death, and such other talk, which are to no purpose.

In the mean time, when Mr. Bradford had written his reasons and arguments, and had sent them to Dr. Weston, soon after, about the 28th of March, there came to the Compter Dr. Pendleton, and with him the aforesaid Mr. Collier, sometime warden of Manchester, and Stephen Bech. After salutations, Dr. Pendleton began to speak to Mr. Bradford, that he was sorry for his trouble. And further, said he, after that I knew you could be content to talk with me, I made the more speed, being as ready to do you good, and serve you what I can, as you would wish.

Bradford. Sir, the matter how I was content to speak with you was on this sort: Mr. Bech often asked me whom he should bring unto me, and named you amongst others; and I said I would rather speak with you than with any other. Now the cause why I so would, I will briefly tell you. I remember that once you were, (as far as any man might judge) of the religion that I am of at present, and I remember that you have earnestly set forth the same. Gladly therefore would I learn of you what thing it was that moved your conscience to alter, and gladly would I see what thing it is that you have seen since which you saw not before.

Pendleton. I do not know for what you are condemned.

Bradford. Transubstantiation is the cause for which I am condemned, and because I deny that wicked men do receive Christ's body: wherein I would desire you to shew me what reasons which before you knew not, do move your conscience now to alter. For once, (as I said) you were as I am in religion.

Here Mr. Pendleton, half amazed, began to excuse himself, as though he had not fully denied transubstantiation indeed, although I said, says he, that the word was not in scripture; and so he made an endless tale of the thing that moved him to alter: but (said he) I will gather you the places which moved me, and send you them. And here he desired Mr. Bradford that he might have a copy of that which he had sent to Dr. Weston; which Mr. Bradford promised him.

Some reasoning also they had, whether evil men did receive Christ's body. Bradford denying, and Pendleton affirming. Mr. Bradford said, that they received not the spirit: therefore, not the body; for it is no dead carcase. Hereto Mr. Bradford brought also St. Augustine, how Judas received "the bread of the Lord," and not "bread the Lord," and that he must be Christ's body, which must receive the body of Christ. Pendleton went about to put it away with Idem, and not Ad idem, and how that In Corpore Christi was to be understood of all that are in the visible church of God elect. Mr. Bradford denied this to be St. Augustine's meaning, and said also that the allegation of Idem, and not Ad idem, could not make for that purpose. They talked more of transubstantiation, Pendleton quoting Cyprian, The nature of bread is changed, &c. And Mr. Bradford said, that in that place, nature did not signify substance. As the nature of an herb is not the substance of it; so the bread changed in nature is not to be taken for changed in substance: for now it is ordained not for food of the body simply, but rather for the soul. Here also Bradford alledged the opinion of Gelasius. Pendleton said, he was a pope. Yes, said Bradford, but his faith was my faith in the sacrament if you would receive it.

They reasoned also whether accidents were things or no. If they are things, said Mr. Bradford, then they are substances; and if they be substances, they are earthly: and then there are earthly substances in the sacrament as Irenæus says, which must needs be bread. But Pendleton said, that the colour was the earthly thing, and called it an accidental substance.

We omit what passed about my lord of Canterbury of Peter Martyr's book; of Pendleton's letter laid to Bradford's charge when he was condemned, with other talk about the church; whether Die Ecclesie was spoken of the universal church, or of a particular church, (at length Mr. Pendleton granted that it was spoken of a particular church) also of vain-glory, which he desired Mr. Bradford to beware of, and such like talk. A little before his departing Mr. Bradford said thus: Master Doctor, as I said to Dr. Weston before, so I say to you now, that I am the same man in religion against transubstantiation still, as I was when I came into prison; for hitherto I have seen nothing in any one point to convince me of the contrary. At which words Mr. Pendleton was something moved, and said it was not catholic doctrine. Yes, says Mr. Bradford, and that will prove even by the testimony of the catholic fathers until the council of Lateran, or thereabouts. Then Pendleton went his way, saying that he would often come to Mr. Bradford.

The same day in the afternoon, about five o'clock Dr. Weston came to Mr. Bradford, and after general salutations, he desired every man present to depart and they sat down. And after he had thanked Mr. Bradford for his writing to him, he pulled out of his bosom the writing which Mr. Bradford had sent him. The writing is as follows:

CERTAIN REASONS against TRANSUBSTANTIATION, collected by MR. JOHN BRADFORD, and given to DR. WESTON, and Others.

THAT which is former (saith Tertullian) is true; that which is latter is false. But the doctrine of transubstantiation is a late doctrine, for it was not defined generally before the council of Lateran, about 1215 years after Christ's coming, under pope Innocent, the third of that name. For before that time it was free for men to believe, or not believe it, as the bishop of Durham doth witness in his book of the presence of Christ in his supper, lately published. Therefore, the doctrine of transubstantiation is false.

2. That the words of Christ's supper be figurative, the circumstances of the scriptures, the analogy or proportion of the sacraments, and the opinions of all the holy fathers, which were, and wrote for the space of 1000 years after Christ's ascension, do teach: whereupon it follows, there was no transubstantiation.

3. That the Lord gave to his disciples bread, and called it his body, the scriptures do witness. For he took that, and called it his body, which he took in his hand, whereon he gave thanks, which also he gave, and gave to his disciples, that is to say, bread, as the fathers Irenæus, Tertullian, Origen, Cyprian, Epiphanius, Augustine, and all the residue which are of antiquity, do affirm: but inasmuch as the substance of bread and wine is another thing than the substance of the body and blood of Christ, it plainly appeareth that there is no transubstantiation.

4. The bread is no more transubstantiated than the wine: for that the wine is not transubstantiated, St. Matthew and St. Mark teach us: for they witness that Christ said, I would drink no more of the fruit of the vine, which was not blood but wine: and therefore it follows, that there is no transubstantiation. Chrysostom upon St. Matthew, and Cyprian do affirm this reason.

5. As the bread in the Lord's supper is Christ's natural body, so it is his mystical body: for the same spirit that spake of it, This is my body, said also, for we many are one bread, one body, &c. but now it is not the mystical body by transubstantiation, and therefore it is not his natural body by transubstantiation.

6. The words spoken over the cup in St. Luke and St. Paul, are not so mighty and effectual, as to transubstantiate it: for then the cup, or that which is in it, should be transubstantiated into the New Testament: therefore the words spoken over the bread, are not so mighty as to make transubstantiation.

7. All that doctrine which agreeth with those churches which be apostolical mother churches, is to be counted for truth, because it holdeth that which these churches received of the apostles, the apostles of Christ, and Christ of God. But it is manifest that the doctrine taught at this present by the church of Rome, concerning transubstantiation, doth not agree with the apostolical and mother churches of Greece, of Corinth, of Philippos, Colossia, Thessalonica, and Ephesus, which never taught transubstantiation; yea, it agreeth not with the doctrine of the church of Rome, as it was taught in times past. For pope Gelasius, setting forth the doctrine which that see then held, doth manifestly confute the error of transubstantiation, and reproveth them for sacrilege who divided the mystery, and kept the cup from the laity: therefore the doctrine of transubstantiation agreeth not with the truth.

This was the writing which Weston pulled out of his bosom; and yet before he began to read it, he told Mr. Bradford that he had inquired of his conversation at Cambridge since his last being with him; and, said he, because you are a man not given to the glory of the world, I will speak it before your face; your life I have learned was always such there, as all men, even the greatest enemies you have, cannot but praise, and therefore I love you much better than ever I did; but now I will read over your arguments, and so we will confer them. They are such that a man may well perceive you stand on conscience, and therefore I am the more ready and glad to pity you. So he began to read the first, to which he said, that though the word transubstantiation began but lately, yet the thing always was, and hath been since Christ's institution.

Bradford. I do not contend, or insist upon the word only, but upon the thing which is as new as the word.

Then Dr. Weston went to the second, and there brought out St. Augustine, how that if an evil man going to the devil, did make his will, his son and heir would not say his father did lie in it, or speak tropically: much more Christ, going to God, did never lie, or use any figurative speech in his last will and testament. Do you not remember this place of St. Augustine? said he.

Bradford. Yes, sir, but I do not remember he hath those words tropically, or figuratively, as you rehearse them: for any man may speak a thing figuratively and not lie: and so Christ did in his last supper.

After this Dr. Weston went to the third, and brought forth Cyprian, how that the nature of bread is turned into flesh. Here, says he, my lord of Canterbury expoundeth nature for quality, by Gelasius. Which interpretation serves for the answer of your argument, that Christ called bread his body: that is, the quality, form, and appearance of bread. And further, the scripture is wont to call things by the same names which they had before, as Simon the leper; he was not so at that time, but because he had been so.

Bradford. Cyprian wrote before Gelasius; therefore Cyprian must not expound Gelasius, but Gelasius Cyprian; and so they both teach, that bread remaineth still. As for things having still the names they had, it is no answer, except you could shew that this now were not bread, as easily as a man might have known and seen then Simon to have been healed and clear from his leprosy.

After this Dr. Weston went to the fourth, of the cup, which he did not fully read, but digressed into a long talk of Cyprian's epistle De Aquatilis, also of St. Augustine, expounding the breaking of bread by Christ to his two disciples going to Emmaus, to be the sacrament; with such other talk to little purpose: and therefore Mr. Bradford prayed him, that inasmuch as he had written the reasons that established his faith against transubstantiation, so he would likewise do to him, that is, answer him by writing, and shew him more reasons in writing to confirm transubstantiation. This Dr. Weston promised to do, and said that he would send or bring it to Mr. Bradford again within three days.

Thus when he had read over the arguments, and here and there spoke little to the purpose for the avoiding of them, and Mr. Bradford had prayed him to give him his answers in writing: then he began to tell Mr. Bradford how and what he had done for Mr. Grimoald, and that Mr. Bradford needed not to fear any reproach or slander he should suffer, meaning probably to have Mr. Bradford secretly to come to them as Grimoald did; for he subscribed.

Bradford. Mr. Dean, I would not have you conceive I mind the shame of men in this matter; I would rather have you think as the very truth is, that hitherto I have not heard or seen any thing to weaken my faith against transubstantiation, so I am no less settled in it than I was at my first coming hither. I love to be plain with you, and to tell you at first as you shall find at the last.

West. Indeed, Mr. Bradford, I love you better for your plainness: and do not think otherwise of me, but that you shall find me plain in all my talk with you.

Here Weston began to ask Mr. Bradford of his imprisonment and condemnation; and Mr. Bradford told him altogether how he had been handled. Whereat Weston seemed to wonder: yea, in plain words he said, that Mr. Bradford had been handled otherwise than he had given cause; and so shewed him, that my lord of Bath reported that he had deserved a benefit at the queen's hand, and at all the council's.

In this kind of talk they spent almost an hour, and Mr. Bradford, being weary, rose up, and Weston called the keeper, and before him he bade Bradford be of good comfort, and he told him he was in no danger of death.

Sir,

Sir, says the keeper, but it is in every man's mouth that he shall die to-morrow.

Whereat Weston seemed half amazed, and said, he would go say even-song before the queen, and speak to her in his behalf. But it is to be thought that the queen had almost supped at that time; for it was past six o'clock.

Before the keeper, Mr. Bradford told Weston again, that still he was one man, and even as he was at the first; and till he should see matter to teach his conscience the contrary, he said he must needs so continue.

The keeper desired Mr. Bradford to hearken to Mr. Doctor's counsel, and prayed Mr. Doctor to be good unto him: and so after they had drank together, Dr. Weston with most gentle words took his leave for three days.

Now when he was gone, the keeper told Mr. Bradford, that Mr. Doctor spake openly, that he saw no cause why they should burn him. Which sentence, for the ambiguity of the meaning, made him somewhat sorry; lest he had gathered any conformity to them in their doctrine, which God knoweth, said Bradford, I never as yet did. God our Father blefs us, as his children, and keep us from all evil for ever. Amen.

Upon the 5th of April, Dr. Weston came to the computer about two o'clock in the afternoon, who excused himself for being so long absent; partly by sickness; partly for that Dr. Pendleton told him that he would come unto him; and partly for that, said he, I withstood certain monks which would have come again into Westminster; telling him moreover, that the pope was dead, and also declared unto him, that he had spoken to the queen in his behalf, and that death was not so near to him.

Last of all, he excused himself for not answering his arguments against transubstantiation; because my coming to-day, said he, was more by fortune, than of purpose.

Bradford. I would gladly, Mr. Doctor, if it please you, see your answers to my arguments.

Weston. Why, you have remembered something that I spake to you, when I was last with you.

Bradford. No, sir, I never called them in manner to mind, since that time, as well because I hoped you would have written them, as also for that they seemed not to be so material.

Weston. In good faith I cannot see any other or better way for you, than to submit yourself to the judgment of the church.

Bradford. Indeed, so I will, sir, if so be by the church you understand Christ's church.

Weston. Lo, you take upon you to judge the church.

Bradford. No, sir, that I do not; in taking upon me to discern, I do not judge the church.

Weston. Yes, that you do; and make it invisible.

Bradford. I do neither.

Weston. Why, who can see your church?

Bradford. Those, sir, that have spiritual eyes, where-with they might have discerned Christ's visible conversation here upon earth.

Weston. Nay, Christ's church hath three tokens, that all men may look well upon: namely, unity, antiquity, and consent.

Bradford. These three may be as well in evil as in good, as well in sin, as in virtue, as well in the devil's church, as in God's church. As for example, idolatry amongst the Israelites had all those three. Chrysostom says plainly, as you well know, that the church is well known only by the scriptures.

Weston. You make your church invisible, when you will have it known only by the scriptures.

Bradford. No, sir, the scriptures do plainly set forth to us the church, that all men may well enough know her thereby, if they please to look.

Weston. The church is like a tower or town, that all men may see.

Bradford. True, sir, all men that are not blind. Visible enough is the church, but men's blindness is great. Impute not therefore to the church, that which is to be imputed to men's blindness.

Weston. Where was your church forty years ago? Or where is it now, except in a corner of Germany?

Bradford. Forsooth, sir, the church of God is dispersed and not tied to this or that place, but to the word of God; so that where it is, there is God's church, if it be truly taught.

Weston. Lo, is not this to make the church invisible? Point me out a realm a hundred years past which maintained your doctrine.

Bradford. Sir, if you would weigh or well mark the state of the church before Christ's coming, with it now (as St. Peter and Paul willeth us) I think you would not look for such shews of the church to be made, as point it out by realms. You know that in Elijah's time both in Israel and elsewhere, God's church was as pointable; and therefore he cried out that he was left alone.

Weston. No, truly, did not God say that there were 7000 which had not bowed their knees to Baal? How was a church of 7000; shew 7000 a hundred years ago of your religion.

Bradford. Sir, these 7000 were not known to men: for then Elijah would not have said, that he had been left alone. And that is plain enough by the text, namely, that God saith, "I have reserved to me seven thousand." Mark that it saith, God hath reserved to himself, to his own knowledge; as I doubt not but a hundred years ago God had his seven thousand in his proper places, though men knew not thereof.

Weston. Well, Mr. Bradford, I will not make your case worse than for transubstantiation: although I know that we agree not in other matters. And I pray you make it not worse yourself. If I can do you good, I will: hurt you I will not. I am no prince, and therefore I cannot promise you life, except you submit yourself to the definition of the church.

Bradford. Sir, if you will define your church, and bring no false church into that definition, you shall soon see that I will be at a point with you.

Weston. In good faith, Mr. Bradford, I see no good will be done, and therefore I wish you as much good as I can; and perhaps I may come or send to you again: and so he departed and went for Mr. Weal.

After his departure, the keeper, Mr. Claydon, and Stephen Bech came to Mr. Bradford, and spake to him in such a manner as if they had been his utter enemies, notwithstanding the friendship they hitherto pretended. If God be with us, it matters not who is against us.

Divers came to Mr. Bradford in prison, some to dispute, some to confer, some to give counsel, some to take comfort, and be confirmed in their faith, and others came to visit him. There was a certain gentlewoman's servant, which gentlewoman had been cruelly afflicted, and miserably handled by her father and mother, and all her kindred in her father's house, for not coming to mass; and she would have been put to death, had not the providence of God delivered her from her father's house, although at the loss of all she had.

This gentlewoman's servant therefore coming to Mr. Bradford, and taking him by the hand, said, God be thanked for you. How do you do?

Mr. Bradford answered, Well, I thank God. For as men in sailing, which be near to the shore or haven where they would be, would be nearer; even so the nearer I am to God, the nearer I would be.

Servant. Sir, I have never seen you so strong and healthful in body, as methinks you be now, God be thanked for it.

Why, said Bradford, I have given over all care and study, and I only covet to be talking with him, whom I have always studied to serve.

Servant. Well, God hath done much for you since the time that I first knew you, and hath wrought wonderfully in you to his glory.

Bradford. Truth it is, for he hath dealt favourably with me, in that he hath not punished me according to my sins, but hath suffered me to live, that I might seek repentance.

Servant. Truly, we hear say, there is a rod made so grievous, out of which I think no man shall pluck his head.

Bradford.

Bradford. Well, let all that be of Christ's flock, arm themselves to suffer: for I think verily, God will not have one of his to escape untouched, if he love him, let them seek what means or ways they can.

Servant. Well, fir, there is a discourse of a friar that preached before the king, who told him, that he should be guilty of the innocent blood that hath been shed of late.

Indeed, said Bradford, I had a book within these two days of his writing, and therein he saith, that it is not meet nor convenient that heretics should live: and therefore I do marvel how that talk should rise: for I have heard of it also, and I have also talked with this friar (he is named Alphonsus) and with divers others, and I praise God they have confirmed me: for they have nothing to say but that which is most vain.

Servant. Sir, Mr. Cardmaker commendeth himself unto you.

Bradford. How doth he, how doth he?

Servant. Well, God be thanked.

Bradford. I am very glad thereof: for indeed my lord chancellor did cast him in my teeth: but as David saith, God hath disappointed him.

Servant. Forsooth, God's name be praised, he is very strong.

Bradford. And I trust, so are we. What else? our quarrel is most just: therefore let us not be afraid?

Servant. My mistress commendeth herself unto you.

Bradford. How doth she?

Servant. Well, God be praised, but she hath been sore afflicted by her own father and mother, than ever you were with your imprisonment; and yet God hath preserved her, I trust to his glory.

Bradford. I pray you, tell her, I read this day a godly story, written by Basilus Magnus, of a virtuous woman who was a widow, and was named Juledo. She had great lands and many children, and nigh her dwelt a cormorant, who for her virtuous and pious living had great indignation against her, and of very malice he took away her lands, so that she was constrained to go to law with him: and in conclusion, the matter came to the trial before the judge, who demanded of this tyrant why he wrongfully withheld these lands from this woman? He made answer and said, he might so do, for (said he) this woman is disobedient to the king's proceedings: for she will in no wise worship his gods, nor offer sacrifice unto them. Then the judge hearing that, said unto her, Woman, if this be true, thou art not only like to lose thy land, but also thy life, unless that thou worship our gods, and do sacrifice unto them. This good woman hearing that, steps forth to the judge, and said, Is there no remedy but either to worship your false gods, or else to lose my lands and life? Then farewell suit, farewell lands, farewell children, farewell friends, farewell life too: and in respect of the true honour of the everliving God, farewell all. And without saying the judge committed her to prison, and afterwards she suffered most cruel death: and being brought to the place of execution, she exhorted all women to be strong and constant. For, saith she, you were redeemed with as dear a price as men. For although you were made of the rib of the man, yet are you all of his flesh: that also in the case and trial of your faith towards God, you ought to be as strong. And thus died she constantly, not fearing death. I pray you, tell your mistress of this story.

Servant. That I shall, fir, by God's grace: for she told me that she was with you and Mr. Saunders, and received your kind counsel.

Bradford. We never gave her other counsel but the truth, and in witness thereof, we have and will seal it with our blood. For I thought this night I had been sent for, because at eleven o'clock there was such a rapping at the door.

Then answered a maid, and said, Why then, I perceive you were afraid.

Bradford. You shall hear how fearful I was. For I considered that I had not slept, and I thought to take a nap before I went: and after I was asleep, these men came into the next chamber, and sang, as it was told me, and yet for all my fearfulness, I heard them not: therefore I could not be much afraid, if I slept so fast.

Servant. Do you lack any thing towards your necessity?

Bradford. Nothing but your prayers, and I trust I have them, and you mine.

Servant. I saw a priest come to you to-day in the morning.

Bradford. Yea, he brought me a letter from a friar, and I am writing an answer.

Servant. Then we hinder you, therefore the living God be with you.

Bradford. And with you also, and bless you.

Servant. Amen, amen; and gave him thanks and departed.

Mr. Bradford continued still in prison, until the month of July, in such labours and sufferings as he always before had sustained in prison. But when the time of his determined death was come, he was suddenly conveyed out of the Compter where he was prisoner, in the night season to Newgate, as is declared before, and from thence he was carried the next morning to Smithfield, where he constantly abiding in the same truth of God, which before he had confessed, earnestly exhorting the people to repent, and to return to Christ, and sweetly comforting the pious young man of nineteen or twenty years of age, who suffered with him, cheerfully ended his painful life to live with Christ.

The EXAMINATION of Mr. JOHN LEAF.

WITH Mr. Bradford was burnt John Leaf, apprentice to Humphrey Gaudy, tallow-chandler, of the parish of Christ-church, in London, born at Kirkly Moreside, in the county of York; who upon the Friday before Palm-Sunday was committed to the Compter in Bread-street, by an alderman of the ward where the said John Leaf dwelt. Afterwards he coming to examination before bishop Bonner, gave a firm and christian testimony of his doctrine and profession, answering to such articles as were objected to him by the said bishop.

First, as touching his belief and faith in the said sacrament of the altar, he answered, that after the words of consecration spoke by the priest over the bread and wine, there was not the very true and natural body and blood of Christ in substance; and further did hold and believe, that the said sacrament of the altar, as is now called, used, and believed in this realm of England, is idolatrous and abominable; and also said further, that he believed, that after the words of consecration spoke by the priest over the material bread and wine, there is not the self-same substance of Christ's body and blood there contained; but bread and wine, as it was before. And further said, that he believed, that when the priest delivereth the said material bread and wine to the communicants, he delivereth only material bread and wine; and the communicants do receive the same in remembrance of Christ's death and passion, and spiritually in faith they receive Christ's body and blood, but not under the forms of bread and wine: and also affirmed, that he believed confession not necessary to be made unto a priest; neither that the priest hath any authority given him by the scripture to absolve and remit any sin.

Upon these his answers, and testimony of his faith, he was at that time dismissed, with orders to appear again the next Monday, June 10, in the said place, there and then to hear the sentence of his condemnation. At which time the aforesaid bishop propounded the said articles to him as before, endeavouring by all manner of ways to bring him to renounce his religion; but notwithstanding all his persuasions, threats, and promises, found him the same man still, so planted upon the sure rock of truth, that no words or deeds of men could remove him.

Then the bishop, after many words passing between them, at last asked him, if he had been Mr. Rogers's scholar? To whom the aforesaid John Leaf answered again, granting it so to be; and that he believed in the doctrine of the said Rogers, and in the doctrine of bishop Hooper, Cardmaker, and others of their opinion, who were lately burned for the testimony of Christ, and that he would die in that doctrine that they died for. The bishop still continued persuading him to return to the unity of the church, but he answered again in these words: My lord, (said he) you call mine opinion heresy; but it is the true light of the word of God. And again repeating the same, he professed that he would never forsake his stayed and well grounded opinion, while the breath should be in his body. Whereupon the bishop being too weak, either to refute his sentence, or to remove his constancy, proceeded consequently to read the sentence of condemnation; whereby this pious and constant young man being committed to the secular power of the sheriffs there present, was then adjudged, and not long after suffered, the same day with Mr. Bradford, confirming with his death that which he had spoken and professed in his life.

It is reported of the said John Leaf, by one that was in the Compter at the same time, and saw the thing, that after his examination before the bishop, when two bills were sent unto him in the Compter in Bread-street, the one containing a recantation, the other his confessions, to know to which of them he would put his hand; first hearing the bill of recantation read unto him, (because he could not read nor write himself) that he refused. And when the bill of his confessions was read unto him, instead of a pen he took a pin, and so pricking his hand, sprinkled the blood upon the said bill, desiring the reader thereof to shew the bishop, that he had sealed the same bill with his blood already.

The BEHAVIOUR of Mr. BRADFORD and JOHN LEAF at their MARTYRDOM.

FIRST, when they came to the stake in Smithfield to be burned, Mr. Bradford lying prostrate on one side the stake, and the young man John Leaf on the other side, they lay flat on their faces, praying to themselves the space of a minute. Then one of the sheriffs said to Mr. Bradford, Arise; and make an end; for the pangs of the people is great.

At that word they stood up, and Mr. Bradford took a faggot in his hand and kissed it, and likewise the stake. And when he had so done, he desired of the sheriffs, that his servant might have his raiment. For (said he) I have nothing else to give him: and besides that, he is a poor man. And the sheriff said he should have it. Then Mr. Bradford immediately took off his raiment, and went to the stake: and holding up his hands, and casting his eyes towards heaven, he said thus, "O England, England, repent of thy sins, repent of thy sins; beware of idolatry; beware of Antichrist; take heed they do not deceive you." And as he was speaking these words, the sheriff ordered his hands to be tied if he would not be quiet. O Master Sheriff, said he, I am quiet: God forgive you this, Master Sheriff. And one of the officers who was to make the fire, hearing Mr. Bradford so speaking to the sheriff, said, If you have no better learning than this, you are but a fool, and you had best hold your peace. To which Mr. Bradford gave no answer; but asked all the world forgiveness and forgave all the world, and desired the people to pray for him: then he turned his head to the young man that suffered with him, and said, Be of good comfort, brother; for we shall have a merry supper with the Lord this night: and then embracing the reeds, he said thus, "Strait is the gate and narrow is the way that leadeth to eternal salvation, and few there be that find it."

And thus they both ended this mortal life, like two lambs, without any alteration of their countenances, being void of all fear, hoping to obtain the prize that they had long run for; to which I beseech Almighty God happily to conduct us, through the merits of Jesus Christ our Lord and Saviour, Amen.

Mention was made a little above how churlishly Mr. Woodrofe the sheriff answered Mr. Bradford at the stake, not suffering him to speak, but commanding his hands to be tied, &c. The like extremity, or worse, he used also before to Mr. Rogers.

The said Woodrofe was sheriff together with Sir William Chester, in the year 1555, who was a much better man, both in temper and religion; he behaved with great mildness towards those pious martyrs, who suffered for their conscience, and was very sorry to see them at any time misused. But Woodrofe was so churlish and ill-natured that he was wont to abuse the friends of those who were going to die; he would not so much as let them shake hands with their departing friends; privilege never denied to malefactors, and the vile criminals under protestant government.

But now, by the way, let us take notice of the severe punishment which God inflicted on this cruel persecutor Mr. Woodrofe: it is said, that within half a year after the burning of this blessed martyr, the said sheriff was so struck on the right side with a palsy, that for the space of eight years after (till his dying day) he was not able to turn himself in his bed, but needed two men to move him; and withal such an insatiable devouring came upon him, that was monstrous to behold. And thus he continued for eight years together.

On the DEATH of Mr. JOHN BRADFORD.

LET no disciple above his master be,
God's servants are not from afflictions free.
God, whom he loves, chastises every son;
Strait is the way to the celestial throne.
These words whilst, Bradford, thou dost ruminate,
No human threats, no fears, no dismal state,
Could shock thy steady soul; no fiery dart
Of Satan's malice wound thy constant heart:
But thou didst freely (arm'd with grace divine)
Thy body to the flaming pile resign.

Mr. Bradford, during the time of his imprisonment wrote several comfortable treatises, and many pious letters, of which, some were directed to the city of London, Cambridge, Walden, to Lancashire and Cheshire, and divers to his other private friends. Which letters to the intent it may appear how well this good man occupied his time in prison, what special zeal he bore to the state of Christ's church, what care he had to perform his office, how earnestly he admonished all men, how tenderly he comforted the heavy-hearted, how faithfully he confirmed them whom he had taught, we thought good here to introduce: all the letters that he wrote cannot be here exhibited, being so many in number that they alone would make a large volume; however, for the satisfaction of the pious reader, we will insert those that are judged the best and most excellent among them.

It has been mentioned before how the earl of Derby complained in the parliament house, of certain letters written by John Bradford out of prison, to Lancashire and he was likewise charged by the bishop of Winchester and Mr. Allen, with some other letters. Now to the intent that the reader may more perfectly understand what sort of letters these were, which he wrote to his mother, brethren, and sisters, out of the Tower, before his condemnation, we will here produce the copy and content as followeth.

L E T T E R I.

From Mr. BRADFORD, to his MOTHER, a PIOUS MATRON, dwelling in MANCHESTER, and to his BRETHREN and SISTERS, and other FRIENDS there.

OUR dear and sweet Saviour Jesus Christ, whose prayer at this present (praised be his name) I am, preserve and keep you, my good mother, with my brothers and sisters, my fathers John Traves, Thomas Sorrocol, Laurence and James Bradshaw, with their wives and families, &c. now and ever, Amen.

I am now in prison, secure enough from starting, to confess what I have preached unto you, as I am ready (I thank God) to seal the same with my life and blood, if God shall vouchsafe to make me worthy of that honour. For, good mother, to my brethren, it is a most special benefit from God, to suffer for his name's sake and gospel, as now I do: I heartily thank God for it, and am sure that with him I shall be partaker of his glory as St. Paul saith, "If we suffer with him, we shall reign with him." Therefore be not faint-hearted, but rather rejoice, at least for my sake, who am now in the right and highway to heaven: for by many afflictions we must enter into the kingdom of heaven. Now will God make known his children. When the wind doth not blow, a man cannot know the wheat from the chaff: but when the blast cometh, then the chaff flieth away.

the wheat remaineth, and is so far from being hurt, that by wind it is more cleansed from the chaff, and known to be gold. Gold, when it is cast in the fire, is the more precious: eat. God's children by the cross of affliction. God always beginneth his judgment at his house. Christ and the apostles were in the most misery in the land of Jewry, but yet the whole land smarted for it after: so now the children of God are chastised in this world, that they should not be damned with the world: for surely the great plagues of God hang over this world. Ye all know that there never was more knowledge of God, and less godly living, and true serving of God. It was counted a foolish thing to serve God truly: and earnest prayer was esteemed. Preaching was but a pastime. The communion was counted too common. Fasting to subdue the flesh was out of use. Alms was almost nothing. Malice, covetousness, and uncleanness, was common every-where, with eating, drunkenness, and idleness. God therefore now is punishing us with the world, he beginneth to punish us: as me for my living. For, as for my doctrine, I am very certain that it is God's truth, and by his grace I resolve to give my life for it; but because I loved not the gospel as sincerely as I ought, therefore doth he thus punish me: nay, in punishing, he rather blesteth me. Indeed I thank him more for this prison, than for any parlour, yea, than for any pleasure that ever I had; in it I always find God my sweetest and greatest good. The world is now punished to admonish us heartily to live as we profess; and to certify the wicked of their just damnation, if they repent not.

Perhaps you are weakened in that which I have preached, because God doth not defend it, as you think, but suffereth the world to come again and prevail: but you must know, dear mother, that God by this doth prove and try his children, whether they will unfeignedly and simply stand stedfast to him and his word. He did so with the Israelites, bringing them into the desert, after their coming out of Egypt, where (I mean in the wilderness) was want of all things, in comparison of that which they had in Egypt. Christ when he came into this world, sought no worldly wealth, nor quietness with him, but rather trouble: "The world (saith he) shall rejoice, but ye shall mourn, and weep, but your weeping shall be turned into joy: and therefore happy are they that mourn and weep, for they shall be comforted." They are marked then with God's mark in their foreheads, and not with the beast's mark, I mean the pope's shaven crown, who now with his shavelings rejoice: but be unto them, for they shall be cast down, they shall weep and mourn. The rich glutton had here his joy, and Lazarus sorrow, but afterwards the case was changed. The end of carnal joy is sorrow. Now let the whoremonger joy with the drunkard, swearer, covetous, malicious, and blind buzzard sir: for the mass will not bite them, nor make them blush as preaching doth. Now they may do what they will, come devils to church, and go devils home again, for no man must speak against it. They are glad of all this; now they have their heart's desire, as the Sodomites had when Lot was gone; but what followed? forsooth, when they cried peace, all shall be well, then came God's vengeance, fire and brimstone from heaven, and burnt up every mother's child; even so (dear mother) will be to our papists.

Wherefore fear God; stick to his word, though all the world shall turn from it. Die you must once, and when and how, you cannot tell. Die therefore with Christ, suffer for serving him truly, according to his word: for we may be sure, that of all deaths it ought to be our greatest desire to die for the cause of God. This is the safest way of dying; we need not doubt but that we shall go to heaven, if we die for his name's sake. And that you shall so die, the word of God will warrant you, if you stick to that which God by me hath taught you. You shall see that I speak as I think; for by God's grace I will drink before you of this cup, if it be put to me.

I doubt not but God will give me grace and strength to undergo what I purpose: pray for me, that I may be immovable in the fiery trial. I am ready whenever God shall be pleased to call me. Death nor life, prison nor pleasure, I trust in God, he shall be able to separate me from my Lord God and his gospel. In peace, when no persecution was, then were you content and glad to hear me, then you believed me, and will you not do so now, seeing I speak nothing but that which by God's grace I will verify with my blood? Good mother, I write to you before God, as before him I have preached.

I have taught the pure word of God: it is the same infallible word whereof he said, "Heaven and earth shall pass, but my word shall not pass." The mass, and such baggage as the false worshippers of God, and the enemies of Christ's cross (the papists) have brought in again, to poison the church of God, highly displeaseth him, and is abominable in his sight. Happy may he be who for conscience sake will suffer the loss of life or goods, in contending against it. Come not near it. If God be God, follow him: if the mass be God, let who will see it, far, or be present at it, go to the devil with it. What is there which God ordained? His supper was ordained to be received by us as a memorial of his death, for the confirmation of our faith, that his body was broken for us, and his blood shed for the pardon of our sins; but in the mass there is no receiving, but the priest alone keepeth all to himself. Christ saith, Take, eat: No, saith the priest, Gape, peep. Here (in the mass) is a sacrificing, yea, crucifying Christ again as much as they can. Here is idolatry, in worshipping the outward sign of bread and wine; here is all in Latin, you cannot tell what is said. In short, here is nothing as God ordained. Wherefore (my good mother) come not near it.

I presume some will say, that it will be worse for you, if you refuse to go to mass, and do as others do. But be assured, that God will assist and protect you, as you shall one day find: he hath promised to them who suffer for his cause, his great blessing in this world, and in the world to come life everlasting.

You shall be counted an heretic: but they are the heretics that so call you, whose praise is a scandal.

You are not able to reason against the priests, but God will, that they shall not be able to withstand you. I doubt not but father Traves, and others of my brothers and sisters will comfort and assist you by their counsel and pious examples; but if they do not, I your son in God, by his grace, will so do, and go before you: pray that I may be constant: rejoice in my sufferings, for it is for your sakes, that thereby I may confirm the truth I have taught. Beware that this letter come not abroad, but only into father Traves's hands: for if it should be known that I have pen and ink in prison, it would be much worse for me. Therefore keep it to yourselves, and commend me to God's mercy through Jesus Christ, and pray that he would make me worthy to give my life for the sake of his church and gospel. From the Tower of London, October 26, 1553.

My name I write not, you know the reason well enough: like the letter never the worse. Commend me to all our good brethren and sisters in the Lord. Howsoever you do, be obedient to the higher powers, that is, in no point either in hand or tongue rebel, but rather if they command that which with good conscience you cannot obey, lay your head on the block, and suffer whatsoever they shall do or say. By patience possess your souls.

After the time that Mr. Bradford was condemned, and sent to the Compter, his adversaries purposed (as ye heard before) to send him to Manchester to be burned. Whereupon he writeth to the city of London, thinking to take his last farewell of them in this letter.

LETTER II.

From Mr. BRADFORD, to the CITY of LONDON.

TO all that profess the gospel and true doctrine of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ in the city of London, John Bradford, a most unworthy servant of the Lord, now not only in prison, but also excommunicated and condemned to be burned for the same true doctrine, wishes mercy, grace, and peace, with increase of all godly knowledge and piety from God the Father of mercy, through the merits of our alone and all-sufficient Redeemer Jesus Christ, by the operation of the Holy Spirit, for ever. Amen.

My dearly beloved brethren in our Saviour Christ, although the time I have to live is very little, (for I look hourly when I shall be had hence to be conveyed into Lancashire there to be burned, and to render my life by the providence of God, where I received it) and although there is great charge given to keep me from all things whereby I might signify any thing to the world of my estate: yet having, as I now have, pen and ink, through God's working, in spite of Satan and his soldiers, I thought good to write a short confession of my faith, and join thereto a little exhortation to you all to live according to your profession.

First, For my faith, I do confess and pray all the whole congregation of Christ to bear witness with me of the same, that I believe constantly, through the gift and goodness of God, (for faith is God's only gift) all the twelve articles of the symbol and creed, commonly attributed to the collection of the apostles. This my faith I would particularly declare and expound to the confirmation and comfort of the simple; but alas! by starts and stealth I write in manner what I write, and therefore I shall desire you all to take this brevity in good part. And this faith I hold, not because of the creed itself, but because of the word of God, which teacheth and confirmeth every article accordingly. This word of God, written by the prophets and apostles, left and contained in the canonical books of the whole Bible, I do believe to contain plentifully all things necessary to salvation, so that nothing (as necessary to salvation) ought to be added thereto, and therefore the church of Christ, nor none of his congregation, ought to be burthened with any other doctrine, than that which hath its foundation and ground from thence. In testimony of this faith, I render and give my life, being condemned as well for not acknowledging the Antichrist of Rome to be Christ's vicar general, and supreme head of his catholic and universal church here or elsewhere upon earth; as for denying the horrible and idolatrous doctrine of transubstantiation, and Christ's real, corporal, and carnal presence in his

supper, under the forms and accidents of bread and wine.

To believe Christ our Saviour to be the head of his church, and kings in their realm to be the supreme powers, to whom every soul oweth obedience, and to believe that in the supper of Christ (which the sacrament of the altar, as the papists call it and use it, doth utterly overthrow) is a true and very presence of whole Christ, God and Man, to the faith of the receiver, but not to the stander by, and looker upon, as it is a true and very presence of bread and wine to the senses of men: to believe this, I say, will not serve, and therefore as an heretic I am condemned, and shall be burned; whereof I heartily ask God mercy that I do no more rejoice than I do, having so great cause, as to be an instrument wherein it may please my dear Lord God and Saviour to suffer.

For albeit my manifold sins, even since I came into prison, have deferved at the hands of God, not only this temporal, but also eternal fire in hell, much more than my former sinful life, which the Lord pardon for Christ's sake, as I know he of his mercy hath done, and will never lay mine iniquities to my charge to condemnation, so great is his goodness, (praised therefore be his holy name) although, I say, my late manifold and grievous sins have most justly deserved all the tyranny that man or devil can do unto me; and therefore I confess that the Lord is just, his judgments be true, and I have deserved them: yet the bishops and prelates, instead of persecuting them in me, do persecute Christ himself, his word, his truth, and his religion. And therefore I have great cause to rejoice that ever I was born, and hitherto preserved by the Lord; that by my death, which I deserve for my sins, it pleaseth him to glorify his name, to testify and confirm his truth, and to overcome his adversaries. O good God and merciful Father, forgive my great unthankfulness, especially herein.

And you, my dearly beloved, for the Lord Jesus Christ's sake, I humbly and heartily in his bowels and blood do now, for my last farewell in this present life, beseech you, and every one of you, that you will consider this work of the Lord accordingly. By me be admonished to beware of hypocrisy and carnal security; profess not the gospel with tongue and lips only; but in heart and in truth frame your lives accordingly: beware God's name be not evil spoken of, and the gospel less regarded by your conversation. God forgive me that I have not so heartily professed it as I should have done, but have sought myself, and too much consulted my own ease therein. The gospel is a new doctrine to the old man; it is new wine, and therefore cannot be put into old bottles, without greater harm than good to those bottles. If we will talk with the Lord, we must put off our shoes and carnal affections; if we will hear the voice of the Lord, we must wash our garments and be holy; if we will be Christ's disciples, we must deny ourselves, take up our cross, and follow him; we cannot serve two masters. If we seek Christ's kingdom, we must seek the righteousness thereof. To this petition, Thy kingdom come, we must join, Thy will be done, done on earth as it is in heaven. If we will not be doers of the word, but hearers only, we miserably deceive ourselves. If we hear the gospel, and love it not, we declare ourselves to be but fools, and builders upon the sand. Deceitfulness the Lord abhorreth; if we come to him, we must beware that we come not with a double heart; for then God will answer us according to our own folly; and we shall deceive ourselves and others.

To faith see that we join a good conscience, lest we make a shipwreck. To the Lord we must come with fear and reverence. If we will be gospellers, we must be Christ's; if we will be Christ's, we must crucify our flesh with the lusts and concupiscences thereof; if we will be under grace, sin must not bear rule in us. We may not come to the Lord, and draw nigh to him with our lips, and leave our hearts elsewhere, lest the Lord's wrath wax hot, and he take from us the good remaining. In no case can the kingdom of Christ approach them that repent not. Therefore, my dearly beloved, let us repent and be heartily sorry that we have so carnally, so hypocritically, so covetously, so vain-gloriously professed the gospel. For all these I confess myself to the glory of God, that he may cover mine offences in the day of judgment. Let the anger of God, most justly fallen upon us, be applied to every one of our deserts, that from the bottom of our hearts we may say, It is I, Lord, that have sinned against thee: it is my hypocrisy, my vain-glory, my covetousness, uncleanness, carnality, security, idleness, unthankfulness, self-love, and such like, which have deserved the taking away of our good king, of thy word and true religion, of thy good ministers by exile, imprisonment, and death; it is my wickedness that causeth success and increase of authority and peace to thine enemies. Oh be merciful, be merciful unto us. Turn to us again, O Lord of Hosts, and turn us unto thee; correct us, but not in thy fury, lest we be consumed in thine anger; chastise us not in thy wrathful displeasure; improve us not, but in the midst of thine anger remember thy mercy. For if thou mark what is done amiss, who shall be able to abide it? But with thee is mercifulness, that thou mightest be worshipped. Oh then be merciful unto us, that we might truly worship thee. Help us for the glory of thy name: be merciful unto our sins, for they are great: O heal us, and be us for thine honour. Let not the wicked people say, Where is their God, &c.

On this sort, my right dearly beloved, let us heartily bewail our sins, repent us of our former evil life, heartily and earnestly purpose to amend our lives in all things, continually watch in prayer, diligently and reverently attend, hear, and read the holy scriptures, labour after our vocation to amend our brethren. Let us reprove the works of darkness. Let us fly from all idolatry. Let us abhor the antichristian and Romish rotten service, detest the popish mass, renounce the Romish god, prepare ourselves to the cross, be obedient to all that are in authority, in all things that be not against God and his word; for then answer with the apostles, "It is more meet to obey God than man." Howbeit never for any thing resist, or rise against the magistrates. Avenge not yourselves, but commit your cause to the Lord, to whom vengeance belongeth, and he in his time will reward it. If you feel in yourselves an hope and trust in God, that he will never tempt you above that he will make you able to bear, be assured the Lord will be true to you, and you shall be able to bear all brunts. But if you want this hope, fly and get you hence, rather than by your tarrying, God's name should be dishonoured.

In sum, cast your care on the Lord, knowing for most certain, that he is careful for you; with whom all the hairs of your head are numbered, so that not one of them shall perish without his good pleasure: much more then nothing shall happen to our bodies, which shall not be profitable, howsoever at a time it seem otherwise to our senses. Depend on the providence of God, not only when you have means to help you, but also when you have no means, yea, when all means be against you. Give him this honour, which of all other things chiefly requireth at your hands: namely, believe that you are his children through Christ, that he is your Father and God through him, that he loveth you, pardoneth you all your offences that he is with you in trouble, and will be with you for ever. When you fall, he will put under his hand, you shall not fall still: before you call upon him he heareth you, out of the heaven he will finally deliver you, and bring you to his eternal joy. Doubt not herein, my dearly beloved, doubt not (I say) that God your Father will do for you, not in respect of yourselves, but in respect of Christ your captain, your pastor, your keeper, out of whose hands none shall be able to pluck you; in him be quiet, and often consider your dignity, namely, how that you be God's children, the saints of God, citizens of heaven, vessels of the Holy Ghost, the thrones of God, members of Christ, and lords over all.

Therefore be ashamed to think, speak, or do any thing that should be unseemly for God's children, God's saints, Christ's members, &c. Marvel not though the devil and the world hate you, though ye be persecuted here, for the servant is not above his master. Covet not earthly riches, fear not the power of man, love not this world, nor the things of this world; but long for the Lord Jesus's coming, at which time your bodies shall be made like unto his glorious body; when he appears you shall be like unto him; when your life shall be thus revealed, then shall ye appear with him in glory.

In the mean time live in hope thereof. Let the life you lead be in the faith of the Son of God. "For the just do live in faith:" which faith sleeth from all evil, and followeth the word of God as a lantern to her feet, and a light to her steps; her eyes be above where Christ is, she beholdeth not the things present, but rather things to come; she glorieth in affliction; she knoweth that the afflictions of this life are not worthy to be compared to the glory which God will reveal to us and in us. Of this glory God grant us here a lively taste, then shall we more after the scent it sendeth forth. It will make us valiant men, take us to us the kingdom of God; whither the Lord of mercy bring us in his good time through Christ our Lord, to whom with the Father and the Holy Ghost, three Persons and one God, be all honour and glory, world without end. Amen.

My dearly beloved, I would gladly have given here my body to have been burned for the confirmation of the true doctrine I have taught here unto you. But that my country must have otherwise, therefore I pray you take in good part this signification of my good will towards all of you. Impute the want herein to my age and trouble. Pardon me mine offensive and negligent behaviour when I was amongst you. With me repent, and labour to amend. Continue in the truth which I have truly taught unto you, by preaching in all places where I have come; God's name therefore be praised. Confess Christ when you be called, whatsoever cometh thereof, and the God of peace be with all, Amen. February 11, 1555.

Your brother in bonds for the Lord's sake,

JOHN BRADFORD

LETTER III.

From Mr. BRADFORD to the UNIVERSITY of CAMBRIDGE.

TO all that love the Lord Jesus and his true doctrine, be in the university and town of Cambridge, John Bradford a most unworthy servant of the Lord, now not only imprisoned, but also condemned for the same true doctrine, with peace, and mercy, with increase of all godliness from the Father of all mercy, through the bloody passion of our Jesus Christ, by the lively working of the Holy Spirit ever, Amen.

Although I look hourly when I should be had to the stake, (right dearly beloved in the Lord) and although the charge is great and strict, yet having by the providence of God my pen and ink, I could not but signify unto you my sollicitude which I have for all of you in the Lord, though not as I would, yet as I may. You have often and openly heard the truth (especially in this matter wherein I am condemned) diffused and preached, that it is needless to do any more but only put you in remembrance of the same: but hitherto you have heard it confirmed; and as it were sealed up, as now you do and shall hear by me, that is, by my death and burning. For albeit I have deserved (through my uncleanness, hypocrisy, avarice, idleness, unthankfulness, and carnality, wherof I am full myself, to my confusion before the world, that before God through Christ I might, as my assured hope is I shall, find eternal death and hell-fire, much more than this affliction and fire prepared for me: yet my dearly beloved, it is not for any of these things, for which the prelates do persecute me, but God's verity and truth; yea, even Christ himself is the cause for which I am now condemned, and shall be burned in heretic, because I will not grant the Antichrist of Rome to be Christ's vicar general and supreme head of his church here, every-where upon earth, by God's ordinance, and because I will not grant such corporal, real, and carnal presence of Christ's body and blood in the sacrament, as doth transubstantiate the substance of bread and wine, and is received by the wicked, by dogs and mice. Also I am excommunicated and accounted as a dead member of Christ's church, as a rotten branch, and therefore shall be cast into the fire.

Therefore you ought heartily to rejoice with me, and to give thanks for me, that God the eternal Father hath vouchsafed our Father to bring up any child in whom it would please him to glorify his holy name as he doth, and I hope for his mercy and truth's sake, will do in me and by me. Oh, what such comfort upon earth can it be, as that I who deserved death by reason of my sins, should be delivered to a demonstration, a justification, and confirmation of God's verity and truth? Thou mother the university hast not only had the truth of God's word plainly manifested unto thee by reading, disputing, and teaching publicly and privately; but now to make thee altogether excusable, and as it were, almost to sin against the Holy Ghost, if thou put to thy helping hand with the Romish rout suppress the verity, thou hast my life and blood as a seal to confirm thee, if thou wilt be confirmed, or else to confound thee, and bear witness against thee, if thou wilt take part with the prelates and clergy, which now fill up the measure of their iniquities which slew the prophets and apostles, that all the righteous blood from Abel to Bradford, shed upon earth, may be required at their hands.

Of this therefore I thought good before my death, as time and liberty would suffer me, (for the love and duty I bear unto thee) to admonish thee good mother, and my sister the town, that you would call to mind from whence you are fallen, and how to do the first works. You know (if you will) these matters of the Romish supremacy, and the antichristian transubstantiation, whereby Christ's supper is overthrown, his priesthood evacuated, his sacrifice frustrated, the ministry of his word replaced, repentance repelled, faith fainted, piety extinguished, his commandments maintained, idolatry supported, and all impiety cherished: you know I say (if you will) that these opinions are not only contrary to God's word, but even directly against it, and therefore to take part with them, is to take part against God, against whom you cannot prevail.

Therefore for the tender mercy of Christ, in his bowels and blood I beseech you, to take Christ's eye-salve to anoint your eyes, that you may see what you do, and have done, in admitting (as I hear you have admitted, yea, alas! authorized, and consent confirmed) the Romish rotten rags, which once you utterly expelled. O be not "The dog returned to his own vomit; the sow that was washed returned to her wallowing in the mire," 2 Pet. ii. Beware lest Satan enter in with seven devils, and then the last shall be worse than the first. It had been better ye had never known the truth, than after knowledge to run from it. Ah, woe to this world and the things therein, which hath now so wrought with you. Oh that ever the devil should daub up the eye of the realm. For mother, art as the eye of the realm. If thou be lighted thine, all the body shall fare the better: but if thou the light of darkness, alas how great will the darkness be? What is man's breath is in his nostrils, that thou shouldst thus be afraid of him?

On what is honour and life here? Bubbles. What is glory in this world, but shame? Why art thou afraid to carry Christ's cross? Wilt thou come into his kingdom, and not drink of his cup? Dost thou not know Rome to be Babylon? Dost thou not know, that as the old Babylon had the children of Judah in captivity, so hath this Rome the true Judah, that is, the confessors of Christ? Dost thou not know, that as destruction happened unto it, so shall it do unto this? And thinkest thou that God will not deliver his people now when the time is come, as he did then? Hath not God commanded his people to come out from her? And wilt thou give example to the whole realm to run unto her? Hast thou forgotten the woe that Christ threateneth to offence-givers? Wilt thou not remember, that it were better that a mill-stone were hanged about thy neck and thou thrown into the sea, than that thou shouldst offend the little ones?

And alas, how hast thou offended? Yea, and how dost thou still offend? Wilt thou consider things according to the outward shew? Was not the synagogue more seemly and like to be the true church, than the simple flock of Christ's disciples? Hath not the whore of Babylon more costly array, and rich apparel, externally to set forth herself, than the homely housewife of Christ? Where is the beauty of the king's daughter, the church of Christ? Without or within? Doth not David say, within? O remember that as they are happy which are not offended at Christ, so are they happy which are not offended at his poor church. Can the pope and his prelates mean honestly, which make so much of the wife, and so little of the husband? The church they magnify, but Christ they contemn. If this church were an honest woman, (that is, Christ's wife) except they would make much of her husband, Christ and his word, she would not be made much of by them.

When Christ and his apostles were upon earth, who was most like to be the true church, they or the prelates, bishops, and synagogue? If we ought to have followed custom, unity, antiquity, or the greater part, should not Christ and his company have been cast out doors? Therefore Christ saith, Search the scriptures. Good mother, shall the servant be above his master? Shall we look for better entertainment at the hands of the world, than Christ and his dear disciples found? In Noah's time who was taken for the church, poor Noah and his family, or all the others that were destroyed by the flood? Who was taken for God's church in Sodom, righteous Lot, or the others? And doth not Christ say, "As it was then, so shall it go now towards the coming of the Son of man?" What meaneth Christ when he saith, Iniquity shall have the upper hand? Doth not he likewise say, that charity shall wax cold? And we plainly see the greatest scarcity of it in those, who would now be taken for Christ's true catholic church. All that fear God in this realm can tell more of this than I can write.

Therefore, dear mother, receive some admonition of one of thy poor children, now going to be burnt to ashes for the testimony of Jesus. Come again to God's truth; come out of Babylon; confess Christ and his true doctrine; repent of what is past, make amends by declaring thy repentance by the fruits. Remember the reading and preaching of God's prophet the true preacher, Martin Bucer. Call to mind the threatenings of God against impenitent sinners. Let the exile of Leaver, Pilkington, Grindal, Haddon, Horn, Scory, Ponet, &c. awake and strengthen thee. Let the imprisonment of thy dear sons, Cranmer, Ridley, and Latimer, move thee. Consider the martyrdom of thy intimate friends, Rogers, Saunders, and Taylor. And now cast not away the poor admonition of me, that am now going to be burnt and to receive the like crown of glory with my fellows. Take to heart God's calling by us. Be not as Pharaoh was, that it may not happen unto thee as it did unto him. What is that? Hardness of heart. And what then? Destruction eternally both of body and soul. Ah therefore, good mother, awake, awake, repent, repent, and make haste to turn to the Lord. For otherwise it shall be more easy for Sodom and Gomorrah in the day of judgment, than for thee. O harden not your hearts; O stop not your ears to-day in hearing God's voice, though it be by a most unworthy messenger. O fear the Lord, for his anger is begun to kindle. Even now the axe is laid to the root of the tree.

You know I prophesied truly before the sweating sickness came what would come, if you repented not your carnal preaching. And now I tell you before I depart hence, that the ears of men will tingle to hear the vengeance of God that will fall upon you all, both town and university, if you repent not, if you leave not your idolatry, if you turn not speedily to the Lord, if you will be ashamed of Christ's truth which you know.

O Perne repent, O Thompson repent, O doctors, bachelors and masters repent; O mayor, aldermen, and town-dwellers, repent, repent, repent, that you may escape the approaching vengeance of the Lord. Rent your hearts and make haste to come unto the Lord. Let us all say, We have sinned, we have done wickedly, we have not hearkened to thy voice, O Lord. Deal not with us after our deserts, but be merciful unto our iniquities, for they are great. O pardon our offences. In thine anger remember thy mercy. Turn us unto thee, O Lord God of hosts, for the glory of thy name's sake. Spare us and be merciful unto us. Let not the wicked people say, Where is now their God? O for thine own sake, for thy name's sake, deal mercifully with us. Turn thyself unto us, and us unto thee, and we shall praise thy name for ever.

If in this sort, my dearly beloved, in heart and mouth we come unto our Father, and prostrate ourselves before the throne of his grace, then surely we shall find mercy. Then shall the Lord look merrily upon us, for his mercy's sake in Christ: then shall we hear him speak peace unto his people. For he is gracious and merciful, of great pity and compassion: he cannot be chiding for ever: his anger cannot last long to the penitent. Though we weep in the morning, yet at night we shall have our sorrow to cease. For he is merciful, and hath no pleasure in the death of a sinner: he would rather have him turn from his wickedness and live.

Oh turn ye now and repent, yet once again I humbly beseech you, and then the kingdom of heaven shall draw nigh. The eye hath not seen, the ear hath not heard, nor is the heart of man able to conceive the joys prepared for us, if we repent, amend our lives, and heartily turn to the Lord. But if you repent not, but be as ye were, and go forwards with the wicked, following the fashion of the world, the Lord will lead you on with wicked doers, you shall perish in your wickedness, your blood will be upon your own heads, your parts shall be with hypocrites, where shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth; you shall be cast from the face of the Lord for ever and ever: eternal shame, sorrow, woe, and misery, shall be both in body and soul to you world without end. Oh therefore, right dear to me in the Lord, turn you, turn you, repent you, repent you, amend, amend your lives, depart from evil, do good, follow peace, and pursue it. Come out from Babylon, cast off the works of darkness, put on Christ, confess his truth, be not ashamed of his gospel, prepare yourselves for the cross, drink of God's cup before it come to the dregs, and then shall I with you and for you, rejoice in the day of judgment, which is at hand; and therefore prepare yourselves thereto, I heartily beseech you. And thus I take my farewell for ever, with you in this present life, mine own dear hearts in the Lord. The Lord of mercy be with us all, and give us a joyful and sure meeting in his kingdom, Amen, Amen.

Out of prison, February 11, 1555.

Your own in the Lord for ever,

JOHN BRADFORD.

LETTER IV.

From Mr. BRADFORD, to LANCASHIRE and CHESHIRE.

TO all those who profess the name and true religion of our Saviour Christ in Lancashire and Cheshire, and especially abiding in Manchester and thereabouts, John Bradford, a most unworthy servant of the Lord, now not only in bonds, but also condemned for the same true religion, witheth mercy and grace, peace and increase of all godliness from God the Father of all pity, through the deserts of our Lord Jesus Christ, by the working of the most mighty and lively Spirit the Comforter for ever, Amen.

I heard it credibly reported, my dearly beloved in the Lord, that my heavenly Father hath thought it good to provide, that as I have preached his true doctrine and gospel amongst you by word, so shall I testify and confirm the same by deed, that is, I shall leave my life with you, which by his providence I first received there, (for in Manchester I was born) for a seal to the doctrine I have taught with you and amongst you: so that if from henceforth you waver in the same, you have no excuse at all. I know the enemies of Christ which exercise this cruelty upon me, (I speak in respect of mine offence, which is none to themwards) think by killing of me amongst you, to hinder you and others, lest they should attempt to teach Christ truly, or believe his doctrine hereafter. But I doubt not but my heavenly Father will by my death more confirm you in his truth. And therefore I greatly rejoice to see Satan and his soldiers supplanted in their own wisdom, which is plain foolishness amongst the wise indeed, that is, amongst such as have heard God's word, and do follow it: for they only are counted wise of the wisdom of God our Saviour.

Indeed if I should simply consider my life with that which it ought to have been, and as God in his law requireth, then could I not but cry as I do, Righteous art thou, O Lord, and all thy judgments are true. For I have much grieved thee, and transgressed thy holy precepts, not only before my professing the gospel, but since also: yea, since my coming into prison I do not excuse, but accuse myself before God and all his church, that I have grievously offended my Lord God, I have not loved his gospel as I should have done, I have sought myself, and not his glory only and my brethren's good, I have been too unthankful, secure, carnal, hypocritical, vain-glorious, &c. All which my evils, the Lord of mercy pardon for his Christ's sake, as I hope and certainly believe he hath done for his great mercy in Christ our Redeemer.

But when I consider the cause of my condemnation, I cannot but lament, that I do no more rejoice than I do: for it is God's verity and truth. So that the condemnation is not a condemnation of Bradford simply, but rather a condemnation of Christ and of his truth. Bradford is nothing else but an instrument in whom Christ and his doctrine is condemned. And therefore, my dearly beloved, rejoice and give thanks with me and for me, that ever God did vouchsafe so great a benefit to our country, as to chuse the most unworthy (I mean myself) to be one, in whom it would please him to suffer any kind of affliction: much more this violent kind of death, which I perceive is prepared for me with you for his sake. All glory and praise be given unto God our Father, for his great and exceeding mercy towards me through Jesus Christ our Lord, Amen.

But perchance you will say unto me, what is the cause for which you are condemned? We hear say, that you deny all presence of Christ in his holy supper, and so make it a bare and common bread, and nothing else. My dearly beloved, what is said, and what will be said of me, I cannot tell. It is told me that Dr. Pendleton is gone down to preach with you, not as he once recanted, (for you all know he hath preached contrary to that he was wont to preach before I came amongst you) but to recant that which he hath recanted. How he will speak of me, and report before I come, when I am come, and when I am burned, I mind not: for he that is so uncertain, will speak so often against himself, I cannot think he will speak well of me, except it make for his purpose and profit: but this enough.

Indeed the chief thing which I am condemned for, as a heretic, is because I deny in the sacrament of the altar, (which is not Christ's supper, but a plain perverting of it, being used as the papists now use it) to be a real, natural, and corporeal presence of Christ's body and blood, under the form and accidents of bread and wine, that is, because I deny transubstantiation, which is the darling of the devil, and daughter and heir to Antichrist's religion, whereby the mass is maintained, Christ's supper perverted, his sacrifice and cross imperfect, his priesthood destroyed, the ministry taken away, repentance repelled, and all true godliness abandoned. In the supper of our Lord or sacrament of Christ's body and blood, I confess and believe that there is a true, and very presence of the whole Christ, God and man, to the faith of the receiver, (but not to the stammerer or looker on) as there is a very true presence of bread and wine to the senses of him that is partaker thereof. This faith, the doctrine, which consenteth with the word of God, and with the true testimony of Christ's church, (which the popish church doth persecute) will I not forsake, and therefore I am condemned as an heretic, and as such I shall be burned. But, my dearly beloved, this truth (for which I lay down my life) I hope in God shall never be burnt, bound, nor overcome; but shall gloriously triumph, have victory, and be at liberty, in spite of the rage of God's adversaries. For there is no counsel against the Lord, nor can any device of man be able to defeat the truth in another than such as be children of unbelief, who have no love to the truth, and therefore are given up to believe lies. For which plague the Lord of mercy deliver you, my dear hearts in the Lord, and all the realm, I humbly beseech his mercy. Amen.

And that you may be delivered from this plague, I shall, with my farewell with you for ever in this present life, heartily desire you all, in the bowels and blood of our most merciful Saviour Jesus Christ, to attend unto these things which I am now going to write unto you out of the holy scriptures.

You know the heavy plagues of God are fallen upon us, taking away our king, and true religion, God's true prophets and ministers, &c. and setting over us such as seek not the Lord after knowledge: whose endeavours God prospereth wonderfully to the trial of many, that his people may both better know themselves, and be known. Now the cause hereof is our iniquities and grievous sins. We knew not the time of our visitation; we were unthankful to God, we contemned, and continually abused the gospel, to serve our hypocrisy and vain-glory, viciousness, avarice, idleness, security, &c. Long did the Lord linger, and tarry to have shewed mercy unto us, but we were ever the less deserving. Therefore God dealeth with us more justly, and even now he tempereth his justice with great mercy by which we are preserved from utter destruction. If the Lord should deal with us according to our deserts, alas, who could bear it? Seeing in his anger he remembereth mercy, undesired (nay, even undesired by us) let us take occasion the more ready to meet him, (not with force of arms, for we are not able to withstand him, much less to prevail against him) and beseech him to be merciful unto us, according to his wonted mercy deal with us.

Let us arise with David, and say, "Enter not into judgment with thy servant, O Lord, for in thy sight no man living shall be justified." Let us send ambassadors with the centurion and say, "Lord, we are not worthy to come ourselves unto thee, speak the word, and we shall have peace." Let us patiently with the publican look down on the earth, knock our hearts to burst them, and cry out, "O God, be merciful unto us, wretched sinners." Let us with the lost son return and say, "O Father, we have sinned against heaven and earth, and before thee, we are unworthy to be called thy children." Let us, I say, heartily repent of our former evil life, and turn to God with our whole hearts, hoping in his great mercy through Christ, and heartily calling upon his holy name, and then undoubtedly we shall find and feel otherwise than yet we have both inwardly and outwardly. Inwardly we shall feel peace of conscience between God and us, which peace passeth all understanding, and we shall find that the outward troubles and

From Mr. BRADFORD, to the Town of WALDEN.

TO the faithful, and such as profess the true doctrine of our Saviour Jesus Christ, dwelling at Walden and thereabouts, John Bradford, a most unworthy servant of the Lord, now in bonds and condemned for the same true doctrine, wisheth grace, mercy, and peace, with the increase of all godliness in knowledge and living, from God the Father of all comfort, through the merits of our only Redeemer Jesus Christ, by the mighty working of the most Holy Spirit, the Comforter, for ever. Amen.

When I remember, how that by the providence and grace of God I have been a man by whom it hath pleased him, through my ministry, to call you to repentance and amendment of life, something effectually, as it seemed, and to sow amongst you his true doctrine and religion, lest that by my affliction, and storms now arisen to try the faithful, and to conform them to the image of the Son of God, into whose company we are called, you might be faint-hearted; I could not but out of prison secretly (for my keepers must not know that I have pen and ink) write unto you a signification of the desire I have, that you should be more confirmed in the doctrine I have taught you, which I am assured is the plain and infallible truth of God, and also that you be warned to govern your lives and conversation agreeable thereto. Dearly beloved in the Lord, had I taught you fables, tales, or lies, instead of this truth, I should not so willingly seal it with my blood.

Indeed, to confess the truth to you and all the church of Christ, I do think of myself that I have not only most justly deserved this kind of death, but also all kinds of deaths, and that eternally, for mine hypocrisy, vain-glory, uncleanness, self-love, covetousness, idleness, unthankfulness, and carnal professing of God's holy gospel, living therein not so purely and industriously as I should have done: may the God of all mercy pardon me through the merits of Christ's blood, as I hope, yea, I certainly believe he hath done. My dearly beloved, you and all the world well know, and may plainly perceive, that the prelates persecute Christ in me: they do not trouble me for the evil I have done, but for the good I have endeavoured to do, in standing up for the honour of God and his gospel; and because I cannot, dare not, and will not confess transubstantiation, and that wicked men, yea mice and dogs eating the sacrament of the altar, as they term it, (whereby they utterly overthrow Christ's holy supper) do eat the natural and real body of Christ which was born of the virgin Mary: I say, because I will not come into these absurd notions, I am deemed an heretic unworthy to live.

To believe and confess as God's word teacheth, the primitive church believed, and all the catholic and good holy fathers taught, 500 years at least after Christ, that in the supper of the Lord, (which the mass overthroweth, as it doth Christ's priesthood, sacrifice, death, and passion, the ministry of his word, true faith, repentance, and all godliness) whole Christ, God and man, is present by grace to the faith of the receivers, but not to the standers by or lookers on, as bread and wine is to their senses, will not serve: and therefore I am condemned, and shall be burned out of hand as an heretic. Wherefore I heartily thank my Lord God, that will and doth vouchsafe me worthy to be an instrument, in whom he himself doth suffer. For you see my affliction is not simply, because I have deserved no less, but much more at his hands and justice: but rather because I confess his truth, and by his grace, I am not afraid so to do, that you also might be confirmed in his truth. Therefore, my dearly beloved, I do heartily desire you, and all that sincerely love me in God, to give hearty thanks with me and for me to our heavenly Father, through our sweet Saviour Jesus Christ: for this is his exceeding great mercy towards me and you also, that your faith waver not from the doctrine I have taught, and you have received. For what can you desire more to assure your consciences of the verity taught by your preachers, than their own lives?

Therefore, my dear friends, waver not in Christ's religion truly taught you, and set forth in the days of king Edward. Never shall the enemies be able to burn, imprison, or keep it in bonds. They may bind and burn us as they please, so long as God shall give them leave; but our cause, religion, and doctrine which we profess, they shall never be able to put away. Their idolatry and popish religion shall never be built in the consciences of men that love God's truth. As for those that love not his gospel, that have no pleasure in his ways, over those the devil shall prevail: for God will give them up to strong delusions that they may believe lies. Therefore, dear brethren, I humbly beseech you in the blood of our Lord Jesus Christ, as I am now going to death for the testimony of Jesus, and as I have often pressed you from the pulpit, that you love the Lord's truth; so love it, that you frame your lives according to it. Alas, you know the cause of all these plagues now falling upon us, which God's enemies daily triumph in, that it is for our not loving God's word as we ought to do.

You

of this life will be much mitigated, if not quite taken away. Therefore, my dearly beloved in the Lord, I your poorest her now departing to the Lord, for my eternal farewell in life, pray you, beseech you, and even from the very bottom of my heart, by all the mercies of God shewed to you of my heart, by all the mercies of God shewed to you of my heart, most earnestly beg and intreat you out of prison, (as I have often done out of your pulpits) that you will repent, and forsake your wicked lives, be sorry for your offences, and turn to the Lord, whose arms are wide open to receive and embrace you. For he is the Lord of mercy, and God of all comfort, he desireth not the death of a sinner, but rather that he should repent, and amend. He hath no pleasure in the destruction of men; his long suffering should draw you to repentance, before the time of vengeance, and the day of wrath, which at hand, doth come. Now is the axe laid to the root of the tree utterly to destroy the impenitent. Now is the fire gone out before the face of the Lord, and who is able to quench it? O therefore repent, re- pent. It is enough to have played the wanton gospellers, the proud protestants, hypocritical and false christians, as alas! we have done. Now the Lord speaketh to us in mercy and grace; he will not speak in wrath. Yet is there mercy with the Lord, and plenteous redemption: yet he hath not forgotten to shew mercy to those that call upon him. O then call upon him while he may be found. For he is rich in mercy, and merciful to all them that call upon him. So that he that calleth upon the name of the Lord, shall be saved. If your hearts be red as scarlet, the Lord saith, he will make them as white as snow. He hath sworn, and never will repent him- self, that he never will remember our iniquities: but as he is good, faithful, and true, so will he be our God, and we will be his people: he will write his law in our hearts, and put it in our minds, and never will he regard our unrighteousnesses. Therefore, my dear hearts in the Lord, turn you, turn you to the Lord your Father, to the Lord your Saviour, to the Lord your Comforter. Oh why do you stop your ears, and harden your hearts, to-day, when you hear his voice by me your poor brother? O forget not how that the Lord hath shewed himself true, and me his true preacher, by bringing to pass these things which at my mouth you often heard before they came to pass, especially when I treated of Noah's flood, and when I preached on the xxii. chap. of St. Matthew's gospel, on St. Stephen's day, the last time that I was with you. And now me the Lord sendeth you word, dear countrymen, that if you will go forward in your impenitence, carnality, hypocrisy, idolatry, covetousness, swearing, gluttony, drunkenness, whoredoms, &c. (wherewith alas, alas, our country floweth!) if, I say, you will not turn and leave off, seeing me now burned amongst you, to assure you on all sides how God seeketh you, and is sorry to do you hurt, to plague you, to destroy you, to take vengeance upon you; O your blood will be upon your heads: you have been warned, and warned again, by me preaching, by me in burning. As I said therefore, I say again, my dear hearts in the Lord, turn you, turn you, repent you, cease from doing evil, study to do well, away with idolatry, fly the Romish god and service, away from swearing, cut off carnality, abandon avarice, away drunkenness, fly from fornication and flattery, murder and malice, destroy deceitfulness, and cast away all the works of darkness. Put on mercy and piety, serve God after word, and not after custom, use your tongues to glorify God by prayer, thanksgiving, and confession of his truth, &c. spiritually, and by the spirit mortify carnal affections; be sober, holy, true, loving, gentle, merciful, and then the Lord's wrath will cease, not for this our doings sake, but for his mercy's sake. Go to therefore, good countrymen, take this counsel of the Lord, by me now sent unto you, as the Lord's counsel, and not as mine, that in the day of judgment I may rejoice with you and for you; which thing I heartily desire, and to be a witness against you. My blood will cry for vengeance against the papists as God's enemies, (whom I beseech God, if it be his will, heartily to forgive, yea, even them which put me to death and are the causers thereof, for they know not what they do) so will my blood cry for vengeance against you, my dearly beloved in the Lord, if ye repent not, and turn unto the Lord. Turn unto the Lord, yet once more I heartily beseech thee, thou Manchester, thou Ashton-under-line, thou Bolton, Bury, Eigan, Liverpool, Winsley, Eccles, Middleton, and thou of West-chester, &c. where I have truly taught and preached the word of God. Turn, I say, unto you all, and to all the inhabitants thereabouts, unto the Lord our God, and he will be merciful unto you; he will say unto his angel, It is enough, put up the sword. Which that he may do, I humbly beseech his precious blood's sake of his dear Son our Saviour Jesus Christ. Ah good brethren, take in good part these last words unto every one of you. Pardon me mine offences and negligences in behaviour amongst you. The Lord of mercy pardon us all our offences for our Saviour Jesus Christ's sake. I am of prison ready to come to you, the 11th of February, 1555.

You know that we were gospellers in lips and not in life. We were gluttoned with and tired of the word of God: yea, we loathed it, as the children of Israel did the manna in the wilderness; and therefore as the Lord's wrath waxed hot with them, so it doth with us. So that there is no other remedy, but that (for it is better late to turn, than never to turn) we confess our faults, even from the bottom of our hearts, and with hearty repentance, (which God grant to us all) we run unto the Lord our God, who is exorable, merciful, and sorry for the evil poured out upon us; and cry unto him with Daniel, saying, We have sinned, we have grievously sinned, O Lord God, against thy majesty; we have heaped iniquity upon iniquity: the measure of our transgressions floweth over, so that thy vengeance and wrath is justly fallen upon us. For we are very miserable, for we have contemned thy long-suffering, we have not hearkened to thy voice. When thou hast called us by preachers, we hardened our hearts, and therefore now we justly deserve to have our hearts hardened like Pharaoh, to have eyes and see not, ears and hear not, hearts and understand not, lest we should turn and be saved. O be merciful unto us; spare us, good Lord, and all thy people whom thou hast dearly bought. Let not thine enemies triumph altogether, and always against thee, for then they will be puffed up. Look down and behold the pitiful complaint of the poor; let the sorrowful sighing of the simple come into thy sight, and be not angry with us for ever. Turn us, O Lord God of hosts, unto thee, and turn thou unto us, that thou mayest be justified in thy sweet sentences and overcome when thou art judged, as now thou art by our adversaries. For they say, Where is their God? Can God deliver them now? Can their gospel serve them? O Lord, how long? for thy honour's sake, in the bowels and blood of Jesus Christ, we humbly beseech thee, come and help us, for we are very miserable.

In this manner let us publicly and privately bewail our sins; and at the same time endeavour to avoid them as much as possible, especially all wilful and habitual sins; for if we nourish them in our heart, the Lord will not bear us, for the prayer of the wicked is abominable in the sight of God, saith the prophet. And in St. John it is written, The impenitent sinners God heareth not; and they are impenitent who purpose not to amend their lives. Those who, for fear or favour of men, worship God in a false manner, and contrary to their own consciences consent to the Romish rags, and resort to the rotten religion, communicating in service and ceremonies with the papists, thereby declaring, in effect, that they love the world more than God, and fear men more than Christ, and dread the loss of temporal things more than spiritual; I say, such men do sin as presumptuously as those who are wilfully guilty of the greatest immorality; for it is evident that the love of God abideth not in them. He that loveth the world, hath not God's word abiding in him, saith St. John: therefore my dear brethren in the Lord, remember what you have professed, Christ's name and religion, and the renouncing the devil, sin, and the world.

Remember, that before you learned A B C, your lesson was Christ's cross. Forget not that Christ will have no disciples, but such as will promise to deny themselves, and take up their cross, (mark, take it up) and follow him, and not the multitude, custom, &c. Consider for God's sake, that if we gather not with Christ, we scatter abroad. What should it profit a man to gain the whole world and lose his own soul? We must not forget that this life is a wilderness, and not a paradise: here is not our home; we are now in warfare: we must needs fight, or else be taken prisoners. Of all the things we have in this life, we shall carry nothing with us. If Christ be our captain, we must follow him. If we keep company with him in affliction, we shall be sure of his society in glory everlasting. If we forsake not him, he will never forsake us; but if we deny him, he will deny us. If we be ashamed of him, he will be ashamed of us. Wherefore, as he forsook his Father and heaven, and all the glory thereof, to come to us, to suffer poverty, torments, and death for our sakes, surely the least that we can do, is to forsake all the trifles here below, and go to him, especially when by so doing we make sure our eternal interest. Whatsoever you lose for the Lord's sake, shall be restored three-fold to your children: and you shall find peace of conscience and friendship with God, which is infinitely more worth than all the kingdoms of this world and the glory thereof.

My dearly beloved, therefore for the Lord's sake consider these things which I now write unto you of love, for my farewell, and last farewell for ever in this present life. Turn to the Lord, repent of your evil and unthankful life, declare repentance by the fruits, take time while you have it, come to the Lord while he calleth you, run into his lap while his arms be open to embrace you, seek him while he may be found, call upon him while time is convenient, forsake and fly from all evil, both in religion and in the rest of your life and conversation. Let your light so shine before men, that they may see your good works, and praise God in the day of his visitation. Oh come again, come again, you strange children, and I will receive you, saith the Lord. Repent and turn to me, and I will turn to you. Why will ye needs perish? As long as I live, (saith the Lord) I desire not your death, turn therefore unto me. Can a woman forget the child of her womb? If she should, yet will I not forget you, saith the Lord your God. I am he, I am he which put away your sins for mine own sake.

O then dear friends, turn, I say, unto your dearest Father. Cast not these sweet and loving words to the ground; for the Lord watcheth on his word to perform it: which is in two fold to them that lay it up in their hearts, and believe it, will be to all, and eternal joy and comfort. But to them that cast it out their backs, and will forget it, to them, I say, will be once more beseech and pray you, and every of you, not to condemn this poor and simple exhortation, which now out of passion I make unto you, or rather the Lord by me. I am unwilling to be a witness against you in the last day; as of truth must if you repent not, if you love not God's gospel, yea, if you love it not.

Therefore, to conclude, repent, love God's gospel, let it be all your conversation; so shall God's name be praised, his plagues be mitigated, his people comforted, and his enemies ashamed. Grant all this thou gracious Lord God, to every one of us for thy dear Son's sake, our Saviour Jesus Christ; whom with thee and the Holy Ghost, be eternal glory for ever and ever. Amen. February 12, 1555.

By the bondman of our Lord, and your afflicted poor brother,
JOHN BRADFORD

LETTER VI.

From Mr. BRADFORD to his loving BRETHREN
B. C. &c. their WIVES and whole FAMILIES.

I beseech the everliving God to grant you all, my good brethren and sisters, the comfort of the Holy Spirit, and the continual sense of his mercy in Christ our Lord, now and ever, Amen.

The world, my brethren, seemeth to have the upper hand of iniquity overfloweth, the truth and verity seemeth to be oppressed, and they which take part therewith are unjustly treated, as they which love the truth lament to see and hear as they do. The cause of all this is God's anger and mercy: his anger because we have grievously sinned against him; his mercy, because he here punisheth us, and as a Father nurtureth us. We have been unthankful for his word; we have contemned his kindness; we have been negligent in prayer; we have been carnal, covetous, licentious, &c. we have not hastened to be heaven-ward, but rather to hell-ward. We were fallen almost into an open contempt of God, and all his good ordinances so that of his justice he could no longer forbear, but make us feel his anger as now he hath done, in taking his word and service from us, and permitting Satan to serve us with an unchristian religion; and that in such sort, that if we will not yield to it, and seem to allow it in deed and outward fact, our bodies are like to be laid in prison, and our goods given to them that cannot tell to whom.

We should look upon this as a sign of God's anger procured by our sins; which, my good brethren, every one of us should often call to our memories, as particularly as we can, that we might heartily lament them, repent them, hate them, earnestly ask mercy for them, and submit ourselves to bear in this life any kind of punishment which God will lay upon us for them. This should we do in consideration of God's anger in this time. Now his mercy in this time of wrath is seen, and should be seen in us, my dearly beloved, in this, that God doth vouchsafe to punish us in this present life. If he should not have punished us, do not you think that we would have continued in the error we were in? Yes verily, we would have been worse, and have gone forwards in hardening our hearts by impenitence, and negligence of God and true godliness. And then if death had come, should not we have perished both soul and body in eternal fire and perdition? Alas, what misery should we have fallen into, if God should have suffered us to have gone forward in our evil way. There is no greater sign of damnation, than to lie in evil sin unpunished by God, as now the papists (my dearly beloved) are cast into Jezebel's bed of security, which of all plagues is the most grievous that can be. They are bastards and not for they are not under God's rod of correction.

A great mercy it is therefore that God doth punish us: for if he loved us not, he would not punish us. Now doth he chastise us, that we should not be damned with the world. Now doth he nurture us, because he favoureth us. Now may we thank ourselves God's house and children, because he beginneth to chastize us. Now he calleth us to remember our sins of the past. Wherefore? That we might repent and ask mercy. And why? That he might forgive us, pardon us, justify us, make us his children, and so begin to make us like unto Christ here, that we might be like unto him elsewhere, even in heaven, where already we are set by faith with Christ; and at his coming in very deed we shall then most joyfully enjoy, when our sinful and vile bodies shall be made like to Christ's glorious body according to the promise.

ording to the power whereby he is able to make all things ject to himself.
Therefore my brethren, let us in respect hereof not lament, praise God; not be sorry, but be merry; not weep, but be glad, that God doth vouchsafe to offer us his grace, whereby to come to him to endless joys and comforts.
If we suffer, we shall reign; if we confess him before men, he will confess us before his Father in heaven; if we be not ashamed of his gospel now, he will not be ashamed of us in the last day, but will be glorified in us, crowning us with crowns of glory and endless felicity: for, "Blessed are they which suffer persecution for righteousness' sake, for their's is the kingdom of heaven." Be glad, (saith Peter) for the Spirit of God resteth upon you. After that you are a little afflicted, God will comfort, strengthen, and confirm you. And therefore, my good brethren, be not discouraged for crosses, for prison, or loss of goods, for confession of Christ's gospel and truth which you have believed, and was lively taught amongst you in the days of our late good king and most holy prince, king Edward.
This is most certain, if you lose any thing for Christ's sake, God will recompense it you a hundred fold, and for contemning the antichristian service, set up again amongst us; as you for your parts even in prison shall find God's great and rich mercy, far passing all worldly wealth; so shall your wives and children in this present life find and feel God's providence, more plentifully than tongue can tell. For he will show merciful kindness on them that love him. The good man's need shall not go begging his bread. You are good men, so shall you suffer for Christ's sake.

I trust you all, my dearly beloved, will consider this with yourselves, and in the cross see God's mercy, which is more valuable than life itself, much more than any pelf of this world.
His mercy of God should make you merry and chearful: for the afflictions of this life are not to be compared with the joys of the life prepared for you. You know that the way to heaven is not the wide way of the world, which leadeth to the devil: but the way to heaven is strait, which few people walk in. For few live godly in Christ Jesus; few regard the life to come; few remember the day of judgment; few remember that Christ will deny them before his Father, that do deny him here; few consider that Christ will be ashamed of them in the last day, who are ashamed of his truth and true service; few imagine how their accounts will stand at the day of vengeance; few regard the condemnation of their own conscience, in doing that which inwardly they disallow; and few love God better than their goods.

I trust you are of this few, my dearly beloved, I hope you are of that little flock, who shall inherit the kingdom of heaven; I hope you are those mourners and lamenters, who shall be comforted with such comfort as shall never be taken from you. Repent of your former evils: strive against those evil inclinations that are in you: continue to call upon God: defile not your bodies with the idolatrous service of the antichristian church of Rome: molest not the good Spirit of God, which is given you as a pledge of your eternal redemption, a counsellor and guide to lead you to his eternal truth; which good Spirit I beseech the Father of mercy to give to us all, for the sake of his only Son Jesus Christ our Lord; to whom I commend you all, and to the word of his grace, which is able to help you all, and save all that believe it, and lead their lives according to it.

Of this you may be very certain, that all the hairs of your heads are numbered, so that not one of them shall perish, neither shall any man or devil be able to hurt you, or even attempt to hurt you, without the permission of your heavenly Father, who tenderly loveth you; and when he hath given them leave, they shall go no farther than he will, nor keep you in trouble longer than he pleases. Therefore cast your care on him, who careth for you. Only study to please him, and to keep your conscience clean, and your bodies pure from the idolatrous service, which now every-where is used, and God will marvellously and mercifully defend and comfort you, for the sake of his only name in Jesus Christ our Lord, Amen.

LETTER VII.

From Mr. BRADFORD to ERKINALDE RAW-LINS, and his WIFE.

God our dear and most merciful Father through Jesus Christ, be with you, my good brother and sister, as with all his children for ever, and in all things so guide you with his holy Spirit, the leader of his people, as may be to his glory, and our own everlasting joy and comfort in him, Amen.
As you have often relieved my necessities, (for which I besought God to make me thankful, and to recompense you both here and hereafter) I cannot but endeavour (as I am in gratitude bound) to write something for your spiritual comfort.

My dearly beloved, look not upon these days, and the afflictions which they bring, as dismal days, and days only of God's vengeance, but rather of good days, or days of God's fatherly kindness towards you, and such as you be, that is, towards such repent of their past sins, and earnestly purpose to amend their lives, walking not after the way of the world, and the greatest part of men, for the preservation of their pelf, which, will they nill they, they shall leave sooner or later, and to whom, and how it shall be used, they know not. Indeed to such as walk in their wickedness, and wind on with the world, this time is a time of wrath and vengeance, and their beginning of sorrow is but now, because they contemn the physic of their Father, which by this purging time and cleansing days would work for their health, if they did but consider it: and because they will not have God's blessing, which hath been offered to them both by prosperity and adversity, therefore it shall be kept far enough from them. As when the sick man will receive no kind of physic from the hands of the physician, he is left alone, and so the malady increaseth, and at length destroyeth him.

To such men, indeed, these days are, and should be doleful days, and days of woe and weeping, because their damnation draweth nigh.

But unto such as be penitent, and are desirous to live after the Lord's will, (among whom I do not only count you, but as far as a man may judge, I know you are) unto such, I say, this time is, and should be comfortable. For now our Father chastiseth us for our sins; if he had had a mind to destroy us, he would have left us to ourselves, to seek our own ways, and work our own ruin: let us patiently embrace his fatherly visitation, for he chastiseth us in this world, lest with the world we should perish. Therefore, dear friends, call to mind and lament your sins; pray for mercy and forgiveness, and undoubtingly believe that God will hear you: he doth not punish twice for one thing.

So that, I say, we have cause to rejoice for these days, because our Father suffereth us not to lie in Jezebel's bed, sleeping in our own sins and security, but as mindful of us, doth correct us as his own children; whereby we may be certain that we are no bastards, but sons; for he correcteth every son whom he receiveth. So that they who are not partakers of his chastise-ments, or that contemn it, declare themselves to be bastards and not sons, as I know you are, who being chastised, improve it accordingly. And therefore, my dear friends, be glad, knowing certainly even by these visitations of the Lord, that ye are his dear and chosen children, whose faults your Father doth visit with the rod of correction, but his mercy will he never take away from us. Amen.

You have cause to rejoice for these days, because they are days of trial, wherein you yourselves, and all the world shall know that you belong not to it, but are God's darlings. Before these days came, Lord God! how many thought themselves in God's bosom, and so were taken, and would be taken by the world? But now we see whose they are. For, whom we obey, his servants we be. If we obey the world, (which God forbid, and hitherto you have not done it) then are we the world's; but if we obey God, then are we God's. Which thing (I mean, that you are God's) these days have declared both to you, to me,
and to all others that know you, better than ever we knew it.
Therefore you have no cause to be sorry, but rather to rejoice at this assurance of being the Lord's children, and as you are so accounted by all good people.

What though the world repine thereat? what though it kick?
what though it seek to trouble and molest you? it doth but according to it's nature: he cannot love the Lord who liveth not in the Lord: he cannot brook the child that hateth the Father:
he that careth not for the master will not mind the servant. If ye were of the world, the world would love you, you should live quietly, there would be no grief, no molestation. If the devil dwelt in you, (which God forbid) he would not stir up his knights to besiege your house, or suffer his fiends to enter into your swine: but because Christ dwelleth in you, (as he doth by faith) therefore the devil stirreth up his first-begotten son, the world, to seek how to disquiet you, to rob you, to spoil you, and to destroy you: and perchance your dear Father, to try, and to make known to you and to the world, that you are intended for a better habitation than can be found here upon earth, even an house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens; hath given, or will give power to Satan, and to the world, to take from you the things which he hath lent you, and by taking them away, to try your fidelity, obedience, and love towards him, (for you must not love them above him) as by giving that you have, and keeping it, he hath declared his love towards you.

Satan, it may be, telleth God, (as he did of Job) that you love God for the sake of your goods. What then, if the Lord, to try you with Job, should give him power over your goods and body, would you be dismayed? would you despair?
would you be faint-hearted? or would you not rather rejoice, as the apostles did, that they were worthy to suffer any thing for the Lord's sake? O forget not the end that happened to Job: for as it happened to him, so shall it happen unto you.
For God is the same God, and cannot long forget to shew mercy to them that look and long for it, as you do, and I pray you still so to do: for the Lord loveth you, and never can nor will forget to shew and pour out his mercy upon you. After he hath afflicted and tried you a little while, (saith St. Peter) he will visit, comfort, and confirm you; as he did to Jacob wrestling with the angel, when at length morning came, and the sun arose; so doubtless, it will happen unto you. However, do ye as Job and Jacob did, that is, order and dispose the things that God has lent you, as well as you can while you have time: who knoweth but God hath given you power thus long, for that end?

Go therefore, dispose of your goods, prepare yourselves to trial, that ye may either stand to it like God's champions, or else if you feel such infirmity in yourselves that ye be not able, give place to violence, and go where you may serve the Lord with a free and safe conscience. Think not this counsel to come by chance and fortune, but from the Lord. Other oracles we may not look for now. As God told Joseph in a dream by an angel, that he should fly; so if you feel such infirmity in yourselves, as should turn to God's dishonour, and your own destruction withal; know that at this present I am as God's angel, to admonish you to take time while ye have it, and to see that God's name might not be dishonoured by you. Joseph might have objected the omission of his vocation, as perchance ye will do. But (dear hearts) let vocations and all things else give place to God's name, and the sanctifying thereof.

This I speak, not as though I would not have you rather to tarry, and to stand to it: but I speak it in respect of your infirmity, which if you feel to be so great in you, that you are not certain of this hope, that God will never tempt you above your ability, fly and get you hence, and know that thereby God will have you tried to yourselves and to others. For by it you shall know how to take this world, and that your home here is no home, but that ye look for another, and so give occasion to others less to love this world, and perchance to some to doubt of their religion. Wherein though they be earnest, yet would they not lose so much as ye do for your religion, which ye do confirm to me and others, by your giving place to violence.

Last of all, ye have cause to rejoice over these our days, because they be the days of confirmation, in which and by which, God our heavenly Father maketh us like to Christ's image here, that we may be like unto him elsewhere. For if we suffer with him, then shall we rise with him again; if we accompany with him in all troubles and afflictions, then shall we rejoice with him in glory; if we now sow with him in tears, we shall reap with him in gladness; if we confess him before men, he will confess us before his Father in heaven; if we take his part, he will take our's; if we lose aught for his name's sake, he will give us all things for his truth's sake. So that we ought to rejoice and be glad, for it is not given to every one to suffer loss of country, life, goods, house, &c. for the Lord's sake. What can God the Father do more unto us, than to call us into the camp with his Son? What may Christ our Saviour do more for us, than to make us his warriors? What can the Holy Ghost do to us above this, to mark us with the cognizance of the Lord of Hosts?

This cognizance of the Lord standeth not in forked caps, tippets, shaven crowns, or such other baggage and antichristian pelf, but in suffering for the Lord's sake. "The world shall hate you," saith Christ. Lo, there is the cognizance and badge of God's children; the world shall hate you. Rejoice therefore, (my dearly beloved) rejoice, that God doth vouchsafe to begin to confirm you, and to make you like to Christ. By the trial of these days ye are occasioned more to repent, more to pray, more to condemn this world, more to desire life everlasting, more to be holy, (for holy is the end for which God doth afflict us) and so to come to God's company. Which thing because we cannot do as long as this body is as it is, therefore by the door of death we must enter with Christ into eternal life, and immortality of soul and body; which God of his mercy send shortly, for our Saviour Jesus Christ's sake. Amen.

LETTER VIII.

From Mr. BRADFORD to Mrs. A. WARCUP.

THE everlasting peace of Christ be more and more lively felt in our hearts, by the operation of the Holy Ghost, now and for ever, Amen.

Although I know it to be more than needless to write any thing unto you, good sister, being, as I doubt not but you be, diligently exercised in reading of the scriptures, in meditating of the same, and in hearty prayer to God for the help of his Holy Spirit, to have the sense and feeling, especially of the comforts you read in God's word: yet having such opportunity, and not knowing whether hereafter I shall ever have the like, (as this messenger can declare) I thought good in few words to take my farewell in writing, because otherwise I cannot. And now methinks I have done it. For what else can I, or should I say unto you, my dearly beloved in the Lord, but farewell? Farewel, dear sister, farewell; howbeit in the Lord, our Lord, (I say) farewell. In him shall you fare well, and so much the better, by how much in yourself you fare evil, and shall fare evil.

When I speak of yourself, I mean also this world, this life, and all things properly pertaining to this life. In them as you look not for your welfare, so be not dismayed when accordingly you shall not feel it. To the Lord our God, to the Lamb our Christ, which hath borne our sins on his back, and is our Mediator for ever, do I send you. In him look for welfare, and that without wavering, because of his own goodness and truth which our wickedness cannot take away: nor that I would have you flatter yourself in any evil or unbelief, but that I would comfort you, that they should not dismay you. Your's is Christ wholly, your's, I say, he is, with all that ever he hath is not this welfare, think you? Mountains shall move, and the earth shall fall, before you find it otherwise, say that liar Satan what he list.

Therefore, good sister, farewell, and be merry in the Lord, merry, I say, for you have good cause. If your welfare, joy, and salvation, hanged upon any other thing than God's mercy and truth, then you might well be sad, heavy, and stand in doubt: but in as much as it hangeth only upon these two, (mean God's mercy and truth) tell Satan he lieth when he would persuade you to stand hesitating, by causing you to call your eyes (which only in this case should be set on Christ our sweet Saviour) on yourself. In some part, indeed, look on yourself, on your faith, on your love, obedience, &c. to awaken you from security, to stir you up to diligence, in doing the things appertaining to your vocation: but when you would be at peace with God, and have true consolation in your conscience, altogether look upon the goodness of God in Christ. Think on this commandment which precedeth all others, That you must have no other gods but the Lord Jehovah, which is your Lord God, which he could not be, if he did not pardon your sins in mercy. Remember that Christ commandeth you to call his Father for the same intent. And here call to mind all the benefits of God hitherto shewed upon you: and so shall you feel every deed, that which I wish unto you now, and pray you wish unto me. Farewel, dear sister, in the Lord Jesus, with whom he grant us shortly to meet as his children, for his name and mercy's sake, to our eternal welfare. Amen.

LETTER IX.

To Mr. LAURENCE SAUNDERS, PRISONER in the MARSHALSEA.

MY good brother, I beseech our good and gracious Father always to continue his gracious favour and love towards us, and by us, as by instruments of his grace, to work his glory and the confusion of his adversaries. "Out of the mouth of infants and babes he will shew forth his praise to destroy the enemy," &c.

I have perused your letters to myself, and have read them to others. For answer whereof, if I should write what Dr Taylor and Mr. Philpot do think, then I must say, that they think the salt sent unto us by your friend, is unreasonable. And I think they will both declare it heartily, if they should come before men. As for me, if you would know what I think, (my good and most dear brother) because I am so sinful and so defiled (the Lord knoweth that I lie not) with many grievous sins, which I hope are washed away with the blood of Christ, I neither can nor would be consulted withal, but stood as a cypher. Howbeit, to tell you how much what I mind, take this for a sum: I pray God in no case I may seek myself, and indeed I thank God for it, I purpose not.

That which remaineth I commit to my Lord God, and trust in him, that he will do according to this: Cast thy care on the Lord, &c. Cast all your care upon him, &c. Reveal unto the Lord thy way, and trust, &c. Whosoever trusteth in the Lord, mercy shall compass him about. For the Lord is faithful: he will in temptation make a way that you may be able to bear it. The Lord knoweth how to rid out of temptation the godly, &c. O would to God, I were godly, &c. The Lord knoweth how to deliver out of temptation, such as trust in him, &c. I cannot think that they will offer any kind of indifferent or mean conditions: for if we will not adore the beauteous Father and gracious Lord make perfect the good he hath begun in us.

He will do it, my brother, my dear brother, whom I have in my inward bowels to live and die with. O that I were with you. Pray for me, my own heart root in the Lord.

For ever your own,

JOHN BRADFORD

LETTER X.

From the SAME to the SAME.

GOD's sweet peace in Christ be with you, my good brother in the Lord Jesus, and with all your fellow captives. Amen.

I was hindered this morning from musing on that which I purposed to have thought on by reason of you, against whom I saw myself guilty of negligence, even in this point that I would not write, I should say, that I had not written unto you as yet: therefore I prepared myself out of hand to clear myself hereof, not that I will go about to excuse my fault, (for that were more to load me) but by asking God and you pardon, to get it no more laid to my charge. Now when I was thus purposing, and partly doing, there came

th a letter from you : for which as I have cause to thank d and you, so I see myself more blame-worthy for thus g holding my peace. Howbeit, good brother, in this I have en a demonstration to you, to behold my negligence in all er things, and especially in praying for you, and for the urch of God, which for my sins and hypocrisy, (hypocrisy eed even in this writing, God deliver me from it) having de-ved all kinds of plagues at his hands : but yet merciful is he it will on this wise chastize us in this world, that we should be condemned with the world. He might otherwise have ished us, I mean, he might have cast us in prison for other uses, me especially, than for his gospel and word's sake.
aised therefore be his name, who vouchsafeth us worthy of his honour. Ah good God, forgive us our sins, and work by thy fatherly correction on us, on me especially, effectually love thee and thy Christ ; and with joyfulness carry thy cross the end.

Ah good brother, if I could always have God, his majesty, ercy, heaven, hell, &c. before mine eyes, then should I dure, as St. Paul writeth of Moses, Heb. xi. " He en-red as he that saw him which is invisible." Pray for me as I know you do, and give thanks also : for, " In the Lord I shall not waver. If I walk by the valley of the shaw of death, I will not fear, for thou art with me, O Lord." I think we shall be shortly called forth : for now they have aw, and according to it they proceed, &c. otherwise they ill not reason with us ; and I think their sheet-anchor ill be, to have us to subscribe. Which thing if we do, ough with this condition, (so far as the thing subscribed to is against God's word) yet this will be offensive. Therefore us all confess that we are no changelings, but the same as we were in religion, and therefore cannot subscribe except e will dissemble both with God, ourselves and the world.
these things I write to you, dear brother, in the Lord.
ow I will read your epistle. Ah brother, that I had the actical understanding with you in that vine which you decribe : pray the Lord that I may think so indeed. God make e thankful for you. All our fellow-prisoners salute you, and ve thanks to God for you. The same do you for us, and pray at, &c.

Your brother in the Lord Jesus,

To live and die with you,

JOHN BRADFORD.

LETTER XI.

from Mr. BRADFORD to the Rev. FATHERS, Dr.
CRANMER, Dr. RIDLEY, and Dr. LATIMER.

JESUS Immanuel. My dear fathers in the Lord, I beseech God our sweet Father through Christ, to make perfect the d he hath begun in us all, Amen.

I had thought that every one of your staves had stood next e door, but now it is otherwise perceived. Our dear brother egers hath broken the ice valiantly, as this day, I think, or morrow at the uttermost, hearty Hooper, sincere Saunders, nd trusty Taylor, end their course, and receive their crown.
he next am I, which hourly look for the porter to open me the ates after them, to enter into the desired rest. God for-ve me mine unthankfulness for this exceeding great mercy, hat amongst so many thousands it pleaseth his mercy to huse me to be one, in whom he will suffer. For although it be most true, that I justly suffer, (for I have been great hypocrite, and a grievous sinner, the Lord pardon me, yea, he hath done it, he hath done it indeed) yet what il hath he done? Christ whom the prelates persecute, his erity which they hate in me, hath done no evil, nor deserved death. Therefore ought I most heartily to rejoice of this tener kindness of the Lord towards me, which useth a remedy for my sin as a testimonial of his testament, to his ory, to my everlasting comfort, to the edifying of his church, and to the overthrowing of Antichrist, and his king-om. Oh what am I, Lord, that thou shouldst thus magnify ne so vile a man and miser, as always I have been? Is his thy custom, to send for such a wretch and hypocrite as I ave been, in a fiery chariot as thou didst for Elijah? O dear athers, be thankful for me, that I still might be found worthy a whom the Lord would sanctify his holy name. And for our part, make you ready : for we are but your gentlemen-others. The marriage of the Lamb is prepared, come unto he marriage. I now go to leave my flesh there where I received it. I shall be conveyed thither, as Ignatius was to Rome, to be devoured by leopards ; by whose evil I hope to be made better. God grant, if it be his will, they may be made better by me. Amen.

For my farewell therefore, I write and send this unto you, trusting shortly to see you where we shall never be separated.
In the mean season I will not cease, as I have done, to commend you to the Father of heaven, and that you would do so by me, I most heartily pray every one of you : you know now that I have most need. " Faithful is God, who will not suffer us to be tempted above our strength." He never did it hitherto, and I am assured he never will,

Amen. " He is on my right hand, therefore I shall not fall. Wherefore my heart shall rejoice, for he shall not leave my soul in hell, neither shall he suffer me his holy one, by his grace in Christ, to see corruption."

Out of prison in haste, looking for the tormentor, February 8, 1555.

JOHN BRADFORD.

LETTER XII.

To the Right Honourable the LORD RUSSEL, EARL of BEDFORD, being then in TROUBLE for the CAUSE of RELIGION.

THE everlasting and most gracious God and Father of our Saviour Jesus Christ, bless your good lordship with all manner of heavenly blessings in the same Christ our only comfort and hope. Amen.

Praised be God our Father, who hath thought you worthy of faith in Christ, and of his cross for the same. Magnified be his holy name, who, as he hath delivered you from one cross, so hath made you willing (I hope) and ready to bear another when he shall see his time to lay it upon you : for these are the most singular gifts of God, given as to few, so to none else but to those few who are most dear in his sight.
Faith is reckoned, and worthily, among the greatest gifts of God, yea, it is the greatest that we can enjoy. For by it, as we be justified and made God's children, so are we temples and possessors of the Holy Spirit, yea, of Christ also, Ephes. iv. and of the Father himself, John xiv. By faith we drive the devil away, 1 Pet. v. We overcome the world, 1 John. v. and are already citizens of heaven, and fellows with God's dear saints. But who is able to reckon the riches that this faith bringeth with her unto the soul she sitteth upon? No man nor angel. And therefore (as I said) of all God's gifts she may be placed at the head, and have the highest seat. Which if men would rightly consider, (in that it cometh only from God's mercy-seat, not of hearing masses, mattins, dirges, or such dross, but by hearing the word of God in such a tongue as we may understand it) as they would be diligent and take great heed for doing or seeing any thing which might cast her down, (for then they fall also) so would they with no less care read and hear God's holy word, joining thereto most earnest and hearty prayer, ar well for the better understanding, as for the loving, living, and confessing the same, in spite of the devil, the world, the flesh, reason, goods, possessions, carnal friends, wife, children, and very life here, if they should pull us back to hearken to their voice and counsel, for more quiet, sure, and longer use of them:

Now notwithstanding this excellency of faith, in that we read the apostle to match therewith, yea, (as it were) to prefer suffering persecution for Christ's sake, I suppose no man will be so weak as to think otherwise, but that I and all God's children have cause to glorify and praise him, who hath made you worthy of so great a blessing. For though the reason or the wisdom of the world think of the cross according to their reach, and according to their present sense, and therefore they fly from it, as from the greatest ignominy and shame ; yet those who have been brought up in the school of Christ have learned to think otherwise of his cross, that it is the frame house in which God frameth his children like to his Son Christ ; the furnace that fineth God's gold ; the highway to heaven ; the livery wherewith God's servants are served ; the earnest and beginning of all consolation and glory. For they (I mean God's scholars, as your lordship, I hope, is) do enter into God's sanctuary, lest their feet slip. They look not as beasts do, on things present only, but on things to come, whereby they have the day of judgment and the glorious coming of Christ, as present to their faith, as the wicked have now their worldly wealth before their eyes, wherein they wallow, and will wallow till they tumble into hell, into miseries inexpressible, into torments everlasting.
Now they follow the fiend as the bear doth the train of honey, and the sow the swillings, till they be brought into the slaugh-terhouse, and then they shall know (but too late) that their prosperity hath brought them to eternal perdition. Then shall they cry, Wo, wo, wo, we went the wrong way : we counted these men (I mean such as you be, that suffer for God's sake, loss of goods, friends, and life, whom they shall see clothed with rich robes of righteousness, crowns of most pure and precious gold, and palms of conquest in the glorious palace of the Lamb, where is eternal joy and felicity. We counted (they will then say) these men but fools and madmen, we took their conditions to be but curiosity. But then the time will be turned, laughing shall be turned into weeping, and weeping into rejoicing. Read Wisdom ii. iii. iv. and v.

Therefore (as before I have said) great cause have I to thank God, who hath vouchsafed to make you worthy of this most bountiful blessing : much more then have you, my good lord, to be thankful. For look upon your vocation, I pray you, tell me how many noblemen, earls sons, lords, knights, and men of esteem, hath God thus dealt with in this realm of England :
I dare say, you think not you have deserved this. Only God's mercy in Christ hath wrought this on you, as he did in Jeremiah's time

time on Abimelech, in Achab's time on Abdias, in Christ's time on Joseph of Arimathea, in the apostles time on Sergius Paulus, and the queen of Candace's chamberlain. Only now be thankful and continue; continue, my good lord, continue to confess Christ. Be not ashamed of him before men, and then he will not be ashamed of you. Now will he try you; stick fast unto him, and he will stick fast by you; he will be with you in trouble, and deliver you. But then you must cry unto him; for so it proceedeth, "He cried unto me, and I heard him, I will be with him in trouble, will deliver him, and honour him."

Remember Lot's wife, who looked back. Remember Francis Spira. Remember none is crowned but he that striveth lawfully. Remember that all you have is at Christ's command. Remember he lost more for you; than you can lose for him. Remember you lose not that which is lost for his sake; for you shall find much more here and hereafter. Remember you shall die, and when, where, and how, you cannot tell. Remember that the death of sinners is most terrible. Remember the death of God's saints is most precious in his sight. Remember the multitude goeth the wide way that leadeth to destruction. Remember that the strait gate, which leadeth to glory, hath but few travellers. Remember, Christ biddeth you to strive to enter in thereat. Remember, he that trusteth in the Lord, shall receive strength to stand against all the assaults of his enemies. Be certain that all the hairs of your head are numbered. Be certain that your good Father hath appointed bounds, over which the devil dare not look. Commit yourself to him; he is, hath been, and will be your keeper. Cast your care on him, and he will care for you. Let Christ be your scope and mark to aim at. let him be your pattern to work by: let him be your ensample to follow: give unto him your heart and hand, mind and tongue, faith and feet, and let his word be your candle, to go before you in all matters of religion. Blessed is he that walketh not to these popish prayers, nor sitteth nor standeth at them; glorify God both in soul and body. He that gathereth not with Christ, scattereth abroad. Use prayer; look for God's help, which is at hand assuredly to them that unfeignedly ask and desire it. In which prayers I heartily desire your lordship to remember us, who are (God be praised) gladly going with you; but if we go before you, we hope that you (if it be God's pleasure) will follow after, according to your daily prayer, "Thy will be done on earth, as it is in heaven." The good Spirit of God always be with your lordship unto the end, Amen.

Your lordship's own for ever,

JOHN BRADFORD.

LETTER XIII.

To Mr. WARCUP and his WIFE, Mrs. WILKINSON, and other FRIENDS.

THE same peace our Saviour Christ left with his people, which is not without war with the world, Almighty God work plentifully in your hearts now and for ever. Amen.

I perceive the time is come wherein the Lord's ground will be known; I mean, it will now shortly appear who have received God's gospel into their hearts indeed, to the taking of good root therein: for such will not wither for a little heat or sun burning, but stiffly will stand and grow on, in spite of the malice of all burning showers and tempests. And forasmuch as (my beloved in the Lord) I am persuaded of you, that ye be indeed the children of God, God's good ground, which groweth and will grow on, by God's grace, bringing forth fruit to God's glory after your vocations, as occasions shall be offered, therefore I cannot but so signify unto you, and heartily pray you and every one of you, accordingly to go forwards after your master Christ, not sticking at the foul way and stormy weather which you are to come into, and are like so to do: being most certain of this, that the end of your journey shall be pleasant and joyful in such a perpetual rest and blissfulness, as cannot but swallow up the showers that ye now feel and are immersed in, if ye often set it before your eyes, after St. Paul's counsel in the latter end of the fourth, and beginning of the fifth chapter of the second epistle to the Corinthians. Read it, I pray you, and remember it often as a restorative to refresh you, lest you faint in the way.

And besides this, set before you also, that though the weather be foul, and storms grow apace, yet ye go not alone, but others your brothers and sisters tread the same path, as St. Peter telleth us: and therefore company should cause you to be the more courageous and chearful. But if you had no company at all to go presently with you, I pray you tell me, if even from the beginning, the best of God's friends have found any fairer weather and way to the place whither ye are going, (I mean heaven) than ye now find, and are like to; except ye will with the worldlings, which have their portion in this life, tarry still by the way till the storms are overpast, and then either night will so approach that ye cannot travel, or the doors will be locked before you come, and so you lodge without in evil lodgings. Read Revelations xxii. Begin at Abel, and come from him to

Noah, Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, Joseph, the patriarchs, Moses, David, Daniel, and all the saints of the Old Testament, and tell me whether any of them ever found any fairer way than this now find.

If the Old Testament will not serve, I pray you come to the New, and begin with Mary and Joseph, and come from thence to Zachary and Elizabeth, John Baptist, and every one of the apostles and evangelists, and search whether they all found any other way into the city we travel towards, than by many tribulations.

Besides these, if ye should call to remembrance the primitive church, Lord God, ye should see so many to have given cheerfully their bodies to most grievous torments, rather than they would be stopped in their journey, that there is no day in the year, but (I dare say) a thousand was the fewest that with great joy lost their homes here, but in the city they went unto, they found other manner of home than man's mind is able to conceive. But if none of these were, if ye had no company to go with you, as you have me your poor brother and bondsman of the Lord, with many others, I trust in God, if you be none of the fathers, patriarchs, kings, prophets, apostles, evangelists, martyrs, and other holy saints and children of God, that in their journey to heaven-ward found as ye now find, ye are like to find if ye go forward, as I trust ye will, yet ye have your master and captain Jesus Christ, the only begotten and beloved Son of God, in whom was all the Father's pleasure, joy, and delight; ye have him to go before you, no fairer way, but much fouler, into this our city of Jerusalem. I need not (I trust) rehearse what manner of way he found. Begin at his birth, and till ye come to his burial, ye will find that every foot of his journey was no better, but much worse than yours is now.

Wherefore (my dearly beloved in the Lord) be not so dainty as to look for that at God's hands, your dear Father, which the patriarchs, prophets, apostles, evangelists, martyrs, saints, and his own Son Jesus Christ did not find. Hitherto we have had fair way (I think) and fair weather also: now because we have loitered by the way, and not made the speed we should have done, our loving Lord and sweet Father hath overcast the weather, and stirred up the storms and tempests, that we might with more haste run out our race before night come, and the door be locked. The devil standeth now at every inn-door in the city and country of this world, crying unto us to tarry and lodge in this place or that place till the storms be overpast; but that he would not have us wet to the skin, but that the time might overpass us to our utter destruction. Therefore beware of his enticements. Cast not your eyes on things that be present, how this man doth, and how that man doth: but cast your eyes on the mark ye run at, or else ye will lose the game. Ye know that he which runneth at the mark, doth not look on others that stand by, and go this way or that way, but altogether he looketh on the mark, and on them that run with him, that those which be behind overtake him not, and that he overtake them which be before: even so should we do, leave off looking at those which will not run the race to heaven's bliss by the path of persecution with us, and cast our eyes on the end of our race, and on them that go before us, that we may overtake them, and on them which come after us, that we may encourage them the faster to follow.

He that shooteth at a mark, will not cast his eyes on those that stand by, but will rather take care of his aim, otherwise he might shoot the wrong way: even so, my dearly beloved, let your eye and your heart be fixed on the mark you aim at, even Christ Jesus, who for the joy set before him, did joyfully carry his cross, contemning the shame, and therefore he now sitteth at the right hand of the throne of God. Let us follow him; for this he did that we should not be faint-hearted: for we may be assured, that if we suffer with him, we shall undoubtedly reign with him: but if we deny him, he will surely deny us: for "He that is ashamed of me, (saith Christ) and of my gospel, in this faithless generation, I will be ashamed of him before the angels of God in heaven." O how heavy a sentence is this to all such as know the mass to be an abominable idol, full of idolatry, blasphemy, and sacrilege against God and his Christ, (as undoubtedly it is) and yet for fear of men, for loss of life and goods, yea, some for advantage and gain, will honour it with their presence, dissembling both with God and man, as their own heart and conscience doth accuse them. Better it were that such had never known the truth, than that they should wittingly, and for fear and favour of man, whose breath is in his nostrils, to dissemble it, or rather (as indeed he doth) deny it. The end of such is like to be worse than their beginning. Such had need to take heed of the two terrible places to which the Hebrews in the 6th and 10th chapters, lest by so doing they fall therein. Let them beware they do not craftily beguile themselves, as some do I fear, who go to mass, and because they worship not, kneel not, or knock not as others do, but sit still in their pews, therefore they think they rather do good to others than hurt.

But, alas, if these men would look into their own consciences, there should they see that they are very dissemblers, and in seeking to deceive others (for by this means the magistrate k them of their fort) they deceive themselves. They think the time of elevation, that the eyes of all men are fixed upon to observe how they do. They think others, hearing of men going to mass, do see or inquire of their behaviour

 e. O if there were in those men that are so present at the either love to God, or to their brethren, they would for one or both, openly take God's part, and admonish the ple of their idolatry. They fear men more than Him who power to cast both soul and body into hell-fire: they hasten both knees; they serve two masters. God have mercy upon h, and open their eyes with his eye salve, that they may see they who take no part with God are against him; and that who gather not with Christ, do scatter abroad. O that would read what St. John saith will be done to the fearful.
 e advice given to the church of Laodicea, is good counsel such.
 But to return to you again, (dearly beloved) be not ashamed of d's gospel: it is the power of God unto salvation to all those do believe it. Be therefore partakers of the afflictions, as d shall make you able, knowing for certain that he will er tempt you farther than he will make you able to bear:
 think it no small favour from God to suffer for his truth:
 the Spirit of God resteth upon you, and ye are happy; as day ye shall see. Read 2 Thessalonians i. Hebrews xii.
 the fire hurteth not gold, but maketh it finer, so shall ye more pure by suffering with Christ, 1 Pet. i. The flail and wind hurteth not wheat, but cleanseth it from the chaff.
 d ye (my beloved) are God's wheat; fear not therefore the l: fear not the fanning wind; fear not the mill-stone; fear the oven: for all these make you more meet for the Lord's m tooth. Soap, though it blacken, yet it soileth not the th, but rather at length maketh it more clean: so doth the ck cross help us to more whiteness, if God strike with his ti-dore. Because ye are God's sheep, prepare yourselves to slaughter, always knowing that in the light of the Lord death shall be precious. The souls under the altar look for to fill up their number: happy are we, if God hath so apinted us. Howsoever it be, dearly beloved, cast your eyes olly upon the Lord, with whom all the hairs of your heads numbered, so that not one of them shall perish. Will we, we, we must drink God's cup, if he hath appointed it for Drink it willingly, and at the first, when it is full, lest adventure, if we linger, we shall, with the wicked, drink dregs thereof, if at the beginning we refuse to drink with children: for with them his judgment beginneth, and when hath wrought his will on mount Sion, then will he visit the tions round about.
 Submit yourselves therefore under the mighty hand of the within the three days rose again immortal, even so we shall do our time, that is, when the trump shall blow, and the angel all shout, and the Son of man shall appear in the clouds with numerable saints and angels, in majesty and great glory: then all the dead arise, and we shall be caught up into the clouds to eet the Lord, and so be always with him. Comfort yourselves

JOHN BRADFORD.

LETTER XIV.

from Mr. BRADFORD to Sir JAMES HALES, Knight, then PRISONER in the COMPTE.

THE God of mercy, and Father of all comfort, plentifully pour out upon you and in you his mercy, and with his consolations comfort and strengthen you to the end, for his and our Christ's sake.
 No. 19.

Although, right worshipful sir, many causes might move me to be content with crying for you to your God, and my God, that he would give you grace to persevere well, as he hath right notably begun, to the great glory of his name, and comfort of all such as fear him; as lack of learning, familiarity, yea, acquaintance, (for I think I am unknown to you both by face and name) and other such like things; yet I cannot content myself, but presume to scribble something unto you; not that I think my scribbling can do you any good, but that I might declare my sympathy and compassion, love and affection I bear towards you, who are contented, yea, desirous with us poor sinners, to confess Christ's gospel in these perillous times and days of trial. O Lord God, how good art thou, which dost thus glean out grapes, I mean children for thyself, and brethren for Christ? Look, good master Hales, on your vocation; not many judges, not many knights, not many landed men, not many rich men, and wealthy to live as you are, hath God chose to suffer for his sake, as he hath now done you. Certainly I dare say, you think not so of yourself, as though God were bound to prefer you, or had need of you, but rather attribute this as all good things unto his free mercy in Christ.
 Again, I dare say that you being a wise man do judge of things wisely, that is, concerning this your cross, you judge of it not after the world and people, which is the great master of error, nor after the judgment of reason and worldly wisdom, which is foolishness to faith, nor after the present sense, to which it seemeth not to be joyous but grievous, as St. Paul writeth; but after the word of God, which teacheth your cross to be,
 in respect of yourself between God and you, God's chastising, and your Father's correction, nurture, school, trial, pathway to heaven, glory, and felicity, and the furnace to consume the dross, and mortify the relics of old Adam which yet remain, yea even the frame-house to fashion you like to the dearest saints of God here, yea to Christ the Son of God, that elsewhere you might be like unto him.

Now concerning your cross in respect of the world, between the world and you, God's word teacheth it to be a testimonial of God's truth, of his providence, of his power, of his justice, of his wisdom, of his anger against sin, of his goodness, of his judgment, of your faith and religion, so that by it you are to the world a witness of God, that he is true, he ruleth all things, he is just, wise, and at length will judge the world, and cast the wicked into perdition, but the godly he will take and receive into his eternal habitation. I know you judge of things after faith's fetch, and the effects or ends of things, and so you see an eternal weight of glory which this cross shall bring unto you, while you look not on things which are seen, but on the things which are not seen. Let the worldlings weigh things, and look upon the affairs of men with their worldly and corporal eyes, as many did in the subscription of the king's last will;
 and therefore they did that, for which they afterwards repented.
 But let us look on things after another manner, as God be praised you did, in not doing that which you were desired; you then beheld things not as a man, but as a man of God, and so you do now in religion, at least hitherto you have done, and that you might do still, I humbly beseech and pray you say with David, "Mine eyes fail for thy word, saying, when wilt thou comfort me? Though you be like a bottle in the smoke, (for I hear you want health) yet do not forget the statutes of the Lord: but cry out, How many are the days of thy servant?
 When wilt thou execute judgment on them that persecute me?" And be certain, "The Lord will surely come, and not stay; though he tarry, wait for him: for he is but a while in his anger, but in his favour is life: weeping may abide at evening, but joy cometh in the morning." Follow therefore Isaiah's counsel, Hide thyself for a very little while until his indignation pass over, which is not indignation indeed, but to our sense: and therefore in the six and twentieth chapter of Isaiah, God saith of his church and people, that as he keepeth night and day; so there is no anger in me, saith he.

The mother sometimes beateth the child, but yet her heart melteth upon it, even in the very beating: and therefore she casteth the rod into the fire, and calleth the child, giveth it an apple, and dandleth it most motherly. And to say the truth, the love of mothers to their children, is but a trace to train us to behold the love of God towards us: and therefore, saith he,
 Can a mother forget the child of her womb? As much as to say, No: but if she should so do, yet will I not forget thee, saith the Lord of hosts. Ah comfortable saying! I will not forget thee, saith the Lord. Indeed the children of God think oftentimes that God hath forgotten them, and therefore they cry, Hide not thy face from me, &c. Forsake me not, O Lord.
 Whereas in very truth it is not so, but only in their present sense: and therefore, saith David, I said in mine agony, I was clean cast away from thy face. But was it so? No verily.
 Read his psalms, and you shall see. So he writeth also, in other places very often, especially in the person of Christ. as when he saith, My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?
 He saith not, why dost thou forsake me? or why wilt thou forsake me? but, why hast thou forsaken me? whereas, indeed, God had not left him, but that it was so to his sense, and that this psalm telleth us full well, which I pray you sometimes to read; it is the twenty-second psalm, and thereto join the thirtieth, and the hundred and sixteenth, with divers others. Much the same we read in the fortieth chapter of the prophet Isaiah; where he reproveth Israel for saying, God hath forgotten them, in these words, "Hast thou not known? hast thou not heard? &c. They that trust in the Lord shall renew their strength." In his fifty-fourth chapter read the following comfortable words; "Fear not, for a little while I have forsaken thee, but with great compassion will I gather thee. For a moment in mine anger I hid my face from thee, for a little season: but in everlasting mercy have I had compassion on thee, saith the Lord thy Redeemer. For this is unto me as the waters of Noah: for as I have sworn that the waters of Noah should no more go over the earth, so have I sworn that I would not be angry with thee nor rebuke thee. For the mountains shall move, and the hills shall fall down, but my mercy shall not depart from thee, neither shall the covenant of my peace fall away, saith the Lord that hath compassion on thee."

But the scriptures are full of such sweet places to them that will bear the wrath of the Lord, and wait for his health and help. As of all temptations, this is the greatest, that God hath forgotten, or will not help us through the pikes, as they say; so of all the service of God, nothing is more pleasing to him, than assuredly to hope and trust in him, whose help is always ready; for he is an helper in tribulations, and doth more gloriously shew his power by such as be weak, and feel themselves so. The weaker we are, the more strong we are in him. Thus the eyes of the Lord be on them that fear and tremble. He will accomplish their desire; he is with them in their trouble; he will deliver them. Before they cry, he heareth them, as all the scriptures teach us. To the reading whereof, and hearty prayer, I heartily commend you, beseeching Almighty God, that of his eternal mercy he would make perfect the good he hath begun in you, and strengthen you to the end, that you might have no less hope, but much more of his help to your comfort now against your enemies, than already he hath given you against N. for not subscribing to the king's will.

Be certain, be certain, good master Hales, that all the hairs of your head, your dear Father hath numbered, so that not one of them shall perish: your name is written in the book of life. Therefore cast all your care upon God, who will comfort you with his eternal consolations, and make you able to go through the fire, (if need be) which is nothing to be compared to the fire wherein our enemies shall fall, and lie for ever; from which the Lord deliver us, though it be through temporal fire, which must be construed according to the end and profit that cometh after it; it shall not then much terrify us to suffer for Christ our master's cause, which the Lord grant us for his mercy's sake. Amen.

From the King's Bench,

Your humble,

JOHN BRADFORD.

LETTER XV.

From Mr. BRADFORD, to Dr. HILL, PHYSICIAN.

THE God of mercy and Father of all comfort at this present and for ever ingraft in your heart the sense of his mercy in Christ, and the continuance of his consolation, which cannot but enable you to carry with joy whatsoever crosses he shall lay upon you, Amen.

Hitherto I could not have the liberty to write to you, as I suppose you know: but now through God's providence I have no such restraint, and therefore I shall write something to clear myself of the suspicion of unthankfulness towards you in these dangerous days, lest you should wax cold in God's cause, (which God forbid) or suffer the light of the Lord, once kindled in your heart, to be quenched, and so become as you were before, after the example of the world, and of many others who would have been counted otherwise in our days, and still would be so accounted, although by their outward life they declare the contrary, as if they could keep the heart pure, while the outward man doth curry favour.

In which doings, as they deny God to be jealous, and therefore requireth the whole man as well body as soul, being both created for immortality and society with him, and redeemed by the blood of Jesus Christ, and now sanctified by the Holy Spirit to be the temple of God, and member of his Son, (I say) by their parting stakes to give God the heart and the world the body, they deny God to be jealous, (for else they would give him both, as the wife would do her husband, whether he be jealous or no, if she be honest) so they play the dissemblers with the church of God by their fact, offending the godly, whom either they provoke to fall with them, or make them more careless and conscienceless if they be fallen, and occasioning the wicked and obstinate to triumph against God, and the more vehemently to persecute their malice against such as will not defile themselves in body or soul with the Romish rags now received amongst us. Because of this, I mean, lest you, my dear master and brother in the Lord, should do as too many of our gospellers have done for fear of man, whose breath is in his nostrils, and hath power but of the body, not fearing the Lord, who hath power both of soul and body; not only temporally, but eternally: I could not but write something unto you, well because gratitude requireth it, (for the many favours have received of God by your hands, for which many thanks I owe you, for I cannot) as also because charity and love cometh of you, so I doubt not but you have hitherto kept your upright from halting) but that I might both quiet my conscience, calling upon me hereabout, and signify unto you by something, my carefulness for your soul, as painfully as often you have done for my body.

Therefore I pray you call to mind, that there are but two masters, two kinds of people, two ways, and two maner places. The masters are Christ and Satan, the people are serving to either of these, the ways are strait and wide, the mansions are heaven and hell. Again, consider that this world is the place of trial of God's people, and the devil's servants: for as the one will follow his master whatsoever cometh of it, so will the other. For a time it is hard to discern who pertaineth to God, and who to the devil: as in the calm and peace who is the good sailor and warrior, and who is not. But as when the storm riseth, the expert man is known, and as in war the good soldier is seen, so in affliction and the cross, God's children are easily known from Satan's servants; for then as the good servant will follow his master, so will the godly follow their captain come what will; whereas the wicked and hypocrites will bid adieu, and desire less of Christ's acquaintance, which cause the cross is called a probation and trial, because it tries who will go with God, and who will turn from him. And now in England we see how small a company Christ hath, in comparison of Satan's followers. Let no man deceive himself: for he that gathereth not with Christ scattereth abroad. No man can serve two masters; the Lord abhorreth double hearts, the lukewarm, that is, such as are both hot and cold, he speweth out of his mouth. No man that halt on both knees doth God take for his servant. The way of Christ is the strait way, and so strait, that few find it, and few walk in it, so no man can halt in it, but must needs go upright: for as the straitness will suffer no reeling to this side, or that side, so if any man he is like to fall off the bridge into the pitt of eternal perdition.

Strive therefore, good Mr. Doctor, now you have found it, to enter into it: and if you shall be called or pulled back, look not on this side, or behind you, as Lot's wife did, but strait forwards is the end which is set before you (though it be to come) as even now present: like as you order your patients to do in purgations, and other your ministrations, to consider the effect that will ensue whereby the bitterness and loathsomeness of the purgation so overcome, and the painfulness in abiding the working what is ministered, is so eased, that it maketh the patient willingly and joyfully to receive whatsoever is to be received: be it ever so unpleasant: so I say, set before you the end of this strait way, and then doubtless, as St. Paul saith, shall bring with it an eternal weight of glory, whilst you look not on the thing which is seen, for that is temporal, but on the thing which is not seen, which is eternal. So doth the husbandman in plowing and sowing let behind him the harvest-time; so doth the fisher consider the draught of his net, rather than the casting in; so doth the merchant the return of his merchandize; and so should we in these stormy days set before us not the loss of our good liberty, and very life; but the reaping time, the coming of our Saviour Christ to judgment, the fire that shall burn the wicked and disobedient to God's gospel, the blast of the trumpet, the exceeding glory prepared for us in heaven eternally, such as the eye hath not seen, the ear hath not heard, nor the heart of man can conceive. The more we lose here, the greater joy we shall have there. The more we suffer, the greater triumph. For corruptible dross shall find incorruptible treasures; for gold, glory; for flesh, joy without end; for riches, royal robes; for earthly houses, eternal palaces: mirth without measure, pleasure without pain, and endless felicity. In fine, we shall have God the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost.

O happy place! O that this day would come! Then shall the end of the wicked be lamentable; then shall the receive the just reward of God's vengeance; then shall the cry, Wo, wo, that ever they did as they have done. Read Wisd. i. ii. iii. iv. v. Read Matt. xxv. Read 1 Cor. xv. 2 Cor. And by faith, (which God increase in us) consider the things there set forth. And for your further comfort, read Hebrews xi. to see what faith hath done, always considering the way to heaven to be through many tribulations, and that all they who live godly in Christ Jesus, must suffer persecution. You know this is your alphabet; He that will be my disciple, saith Christ, must deny himself, and take up his cross and follow me: not this bishop, nor that doctor, nor this emperor, nor that king, but me, saith Christ: for he that loveth his father, mother, wife, children, or even life, better than me, is not worthy of me. Remember that the same Lord saith; will save his life shall lose it. Comfort yourself with this, as the devils had no power over the swine, or over Job's servants without God's leave, so shall they have none over you. Remember also, that all the hairs of your head are numbered with God. The devil may make a man believe that he will drown him, as the sea in it's surges threateneth the land; as the Lord hath appointed bounds for the one, over which the other pass, so he doth for the other.

On God therefore cast your care, love him, serve him after word, fear him, trust in him, hope at his hand for all things, and always pray, looking for the cross; and whensoever cometh, be assured, that the Lord, as he is faithful, so will never tempt you further than he will make you to bear, but in the midst of the temptation will make you a deliverance as will be most for his glory and your eternal comfort. God for his mercy in Christ, with his Holy Spirit endue and comfort you, under the wings of his merciful shadow you, and as his dear child guide you for evermore. whose merciful tuition, as I do with my hearty prayers commit you; so I doubt not but you pray for me, and so beseech you still to do. My brother P. telleth me, you should have the last part of St. Jerome's works, to have the thereof for a fortnight. I cannot well spare them these days, but on Thursday next I will send them to you, if it preventeth me not. Use me and all that I have as your own. The Lord of his mercy in Christ direct our ways to his glory.

Out of prison, by your's to command,

JOHN BRADFORD.

LETTER XVI.

To Mrs. M. H. a pious GENTLEWOMAN.

Humbly and heartily pray the everlasting God and Father of mercy to bless and keep your heart and mind in the knowledge and love of his truth, and of his Christ, through the inspiration and working of his Holy Spirit, Amen.

Although I have no doubt, but that you prosper and go forward daily in the way of godliness, more and more drawing towards perfection, and have no need of any thing that I write; yet because my desire is, that you might be more diligent and persevere to the end, I could not but write somewhat unto you, beseeching you both often and diligently to stir up your mind, as a means to stir you hereunto, yea, as that which God most straitly requireth you to believe, that you are beloved of God, and that he is your dear Father, through, and for Christ and his death's sake. This love and tender kindness of God towards us in Christ is abundantly herein declared, in that he hath to the godly work of creation of this world made us after his image, redeemed us by his blood, called us into his church, sealed us with his mark sign of baptism, kept and preserved us all the days of our life, fed, nourished, and most fatherly chastised us, and now hath kindled in our hearts the sparkles of his fear, faith, love, and knowledge of his Christ and truth, and therefore we lament because we bewail no more our unthankfulness, our sloth, our diffidence and wavering in things, wherein we could be most certain.

All these things we should use as means to confirm our faith in God, that God is our God and Father, and to assure us, that he loveth us as our Father in Christ; to this end, (I say) we should use the things before touched, especially in that, of all things, God requireth this faith and fatherly persuasion of his fatherly goodness, as his chief service. For before he asketh any thing of us, he saith, I am the Lord thy God, giving him all that he hath to us, to be our own. And this he doth in respect of himself, of his own mercy and truth, and in respect of us, for then were grace no grace. In consideration whereof, when he saith; Thou shalt have no other gods but me; Thou shalt love me with all thy heart, &c. though of duty we ought to accomplish all that he requireth, yet are culpable and guilty if we do it not, yet he requireth not these things further of us than to make us more in love, and more certain of this his covenant, that he is our Lord and God. In certainty whereof, as he hath given us this whole world to answer our necessities and conveniences, so hath he given us his Son Christ Jesus, and in Christ, himself to be pledged, whereof the Holy Ghost doth now and then give some comfortable taste and sweet smell to our eternal

Therefore (as I said) because God is our Father in Christ, he requireth of you steadfastly to believe it, give yourself to obedience, although you do it not with such feeling and readiness as you desire. Faith must first go before, and then, by the operation of love, zealous affections will follow. If our affections, frailty, and many evils should be the occasions whereby Satan would have us to doubt; let us abhor that suggestion as much as possible, as of all others the most pernicious; and indeed so it is. For when we stand in doubt whether God be our Father, we cannot be thankful to him, we cannot heartily pray, or think any thing we do acceptable to him: we cannot even love our neighbours as we ought to, and therefore Satan is very subtle, for he well knoweth that if we doubt of God's eternal mercy towards us, through Christ, we can neither please God; nor rightly do our duty to man. He continually casteth into our thoughts our imperfection, frailty, falls, and miscarriages; to make us despair of God's mercy and favour.

Therefore, my good sister, we must not be sluggish herein, but as Satan laboureth to weaken our faith, so must we endeavour to strengthen it by meditating upon the promises and covenant of God in Christ's blood, namely, that God is our God with all that ever he hath: which covenant intirely dependeth on God's own goodness, mercy, and truth, and not on our obedience or worthiness in any point; for then we should never be certain. Indeed God requireth of us obedience and worthiness, but not that thereby we may be his children, and he our father; but because he is our father; and we his children through his goodness in Christ, therefore he requireth faith and obedience. Now if we want this obedience and worthiness which he requireth, shall we doubt whether he be our Father? Nay, that were to make our obedience and worthiness the cause, and so to put Christ out of place, for whose sake God is our Father. But rather because he is our Father, we ought to be moved with shame and remorse for not being as we ought to be: and thereupon we should take occasion to go to our Father in prayer on this manner:

"Dear Father, thou of thine own mercy in Jesus Christ hast chosen me to be thy child, and therefore thou wouldst that I should be brought into thy church, and faithful company of thy children, wherein thou hast hitherto kept me, thy name therefore be praised. Now I see myself to want faith, hope, love, &c. which thy children have, and thou requirest of me, for the want of which the devil would have me to doubt, yea, utterly to despair of thy fatherly goodness, favour, and mercy. Therefore I come to thee as to my merciful Father, through thy dear Son Jesus Christ, and pray thee to help me, good Lord: help me, and give me faith, hope, love, &c. and grant that thy Holy Spirit may be with me for ever, and more and more assure me that thou art my Father; that this merciful covenant that thou madest with me in respect of thy grace in Christ and for Christ, and not in respect of any of my worthiness, is always to me," &c.

On this manner you ought to pray when Satan persuadeth you to doubt of salvation. He doth all he can to prevail against you. Though you are not so feelingly affected as you desire to be, yet doubt not, but hope beyond all hope, as Abraham did: for, as I said before, faith always goeth before love. As certain as God is almighty, as certain as God is merciful, as certain as God is true, as certain as Jesus Christ was crucified, is risen, and sitteth on the right hand of the Father, as certain as this is God's commandment, "I am the Lord thy God," &c. so certain ought you to believe that God is your Father. As you are bound to have no other gods but him, so are you none less bound to believe that God is your God. What profit would it be to you to believe this sentence, "I am the Lord thy God," to be true to others, if you will not believe it to be true to yourself? The devil believeth in this manner. And whatsoever it be that would move you to doubt whether God be your God through Christ, the same undoubtedly cometh of the devil. Wherefore did God make you, but because he loved you? Might he not have made you blind, deaf, lame, lunatic, &c. Might he not have made you a Jew, a Turk, a Papist, &c.? And why hath he not done so? Verily because he loved you? And why did he love you? what was there in you to move him to love you? Surely nothing moved him to love you, neither to create you, nor hitherto to preserve you, but his own goodness in Christ. Now then in that his goodness in Christ still remaineth as much as it was, that is, even as great as himself, for it cannot be lessened; how should it be but that he is your God and Father? Believe this, believe this, my good sister, for God is unchangeable; them whom he loveth, he loveth to the end.

Therefore cast yourself wholly upon him, and think without all wavering that you are God's child, that you are a citizen of heaven, that you are a child of God, and the temple of the Holy Ghost. If you be assured hereof, as you ought to be, then shall your conscience be quieted, then shall you lament more and more for the want of many things which God loveth; then shall you labour to be holy in soul and body; then shall you desire and endeavour to make God's glory shine in all your words and works; then shall you not be afraid what man can do unto you; then shall you have wisdom to answer your adversaries, as shall serve to their shame and your comfort; then shall you be certain that no man can touch one hair of your head, further than it shall please your good Father, to your everlasting joy; then shall you be most certain that God as your good Father will be more careful for your children, and make better provision for them, if all you have were gone, than you can with the peaceable enjoyment of it. Being assured, I say, of God's favour towards you, give yourself over to help and care for others that be in need; then shall you content this life, and desire to be at home with your good and sweet Father; then shall you labour to mortify all things that would spot either soul or body. All these things spring out of this certain persuasion and faith, that God is our Father, and we are his children children by Christ Jesus. All things should help our faith herein, but Satan goeth about to hinder it.

Therefore let us use earnest and hearty prayer: let us often remember this covenant, "I am the Lord thy God;" let us look upon Christ and his precious blood shed for the confirmation of his covenant; let us remember all the free promises of the gospel; let us set before us God's benefits generally in making this world, and in governing it, in calling and keeping his church, &c. let us set before us God's benefits particularly, how he hath made his creatures after his image, our bodies in perfect form and beauty, and endowed our souls with understanding, memory, and will; how he hath made us christians, and hath given us these faculties to enable us to make a right judgment of his religion; how he hath blessed, kept, nourished, and defended us ever since we were born; how he hath often chastised, and fatherly corrected us; how he hath spared us, and now doth spare us, giving us time, place, and grace. If you do this, and use earnest prayer, and flee from all things which may wound your conscience, giving yourself to diligence in your vocation, you shall at length find (which God grant to us both) a sure certainty of salvation without all such doubt as may trouble the peace of conscience, to your eternal joy and comfort. Amen, Amen.

Your's in Christ,

JOHN BRADFORD.

LETTER XVI.

From the SAME to the SAME.

THE good Spirit of God which guideth his children, be with you my good sister in the Lord for ever, Amen.

Although as I to you, so you unto me in prison are unknown, yet to him whom we desire to please, we are not only in person, but also in heart known and thoroughly seen: and therefore as for his sake you would by what you sent to me be perceived how that in God you bear to me a good will; so that I might be seen to bear you the like good will, I send to you these few words in writing, wishing that in all your doings and speech, yea even in your very thoughts, you would labour to feel that they are all present and open before the sight of God, be they good or bad. This cogitation often had in mind, and prayer made to God for the working of the Spirit thereby as a means, you shall at length feel more comfort and advantage, than any man can know but such as are exercised therein. Howbeit this is to be added, that in thinking yourself, and all that you have and do to be in the sight of God; this, I say, is to be added, that you think his sight is the sight not only of a Lord, but rather of a Father, which tendereth more your infirmities, than you can tender the infirmities of any of your children. Yea when you feel in yourself a motherly affection to your little one that is weak, let the same bring to your remembrance the unspeakable kind affection of God your Father towards you.

And therefore upon the consideration of your infirmities and natural evils which continually cleave unto us, take occasion to go to God as your Father through Christ: and before his merciful heart lay open your infirmities and evils, with desire of pardon and help after his good will and pleasure, but in his time, and by what means he will, and not when you will; in the mean time depend on his fatherly goodness, and you shall never be ashamed. For if a woman that is natural cannot finally forget the child of her womb, be sure God, which is a Father supernatural, cannot and will not forget you. Yea if a woman could be so forgetful, yet God himself saith, he will not be so.

This opinion, yea rather certain persuasion of God our Father through Christ, see that you cherish, and by all means, as well by diligent consideration of his benefits, as of his loving corrections, whether they be inward or outward, see that you nourish, knowing for certain, that as the devil goeth about nothing so much as to bring you in doubt whether you be God's child or no; so whatsoever shall move you to admit that dubitation, be assured the same to come from the devil; if you feel in yourself not only the want of good things, but also plenty of evil, do not therefore doubt whether you be God's child in Christ or no.

For if for your goodness or illness sake, which you feel or feel not, you shall believe or doubt, then should you make Christ Jesus, for whose sake only God is your Father, either nothing, or else but half Christ.

But rather take occasion of your wants in good, and of your plenty in evil, to go to God as to your Father, and to pray to him, that inasmuch as he commandeth you to believe that he is your God and Father; so he would give you his good Spirit, that you might feel the same, and live as his child, to his glory: and cease not upon such prayers to look for comfort in God's good time, still hoping the best, and rejecting all dubitation, and so all evil works, words, and cogitations, as the Lord shall enable you by his good Spirit and grace, which I beseech him to give unto you, my good sister, for ever. And further I pray you, that as he hath made you to be an helper unto your husband, so you would endeavour yourself therein to shew the same as well in soul as in body: and beg grace of God, that your endeavour may be effectual to both your comforts in Christ. Amen.

JOHN BRADFORD

LETTER XVII.

From Mr. BRADFORD to his well-beloved FRIEND W. P.

GRACE and peace from God the Father, through our Lord Jesus Christ, Amen.

Dear brother, God most justly has cast me down into a dungeon, but much better than I deserve; wherein I see no more but my keeper, nor can see any except they come to me. Something in the earth my lodging is, which is an example and memorial of my earthly affections, (which God I hope will manifest) and of my sepulchre, whereunto I trust my Lord God will bring me in peace in his good time. In the mean season may he give me patience, lively hope, and his good Spirit. I pray for me, for the prayer of the righteous, if it be served availeth much with God. I thank God, my common distress doth less trouble me than when I was abroad, which doth teach me the merciful providence of God towards me. Your true and hearty prayer, and you shall perceive God at length will declare himself to see where now many think he sleepeth. Out of the Tower.

JOHN BRADFORD

LETTER XVIII.

From Mr. BRADFORD, to a faithful WOMAN Inwardly Afflicted.

GOD our good Father, for his mercy's sake in Christ, with his eternal consolation so comfort you, as I desire to be comforted of him in my greatest need: yea, he will comfort you, my good sister, only cast your care upon him, and never can nor will forsake you. For his calling and gifts are such, that he can never repent of them. Whom he loveth to the end; none of his chosen can perish. Which number I know you are, my dearly beloved sister; God increase the faith thereof daily more and more in you, may give unto you to depend wholly on him, and on his providence and protection. For whoso dwelleth under that secret shade and help of the Lord, he shall be happy for evermore. He that dwelleth, I say, under God's providence and protection, shall be safe; but if we fly from it, as Lot fled from Zoar, where God promised him protection, if he had dwelled there still, he should have removed to our loss, as he did into the mountains. Do therefore, that is, trust, and that finally unto the end, in the Lord, (my dear sister) and you shall be as mount Zion. The mountains compass Jerusalem, so doth the Lord all his people. How then can he forget you, which are as the apple of his eye for his dear Son's sake? Ah dear heart, that I were now but a half hour with you, to be a Simon to help to carry your cross with you. God send you some good Simon to be with you, and help you.

You complain in your letters of the blindness of your mind and the troubles you feel. My dearly beloved, God make you thankful for that which he hath given unto you: may he open your eyes to see what and how great benefits you have received that you may be less covetous, or rather impatient, for so I fear it should be called, and more thankful. Have you not received at his hands sight to see your blindness, and thereto a serious and seeking heart to see where it lieth in the mid-day, as your dear spouse speaketh of herself in the Canticles? O Joyce, my good Joyce, what is this? Many have some sight, but none this seeking and sighing, none this seeking which you have, I know, but such as he hath married unto him in his mercies. You are content to kiss his feet with Mary Magdalen, but you would not kiss his face with the kiss of his mouth, Canticles i. You would see his face with Moses, not forgetting how he biddeth us to see his face, Psal. xxvii. yea, and that for ever, Psal. cv. Which signifieth no such sight as you desire to be in this present life, which would see God now face to face, whereas he cannot be seen but covered under something, yea sometimes in that which is (as you would say) clean contrary to God, as to see his mercy in his anger. In bringing us to hell, faith seeth him to bring us to heaven; in darkness it beholdeth brightness; in hiding his face from us, it beholdeth his merry countenance. How did David see God, (but as you would say) under Satan's cloak? For he cast the fire from heaven upon his goods? Who overthrew his house, and stirred up men to take away his cattle, but Satan? And yet Job pierced through all these, and saw God's wisdom saying, "The Lord hath given, and the Lord hath taken away" &c.

In reading of the Psalms, how often do you see that David in the shadow of death saw God's sweet love? And so, my dear beloved, I see that you in your darkness and dimness by faith do see clearness and brightness: by faith, I say, because faith is of things absent, of things hoped for, of things which I app your conscience whether you desire not. And can you desire any thing which you know not? and is there any other true knowledge of heavenly things than by faith?

Therefore be thankful, for (before God I write it) you have great cause. Ah, my joyce, how happy is the stay wherein you are: Verily you are in the blessed state of God's children; they mourn, and do you not so? And that not for worldly wealth, but for spiritual riches, faith, hope, charity, &c. do you not hunger and thirst for righteousness? And I pray you, faith not Christ who cannot lie, that happy are such? should God wipe away the tears from your eyes in heaven, if now on earth you shed no tears? How could heaven be a place of rest, if on earth you find no grief? How could you be at home, if in your journey you find no grief? How could you so often call upon God, and talk with him, as I now do, if your enemy should sleep all day long? How could you elsewhere be made like unto Christ, I mean in joy, in sorrow you sobbed not with him? If you will have joy and felicity, you must first feel sorrow and misery. If you will go to heaven, you must sail by hell; if you will embrace Christ in his robes, you must not scorn him in his rags. If you will sit at Christ's table in his kingdom, you must first abide with him in his temptations. If you will drink of his cup of glory, forsake not his cup of ignominy.

Can the head corner stone be rejected, and the other more precious stones in God's building be in this world set by? You are one of his lively stones, be content therefore to be hewn and perfected, that you might be made more meet to be joined to your fellows who suffer with you Satan's snatches, the world's wounds, contempt of conscience, and threats of the flesh, whereby they are enforced to cry, O wretches that we are, who shall deliver us? You are of God's corn, fear not therefore the flail, the fan, mill-stone, or oven. You are one of Christ's lambs, look therefore to be sheeced, haled at, and slain.

If you were a market sheep, you should go in more fat and grassy pasture. If you were for the fair, you should be well-fed, and want no wealth: but because you are God's own occupying, therefore you must pasture on the bare common, enduring the storms and tempests that will fall. Happy, and once happy are you, (my dear sister) that God now haleth you whither you would not, that you might come whither you would. Suffer a little and be still. Let Satan rage against you, in the world cry out, let your conscience accuse you, let the law load you and press you down, yet they shall not prevail; for Christ is Emmanuel, that is, God with us. If God be with us, who can be against us? The Lord is with you, your Father cannot forget; your spouse loveth you. If the waves and surges arise, cry with Peter, Lord, I perish; and he will put out his hand and help you. Cast out your anchor of hope, and it will not cease for the stormy surges, till it take hold of the rock of God's truth and mercy.

Think not that he who hath given you so many things corporally, as inductions of spiritual and heavenly mercies, and that without your deserts or desire, can deny you any spiritual comfort when you desire it. For if he giveth you a desire, he will give you the enjoyment of a desire. The desire to have, and the going about to ask, ought to certify your conscience, that they be his earnest of the thing which (you asking) he will give you; yea, before you ask, and whilst you are about to ask, he will grant the same, (as Isaiah saith) to his glory, and your eternal consolation. He that spared not his own Son for you, will not nor can think any thing too good for you, my heartily beloved.

If he had not chosen you, (as most certainly he hath) he would not have so called you, he never would have justified you; he never would have so glorified you with his gracious gifts, which, praised be his name, I know; he never would have so exercised your faith with temptations, as he hath done and doth, if he had not chosen you. If he hath chosen you, you shall never perish; or if you fall, he will lift you up. Never was mother so careful of a child, as he is of you.

Christ and his mercy is the only cause of our election. This Christ, this mercy, and the infallible truth of God remaineth for ever; and if an angel from heaven should tell you the contrary, let him be accursed. Your thankfulness and worthiness are fruits and effects of your election, but they are no causes. These fruits and effects shall be much more fruitful and effectual, as you are more steadfast and sincere.

Arise, and remember from whence you are fallen. You are a shepherd who never slumbereth nor sleepeth: neither can nor devil can pull you out of his hands. Night and day he commandeth his angels to keep you. Have you forgot what I said to you out of the Psalms, "The Lord is my shepherd, he can want nothing?" As God spared Noah in the ark, when so hath he spared you. Ten thousand shall fall on your right hand, and twenty thousand on your left, and yet no evil shall touch you. Say boldly with the Psalmist, "Many a time from my youth up have they fought against me, but they have not prevailed;" no, nor ever shall prevail, for the Lord is round about his people; and who are his people but such as love him, serve him, and hope in him? Happy are all they that do so, as it is manifest you do by what you have written and unfeignedly confessed unto me. And if you once had that hope, as doubtless you had, though you feel it not at present, it is not lost, you shall find it again if you seek it: for the anger of the Lord lasteth but for a moment, but his mercy endureth for ever. Tell me who hath weakened you? Surely not a persuasion from him that called you. Why should you waver and be so heavy-hearted? Whom look you on? on yourself? on your own worthiness? on your own thankfulness? on that which God requireth of you, as faith, hope, love, fear, joy, &c.? then can you not but waver indeed: for what have you as God requireth? Do you believe, hope, and love as much as you ought? No, no, nor ever can in this life. Ah, my dearly beloved, have you so soon forgotten that which ever should be had in memory? namely, that when you would and ought to be certain and quiet in conscience, your faith should break through all things that are in earth and heaven, or hell, until you come to Christ crucified; and the eternal mercies and goodness of God in him. Here is the resting place, here is the spouse's bed; creep into it, and in your arms of faith embrace him, bewail your weakness, unworthiness, diffidence, &c. and you shall see he will turn to you; nay, I should rather have said, you shall feel he will turn to you. You know that when Moses went to the mount to talk with God, he entered into a dark cloud; and Elias had his face covered when God passed by. Both these dear friends of God heard him, but they saw him not, but you shall see him when he appeareth in power and great glory. Here is not the time of seeing, but as it were in a glass. Isaac was deceived, because he was not content with hearing only.

Therefore to make an end of these many words, wherewith I fear I do but trouble you from better exercises; inasmuch as you are indeed the child of God, elect in Christ before the beginning of all times; inasmuch as you are given to the custody of Christ, as one of God's most precious jewels; inasmuch as Christ is faithful, and hitherto hath all power, so that you shall never perish, no, one hair of your head shall not be lost: I beseech you, I pray you, I desire you, I crave at your hands with all my heart, I ask of you with hand, pen, tongue, and mind, in Christ, through Christ, for Christ, for his name, blood, mercies, power, and truth's sake, my most intirely beloved sister, that you admit no doubting of God's final mercies towards you, howsoever you feel yourself; but complain to God, and crave of him, as of your tender and dear Father, all things, and in that time which shall be most convenient, you shall find and feel far above that your heart or the heart of any creature can conceive, to your eternal joy, Amen, Amen, Amen.

The good Spirit of God always keep us as his dear children; may he comfort you, as I desire to be comforted, my dearly beloved, for evermore, Amen.

I break up thus abruptly, because our common prayer time calleth me. The peace of Christ dwell in both our hearts for ever, Amen.

As for the report of W. P. if it be as you hear, you must prepare to bear it. It is written on heaven's door, DO WELL AND BEAR EVIL. Be content therefore to bear whatsoever the enemy shall imagine to blot you withal. God's Holy Spirit always comfort and keep you, Amen, Amen.

JOHN BRADFORD.

Here followeth another letter of Mr. Bradford to the good lady Vane, wherein he resolveth certain questions which she demanded. This lady Vane was a great supporter of the pious martyrs who were imprisoned in queen Mary's time. Unto whom divers letters were wrote by Mess. Philpot, Careless, Trahern, Thomas Rose, and others, wherein they render unto her most grateful thanks for her exceeding goodness towards them, their singular commendation and testimony also of her christian zeal towards God's afflicted prisoners, and to the truth of his gospel. She died anno 1568.

LETTER XIX.

From Mr. BRADFORD to LADY VANE.

THE true sense and sweet feeling of God's eternal mercies in Christ Jesus be ever more and more lively wrought in your heart by the Holy Ghost, Amen.

I most heartily thank you, good madam, for your comfortable letter; and whereas you would be advertised what were best to be done on your three questions: the truth is, that the questions are never well seen, nor answered, until the thing whereof they arise be well considered. I mean until it be seen how great an evil the thing is. If it be once indeed perceived in your heart, upon probable and pithy places gathered out of the word of God, that there was never any thing upon earth so great and so much an adversary to God's true service, to Christ's death, passion, sacrifice, and kingdom, to the ministry of God's word and sacraments, to repentance, faith, and all true godliness of life, as that is whereof the questions arise, (as most assuredly it is indeed) then cannot a christian heart but so much the more abhor it, and all things that in any point might seem to allow it, of any thing pertaining to the same, by how much it hath the name of God's service.

Again, your ladyship doth know, that as all is to be discommended and avoided, which is followed or fled from in respect of ourselves, in respect of avoiding Christ's cross; so the end of all our doings should be to God-wards, to his glory, to our neighbours, to edification, and good example, whereof none can be given in allowing any of the three questions by you propounded. But because this which I write now is brief, and needeth the more consideration or explication, as I doubt not of the one in you, so from me by God's grace you shall shortly receive the other: for I have already written a little book of it, which I will send unto you, in which you shall have your questions fully answered and satisfied, and therefore I now omit writing any thing about it; beseeching God our good Father, to guide you as his dear child with his Spirit of wisdom, power, and comfort, unto eternal life, that you may be strong, and rejoice in him, and with his church; to carry the cross of Christ, if it be his will, 1 Pet. i. which is a thing to be desired and embraced, if we look on things after the judgment of God's word, and try them by that touch-stone.

If you be accustomed to think on the brevity, vanity, and misery of this life, and on the eternity, truth, and felicity of life everlasting; if you look on the end of things, and not on their present appearance only; if you accustom yourself to set God's presence, power, and mercy, always before your eyes, to see them, as God by every creature would we should; I doubt not but you shall find such strength and comfort in the Lord, as shall not be shaken with all the power of Satan. God's mercy in Christ be with you, and his good Spirit guide you for ever, Amen.

JOHN BRADFORD.

LETTER XX.

From the SAME to the SAME.

AS to mine own soul, I wish to your ladyship grace and mercy from God our dear Father in Christ our Lord and Saviour.

I thank God that he hath something eased you, and mitigated his fatherly correction in us both; I would to God he had done so much in behalf of the grief of the body to you, as he hath done to me. For as for the soul, I trust you feel that which I pray God increase in you, I mean his fatherly love, and grant that I may with you feel the same in such degree as may please him; I will not say as you feel, lest I should seem to ask too much at one time. God doth often much more plentifully visit with the sense of his mercy them that humble themselves under his mighty hand, than others which to the face of the world have a greater shew and appearance.

Therefore I wish as I do, and that not only for mine own convenience, but also that I might occasion you to consider the goodness of God, which I by your letters do well perceive; which is indeed the highway, whereby God increaseth his gifts, and sheweth his salvation more lively, Psal. l. cvii. I have received God's blessing from you, which I have partly distributed to my three fellow-prisoners, Mr. Farrar, Mr. Taylor, and Mr. Philpot, and the residue I will bestow upon four poor souls who are imprisoned in the common gaol for religion also. As for mine own part, if I had need, I would have served mine own turn also. But because I had not, nor (I thank God) have not, I have been, and will be, your almoner, in such a manner as I have already advertised you. God reward you in this world, and in the world to come. Because otherwise I cannot talk with you, therefore on this sort, as occasion and opportunity will serve, I am ready to shew my good will and desire of your help and furtherance in the Lord to everlasting life, whereunto God bring us shortly for his mercy's sake, Amen.

Good madam, be thankful to God, as I hope you be; be earnest in prayer, continue in reading and hearing God's word, and if God's further cross come, as therein God doth serve his providence, (for else it shall not come unto you) so be certain the same shall turn to your eternal joy and comfort, Amen.

JOHN BRADFORD.

LETTER XXI.

From Mr. BRADFORD to his dear FRIENDS and BRETHREN, Mr. ROYDEN, and Mr. ESING, with their WIVES and FAMILIES.

THE comfort of Christ felt commonly of his children in their cross for his sake, the everlasting God work in both your hearts, my good brethren, and in the hearts of both your yoke-fellows, especially of Mary, my good sister in the Lord, Amen.

If I had not heard something of the hazard which you are in for the gospel's sake, if you continue the profession and confession thereof, as I trust you do and will do, and that, by God's help, to the end, which assistance will not be wanting if you hope in him, (for this bindeth him, as David in the psalm of deliver them," Psal. xxii.) yet by conjectures I could not but suppose (though not so certainly) the time of your suffering and probation to be at hand. For now the power of darkness is fully and justly come upon this realm for their sins, and abusing the light lent us of the Lord, to the setting forth of ourselves more than God's glory, that we might be brought to a better knowledge of our evils, and so heartily repent, (which God graciously us to do) as well as to increase in us a true sense of our sweet Saviour Jesus Christ, by humbling and dejecting us, thereby to make us more desirous of him, and him more sweet and pleasant unto us; which may the good Spirit of God work sensibly in all our hearts for God's holy name's sake.

For this cause I thought it my duty, being now (thanks be to God) where I have some liberty to write, and hearing of you as I hear; to do that which I should have done, if I had heard nothing at all; that is, to desire you to be of good cheer and comfort in the Lord, (although in the world you see cause rather to the contrary) and to go on forwards in the way of God whereinto you have entered, considering that the same cannot but so much more wax hard upon the outward man, by how much more you draw nearer to the end of it: even as in the travail of a woman, the neareth she draweth to her delivery, the more her pains increase; so it goeth with us in the Lord's way, the nearer we draw to our deliverance by death to our eternal felicity.

Example whereof we have not only in the holy prophets and apostles of God, who when they were young girded themselves, and went in a manner whither they pleased, but when they grew old, they went girded by others whither they would not, concerning the outward man: but rather, and most lively in our Saviour Jesus Christ, whose life and way was much more painful to him towards the end than it was at the beginning. And no wonder, for Satan can bear with a man that begins well, and if he makes some progress, but rather than he should go on to the end, he will spit his venom, and use a thousand means to prevent his perseverance.

Therefore as we should not be dismayed at this world, as though some strange thing happened unto us, in that it is but as it should wont to be to the godly, in that the devil declared himself after his old manner, in that we have professed no less, but to forsake the world and the devil, as God's very enemies, and that we learned no less at first, when we came to God's school, than to deny ourselves, and take up our cross and follow our master, who leadeth us no other way than he himself hath gone before us: as, I say, we should not be dismayed, for we ought to go forwards with patience and joy, if we set before us the time to come as present, as the saints of God did, but especially our pattern and Saviour Jesus Christ; for the apostle saith, "He let before him the joy and glory to come, and therefore contemned the shame and sorrow of the cross;" and if we should do so, we shall at length find what they have found. For who would grieve if his journey seemeth rough and tedious, if when he comes to the end of it he shall enjoy infinite pleasures for evermore? Who will be afraid, or loth to leave a little pelf, which lasteth but a short time, (even in the possession of which there is no true satisfaction) if he knew that loon after he should enjoy a most plentiful fortune, an eternal inheritance? Who would be unwilling for a little while to forsake his wife, children, and friends, when he knows that in a short time they shall again meet together, according to their own hearts desire, and never be separated? Who will be sorry to forsake his life, who cannot but be most certain of eternal life? Who loveth the shadow better than the body? Who can love this life, but they that regard not the life to come? Who can desire the dross of this world, but such as are ignorant of the treasures of the everlasting joy in heaven? I mean, who is afraid to die, but such as expect not to live eternally? Christ hath promised pleasures, riches, joy, felicity, and all good things to them that lose any thing, or suffer any sorrow for his sake: and is he not true? How can he but be true, for guile was never found in his mouth?

Alas then, why are we so slack and slow, yea hard of heart to believe him, promising us eternal bliss thus plentifully, and are so ready to believe the world promising us many things, and yet paying nothing? If we will now curry favour, and lean to both sides, then it may promise peace and quietness for a little while; but how doth it pay? And if it doth pay, with what quietness of conscience? Or if so; how long, I pray you? Do not we see before our eyes, men to die shamefully, I mean as rebels and other malefactors, who refuse to die for God's cause? What way is so sure to heaven as to suffer for the cause of Christ? If there be any way on horseback to heaven, surely this is the way; by many troubles, saith the apostle, we must enter into heaven. All that will live godly in Christ Jesus must suffer persecution. For the world cannot love them that are of God; the devil cannot love his enemies; the world will love none but his own: you are Christ's, therefore look for no love here. Should we look for fire to quench our thirst? As shall God's true servants find peace and favour in Anti-Christ's regiment.

Therefore my dearly beloved, be stout in the Lord, and in power of his might. Put on you his armour; stand in the city of Christ which you have learned; rejoice that you may be counted worthy to suffer any thing for God's cause: to all this is not given. Your reward is great in heaven, though on earth ye find nothing. The journey is almost over, you are nigh in the haven. Hail on apace, I beseech you, and merchandise up your sails. Cast yourselves on Christ, who careth for you. Keep company with him now still to the end; he is faithful, and will never leave you, nor tempt you further than will enable you to bear; yea, in the midst of the temptation will find you a way to escape. Heartily pray unto him, be thankful for his indignation, rejoice in hopes of the health you shall receive, and be mindful of us who lead the van, and by God's grace trust in Christ to be made able to break the ice before you, that you following, may find the way more easy.
I grant it may so be, Amen, Amen.

Out of prison, by your brother in Christ,

JOHN BRADFORD.

LETTER XXII.

From Mr. BRADFORD to Mrs. WILKINSON.

Almighty God our most loving Father, increase in your heart (my dear mother and good mistress in the Lord) true knowledge and love in Christ, to the encouraging and confirming your faith in these stormy days; which are necessary, and will be profitable to us, if we persevere unto the end, which God grant we may, Amen.

My right dearly beloved, I know no better thing to write unto you, than to desire you to be thankful to the Lord for his great mercies towards you, for many of your state and calling he hath not so favour; it pleaseth him to bless you with extraordinary grace, to keep you from that horrid filth wherewith our country is most abominably defiled. This blessing assuredly is as you see. But now if he shall bless you with another blessing which is more rare, I mean to call you forth as a martyr, and a witness against this filth, I hope you will become truly thankful. For a greater token commonly we have not evidence of our election and salvation (next to Christ, and faith in him) than the cross, especially when it is so glorious, as on us fort to suffer any thing, but chiefly loss of this life; for this life is never found but by the loss of this; except the grain of wheat fall down and die, it cannot rise and flourish.

You know that he who was taken into the third heaven, and saw what he wrote, doth say, "That as the corn liveth not, except it be dead and cast into the earth, so truly our bodies."
And therefore the cross should so little fear us, that even death itself should be desired by us, as the taylor which putteth off raggs, and arrayeth us with the royal robes of immortality, corruption, and glory. Great shame it should be for us, that the whole creatures of God should desire, yea groan in their prayer for our liberty, and we ourselves to loath it, as doubtless we do, if for the cross, yea for death itself, we with joy swallow not up all sorrow that might hinder us from following the Lord's calling, and obeying the Lord's providence; whereby doubtless all crosses, and death itself doth come, and not by chance. In consideration whereof, right dear mother, let this providence stretcheth itself so unto us, and for us, that in the hairs of our heads are numbered with God, not one of us to fall to our hurt; surely we declare ourselves very faint faith if we receive not such comfort, that we can willingly offer ourselves to the Lord, and cast our whole care upon him, honouring him with this honour, that he is and ever will be useful for us and all we have, as for his dear children. Because of good cheer even in the midst of these miseries, be thankful to the Lord, and prepare yourself for a farther trial; which if God send you, as I hope, so do you believe that God will help and comfort you therein, and make you able to bear whatsoever shall happen. And thus much, having this opportunity, I thought good to write, praying God our Father to compensate into your bosom all the good that ever you have done, to me especially and to many others, both in this time of trouble, and always heretofore.

Your own in the Lord,

JOHN BRADFORD.

LETTER XXIII.

From Mr. BRADFORD, to certain PIOUS PERSONS, encouraging them to prepare themselves to bear the CROSS with PATIENCE.

Almighty God and most merciful Father, for Jesus Christ's sake, thy dearly beloved Son, grant us thy mercy, grace, peace, and Holy Spirit, to counsel, comfort, and guide us in our thoughts, words, and works, to thy glory, and our everlasting joy and peace for ever, Amen.

In my last letter you might perceive my conjecturing to be no towards you, than I have now learned. But, dearly beloved,

I have learned none other thing than what I before told you would come to pass, if ye cast not away that which ye have learned. I appeal to both your consciences, whether I speak truth herein, as well of my telling, (though not so often as I might and should, God forgive me) as also of your learning.
Now God will try you, to make others learn by you, that which ye learned by others, and by them which have suffered this day ye might learn (if already ye have not learned) that life and honour is not to be regarded more than God's commandment.
They in no point for all that ever their ghastly fathers could do; having Dr. Death to take their part, would consent, or seem to consent to the popish mass and papistical God, otherwise than they had received in the days of our late king. And thus their faith they have confessed with their deaths, to their great glory and all our comforts, if we follow them; but to our confusion, if we start back from the same. Wherefore I beseech you to consider, as well to praise God for them, as to go the same way with them if God please.

Consider not the things of this life, which is a very prison to all God's children; but the things of everlasting life, which is our very home. But to behold this ye must open the eyes of your mind, of faith, I should have said, as Moses did, who chose rather to suffer affliction with the people of God, than to possess the riches of Egypt, and the pleasures of Pharaoh's court. Your house, home, and goods, yea life, and all that ever ye have, God hath given as love-tokens, to admonish you of his love, and to win your love to him again. He will try your love, whether ye set more by him than by his tokens. If ye for the sake of his tokens, that is, your house, home, goods, yea life, will go with the world rather than lose them, then be assured, your love, as he cannot but espy it to be a trumpet's love, so will he cast it away with the world. Remember that he who will save his life shall lose it, if Christ be true: but he who adventureth, yea, loseth his life for the gospel's sake, the same shall be sure to find it eternally. Do not ye know that the way to salvation, is not the broad way which many run in, but the strait way which now few walk in.

Before persecution came, men might partly have stood in a doubt by the outward state of the world with us, (although by God's word it was plain) which was the highway, (for there were as many that pretended the gospel as popery) but now the sun is risen, and the wind bloweth, so that the corn which hath not taken fast root, neither can nor will abide; and therefore ye may easily see the strait way by the small number of passengers. Who will now adventure their goods and life for the sake of Christ, who gave his life for our sakes? We are now become Gergesites, that would rather lose Christ than our swine. A wife is proved faithful when she rejecteth and withstandeth other suitors. A faithful christian is then found so to be, when his faith is assaulted.

If we are neither able nor willing to forsake this world for God's glory and gospel's sake, ere long we shall be obliged to leave it for nature's sake. Die ye must once, and leave all ye have, (God only knoweth how soon) whether ye will or not;
and seeing you cannot avoid it, why will ye not voluntarily do it for God's sake?

If ye go to mass, and do as the most part doth, then may you live quietly and at rest; but if ye refuse to go thither, then ye shall go to prison, lose your goods, leave your children com-fortless, yea, lose your life also. But (my dearly beloved) open the eyes of your faith, and consider the shortness of this life, that it is even as a shadow and a smoke. Again, consider how intolerable the punishment of hell-fire is, and that endless. Last of all, look on the joys incomprehensible, which God hath prepared for all them, world without end, who lose either life, land, or goods for his name's sake; and then reason thus: If we go to mass, the greatest enemy that Christ hath, though for a little time we shall live in quiet, and leave to our children something to live upon hereafter, yet we shall displease God, fall into his hands, (which is horrible to hypocrites) and be in wonderful hazard of falling from eternal joy, into eternal misery, first of soul, and then of body, with the devil and all idolaters.

Again we shall want peace of conscience, which surmount-eth all the riches of the world: and for our children, who knoweth whether God will visit our idolatry on them in this life?
yea, our house and goods, and even our life are in danger of being lost by many calamities: and when God is angry with us, he can when he pleases send one means or other to take all from us for our sins, and to cast us into greater trouble, who will not come into some little for his sake.

On this sort reason with yourselves, and then doubtless God will work otherwise with you, and in you, than ye are aware of.
Where now ye think yourselves unable to abide persecution, be most assured, that if you earnestly purpose not to forsake God, that he will make you so able to bear his cross, that you shall rejoice therein. "God is faithful, (saith Saint Paul) who will not suffer you to be tempted above that you are able; but will with the temptation also make a way to escape, that ye may be able to bear it." Think how great a benefit it is, if God will make you worthy of this honour, to suffer loss of any thing for his sake. He might justly inflict most grievous plagues upon you, and yet now he will correct you with that rod, whereby
you

you shall be made like to his Christ, that ye may for ever reign with him. Suffer yourselves therefore now to be made like to Christ, for else ye shall never be made like unto him. The devil would gladly have you now to overthrow that, which ye have a long time stedfastly professed. O how would he triumph, if he could win his purpose! O how would the papists triumph against God's gospel in you! O how would you confirm them in their wicked popery! O how would the poor children of God be discomforted, if you should now go to mass and other idolatrous service, and do as the world doth!

Hath God delivered you from the sweat to serve him so? Hath God miraculously restored you to health from your grievous agues for such a purpose? Hath God given you such blessings in this world, and good things all the days of your life hitherto, and now of equity will ye not receive at his hands, and for his sake, some evil? God forbid: I hope better of you. Use prayer, and cast your care upon God; commit your children into his hand; give to God your goods, bodies, and lives, as he hath given them, or rather lent them to you. Say with Job, "God hath given, and God hath taken away, his name be praised for ever." Cast your care upon him, I say, for he is careful for you; and take it amongst the greatest blessings of God, to suffer for his sake. I trust he hath kept you hitherto to that end.

And I beseech thee, O merciful Father, for Jesus Christ's sake, that thou wouldst be merciful unto us, comfort us with thy grace, and strengthen us in thy truth, that in heart we may believe, and in tongue boldly confess thy gospel, to thy glory, and our eternal salvation, Amen. Pray for me, and I by God's grace will do the same for you.

JOHN BRADFORD.

LETTER XXIV.

From Mr. BRADFORD to certain PROFESSORS of the GOSPEL, admonishing them to beware they fall not from the TRUTH, in CONSENTING to the ROMISH RELIGION.

THE peace of Christ, which is the true effect of God's gospel believed, my dearly beloved, be more and more plentifully perceived by you, through the grace of our dear Father, by the mighty working of the Holy Spirit our Comforter, Amen.

Though I have many letters at present to hinder me from writing unto you, yet being desired, I could not but signify my ready good will in this behalf as much as I may, when I cannot so much as I would.

You hear and see how Satan bestirreth him, raging as a roaring lion to devour us. You see and feel partly what storms he hath raised up to drown the poor boat of Christ, I mean his church. You see how terribly he traineth his soldiers to give a fierce onset on the van of God's battle. You see he hath received power of God, to molest God's children, and to begin at his house. By reason whereof consider two things; one, the cause on our behalf; the other, what will be the sequel on strangers.

For the first, if we be not blind, we cannot but well see that our sins are the cause of all this misery; our sins, I say, which I wish that every one of us would apply to ourselves after the example of Jonah and David, searching our own hearts, that other men's offence might lie behind, and our own before. Not that I would excuse other men, who outwardly have walked much more grossly than many of you have done; but that I would provoke you all as myself to more hearty repentance and prayer. Let us more and more increase to know and lament our doubting of God, of his presence, power, anger, mercy, &c.

Let us better feel and hate our self-love, security, negligence, unthankfulness, unbelief, impatience, &c. and then doubtless the cross shall be less fearful, yea it shall be comfortable, and Christ most dear and pleasant: death then shall be desired, as the dispatcher of us out of misery, and entrance into eternal felicity and unspeakable joy, which is so much the more longed for, by how much we feel indeed the serpent's bites, wherewith he woundeth our heels, that is, our outward Adam and senses. If we had, I say, a lively and true feeling of his poison, we could not only rejoice over our captain that he hath bruised his head, but be desirous to follow his example, that is, to give our lives with him and for him, and so fill up his passions, that he might conquer and overcome in us and by us, to his glory and comfort of his children.

Now the second, (I mean the sequel, or that which will follow on the strangers) my dearly beloved, let us look well upon. For if God doth justly thus permit Satan and his seed to vex and molest Christ and his penitent people; O what and how justly may he and will he give to Satan to molest the wicked and impenitent sinners? If judgments begin thus at God's house, what will follow on them that be without if they repent not? Certainly the dregs of God's cup are reserved for them, that is, brimstone, fire, and tempest intolerable. Now are they unwilling to taste of God's cup of afflictions, which he offereth with his Son Christ our Lord, lest they should lose their swine with the Gergesites. They are unwilling to come into the way that bringeth to heaven, even afflictions: they in their hearts cry, Let us cast this yoke from us; they walk two ways, that is, they seek to serve God and Mammon, which is impossible; they will not come night and day in that strait way that leadeth to life; they set their eyes to behold present things only; they judge of religion after reason, and not after God's word; they follow the greater part and not the better; they profess God with their mouths, but in their hearts they deny him; they would be counted to live godly in Christ, but yet they will suffer no persecution; they love this world whereby the love of God is driven far from them; they love those things that be of men, and not of God: in short, they love God in their lips, but in their hearts, yea, and in their deeds, they deny him, as well by not repenting their sins past, as continuing still in them, by doing as the world, the flesh, and the devil leath them; and yet perchance they will pray, or rather promise, "Thy will be done on earth," which is generally that which one should take up his cross and follow Christ. But this is hard saying, who is able to abide it? Therefore Christ must be prayed to depart, lest all the swine be drowned. The devil must have his dwelling again in themselves rather than in their hearts, and therefore to the devil they shall go, and dwell with him in eternal perdition, and damnation, even in hell-fire, a torment endless, and above all imagination incomprehensible, if they repent not.

Wherefore by them, my dearly beloved, be admonished to remember your profession, how that in baptism you made a solemn vow to forsake the devil, the world, &c. You promised to fight under Christ's standard. You learned Christ's cross by the letters A B C. Go forwards then, pay your vows to the Lord; fight like men, and valiant men under Christ's standard; take up your cross and follow your master, as your brethren Mess. Hooper, Rogers, Taylor, and Saunders, have done, and as now your brethren, Dr. Cranmer, Latimer, Ridley, Farrar, Bradford, Haukes, &c. are ready to do. The ice is broke before you, therefore be not afraid, but be content to die for the Lord. You have no occasion to waver or doubt of the doctrine thus declared by the blood of our pastors. Remember that Christ saith, "He that will save his life, shall lose it." And what should it profit you to live the whole world, much less a little quietness, your goods, &c. and to lose your own souls? Render to the Lord what he hath lent you, by such means as he would have you render it, and not as you would. Forget not, Christ's disciples must deny themselves, as well concerning their wills concerning their wisdom. Have in mind, that as it is a small mercy to believe in the Lord, so it is no less kindness of God towards you, to suffer any thing, much more death for the Lord. If they be blessed that die in the Lord, how shall they be that die for the Lord? O what a blessing to have death due for our sins, diverted into a demonstration of the Lord's truth? O that we had a little of Moses's faith to look upon the end of the cross, to look upon the reward, to see continually with Christ and his people greater riches than the riches of Egypt. O let us pray that God will open our eyes to see his hid manna, heavenly Jerusalem, congregation of his first-born, the melody of the saints, the tabernacle of God dwelling with men, and so take the kingdom of heaven as it were by force. God our Father give for Christ's sake to see a little, what and how great joy he hath prepared for us, he hath called us unto, and most abundantly giveth us for his own goodness and truth's sake, Amen.

My dearly beloved, repent, be sober, watch and pray, study to be quiet, and mind your own business: be obedient to the higher powers in all things that are not contrary to God's word; and if you cannot with a good conscience obey without offending God, patiently suffer, presume not to resist, and the glory and good Spirit of God shall dwell upon you. pray you remember us your poor afflicted brethren, be in the Lord's bonds for the testimony of Christ, and waiting for the gracious hour of our most merciful Father. The Lord Christ's sake give us courage to drink heartily of this cup which daily we groan and sigh for, lamenting that the time thus prolonged. The Lord Jesus give us grace to be thankful and to suffer patiently the provident hour of his most gracious will, Amen, Amen.

Your's in Christ,

JOHN BRADFORD

LETTER XXV.

From Mr. BRADFORD to his good BROTHER JOHN CARELESS, Prisoner in the KING'S-BENCH.

THE father of mercy, and God of all comfort, visit us with his eternal consolation, according to his great mercies in Jesus Christ our Saviour, Amen.

My very dear brother, I never received so much consolation by any thing since I came into prison, as I have by your letter, God be praised. I must confess that for my unthankfulness towards you, and especially to God, I have now more need of his merciful assistance than ever. Ah that I envieth us so greatly, ah that our Lord would shortly lay his head under our feet. Ah that I may for ever beware, and be a godly example to you and to others, to beware of unthankfulness. Good brother, we had more need to take heed of a

After lightning than before. God therefore is to be praised even when he hideth (for a season) his cheerful countenance from us, by not knowing how to use it as we ought, do hurt ourselves more thereby; so great is our ignorance and corruption. This, my good brother; I write unto you, as to one whom in the Lord I embrace, and I thank God that you do me in like manner. God our Father more and more give us both his good Spirit, that as by faith we may feel ourselves united unto him in Christ, so by love we may find ourselves linked in the same Christ to one another, I to you; and you to me; we to all the children of God, and all the children of God to us; Amen; Amen.

Commend me to your good brother Skelthorp, for whom I heartily praise God, who hath given him at length grace to see and profess his truth. I doubt not but he will be so wary in all his conversation, that his old acquaintance may thereby ever think themselves astray. Wo, and wo again would be unto us, if we by our example should make men to stumble at the truth. Forget not salutations in Christ, as you shall think good to Trew and his companions. The Lord hath his time (I hope) for them also, though we perchance think otherwise. It is not one or two drops that maketh the stone hollow, but the perpetual dropping; so if with hearty prayer for them, and by our good example gently working upon them, we may at length see the operation of God: beseech God to make perfect all the good he hath begun in us, Amen. I desire you all to pray for me the most unworthy prisoner of the Lord.

Your Brother,

JOHN BRADFORD.

LETTER XXVI.

From Mr. BRADFORD to Mr. JOHN HALL and his WIFE, Prisoners in NEWGATE.

ALMIGHTY GOD our heavenly Father, through Jesus Christ, be with you both, my dearly beloved, as with his dear children for ever, and bless you with his Holy Spirit, that you may rejoice in his cause and this cross, and gladly take it up and bear it so long as he shall think good. I have heard (my good brother and sister) that God hath brought you both into his school-house, that thereby you might see his love and care for you. If it be a token of a loving and careful father, to prevent the purpose, and disappoint the intent of his children, while they inconsiderately endeavour to keep from school (which they would not do, if they did but know the advantage of the learning they might here get); how should you take this work of the Lord preventing your purpose, but as an evident sign of that love and fatherly carefulness which he beareth towards you? If he had winked at your faults, you might indeed have escaped beating, (I mean the cross) but then you would have lost the advantage of learning that which your Father would have you to learn for your future good. He, I say, hath brought you where you be; and though your wit and reason may tell you, it is by chance or fortune, yet my dearly beloved, whatsoever was the means, know for certain that God our Father was the worker hereof, and for your welfare, though your old Adam doth tell you otherwise: yet I say truth, that your duty is to think of this cross, that as is God's sending, and although you deserve otherwise, yet it cometh from him out of pure love and fatherly affection for your welfare and advantage.

You will be apt to object, and say, What advantage can arise from all this? We are now kept close in prison; our families and poor children have nobody to take care of them; our substance by this means is diminished; our poverty approacheth, and perchance more dangers also, yea, and loss of life too. These are no advantages, but the greatest miseries and misfortunes; so that we may justly inquire, and should be glad to know, what advantage can come from us from this cross, which seems to be attended with nothing but the most miserable inconveniences.

To these things I answer, That indeed what you say is true of your bodies, families, children, substance, poverty, life, &c. But then you must consider these things in another manner, you must view them inwardly as well as outwardly, and then, perhaps, you may find more satisfaction. Do not you now that you must of necessity part from all these fine things a very short time? Tell me then, have you not this advantage from your cross, to learn to loath and leave this world, and long for and desire another, where is perpetuity? You fight of your own head and free will to have (according to your profession in baptism) forsaken the world and all earthly things, using the world as though you used it not. Your heart must be set upon your treasure in heaven, or else you can never be Christ's true disciples, nor be saved, and be where he is. The advantage that cometh by this cross, if you rightly and willingly embrace it, will most assuredly bring you to the end in endless glory. How doth God now, as it were, fatherly pull you by the ears, to remember your former offences, that remembrance and remission might ensue? How doth God now compel you to call upon him, and to be earnest in prayer? Are all these no advantages? Doth not the scripture say, that "God doth correct us in this world, because we shall not be damned with the world?" That God chasteneth every one whom he loveth? That the end of this correction shall be joy and holiness? Doth not the scripture say, that you are now going the right way to heaven? That your suffering is Christ's suffering? My dearly beloved, what greater advantages than these can a godly heart desire?

Therefore you are commanded to rejoice and be glad when you suffer as you now do; for through the goodness of God great shall be your reward. Where? forsooth on earth, first your children; for now they are in God's immediate protection. Never was father so careful for his children, as God is for yours. God's blessing, which is more worth than all the world; you leave indeed to your children. Though all your providence for them shall be pulled away, yet God is not poor, he has promised to provide for them most fatherly. "Cast thy burthen upon me, saith he, and I will bear it." Do you therefore cast them, and commend them unto God your Father, and doubt not that he will die in your debt. He never was found unfaithful, and he will not now begin with you. The good man's seed shall not go begging their bread, for he will shew mercy upon thousands of the posterity of them that fear him. Therefore, as I said, God's reward, first, upon earth, shall be felt by your children even corporally, and so also upon you, if God see it most for your advantage, at least inwardly you shall feel it by the quietness of your conscience: And secondly, after this life you shall find it so plentifully, as the eye hath not seen, the ear hath not heard, the heart cannot conceive how great and glorious God's reward will be upon your bodies, much more upon your souls. God open our eyes to see and feel this indeed. Then shall we think the cross, which is a means hereto, to be commodious. Then shall we thank God that he would chastise us. Then shall we say with David, "Happy am I that thou hast punished me; for before I went astray, but now I keep thy laws."

That we may do this indeed, my dearly beloved, let us first know that our cross cometh from God. Secondly, that it cometh from God as a Father, that is, for our good. Thirdly, let us call to mind our sins, and ask pardon. Fourthly, let us look for certain help at God's hand in his good time; help, I say, such as shall make most to God's glory, and to the comfort and advantage of our souls and bodies eternally. This if we certainly conceive, then will there proceed from us hearty thanksgiving, which God requireth as a most gracious sacrifice. That we may all offer this through Christ, let us use earnest prayer to our God and dear Father, who bless us, keep us, and comfort us under his sweet cross for ever, Amen, Amen.

My dear hearts, if I could any way comfort you, you should be sure thereof, though my life lay thereon, but now I must do as I may, because I cannot as I would. O that it would please our dear Father shortly to bring us where we shall never part, but enjoy continually the blessed fruition of his heavenly presence. Pray, pray, that it may speedily come to pass.

To-morrow I will send to you to know your estate; send me word what are the chiefest things they charge you withal.

From the Compter,

by your brother in the Lord,

JOHN BRADFORD.

LETTER XXVII.

From Mr. BRADFORD, to Mrs. HALL, Prisoner in NEWGATE.

OUR most merciful God and Father, through Christ Jesus our Lord and Saviour, be merciful unto us, and make perfect the good he hath begun in us unto the end, Amen.

My dear sister, rejoice in the Lord, rejoice: be glad, I say, be merry and thankful, not only because Christ so commandeth us, but also because our state wherein we at present are, requireth no less, for we are the Lord's witnesses. God the Father hath vouchsafed to chuse us amongst many to witness and testify that Christ his Son is king, and that his word is true. Christ our Saviour, for his love's sake towards us, will have us bear record that he is no usurper nor deceiver of the people, but God's ambassador, prophet, and Messiah; so that of all dignities upon earth, this is the highest. Greater honour had not his prophets, apostles, nor dearest friends, than to bear witness with Christ, as we now do. The world, following the counsel of their sire Satan, would gladly condemn Christ and his truth, but lo, the Lord hath chosen us to be his champions to hinder this. As stout soldiers therefore let us stand to our master, who is with us, and standeth on our right hand, that we shall not be much moved if we hope and depend on his mercy; he is so faithful and true, that he will never tempt us farther than he will make us able to bear.

Therefore be not careful (for I hear that you this day will be called forth) what you shall answer. The Lord, who is true and cannot lie, hath promised, and will never fail nor forget it, that you shall have both what and how to answer, as shall make his shameless adversaries ashamed. Depend therefore on his promise of God, who is an helper at a pinch, and a most present remedy to them that hope in him. Never was it ever heard of, or shall be, that any hoping in the Lord was put to foil.

Therefore as I said, I say again, dear sister, be not only careful for your answering, but also be joyful for your cause. Confess Christ and be not ashamed, and he will confess you, and never be ashamed of you. Though loss of goods and life be like here to ensue, yet if Christ be true, (as he be most true) it is otherwise indeed: for he that loseth his life, saith he, winneth it; but he that saveth it, loseth it. Our sins have deserved many deaths. Now if God so deal with us, that he will make our deserved death a demonstration of his grace, a testimonial of his verity, a confirmation of his people, and overthrow of his adversaries; what great cause have we to be thankful? Be thankful therefore, good sister, be thankful. Rejoice and be merry in the Lord; be stout in his cause and quarrel, be not faint-hearted, but run out your race, and set your captain Christ before your eyes. Behold how great your reward is. See the great glory and the eternity of felicity prepared for you. Strive and fight lawfully, that you may get the crown. Run to get the game, you are almost at your journey's end; I doubt not but our Father will with us send to you also, as he did to Elijah, a fiery chariot, to convey us into his kingdom. Let us therefore not be dismayed to leave our cloak behind us, that is, our bodies to aches. God will one day restore them to us like to the body of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, whose coming is now at hand; let us look for it and lift up our heads, for our redemption draweth nigh, Amen, Amen. The Lord of mercy grant us his mercy, Amen. I pray you, pray for me, and so desire my brethren which be with you. God's peace be with us all, Amen. Blessed be the dead that die in the Lord; then how much more they that die for the Lord!

Your brother in bonds,
JOHN BRADFORD.

LETTER XXVIII.

From Mr. BRADFORD, to a WOMAN that desired to know his MIND, whether she refraining from the MASS, might be present at the POPISH MATTINS, or no.

I Beseech Almighty God our heavenly Father to be merciful unto us, and to increase in you, my good sister, the knowledge and love of his truth, and at this present give me grace to write to you something of the same, as may make to his glory and our own comfort and confirmation in him through Christ our Lord, Amen.

Whether you may come with safe conscience to the church now, that is, to the service used commonly, in part, as at mattins, or at even-song, or no, it is your desire to have me write something for your further stay. My dearly beloved, although your benefits towards me might perchance make you think, that in respect thereof I would bear with that which else were not to be borne withal; yet by God's grace I am proposed, simply and without all such respect in this matter, to speak to you the truth according to my conscience, as I may be able to stand unto when I shall come before the Lord.

First therefore, go about to learn perfectly the first lesson to be learned by all that profess Christ, that is, to deny yourself, and in nothing to seek yourself.

Secondly, learn after this, to begin at the next lesson to it, which is, to seek God in all things you do, and leave undone.

Thirdly, know then, that you seek God, when in his service you follow his word, and not the fancies of man, custom, multitude, &c. and when with your brother you follow the rule of charity, that is, To do as you would be done by: in these is a sum of all the counsel I can give you, if that hitherto I admonish you of the service now used, which is directly contrary to God's word. So that your going to the service, is a declaration that you have not learned your first lesson, and never can learn it, so long as you go thither; and consequently the second lesson you will utterly lose; if you cease not the seeking of yourself, that is, if for company, custom, father or friend, life or goods, you seem to allow that which God disalloweth. And this by God's grace, I purpose briefly to shew.

First, The mattins and even-song is in a tongue forbidden to be used in the public congregation, where they understand it not. Read what St. Paul saith, that to pray in an unknown tongue is against God's commandments, 1 Cor. xiv. This one, I think, is sufficient, if there were no other argument against it. For how can God's glory be sought, where his word and commandment is wilfully broken? How can charity to man stand, when charity to God, which is obedience to his word, is broken down?

Again, Both in mattins and even-song idolatry is maintained; for there is invocation and prayer made to saints departed this life, which robbeth God of that glory which he will give to none other.

Moreover, this service, and setters-forth of it, condemn the English service as heresy, thereby falling into God's curse, which is threatened to all such as call good evil, and evil good; whereof they shall partake who communicate with them.

Besides, this Latin service is a plain mark of Antichrist's catholic synagogue; so that the communicants and approvers of it thereby declare themselves to be members of the same synagogue, and so cut off from Christ and his church, whose exterior mark is the true administration of God's word and sacraments.

Furthermore, the example of your going thither to allow the religion of Antichrist, (as doubtless you do in deed, howsoever in heart you think) occasioneth the obstinate to be utterly untractable, the weak papists to be more obstinate, the strong gospellers to be much weakened, and the weak gospellers to be utterly overthrown: the inconveniences that must necessarily attend it, neither tongue can utter, nor pen describe. All these evils those be guilty of that (externally only) accompany these in religion; from which you are admonished to fly. If Christ be Christ, follow him. Gather with him, lest you scatter abroad. Serve God, not only in spirit, but also in body; make not your body, which is now a member of Christ, a member of Antichrist. Come out from amongst them, saith the Lord, and touch not the unclean thing. Confess Christ and his truth, not only in heart, but also in tongue, yea, in very deed, which too few gospellers do. Indeed many deny him, and therefore had need tremble, lest that Christ deny them in the last day: which day, if it were often set before our eyes, the profits and pleasures of this world would be esteemed as mere trifles.

Therefore, good sister, often have it before your eyes, daily set yourself and your doing, as it were, before the judgment seat of Christ, that hereafter you be not called into judgment. Think that it will be little profit to you to win the whole world and lose your own soul. Mark well Christ's lessons, "He that will save his life, shall lose it." The Father of heaven commandeth you to hear Christ, who saith, follow me: this you cannot do and follow idolatry, or idolaters. Fly from such, saith the scripture.

God grant this to you, to me, and to all God's children. Amen. Thus in haste I have accomplished your request. God grant that as you have done me much good bodily, so that this may be a little means to do you some good spiritually, Amen. If time had served, I would have written more at large. March 2, 1555.

JOHN BRADFORD

LETTER XXIX.

From Mr. BRADFORD to the RIGHT WORSHIPFUL LADY VANE.

THE good spirit of God our Father be more and more plentifully perceived by your good ladyship, through the merits and mediation of our dear Saviour Jesus Christ, Amen.

Although your benefits towards me have deserved all the service I can do for you, yet (right worshipful, and dearly beloved in the Lord) the true fear of God, and the love of his truth which I perceive to be in you, doth, in a more extraordinary manner, oblige me to respect you. This bearer hath told me that your desire is to have something sent to you concerning the usurped authority of the supremacy of the bishop of Rome (which is undoubtedly that great Antichrist, of whom the apostles do so much admonish us). Now, to strengthen your faith, as well as to furnish you with answers, (that you may at any time be capable to render a reason of the hope that is in you) I have written something to the purpose, which I desire you would read and mark well.

The papists do place the pope in preheminance over the whole church, thereby unplacing Christ, who is the only head of the church, that giveth life to the whole body, and by his Spirit doth enliven every member of the same. This they do against all scriptures. For where they bring in this spoken of Peter, Feed my sheep; I would gladly know whether this was not commanded unto others also. As for that (which perchance they will urge) that he spake to Peter by name; I answer, that if they had any learning, they might easily perceive that it was not for any such cause as they pretend, but rather by a threefold commandment to restore him to the honour of an apostle, which he had lost by his three-fold denial. And how dare they interpret this word, My sheep, My lambs, to be the universal church of Christ? I think a man might easily by the like reason prove that Peter himself had resigned that which Christ had given him, in exhorting his fellow pastors to feed the flock of Christ. Is not this pretty stuff? Because Christ saith to Peter, Feed my sheep, therefore he ought to rule the universal and whole church of Christ? If Peter do truly write unto others that they should do the like, that is, feed Christ's flock, either he conferreth right and authority committed to him upon them, or else doth participate or communicate with them; so that foolishly they go about to establish that which hath no ground. Peter indeed was a shepherd of the sheep, but such a one as bestowed his labour on them so far, as he could stretch himself by his ministry. But the papists prate that he had full power over all churches: wherein they may see St. Paul to disprove that for else he hath done unjustly in denying him the supreme place. Howbeit, who ever yet read that St. Peter ever put any thing upon him over churches committed to other men?

as not he sent by the church, and sent by one not having. over the rest? I grant that he was an excellent instrument of God, and for the excellency of his gifts, whensoever they met together, place therefore was commonly given unto him. But what is this to the purpose, to make him head and ruler over all the whole church, because he was so over a small congregation.

But be it so, that Peter had as much given unto him as they affirm: who yet will grant that Peter had a patrimony given to his heirs? He hath left (say the papists) to his successors the same right which he received. O Lord God! then his successor must be a Satan: for Peter received that title from Christ himself. I would gladly have the papists to shew me one place of succession mentioned in the scriptures. I am sure that when he painteth out the whole administration of the church, he maketh one head, nor any inheritable primacy, and yet is altogether in commendation of unity. After he hath made mention of one God the Father, of one Christ, of one Spirit, of one body of the church, of one faith, and of one baptism, he describeth the means and the manner how unity is to be kept; namely, because unto every pastor grace is given according to the measure wherewith Christ had endued them. Where, pray you, is now any title [plenitudinis potestatis] of fulness of power? When he calleth home every one unto a certain measure, why did he not forthwith say, One pope? which he could have forgotten, if the thing had been as the papists make

But let us grant that perpetuity of the primacy in the church is established in Peter; I would gladly learn, why the seat of primacy should be rather at Rome than elsewhere. Marry, they, because Peter's chair was at Rome. This is even like this, that because Moses the greatest prophet, and Aaron the priest, exercised their offices unto their death in the desert, before the principal place of the Jewish church should be in wilderness. But grant them their reason that it is good; what should Antioch claim? For Peter's chair was there also, wherein Paul gave him a check, which was unseemly and unmanly done of St Paul, that would not give place to his present and better.

No, say the papists, Rome must have this authority because he died there. But what if a man should by probable conjectures shew, that it is but a fable which is feigned of Peter's episcopate at Rome? Read how St. Paul doth salute very many private persons, when he writeth to the Romans. Three years after he was brought prisoner to Rome. Luke telleth that he received of these brethren, and yet in all these is no mention at all of Peter, who then, by their stories, was at Rome. Before he was proud, as the pope and his prelates be, or else he could have visited Paul. Paul while prisoner at Rome wrote several epistles, in which he expresseth the names of many who are but mean persons in comparison of Peter, but of Peter he maketh never a word. Surely if Peter had been there, this name of him had been suspicious. In the second epistle to Timothy, Paul complaineth that no man was with him in his prison, but all had left him. If Peter had been then at Rome, they write, then either Paul had belied him, or Peter had betrayed his Peter's part, Luke xxii. In another place, how doth he blame all that were with him, Timothy excepted? Therefore may well doubt whether Peter was bishop at Rome as they say: for all this time, and long before, they say that Peter was not there.

But I will not stir up coals in this matter. If Rome be the chief seat because Peter died there, why should not Antioch be the second? Why should not James and John who were taken with Peter be as pillars? Why, I say, should not their seats be honour next to Peter's seat? Is it not preposterous, that Alexandria, where Mark (who was but one of the disciples) was bishop, should be preferred before Ephesus, where John the evangelist taught and was bishop; and before Jerusalem, where only James taught and died bishop, but also Christ Jesus our Lord and high priest for ever, by whom, being master, I hope our hour should be given unto his chair, more than to the chair of chaplains.

I need to speak nothing how that Paul declareth Peter's apostleship to concern rather the circumcision or the Jews, and before properly pertaineth not to us. Neither need I bring Gregory the first bishop of Rome, which was about the year of our Lord 600, who in his works doth plainly write, that this title of Primacy, and to be heard over all churches under Christ, is a title meet and agreeing only to Antichrist, and therefore he telleth it a profane, mischievous, and a horrible title. Whom could we believe now, if we will neither believe apostle nor pope?

If I should go about to tell how this name was first gotten to Phocas, I should be too long. I purpose, God willing, to set it forth at large in a work which I have begun of Antichrist, if God for his mercy's sake give me life to finish. For this present therefore I shall desire your ladyship to take in good part. If they will needs have the bishop of Rome acknowledged for the head of the church, then will I urge them to give us a bishop. But they obtrude unto us a butcher, a bite-sheep, rather than a bishop. They brag of Peter's succession, of Christ's vicar; this is always in their mouth.

But alas, how can we call him Christ's vicar, that resisteth Christ, rejecteth his truth, persecuteth his people, and preferreth himself above God and man? How or wherein doth the pope and Christ agree? How supplieth he Peter's ministry, that boasteth of his succession? Therefore, if the papists will have the bishop of Rome supreme head of the church of Christ on earth, they must, before they attain this, give us a bishop in deed, and not in name. For whosoever he be that will make this the bond of unity, whosoever the bishop of Rome be; surely this must needs follow, that they do nothing else but teach a most wicked defection, and departing from Christ.

But of this, if God lend me life, I purpose to speak more at large hereafter. Now will I leave your ladyship to the tuition of God our Father, and Christ our only head, pastor, and keeper, to whom see you cleave by true faith, which dependeth only on the word of God, which if you do follow as a lantern to your feet, and light to your steps, you shall then avoid darkness, and the dangerous deeps wherein the papists are fallen by the judgment of God, and seek to bring us into the same dungeon with them, that the blind following the blind, they both may fall into the ditch: out of which God deliver them according to his good will, and preserve us for his name's sake, that we being in his light, may continue therein, and walk in it whilst it is day; so shall the night over-prefs us, we going from light to light, from virtue to virtue, from faith to faith, from glory to glory, by the governance of God's good Spirit, which God our Father give unto us all for ever, Amen.

Your brother in bonds,

for the testimony of Jesus Christ,

JOHN BRADFORD.

Here followeth another letter from Mr. Bradford to Mr. Richard Hopkins, sometime sheriff of Coventry; who, during the time of his shirvalty, was accused by certain malignant adversaries of matters pertaining to religion. What matter it was I am not yet certainly informed, unless it were for sending to a thief, being then in prison ready to be hanged, a certain English book of scripture for his spiritual comfort.

Whereupon, or some such like matter, he being maliciously accused, was sent for and committed to the Fleet-prison, where he remained a long time in great peril of his life. Notwithstanding the said Hopkins being at length delivered out of prison, following Mr. Bradford's counsel, and minding to keep his conscience pure from idolatry, was driven with his wife, and eight young children to quit the realm, and went into High-Germany, where he continued in the city of Basil till the death of queen Mary, being like a good Tobias, to his power a friendly helper and a comfortable reliever of other English exiles there about him, God's providence so working with him, that in those far countries he fell not into any decay, neither any of his household miscarried during his stay there, but as many as he brought out, so many he carried home again, yea, and that with advantage, and God's plenty withal upon him.

LETTER XXX.

From Mr. BRADFORD, to Mr. RICHARD HOPKINS, then SHERIFF of COVENTRY, and Prisoner in the FLEET.

DEARLY beloved in the Lord, I wish unto you as unto mine own brother, yea as to mine own heart, God's mercy, and to the feeling of the same plentifully in Christ our sweet Saviour, who gave himself a ransom for our sins, and price for redemption, praised be his holy name for ever and ever, Amen.

I will not go about to excuse myself for not sending unto you hitherto, but rather accuse myself before God and you, desiring of you forgiveness, and with me to pray to God for pardon of this my unkind forgetting you, and all other my sins, which I beseech the Lord in his mercy to do away for Christ's sake, Amen.

Now I would be glad to make some amends, if I could, but because I cannot, I heartily desire you to accept the will for the deed. At present, my dear heart, you are in a blessed state, although it seem otherwise to you, or rather unto your old Adam, which I dare now be so bold as to discern from you, because you would have him not only discerned, but also utterly destroyed. For if God be true, then is his word true.

Now his word pronounceth of your state that it is happy, therefore it must needs be so. To prove this I think there is no need: for you know the Holy Ghost saith, "That they are happy who suffer for righteousness' sake, and that God's glory and Spirit resteth on them who suffer for conscience to God." You know that you suffer for the sake of God and religion; or else you might soon be out of trouble. You account yourself a great sinner, and so you think you deserve this punishment: but the papists do neither persecute your sins, nor you for the sake of your sins, but in you they persecute Christ, and punish you for professing his religion. Happy are you who have found such favour with God, as to be accounted worthy to suffer for his sake in the sight of man; you shall surely rejoice with a joy unspeakable in the sight of men and angels.

You may think yourself born in a blessed time, that have found this grace with God, as a vessel of honour to suffer with his saints; yea, with his Son. The apostle saith, "Not many noble, not many rich, not many wise in the world, hath the Lord God chosen." Who then hath greater cause to rejoice than you, that amongst the Not many, he hath chosen you to be one? For that cause hath God placed you in your office, that thereby you might the more see his special favour and love towards you. It had not been so great a thing for Mr. Hopkins to have suffered as Mr. Hopkins, as it is for Mr. Hopkins also to suffer as Master Sheriff. O happy day, that you were put into this high office, by which, as God in this world would promote you to greater honour, so by suffering in this room he hath exalted you in heaven, and in the sight of his church and children, to a much more excellent glory. When was it read that the sheriff of a city hath suffered for the Lord's sake, or cast into prison for a good conscience? To the end of the world shall it be written for a memorial to your praise, "That RICHARD HOPKINS, sheriff of Coventry, for the conscientious discharge of his office before God, was cast into the Fleet, and there a long time kept prisoner." Happy, thrice happy are you, if for the sake of religion you may give your life. Never could you have attained to this promotion in this manner, had you not been in that office. Who would ever have thought that you would have been the first magistrate that for Christ's sake should have lost any thing? As I said before, therefore I say again, that your state is happy.

Be thankful therefore, rejoice in your trouble, pray for patience, persevere to the end, let patience have her perfect work. If you want this wisdom and power, ask it of God, who will give it to you in his good time. Hope still in him, yea, if he should slay you, with Job trust in him, and you shall find him merciful and full of compassion; for he never did, nor ever will break his promise. He is with you in trouble, he heareth you calling upon him, yea, before you call, through Christ he granteth your desire. If he now and then hide his face from you, it is to provoke you the more to long for him. This is most true, he is coming, and will come, he will not be long. But if for a time he seem to tarry, yet stand you still, and you shall see the wonderful works of the Lord. O my beloved, why should you be heavy? Is not Christ Emmanuel, God with us? Shall you not find that he is true in saying, "In the world you shall have trouble?" So is he in saying, "In me you shall have comfort." He doth not only foretel that trouble will come, but also promiset that comfort shall ensue. And such comfort as the eye hath not seen, the ear hath not heard, neither can the heart of man conceive. O great comfort! who shall have this? Verily they that suffer for the Lord, as I hope you do. Then, as I said, happy, happy, happy, and happy again are you, my dearly beloved in the Lord. You now suffer with the Lord, surely you shall be glorified with him. Now we are both in the ready road to heaven: for by many afflictions we must enter in thither, whither God bring us for his mercy's sake, Amen, Amen.

Your fellow in affliction,

JOHN BRADFORD.

LETTER XXXI.

From Mr. BRADFORD to Mrs. ELIZABETH BROWN.

GOOD sister, God make perfect the good he hath begun in you unto the end.

I am afraid to write unto you because you so over-charge yourself at all times, even whensoever I do but send commendations to you. I would be more bold to you than many others, and therefore you might suspend so great tokens till I write to you of my need. Dear sister, I see your unfeigned kindness to me, which I do recompense with the like, and will do by God's grace so long as I live, and therefore I hope not to forget you, but to remember you in my prayers, as I hope you do me. Otherwise I can do you no service except it be now and then by my writing to hinder you from better exercise; though the end of my writing is to excite and stir up your heart more earnestly to go forward in your well-begun enterprize. For you know none shall be crowned but such as strive lawfully, and none receiveth the prize but those that run to the appointed mark. None shall be saved but such as persist and continue to the end.

Therefore, dear sister, remember that we have need of patience, that when we have done the good will of God, we may receive the promise. Patience and perseverance are the proper notes, whereby God's children are known from counterfeit,

Many make good beginnings, yea, their progress seemeth well begun, but yet in the end they fall. These were never of faith St. John, for if they had been of us, they would have continued to the end.

Go forward therefore, my beloved in the Lord, as you have well begun, and so well persevere, and happily end, and all is your's. Though this be sharp and sour, yet it is not tedious and long. Accustom yourself now to see God continually that he may be all in all unto you. In good things behold his mercy; and apply it to yourself. In evil things and plagues behold his judgments, whereby learn to fear him. Beware of sin, as the serpent of the soul, which spoileth us all of our ornament and seemly apparel in God's sight. Let Christ crucified be your book to study on, and that both night and day. Mark your vocation, and be diligent in the works thereof. Use earnest and hearty prayer, and that in spirit. In all things give thanks to God our Father through Christ. Labour to have a life lasting begun in you here; for else it will not be enjoyed elsewhere. Set God's judgments often before your eyes, that now examining yourself you make diligent shift, and obtain never to come in judgment. Uncover your evils to God, that he may cover them. Beware of this antichristian trash: defile not yourself therewith in soul or body, but accomplish holiness in the fear of God, and bear no yoke with unbelievers. God our Father accomplish his good work in you. Amen. Commend me to your good mother Mrs. Wilkinson, and to my very dear sister Mr. Warcup. I shall daily commend you all to God, and I pray you do the like for me.

JOHN BRADFORD.

LETTER XXXII.

From Mr. BRADFORD to a FRIEND of his, instructing him how to answer his ADVERSARIES.

MY good brother, our merciful God and dear Father through Christ open your eyes effectually to see, and your heart ardently to desire the everlasting joy which he hath prepared for his slaughter-sheep, that is, for such as shrink not from him for any such storm. Amen.

When you shall come before the magistrates to give answer of the hope that is in you, do it with all reverence and simplicity. And if you are afraid of the power and cruelty of the magistrates, set before you the example of good father Myles for he set the invisible God before the eyes of his faith, and with them he looked upon God and his glorious majesty and power, as with the eyes of his body he saw Pharaoh and all his frightful terrors. So do you, my dearly beloved: let your inward eyes give light unto you, that as you are before the magistrates, so, and much more, are you and they present before the face of God, who will give you such wisdom as the enemy shall be amazed at: and further, he will so order their hearts and doings, that they shall, whether they will or no, serve God by his providence towards you, (which you cannot avoid though you would) as shall be most to his glory, and your everlasting comfort.

The chief matter they will trouble you for, and go about to deceive you withal, is the sacrament, not of Christ's body and blood, but of the altar, as they call it, thereby destroying the sacrament which Christ instituted. I would have you note these two things:

First, That the sacrament of the altar which the priest offereth in the mass, and eateth privately by himself, is not the sacrament of Christ's body and blood instituted by him, as Christ's institution plainly written, and set down in the scriptures, be compared with their using of it, evidently doth declare.

Again, if they talk with you of Christ's sacrament instituted by him, whether it be Christ's body or no; answer them, that as to the eyes of your reason, to your taste, and corporal sense it is bread and wine, and therefore the scripture calleth it so, even after consecration: but to the eyes, taste and sense of your faith which ascendeth into heaven where Christ sitteth, it is indeed Christ's body and blood, which spiritually your soul feedeth on to everlasting life, in faith and by faith, even as your body presently feedeth on the sacramental bread and sacramental wine.

By this means, as you shall not allow transubstantiation, none of their popish opinions; so shall you declare the sacrament to be a matter of faith, and not of reason, as the papists make it. For they deny God's omnipotence, in saying that Christ is not there if bread be there: but faith looketh on the omnipotency of God, joined with his promise, and doubting not but that Christ is able to give us what he promiseth spiritually by faith, the bread still remaining in substance, as we say if the substance of bread were taken away: for Christ saith, I am in any place, this is no bread. But in these things God will instruct you, if you rely on his promise, and pray for the power and wisdom of his Spirit, which may be grant unto us both to all his people, for his name's sake, through Christ our Lord. Amen.

JOHN BRADFORD.

LETTER XXXIII.

Mr. BRADFORD, to certain GODLY MEN, whom he exhorteth to be patient under the CROSS, and constant in the true DOCTRINE which they had professed.

Y dearly beloved in the Lord, as in him I wish you well to fare, so I pray God that I and you may continue in his service, that we may perpetually enjoy the same welfare, as in hope, so in heaven indeed, and eternally.

You know this world is not your home, but a pilgrimage, a where God trieth his children; and therefore as it neither nor can know you, so I hope you know it not, that is, allow it not, nor in any point will seem so to do, although may be moved thereto on many occasions. For this sun now shineth, is so burning hot, that the corn which is sown in sand and stony ground, beginneth to wither, that is, ma-who before were taken for hearty gospellers, do now, for of trouble, begin to fall away, and turn to their vomit in, thereby declaring that they were not of us, for if they had of us, they would no doubt have continued with us, and ther for loss nor gain have left us, either in word or deed.
for their hearts (which undoubtedly are double, and therein danger of God's curse) we have as much with us as the bills have with them, and more too by their own judgment.
they deceive themselves in thinking that they may inwardly the truth, and outwardly curry favour in seeming to like the contrary. What though with my body, say they, I do this or at? God knoweth my heart is whole with him.

Ah brother, if thy heart be whole with God, why dost thou not confess and declare thyself accordingly by word and deed?
that which thou sayest thou believest in thine heart, is either good or not: if it be good, why art thou ashamed of it? If be evil, why dost thou keep it in thine heart? Is not God to defend thee, adventuring thyself for his cause? Or will not defend his worshippers? Dost not the scripture say, that the eyes of the Lord are on them that fear him, and trust in his mercy; to deliver their souls from death, and to feed them at the time of hunger?

If this be true, as certainly it is, why are we afraid of death, as though God could not comfort and deliver us; or contrary to his promise, would not? Why are we afraid of the loss of our goods, as though God would leave them that seek him destitute of all good things? Ah faith, faith, how few see thee now-a-days! Full truly said Christ, that he should scarcely find faith when he came on earth. For if men believed these promises, they would never do any thing outwardly which inwardly they disallow. No example of men, how many ever they be, can prevail in this behalf: for the pattern which we must follow is Christ himself, and not the greater company or custom. His word is the lanthorn to lighten our steps, and not learned men. Company and custom are to be considered according to the thing they allow. Learned men are to be listened to and followed according to God's law, for else the greater part goeth to the devil. As custom causeth error and blindness, so learning, if it be not according to the light of God's word, is poison, and learned men most pernicious. The devil is called Demon for his cunning, and the children of the world are much wiser than the children of light in their generation: and I know that the devil and his agents have for the most part more helps in this life than Christ's church and her children. The devil and his synagogue have custom, multitude, unity, antiquity, learning, power, riches, honour, dignity, and promotions plenty, as always they have had, and commonly will have more than the true church until the coming of Christ:
for the glory, riches, and honour of this true church is not here;
but her trial, cross, and warfare is here.

And therefore, I pray you, consider these things accordingly.
Consider what you be, not worldlings, but God's children.
Consider where you be, not at home, but in a strange country.
Consider with whom you are conversant, even in the midst of your enemies, and of a wicked generation; and then, I hope, you will not much muse at affliction; which you cannot be without, being, as you be, God's children, in a strange country, and in the midst of your enemies, unless you would leave your captain Christ, and follow Satan for the dung and dross of this world, rest and quietness, which he may promise you, and you indeed may think you shall receive it, by doing as he would have you: but he is a liar, he is not able to pay what he promisseth. Peace and war come from God, riches and poverty, wealth and woe. The devil hath no power but by God's permission. If then God permit him a little on your goods, body, or life, that cannot much hurt you if ye be followers of godliness, as St. Peter saith. God will certainly remember you in his time as shall make most for your comfort. Can a woman forget the child of her womb? And if she should, yet will I not forget thee, saith the Lord. Look upon Abraham in his exile and misery; look upon Jacob, Joseph, Moses, and David,
the prophets, apostles, and all the godly from the beginning; and, my good brethren, is not God the same God? You have heard of the patience of Job, saith St. James, and you have seen the end, how that God is merciful, patient, and long suffering: even so say I unto you, that you shall find accordingly,

No. 20.

if that you set his word always before you, and live according to it; and if he lay his cross on you, you bear it with patience.

Therefore I heartily beseech you, and out of my bonds which I suffer for your sake, intreat you, that you would cleave in heart and humble obedience to the doctrine taught you by me, and many other brethren. For we have taught you no fables nor tales of men, but the very word of God, which we are ready to confirm with our lives, and by the shedding of our blood, in all patience and humble obedience to the superior powers, to testify and seal up, as well that you might be more certain of the doctrine, as that you might be ready to confess the same before this wicked world; knowing that if we confess Christ and his truth before men, he will confess us before his Father in heaven;
but if we be ashamed hereof for loss of life, friends, or goods, he will be ashamed of us before his Father and his holy angels in heaven.

Therefore take heed, for the Lord's sake take heed, and defile not your bodies or souls with this Romish and antichristian religion set up amongst us again: but come away, come away, as the angel crieth, from amongst them in their idolatrous service, lest you be partakers of their iniquity.

Use much and hearty prayer for the Spirit of wisdom, knowledge, humbleness, meekness, sobriety, and repentance: which we have great need of, because our sins have thus provoked the Lord's anger against us; but let us bear his anger, and acknowledge our faults with bitter tears, and sorrowful sighs, and doubtless he will be merciful to us after his wonted mercy through Jesus Christ our Lord, to whom with the Father, and the Holy Ghost, be all honour and glory, praise, and everlasting thanks, from this time forth for evermore, Amen.

Out of prison by your's to command,

JOHN BRADFORD.

LETTER XXXIV.

From Mr. BRADFORD to Mr. GEORGE EATON.

Almighty God our heavenly Father, recompense abundantly into your bosom, here and eternally, my dearly beloved, the good which from him by you I have continually received since my coming into prison. Other ways can I never be able to requite your loving kindness here, than by praying for you, and after this life by witnessing your faith declared to me by your fruits, when we shall come and appear together before the throne of our Saviour Jesus Christ, whither I thank God I am even now going, always expecting the officers to come and satisfy the precept of the prelates, whereof though I cannot complain, because I have justly deserved an hundred thousand deaths at God's hands by reason of my sins, yet I may and must rejoice, because the prelates do not persecute in me mine iniquities, but Christ Jesus, and his verity.

And because they can do him no hurt, (for he sitteth in heaven, and laugheth them and their devices to scorn, as one day they shall feel) therefore they turn their rage upon his poor sheep, as Herod their father did upon the infants, Matt. ii.
Great cause therefore have I to rejoice, that my dear Saviour Christ will vouchsafe, amongst many, to chuse me to be a vessel of grace to suffer in me, (who have deserved so often and justly to suffer for my sins) that I might be most assured I shall be a vessel of honour, in whom he will be glorified.

As for the doctrine which I have professed and preached, I do confess unto you in writing, as to the whole world I shall shortly by God's grace in suffering, that it is the very true doctrine of Jesus Christ, of his prophets, apostles, and all good men: so that if an angel should come from heaven and preach otherwise, the same were accursed.

Therefore waver not, dear brother in the Lord, but be confirmed in this truth, and as your vocation requireth, when God so will, confess it, though it be dangerous so to do. The end will evidently shew another manner of pleasure for so doing, than tongue can tell. Be diligent in prayer, and watch therein.
Reverently read God's word. Set the shortness of this time before your eyes, and let not the eternity that is to come, depart out of your memory. Practise in your life what you learn by reading and hearing. Decline from evil, and pursue good.
Remember them that be in bonds, especially for the Lord's cause, as members of your body, and fellow-heirs of grace.
Forget not the afflictions of Sion, and the oppression of Jerusalem; and God our Father will give us his continual blessing through Christ our Lord, who guide us as his dear children for ever. Amen.

And thus I take my farewell of you, dear brother, for ever in this present life, till we shall meet in eternal bliss; whither our good God and Father bring us shortly, Amen. God bless all your babes for ever, Amen.

Out of prison the 8th of February.

Your afflicted brother for the cause of Christ,

JOHN BRADFORD.

LETTER XXXV.

From Mr. BRADFORD to Mrs. ANNE WARCUP.

Almighty God our heavenly Father, for his Christ's sake, increase in us faith, by which we may more and more 3 L see

see what glory and honour is reposed and safely kept in heaven, for all them that believe with the heart, and confess Christ and his truth with the mouth, Amen.

My dearly beloved, I remember that, some time ago, I took my leave of you upon conjecture: but now indeed I bid you farewell, upon certain knowledge. My staff standing at the door, I continually look for the sheriff to come for me, and I thank God I am ready for him. Now I go to confirm that which I have preached. Now I am climbing up the hill, it will cause me to puff and blow before I come to the cliff. The hill is steep and high, my breath is short, and my strength is feeble: pray therefore to the Lord for me, that as I have now, through his goodness, come almost to the top, I may by his grace be so strengthened, as not to rest till I come where I should be. O loving Lord, put out thy hand and draw me unto thee: for no man cometh, but he whom the Father draweth. See, my dearly beloved, God's loving mercy: he knoweth my short breath, and my great weakness. As he sent for Elias in a fiery chariot, so sendeth he for me: for by fire my dross must be purified, that I may be fine gold in his sight. O unthankful wretch that I am! Lord, do thou forgive me mine unthankfulness. Indeed I confess that my sins have deserved hell-fire, much more than this fire. But lo, so loving is my Lord, that he converteth the remedy for my sins, the punishment for my transgressions, into a testimonial of his truth, and a testification of his verity, which the prelates do persecute in me, and not my sins: therefore they persecute not me, but Christ in me, who I doubt not will take my part to the very end, Amen.

O that I had so open an heart, as could receive this great benefit and unspeakable dignity as I should, which God my Father offereth to me! Now pray for me, my dearly beloved, pray for me that I never shrink. I shall never shrink, I hope. I trust in the Lord I shall never shrink: for he that always hath taken my part, I am assured will not leave me when I have most need for his truth and mercy's sake; O Lord, help me. Into thy hands I commend me wholly. In the Lord is my trust, I care not what man can do unto me, Amen. My dearly beloved, say you Amen also, and come after if God so call you. Be not ashamed of the gospel of Christ, but keep company with him still. Use hearty prayer, reverently read and hear God's word, put it in practice: look for the cross, lift up your hands, for your redemption draweth nigh; know that the death of God's saints is precious in his sight. Be merry in the Lord, pray for mitigation of his heavy displeasure upon our country. God keep us for ever, God bless us with his spiritual blessings in Christ. And thus I bid you farewell for ever in this present life. Pray for me, for God's sake, pray for me. God make perfect his good work begun in me.

Out of prison the 7th of February.

JOHN BRADFORD.

In the story of Mr. Bradford there was mention made of a gentlewoman, who being troubled by her father and mother, for not coming to mass, sent her servant to visit Mr. Bradford in prison; who tendering the woeful case of the gentlewoman, to the intent partly to confirm her with counsel, and partly to relieve her oppressed mind with some comfort, directed unto her the following letter.

LETTER XXXVI.

To a certain GENTLEWOMAN, troubled and afflicted by her PARENTS for not coming to MASS.

I With you, right worshipful and dearly beloved sister in the Lord, as to myself, the continual grace and comfort of Christ, and of his holy word, through the operation of the Holy Spirit; that you may continue to the end in the faithful obedience of God's gospel, whereto you are called, Amen.

I understand you are on your trial in the school-house of the Lord, which to me is a great comfort to see the number of God's elect by you increased, who are in that state whereof God hath not called many, as St. Paul saith. May God of his infinite goodness finish and perfect the good he hath begun in you.

If then your cross be to me a comfort, a token of election, and a confirmation of God's continual favour, how much more ought it to be so unto you? unto whom he hath not only given to believe, but also to come into the rank of those who suffer for his name's sake, and that not by common enemies, but even by your own parents and kindred, as you told me. By which I see Christ's words to be true, That he came to give his children such a peace with him, as the devil cannot abide, and therefore he stirreth up father and mother, sister and brother, rather than it should continue. But my dear sister, if you cry with David to the Lord, and complain to him, that for conscience to him, your father and mother have forsaken you, you shall hear him speak in your heart, that he hath received you, and by this he would have you see, that he maketh you like unto Christ, that in heaven you may perfectly enjoy him. You ought to be most assured, that in time, when he shall appear, you shall be like unto him; for he shall make your vile body like unto his glorious and immortal body, according to the power wherewith he is able to do all things. He will confess you before his Father; he will make you to reign with him, who now suffereth for him, and with him; he will not leave you comfortless, who shall no comfort but at his hand; though for a little time you be afflicted, yet therein will he comfort and strengthen you, and lengthen make you to be merry with him in such joy as is infinite and endless. He will wipe all the tears from your eyes; he will embrace you as your dear husband; he will, after he hath promised you, crown you with a crown of glory and immortality, such that the heart of man shall never be able to conceive in such sort the thing is. He now beholdeth your steadfastness, and striveth to do his good will; and shortly he will shew you how steadfast he is, and will be ready to do your will, after you have fully resigned it to his.

Pledge him in his cup of the cross, and you shall pledge him in the cup of his glory. Desire to drink it before it be coarsened with the dregs, whereof the wicked shall drink, and all those that fall away from the cross and pledging the Lord, do walk with the wicked, in betraying in fact and deed that which their heart embraceth for truth. Which thing if you should do, (which God forbid) then you will not only lose for ever all that I have before spoken, and much more infinitely of eternal joy and glory, but also be cast away, and partaker of God's most heavy displeasure for ever, and so for a little ease, which you cannot tell how long it will last, lose for ever all ease and comfort. For, "He that gathereth not with me, saith Christ, scattereth abroad." According to that we do in this body, we shall be judged to condemnation or salvation, much more then our acts and deeds. You cannot be a member of Christ's church, and a member of the pope's church. You must glorify God not only in soul and heart, but in body and deed. God esteemeth his children not only of their hearts, but of their pure hands and works, and therefore in Elias's time he accounted none to be his servants and people, but such as had not bowed their knees to Baal; as now he doth not account any other to be his servants, which know the truth in heart, and deny it in their deeds, as do our mass-gossellers.

We ought to desire above all things the sanctifying of God's holy name, and the coming of his kingdom; and shall we then see his name blasphemed so horribly as it is at mass, by making it a sacrifice propitiatory, and setting forth a false Christ made by priests and bakers to be worshipped as God, and say nothing of the Jews rent their clothes asunder in seeing or hearing any thing blasphemously done or spoke against God, and shall we yet come to church where mass is, and be mute? Paul and Barnabas rent their clothes to see the people of Lycaonia come to offer sacrifice unto them, and shall we see sacrifice and God's service done unto an inanimate creature, and be silent? What thing helpeth more, or so much, Antichrist's kingdom as the mass doth? And what destroyeth preaching and the kingdom of Christ upon earth more than it doth? And how can we then say, "Let thy kingdom come," and go to mass? How can we pray before God, "Thy will be done on earth," when we will do our own will, and the will of our father or friends? How pray we, "Deliver us from evil," which knowing the mass to be evil, do come to it?

But what need I go about to light a candle in the noon-day, that is, to tell you that we may not go to mass, or to the congregation where it is, except it be to reprove it, in that all men in so doing do but dissemble both with God and man? And is dissembling now to be allowed? "How long will men yet halt on both knees?" saith God. "Halting, saith Paul, bringeth out of the way," that is to say, out of Christ, who is the way: so that he which is not in him, shall wither away, and be cast into hell-fire. For Christ will be ashamed of them before his Father, who are now ashamed of his truth before this wicked generation.

Therefore, my good mistress, take good heed, for it had been better for you not to have known the truth, and thereby to have escaped from papistical uncleanness, than now to return to it, making your members, being members of righteousness, members of unrighteousness, as you do if you do but go to the church where mass is. Be pure therefore, and keep yourself from all filth of the spirit, and of the spirit, and of the flesh. Abstain not only from all evil, but from all appearance of evil.

And so the God of peace shall be with you, and the glory of God shall govern you, the spirit of God shall sanctify you, and be with you for ever, to keep you from all evil, and to comfort you in all distress and trouble; which is but short if you consider the eternity you shall enjoy in glory and felicity in the Lord, which undoubtedly you will not fail to inherit for ever, if you put your trust in God's mercy, call upon his name unfeignedly, and consent not with the wicked world, but remain steadfast unto the end. God for his holy name's sake, who is properly the God of the widows, be your good and dear Father for ever, and help you always, Amen, Amen.

JOHN BRADFORD.
LET.

LETTER XXXVII.

Mr. BRADFORD to a PERSON by whom he received COMFORT and RELIEF in his IMPRISONMENT.

THE mercy of God in Christ, peculiar to his children, be felt by you, my dearly beloved in the Lord, Amen. When I consider with myself the benefits which God hath sent unto me by your means, if I had so good and thankful as I wish I had, I could not with dry eyes give him thanks; for certainly they are very many and great. And now yet still the Lord's prisoner, I receive from him more benefit by you. For I think myself so much bound to you, my brother, (although you were but the instrument by whom I was wrought and blessed me) that I look not to come out of your debt by any pleasure or service that I shall ever be able to do in this life. I shall heartily pray unto God therefore to reward you the good you have done to me for his sake: for I thank him that which you have done, you have done it simply in respect of God and his word. May he therefore give you grace to be more and more confirmed in his truth and word, and so fully pour upon you the riches of his Holy Spirit and heavenly treasures laid up in store for you, that your corporal and earthly riches may be used by you as sacraments, and significations thereof, the more to desire the one, that is, the heavenly, the less to esteem the other, that is, the earthly. For Satisfaction is, so to set before you the earthly, that thereby you should not have access to the consideration of the heavenly, but as one bewitched should utterly forget them, together become a lover of mammon, and so to fall to covetousness and a desire to be rich, by that means to bring you many noisome and hurtful lusts: as now-a-days I hear of many who have utterly forsaken God and all his heavenly riches, for the pleasure of the flesh, and the preserving of their worldly goods which they imagine to leave to their posterity, whereof they are uncertain, as they be most certain they leave to them wrath and vengeance, if they in time heartily repent not, it will be no event not the same by earnest prayer. Wherein, my good brother, if you be diligent, hearty, and persevere, I am sure God will preserve you from evil, and from yielding yourself to do as the world now doth, by allowing in bodily fact in the Romish Church, that which the inward cogitation and mind doth deny. But if you be cold in prayer, and come into contention of earthly and present things simply, then shall you be subject to faithless follies and wounding of your conscience; which God evermore preserve you, with your good brother and your babe Leonard, and all your family, to which I send the blessings of God now and for ever, through Christ our Lord, Amen.

May I give thanks for me to your old bedfellow, for his friendship for your sake, shewn to me when I was in the prison.

JOHN BRADFORD.

LETTER XXXVIII.

Mr. BRADFORD, to a faithful FRIEND and his WIFE, resolving their DOUBT, why they ought not to make an AURICULAR CONFESSION.

THE merciful God, and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who loveth us as a most dear Father, keep you, my dear brother Nathaniel, and your good yoke-fellow, my heartily beloved in the Lord, in all things now and for ever, to his glory and your eternal comfort: and also of his goodness may he give you both the feeling of that hope, which undoubtedly is laid up in store for you both, infinitely surpassing all the provision that this world is able to make for you; but which he hath intended to increase it more and more, and kindle in you a longing for the enjoyment of the same; which when it shall be so animate and enlivened, that the means whereby we come to this blessed end, will not appear dreadful: but of this feeling, or else the things of this present world shall dazzle their eyes and attract their affections, that they shall be unable to part with them. Auricular confession, wherein you desire my advice for your soul and family, my dear brother, I am as ready to give it as to desire it; yea more ready, for I had half a suspicion that you and your wife (especially your wife) were tired of the law, as if I had given you too much; whereas indeed I lament my too little care in feeding you spiritually, and have spared no pains, both in prison and out of prison, to give you auricular confession, as it was first used and instituted, (which way of asking counsel) I take to be amongst those traditions which are in themselves indifferent, that is, it may be left undone, unless it giveth offence to the brethren, and then it ought to be avoided, for we learn that things may be lawful that are not at all times so. But to consider it, as it is now used, (I write to you, and what my own mind is; which follow no further than good men by God's word do allow) to consider it, I think now used, methinks it is plainly unlawful and wicked for these causes.

First, Because they make it a service of God, and a thing which pleaseth God of itself, not to say meritorious; my brother, the bearer, can tell you at large how great an evil this is. Secondly, Because they make it of necessity, so that he or she that useth it not, is not taken for a good Christian.

Thirdly, Because it requireth of itself an impossibility, that is, the numbering and telling of all our sins, which no man can conceive, much less utter.

Fourthly, Because it establisheth and confirmeth, at least alloweth, praying to saints. Præcor Sanctam Mariam, you must say, or the priest for you.

Fifthly, Because it is very injurious to the liberty of the gospel, which to affirm in example and fact, I take to be a good work, and dear in the sight of God.

Sixthly, Because (as it is used) it is a note, yea, a very sinew of the popish church; and therefore we should be so far from allowing the same, that we should think ourselves happy to lose any thing in bearing witness against it.

Seventhly, Because instead of counsel, thereat ye shall receive poison, or if you refuse it under Sir John's Benedicite, you shall no less there be wound in the briars.

Eighthly, Because the end and purpose of your going thither is to avoid the cross, that is, for our own cause, and not for Christ's cause or the edification of our brethren. For in that they make it so necessary a thing, and a worshipping of God, it cannot but be against Christ and the freedom of his gospel: and the same thing teacheth us, that it is disadvantageous to our brethren, who either be weak, or strong, or ignorant, or obstinate. If they be weak, by your resorting to it, they be made more weak: if they be strong, you do what you can to decrease their strength: if they be ignorant, thereby you help to keep them so: if they be obstinate, your resorting to it cannot but rock them to sleep in their obstinate error of the necessity of this rite and ceremony. These causes recited do shew you what I think in this: but my thinking must no farther bind you than a man's thought should do, except the same be grounded on God's word which bindeth indeed, as I think they do. I doubt not but you weighing these causes, and especially two of the first and the last, if you pray to God for his Spirit to direct you, and likewise ask the advice of this my good brother, and other godly learned men, I doubt not, I say, but you will be guided to that which is best in God's sight, although in the sight of the world perhaps you should be counted foolish and precise. But be at a point with yourselves, as the disciples of Christ, (who had forsaken themselves) to follow not your own will, but God's will, as you daily pray in the Lord's prayer.

The cross of Christ be willing to carry, lest you carry the cross of the world, the flesh, or the devil. One of these four crosses you must carry. Three of them bring to hell, and therefore the greater part goeth that way. Only the fourth bringeth to heaven, and few walk in it because it is strait. However if it be strait, it is but short, and the few are many, if you consider the godly, as the patriarchs, prophets, apostles, martyrs, confessors, and Christ Jesus, with all his guard and train. Do not scorn to follow those who are gone before, and those that are now going, of which number I hope I am appointed to be one, and I beseech you pray for me, that God would make me worthy of that honour. Our sins deserve plagues, prison, and the loss of all that ever we have: therefore if God remove our sins out of sight, and send us prison, and loss of goods and living for his name's sake, O how happy are we! Consider this, and be assured, that he who loseth any thing for him, shall find it in his posterity, both here and in heaven. As for your unability to answer for your faith; it shall be enough for them to dispute with your teachers. Faith standeth not in disputing. I think few, if it came to disputing, could defend the Godhead of Christ, and many other articles; I speak it for the simple sort. Pray for me. Lack of paper maketh this end. Commend me to my good brother R. B. and my good sister his wife. I pray them to pray for me. I trust by this bearer to hear how you do.

JOHN BRADFORD.

LETTER XXXIX.

From Mr. BRADFORD to Mr. AUGUSTINE BARNEHER.

MINE own good Augustine, the Lord of mercy blest thee; my dear brother, for ever. I have good hope, that if you come late at night, I shall speak with you, but come as secretly as you can: howbeit, in the mean season, if you can, and as you can, learn what Mr. G. hath spoke to Dr. Story, and others. The cause of all this trouble both to my keeper and me, is thought to come by him. It is said that I shall be burned in Smithfield, and that shortly. The Lord's will be done. Behold here I am, Lord, send me. Ah my sweet friend, I am now alone, lest I should make you and others worse. If I should live, I would more warily use the company of God's children, than ever I have done. I will bear the Lord's anger, because I have sinned against him. Commend me to my most dear sister, for whom my heart bleedeth; the Lord comfort her, and strengthen her unto the end. I think I have taken my leave of her for ever in this life, but in eternal life we shall most surely meet, and praise the Lord

Lord continually. I have now taken a more certain answer of death than ever I did; and yet not so certain as I think I should do. I am now as a sheep appointed to the slaughter. Ah my God, the hour is come, glorify thy most unworthy child. I have glorified thee, faith this my sweet Father, and I will glorify thee, Amen. Ah mine own bowels, praise God for me, and pray for me, for I am his hope: I hope he will never forsake me, though I have above all others most deserved it. I am the most singular example of his mercy, praised be his name for ever. Cause Mrs. Perpoint to learn of the sheriff Mr. Chester, what they purpose to do with me; and know if you can whether there be any writ forth for me. I am like to an owl in the house, and as a sparrow alone in the house-top. Ah my Augustine, how long shall God's enemies thus triumph? I have sent you this of the baptism of children to write out; when this is done, you shall have other things. Pray, pray, my own dear heart, on whom I am bold. The keeper telleth me that it is death for any to speak with me, but yet I trust I shall speak with you.

JOHN BRADFORD.

To these letters of Mr. Bradford, here is also adjoined another; written to some of his faithful friends, worthy to be read by all christians; wherein is described a lively comparison between the old man and the new; also between the law and the gospel.

LETTER XL.

From Mr. BRADFORD, describing a Comparison between the OLD MAN and the NEW, &c.

A Man that is regenerate and born of God, (which that every one of us be, our baptism, the sacrament of regeneration, doth require under pain of damnation, and therefore let every one of us say with the virgin Mary, "Be it unto me; O Lord, according to thy word," according to the sacrament of baptism, wherein thou hast declared our adoption; and let us lament the doubting hereof in us, striving against it as we shall be made able by the Lord) a man, I say, that is regenerate, consisteth of two men, (as one may say) namely of the old man and of the new man. The old man is like to a mighty giant, such a one as was Goliath, for his birth is now perfect. But the new man is like to a little child, such a one as was David, for his birth is not perfect until the day of the general resurrection.

The old man therefore is more strong, lusty, and stirring than the new man, because the birth of the new man is now begun, and the old man is perfectly born. And as the old man is more active, lusty, and strong, than the new man; so is the nature of him clean contrary to the nature of the new man, as being earthly and corrupted with the seed of Satan; the nature of the new man being heavenly, and blessed with the celestial seed of God. So that inasmuch as the old man is corrupt with the seed of the serpent, so is the new man blessed with the seed of God from above. And as the old man is a sinner, and an enemy to God, so, inasmuch as he is regenerate, he is righteous and holy, and a friend to God, the seed of God preserving him from sin, so that he cannot sin, as the seed of the serpent, wherewith he is corrupt even from his conception, inclineth him, yea enforceth him to sin, and nothing else but to sin: so that the best part in man before regeneration, in God's sight, is not only an enemy, but even enmity itself.

A man therefore that is regenerate may well be called always just, and always sinful; just, in respect of God's seed, and his regeneration; sinful, in respect of Satan's seed and his first birth. Betwixt these two men there is a continual conflict and a deadly war. The flesh and old man, by reason of his birth being perfect, doth often for a time prevail against the new man, (being but a child in comparison) and that in such a manner, that even the children of God themselves think that they be nothing else but old, and that the Spirit and seed of God is lost and gone away; when yet notwithstanding the truth is otherwise, the Spirit and the seed of God at length appearing again, and dispelling the clouds which cover the sun; so that sometimes a man cannot tell by any sense, that there is any sun, the clouds and wind do so hide it from our sight: even so our blindness and corrupt affections do often shadow the sight of God's seed in his children, as though they were downright reprobates. Whereof it cometh that they praying according to their sense, but not according to the truth, desire of God to give them again his Spirit, as though they had lost it, and he had taken it away. Which thing God never doth indeed, although he maketh us to think so for a time; for he always holdeth his hand under his children in their falls, that they lie not still as others do which are not regenerate. And this is the difference betwixt God's children which are regenerate and elect before all times in Christ, and the wicked always; that the elect lie not still continually in their sin, as the wicked do, but do at length return again by reason of God's seed, which is hid in them as a spark of fire in the ashes, as we may see in Peter, David, Paul, Mary Magdalen, and others. For these (I mean God's children) God hath made all things in Christ Jesus, to whom he hath given his dignity, that they should be his inheritance and spouses.

This our inheritor Christ Jesus, God with God, Light with Light, co-eternal and co-substantial with the Father, and the Holy Ghost, to the end that he might become our husband (because the husband and the wife must be one body and one flesh) hath taken our nature upon him, communicating with it by it in his own person, to us all his children, his divine majesty (as St. Peter saith) and so is become flesh of our flesh, and bone of our bones substantially; as we are become flesh, and bone of his bones spiritually, all that ever we have communicated unto him, yea even our sins; as all that ever he hath communicated unto us, even his whole glory. So that if Satan should tempt us to answer for our debts or sins, in that the wife is a sueable person, but the husband, we may well bid him enter action against our husband Christ, and he will make him a sufficient answer.

For this end, (I mean that we might be coupled and married thus to Christ, and so be certain of salvation, and at peace with God in our consciences) God hath given his holy word, which hath two parts, (as now the children of God do consist of two men) one part of God's word being proper to the old man, and the other part to the new man. The part properly pertaining to the old man, is the law; the part properly pertaining to the new man, is the gospel.

The law is a doctrine which commandeth and forbiddeth, requiring doing and avoiding. Under it therefore are contained all precepts, threatenings, and promises, upon condition of doing and avoiding, &c. The gospel is a doctrine which ways offereth and giveth, requiring faith on our behalf, not of worthiness, or as a cause, but as a certificate unto us, therefore under it are contained all the free and sweet promises of God; as, "I am the Lord thy God," &c.

In those that be of years of discretion, it requireth faith, not as a cause, but as an instrument; whereby we ourselves may be certain of our good husband Christ, and of his glory, therefore when conscience feelth itself disquieted for fear of God's judgment against sin, she may in no wise look upon the doctrine pertaining to the old man, but on the doctrine only pertaining to the new man, in not looking for that which it requireth, that is, faith, because we never believe as we should, only on it which it offereth, and which it giveth, that is, God's grace and eternal mercy and peace in Christ. So she be on quiet, when she looketh for it, altogether out of herself, in God's mercy in Christ Jesus: in whose lap if she will, with St. John, then is she happy, and shall find quietness in Christ. When she feelth herself quiet, let her look on the law, and on such things as it requireth, thereby to bridle and bring down the old Adam, to slay that Goliath; from whom she must needs keep the sweet promises, being the bed where her spouse and she meet and lie together. For as the wife keep her bed only for her husband, although in other things she is contented to have fellowship with others, as to sit, eat, drink, go, &c. so our consciences which are our wives, must needs keep the bed, that is, God's sweet promises only for ourselves and our husband, there to meet together, to embrace, and be joyful together. If sin, the devil, or any thing would creep into the bed and lie there, then complain to thy husband Christ, and forthwith thou shalt see him play Phineas's part. Thus, my dearly beloved, given you in a few words a sum of all the divinity which a christian conscience cannot want.

LETTER XLI.

Mr. BRADFORD's FAREWELL to his MOTHER when he thought he should have suffered shortly after.

THE Lord of life, and Saviour of the world, Jesus Christ, bless you and comfort you, my good and dear mother, with his heavenly comfort, consolation, grace, and spirit, now and for ever, Amen.

If I thought that daily, yea almost hourly you did pray upon God the Father through Jesus Christ, that he would give me his blessing, even the blessing of his children, then I would write more about it. But forasmuch as I am certain you are gentle herein, so I beseech you, good mother, to continue to think it good to write something, whereby this your crying may be furthered. Furthered it will be, if those things which hinder it be taken away. Among which, in that I think imprisonment is the greatest and chiefest, I will spend this time about it, and that briefly, lest it might increase the burden as my good brother, this messenger, can tell you. You know therefore, good mother, that for my body, though I am in an house, out of which I cannot come when I will, yet I have conformed my will to God's, I find here enough, I thank God. And for my lodging, bedding, food, drink, pious and learned company, books, and all necessities for mine ease, comfort, and convenience, I am in a better case than I could wish, and God's merciful providence here is far above my worthiness. Worthiness, said I, am worthy of nothing but damnation.

But besides all this, for my soul I find much more need of grace. For God is my Father, I now perceive, through before for imprisoning me for his gospel, he maketh me like the image of his Son Jesus Christ here, that when he cometh in judgment, I might then be like unto him, as my trust and hope is I shall be. Now he maketh me like to his friends the apostles, apostles, the holy martyrs, and confessors. Which of them did not suffer at the least imprisonment or banishment for his gospel and word?

Now, mother, how far am I unworthy to be compared to you? I (I say) which always have been, and am so vile an accursed and grievous sinner. God might have caused me before this time to have been cast into prison as a thief, a phemer, an unclean liver, and an heinous offender of the realm; but dear mother, his mercy is so great upon me and all that love me, that I should be cast into prison for one of these or for any such vices, but only for Christ's sake, for his gospel's sake, for his church's sake, that thereby as I might learn to lament and bewail my ingratitude and sins, I might rejoice in his mercy, be thankful, look for eternal life with Christ, for whose sake, praised be his name for it, I suffer, and therefore should be merry and glad. And I thank you, good mother, so I am, as ever I was, yea never so merry and glad was I, as now I should be, if I could get you to be merry with me, to thank God for me, and to pray on this behalf for me. Ah good Father, who dost vouchsafe that my son, a grievous sinner in thy sight, should find this favour with thee, to be one of thy Son's captains and men of war to fight for his gospel's sake, I thank thee, and pray thee, in Christ's name, that thou wouldst forgive him his sins and unthankfulness, and make perfect in him that good which thou hast begun: yea, Lord, I pray thee make him worthy to suffer for only imprisonment, but even death itself, for thy truth, for his gospel's sake. As Anna did apply and give Christ unto thee, so I, dear Father, beseech thee for Christ's sake, to accept this my gift, and give my son John Bradford, grace always truly to serve thee and thy people, as Anna did, Amen, Amen."

Good mother, mark what I have written, and learn this prayer by heart, use it sincerely every day, and then I shall be mercifully shall rejoice if you continue, as I trust you do, in God's religion, even the same I have taught you, and my father hopes I hope will put you in remembrance of: my brother Roger, I doubt not, daily doth so. Go on therefore, and learn well. Although the devil casteth divers snares in the way, and, in whom you trust, will cast them away for his Christ's sake, if you will call upon him; and never will he suffer you to be tempted farther than he will enable you to bear. But you should do herein, the other letter which I have written herewith, shall teach you, which I would have no-body read but my father Traves hath read it, and he will give you, by his grace, some instructions.

Now therefore will I make an end, desiring you to expect no more letters: for if it were known that I had pen and ink, then I would want all other conveniences I have mentioned concerning my body, and be cast into some dungeon in fetters of iron: which thing I know would grieve you, and therefore for God's sake, see that these be burned, when this little prayer in it is read by my brother Roger: it may be your house may be searched for such things, when you little think of it: and look to me, sweet mother, till either God shall deliver me, and send me out, or till you and I meet together in heaven, where we shall never part asunder, Amen.

I require you Elizabeth and Margaret my sisters, that you love God, use prayer, love your husbands, be obedient unto them, as God requireth you: bring up your children in God's fear, and be good housewives. God bless you both, with both your husbands, my good brethren, to whom to do good, because I cannot, I will pray for them and you. Commend me to my sister Anne, mother Pike, Thomas Sorrocol and his wife, R. Shaleroofs and his wife, R. Bolton, J. Wild, Mr. Earl, the parson Mottrom, Sr Laurence Hall, with all that I know, and I hope live in the gospel; and God turn Sir Thomas's heart. Amen. I will daily pray for him. I need not set my pen, you know it well enough.

Because you should give my letters to my father Traves to be read, have I written here a prayer for you to learn to pray for me, and another for all your house in your evening prayer, to pray with my brother. These prayers are written with mine own hand: keep them still, but the letters give to father Traves to burn, and give him a copy of the latter prayer.

LETTER XLII.

Mr. BRADFORD to his MOTHER, being his last Farewell, a little before he was BURNED.

GOD's mercy and peace in Christ, be more and more perceived of us, Amen.

My most dear mother, in the bowels of Christ I heartily pray I beseech you to be thankful for me unto God, who now hath me unto himself: I die not as a criminal, but as a witness of Christ, the truth of whose gospel I have hitherto confessed, I thank God, both by preaching and imprisonment, and I am willing to confirm the same by fire. I acknowledge.

I ledge that God might justly have taken me hence for my sins, (which are many, great, and grievous: but the Lord for his mercy in Christ, I hope hath pardoned them all) but now, my dear mother, he taketh me hence by this death, as a confessor and witness, that the religion taught by Christ Jesus, the prophets and the apostles, is God's truth. The prelates in me do persecute Christ, whom they hate, and his truth which they will not abide, because their works are evil. They do not care for the light, lest men thereby should discover their darkness. Therefore, my dear mother, give thanks to God for me, that he hath made the fruits of thy womb to be a witness of his glory, and attend to the truth, which I have truly taught out of the pulpit of Manchester. Use often and continual prayer to God the Father, through Jesus Christ. Harken to the scriptures, and serve God according to them, and not according to the custom: beware of the Romish religion in England; defile not yourself with it: carry the cross of Christ as he shall lay it upon your back: forgive them that kill me: pray for them, for they know not what they do: commit my cause to God our Father: be mindful of both your daughters, and help them as well as you can.

I send all my writings to you and my brother Roger, do with them as you will, because I cannot as I would, he can tell you more of my mind. I have nothing to give you, or to leave behind me for you; only I pray God my Father, for Christ's sake, to bless you, and keep you from evil. May he make you patient, and thankful that he will take the fruit of your womb to witness his truth; wherein I confess to the whole world, I die, and depart this life, in hope of a much better: which I look for at the hands of God my Father, through the merits of his dear Son Jesus Christ.

Thus, my dear mother, I take my last farewell of you in this life, beseeching the Almighty and eternal Father by Christ, to grant us to meet in the life to come, where we shall give him continual thanks and praise for ever and ever, Amen.

Out of prison, June 24, 1555. Your son in the Lord,

JOHN BRADFORD.

LETTER XLIII.

Containing a SUPPLICATION sent by Mr. BRADFORD to QUEEN MARY, her COUNCIL, and the whole PARLIAMENT.

IN most humble wise complaineth unto your majesty and honours, a poor subject, persecuted for the confession of Christ's verity; which deserveth your protection and encouragement, as the thing by which you reign and have your honour and authority. Although we that be professors, through the grace of God, the constant professors of the same, are, as it were, the out-sweepings of the world; yet, I say, the truth itself is not a thing unworthy for your ears to hear, for your eyes to see, and for your hands to handle, help, and succour, as the Lord hath made you able, and placed you where you are for the same purpose. Your highness and honours ought to know, that there is no innocency in words or deeds, where it is enough and sufficient only to accuse. It behoveth kings, queens, and all that be in authority, to know, that in the administration of their kingdoms they are God's ministers. It behoveth them to know, that they are not kings, but plain tyrants, who reign not to this end, that they may serve and set forth God's glory after true knowledge: and therefore it is required of them that they would be wise, and suffer themselves to kiss their Sovereign lest they perish; as all these potentates, with their principalities and dominions, cannot long prosper, but perish indeed, if they and their kingdoms be not ruled with the sceptre of God, that is, with his word; which whoso honoureth not, honoureth not God, and they that honour not the Lord, the Lord will not honour them, but bring them into contempt, and at length take his own cause, which he hath chiefly committed to them to care for, into his own hands, and so overthrow them, and set up his own truth gloriously; the people also perishing with the princes, where the word of prophecy is wanting, much more is suppressed, as it is now in this realm of England, over which the eyes of the Lord are set to destroy it, your highness, and all your honours, if in time you look not better to your office and duties herein, and not suffer yourselves to be slaves and hangmen to Antichrist and his prelates, who have already brought your highness and honours in the mind to let Barabbas loose, and so hang up Christ: as by the grace and help of God I shall make apparent, if first it would please your excellent majesty, and all your honours, to take to heart God's doctrine, which rather through the malice of the pharisees, I mean the bishops and prelates, than your consciences, is oppressed: and not for our contemptible and execrable state in the world to pass the less of it. For this doctrine is higher, and of more honour and majesty than all the whole world. It standeth invincible above all power, being not our doctrine, but the doctrine of the ever-living God, and of his Christ, whom the Father hath ordained King, to have dominion from sea to sea, and from the river unto the end of the world. And truly so he doth and will reign, that he will shake all the earth with his iron and brazen power, with his golden and silver brightness, only by the rod of his mouth, to shivers, in such a manner as though they were pots of clay, according to what the prophets write of the magnificence of his kingdom. And thus much for the doctrine, and your duties to hearken, to propagate, and defend the same.

But now will our adversaries mainly cry out against us, because no man may be admitted once to speak against them, that we pretend falsely the doctrine and word of God, calling us the most wicked contemners of it, and heretics, schismatics, traitors, &c. All which their sayings, how malicious and false they are, though I might refer to that which is written by those men whose works they have condemned, and all that retain any of them, publicly by proclamation; yet here will I occasion your majesty and honours by this my writing, to see that it is far otherwise than they report of us. God our Father, for his holy name's sake, direct my pen to be his instrument to put into your eyes, ears and hearts, that which most may make to his glory, in the safe-guard of your souls and bodies, and preservation of the whole realm, Amen.

JOHN BRADFORD.

LETTER XLIV.

From Mr. BRADFORD to certain of his FRIENDS,
N. S. and R. C.

I Wish to you, my good brethren, the same grace of God in Christ, which I pray the Father of mercies to give me for his holy name's sake, Amen.

Your letter, though I have not read myself, because I would not alienate my mind from conceived things, to write to others, yet I have heard the sum of it, that it is of God's election; wherein I will briefly write to you my faith, and how I think it good and meet for a christian man to wade in it.

I believe, that man, made after the image of God, did fall from that blessed state to the condemnation of himself, and all his posterity. I believe that Christ (for man being thus fallen) did oppose himself to the justice of God, a mediator, paying the ransom and price of redemption for Adam and his whole posterity that refuse it not finally. I believe, that all who believe in Christ, (I speak of such as be of years of discretion) are partakers of Christ and all his merits. I believe that faith, and to believe in Christ (I speak not now of faith that men have by reason of miracles, John ii. 11. Acts viii. or by reason of earthly conveniencies, Matth. xiii. custom and authority of men, which is commonly seen, the hearts of them that so believe, being not right and simple before God: but I speak of that faith which indeed is the true faith, the justifying and regenerating faith) I believe, I say, that this faith and belief in Christ, is the work and gift of God, given to none but those who are the children of God, that is, to those whom God the Father before the beginning of the world hath predestinated in Christ to eternal life.

Thus do I wade in predestination, in such a manner as he hath opened it. Though in God it be the first, yet to us it is the last opened. And therefore I begin with creation, from whence I come to redemption, so on to justification, and then to election. On this manner I am sure, that warily and wisely a man may walk in it easily by the light of God's Spirit, in and by his word, seeing this faith not to be given to all men, 2 Thess. iii. but to such as are born of God, predestinate before the world was made, after the purpose and good will of God, which will we must not call in question, but in fear and trembling submit ourselves to it, as to that which can will nothing otherwise than what is holy, just, and good, how far soever it may seem otherwise to our reason, which must needs be beaten down to be more careful for God's glory, than for man's salvation, which dependeth only thereon, as all God's children full well see: for they seek not the glory which cometh of men, but the glory which cometh of God, Jer. ix. John v. They know God to be a God which doth on earth, not only mercy, but also judgment, which is his justice, and most just, although our foolish reason cannot see it. And in this knowledge they glory and rejoice, though others, through vain curiosity, grudge and murmur against it. Thus briefly I have sent you my mind and meaning concerning this matter. Hereafter you shall have (I think) your letter particularly answered by Mr. Philpot; as also, if I have time, and you so require it, I will do.

JOHN BRADFORD.

NOTES upon the foregoing EPISTLE.

AS touching the doctrine of election (whereof this letter of Mr. Bradford, and many other his letters do much treat) three things must be considered.

1. What God's election is, and what is the cause thereof.

2. How God's election proceedeth in working our salvation.

3. To whom God's election pertaineth, and how man may be certain thereof.

Between predestination and election there is this difference: predestination is as well to the reprobate as to the elect; election pertaineth only to them that be saved.

Predestination, in that it respecteth the reprobate, is called reprobation: in that it respecteth the saved, is called election, and is thus defined:

Predestination is the eternal decreement of God purposed before in himself, what shall befall all men either to salvation or damnation.

Election is the free mercy and grace of God in his own will, through faith in Christ his Son, choosing and preferring unto life such as pleaseth him.

In this definition of election, first go before the mercy and grace of God as the causes thereof, whereby are excluded all the works of the law, and merits of deserving, whether they go before faith, or come after. So was Jacob chosen, and Esau refused, before either of them began to work, &c.

Secondly, In that this mercy and grace of God in this definition is said to be free, thereby is to be noted the proceeding and working of God not to be bound to any ordinary place, or to any succession of chair, nor to state or dignity of person, nor to worthiness of blood, &c. but all goeth by the mere will of his own purpose. And thus was the outward race and stock of Abraham after the flesh refused, (which seemed to have the pre-eminence) and another seed after the spirit raised up in Abraham of the stones, that is, of the Gentiles. So was the outward temple of Jerusalem, and chair of Moses, which seemed to be of price, forsaken, and God's chair advanced in other nations. So was tall Saul refused, and little David accepted: the rich, the proud, the wise of this world rejected, and the word of salvation daily opened to the poor and miserable abjects, the high mountains cast under, and the low valleys exalted, &c.

Thirdly, Where it is added [in his own will,] by this falleth down the free will and purpose of man, with all his actions, counsels, and strength of nature; according to it is written, "It is not in him that willeth, nor in him that runneth, but in God that sheweth mercy." So we see how Israel ran long, and yet got nothing. The Gentiles began to set out later, and yet got the game. So they that came at the first hour did labour more, and yet they which came last were rewarded with the first. The working will of the Pharisee seemed better, but yet the Lord's will was rather to justify the publican. The elder son had a better will to tarry by his father, and yet he did indeed: and yet the fat calf was given to the younger son that ran away. Whereby we are to understand, how the matter goeth, not by the will of man, but by the will of God, as it pleaseth him to accept; according to it is written, "Which are born not of the will of the flesh, nor yet of the will of man, but of God." Furthermore, as all then goeth by the will of God only, and not by the will of man: so again here is to be noted, that this will of God never goeth without faith in Christ Jesus his Son.

And therefore, fourthly, is this clause added in the definition, through faith in Christ his Son. Which faith in Christ to us-ward maketh all together. For first it certifieth us of God's election; as this epistle of Mr. Bradford doth well express. For whosoever will be certain of election in God, let him first begin with his faith in Christ: which if he find in him to stand firm, he may be sure, and nothing doubt, but that he is one of the number of God's elect. Secondly, The said faith, as nothing else, is the only condition and means whereunto God's mercy, election, vocation, and all God's promises to salvation do stay, according to the words of St. Paul, "If ye abide in the faith," Coloss. i. Thirdly, The faith also is the immediate and next cause of our justification simply, without any other condition annexed. For as the mercy of God, his grace, election, vocation, and other precedent causes do save and justify us upon condition, if we believe in Christ: so this faith only in Christ, without condition, is the next and immediate cause use, which by God's promise worketh our justification; according as it is written, "Believe in the Lord Jesus, and thou shalt be saved, thou and thy whole house," Acts xvi. And thus much touching the declaration of election, with the causes thereof declared. Which you see now to be no merits nor works of man, whether they go before or come after faith, but only the mere mercy of God through faith. For like as all they that be born of Adam, do taste of his malediction, though they tasted not his apple: so all they that be born of Christ, which is by faith, take part of the obedience of Christ, although they never did that obedience themselves which was in him, Rom. v.

Now to the second consideration: Let us see likewise, how, and in what manner this election of God proceedeth in chusing and electing them which he ordaineth to salvation; which order is this. In them that are chosen to life, first God's mercy and free grace bringeth forth election; election worketh vocation, or God's holy calling; which vocation, through hearing, bringeth knowledge and faith of Christ. Faith through promise obtaineth justification, justification through hope waiteth for glorification.

Election is before time. Vocation and faith cometh after time. Justification and glorification is without end.

Election, depending upon God's free grace and will, excludeth all man's will, blind fortune, chance, and all peradventure.

Vocation, standing upon God's election, excludeth all man's wisdom, cunning, learning, intention, power, and presumption.

Faith in Christ, proceeding by the gift of the Holy Ghost, and freely justifying man by God's promise, excludeth all other merits of men, all condition of deserving, and all works of the law, both God's law and man's, with all other outward means whatsoever.

Justification cometh freely by faith, standeth sure by promise, without doubt, fear, or wavering in this life.

Glorification pertaining only to the life to come, by hope is looked for.

Grace and mercy preventeth.

Election ordaineth.

Vocation prepareth and receiveth the word, whereby cometh faith.

Faith justifieth.

Justification bringeth glory.

Election is the immediate and next cause of vocation.

Vocation (which is the working of God's Spirit by the word) is the immediate and next cause of faith.

Faith is the immediate and next cause of justification.

And this order and connection of causes is diligently to be observed, because of the papists, who have miserably confounded and inverted this doctrine, thus teaching that Almighty God, so far forth as he foreseeth man's merits before to come, so doth he dispense his election: That the Lord recompenseth the grace of election, not to any merits preceding; but yet granteth the same to the merits which follow: as though we had our election by our holiness that followeth after, and not rather have our holiness by God's election going before.

But we, following the scripture, say otherwise, that the only cause of God's election, is his own free mercy; and the only cause of our justification, is our faith in Christ, and nothing else. As for example; first concerning election, if the question be asked, Why was Abraham chosen, and not Nachor? Why was Jacob chosen, not Esau? Why was Moses elected, and Pharaoh hardened? Why was David accepted, and Saul refused? Why few be chosen, and the most forsaken? It cannot be answered otherwise but thus, Because it was so the good will of God.

In like manner touching vocation, and also faith, if the question be asked, Why this vocation and gift of faith was to Cornelius the Gentile, and not to Tertullus the Jew? Why to the poor, to the babes, and to the little ones of this world? (of whom Christ speaketh, "I thank thee, Father, who hast hid this from the wise," &c. Matth. xi.) Why to the unwise, the simple abjects and out-casts in this world? (of whom St. Paul speaketh, 1 Cor. i. "Ye see your calling, my brethren, how not many of you," &c.) Why to the sinners, and not to the just? Why were the beggars by the high-ways called, and the bidden guests excluded? We can go to no other cause; but to God's purpose and election, and say with Christ our Saviour, "Yea, Father, for so it seemeth good in thy sight," Luke x.

And so for justification likewise, if the question be asked, why the publican was justified, and not the pharisee? Luke xviii. Why Mary the sinner, and not Simon the inviter? Luke xi. Why harlots and publicans go before the scribes and pharisees into the kingdom? Matth. xxi. Why the son of the free woman was received, and the bond woman's son, being his elder, was rejected? Gen. xxi. Why Israel which so long sought for righteousness, found it not? and the Gentiles, which sought not for it, found it? Rom. ix. We have no other cause to render, but to say with St. Paul, Because they sought for it by works of the law, and not by faith: which faith, as it cometh not by man's will, (as the papists falsely pretend) but only by the election and free gift of God; so it is only the immediate cause whereunto the promise of our salvation is annexed, according as we read; "And therefore of faith is the inheritance given, as after grace, that the promise might stand sure to every seed," Rom. iv. Item, in the same chapter, "Faith, believing in him which justifieth the wicked, is imputed for righteousness."

And thus concerning the causes of our salvation, you see how faith in Christ, only and immediately, without any condition, doth justify us, being so linked with God's mercy and election, that wheresoever election goeth before, there faith in Christ must needs follow after. And again, whosoever believeth in Christ Jesus, through the vocation of God, he must needs be partaker of God's election.

Whereupon resulteth now the third note or consideration; which is, to consider whether a man in this life may be certain of his election. To answer to which question, this first is to be understood; that although our election and vocation simply indeed be known to God only in himself, a priore; yet notwithstanding it may be known to every particular faithful man, a posteriore; that is, by means, which means is faith in Christ Jesus crucified. Forasmuch as by faith in Christ a man is justified, and thereby made a child of salvation, reason must needs lead the same to be then the child of election, chosen of God unto everlasting life. For how can a man be saved, but by consequence it followeth, that he must also be elected?

And therefore of election it is truly said, We must judge of election by that which cometh after; that is, by our faith and belief in Christ: which faith, although in time it followeth after election, yet this is the proper and immediate cause assigned by the scripture, which not only justifieth us, but also certifieth us of this election of God.

Whereunto likewise well agreeth this present letter of Mr. Bradford; wherein he saith, Election, albeit in God it be the first, yet to us it is the last opened. And therefore beginning first (saith he) with creation, I come from thence to the redemption and justification by faith, and so to election. Not that faith is the cause efficient of election, but rather the effect thereof, but is to us the cause certificatory, or the cause of our certification, whereby we are brought to the feeling and knowledge of our election in Christ. For albeit that election first be certain in the knowledge of God; yet in our knowledge, faith only that we have in Christ, is the thing that giveth to us our certificate and comfort of this election.

Wherefore, whosoever desireth to be assured that he is one of the elect number of God, let him not climb up to heaven to know, but let him descend into himself, and there search his faith in Christ the Son of God; which if he find to be sincere and unfeigned, by the working of God's Holy Spirit accordingly; thereupon let him stay, and so wrap himself wholly, both body and soul, under God's general promise, and encumber his head with no other speculations; knowing this, "That whosoever believeth in him shall never perish," John iii.

Shall

Shall not be confounded, Rom. ix. Shall not see death, John viii. Shall not enter into judgment, John v. Shall have everlasting life, John iii. Shall be saved, Matth. xxviii. Acts xvi. Shall have remission of all his sins, Acts x. Shall be justified, Rom. iii. Gal. ii. Shall have floods flowing out of him of water of life, John vii. Shall never die, John xi. Shall be raised in the last day, John vi. Shall find rest to his soul, and shall be refreshed, Matth. xi.

Now then, forasmuch as we see faith to be the ground whereupon dependeth the whole condition of our justifying, let us discuss in like manner what is this faith whereof the scripture so much speaketh, for the more plain understanding of the simple. For many kinds there be of faith: as a man may believe every thing that is true, yet not every truth doth save, neither doth the believing of every truth justify a man. He that believeth that God created all things of nought, believeth truly. He that believeth that God is a just God, that he is omnipotent, that he is merciful, that he is true of promise, believeth well, and holdeth the truth. So he that believeth that God hath his election from the beginning, and that he also is one of the same elect and predestinate, hath a good belief, and thinketh well: but yet this belief alone, except it be seasoned with another thing, will not serve to salvation: as it availed not the old Jews, which so thought of themselves, and yet think to this day to be only God's elect people.

Only the faith which availeth to salvation is that, whose object is the body and passion of Jesus Christ crucified. So that in the act of justifying, these two, faith and Christ, have a mutual relation, and must always concur together; faith as the action which apprehendeth; Christ as the object which is apprehended.

For neither doth the passion of Christ save without faith, neither doth faith help, except it be in Christ: as we see the body of man sustained by bread and drink, not except the same be received and conveyed into the stomach: and yet neither doth the receiving of every thing sustain man's body, except it be meat and drink, which have power to give nourishment. In like sort it is with faith; for neither doth the believing of every thing save, but only faith in the blood of Christ: neither again doth the same blood of Christ profit us, except by faith it be received. And as the sun, being the cause of all light, shineth not but to them only which have eyes to see; nor yet to them neither, unless they will open their eyes to receive the light: so the passion is the efficient cause of salvation, but faith is the condition whereby the said passion is to us effectual.

And that is the cause why we say with the scripture, that faith only justifieth us, not excluding thereby all other external causes that go before faith, as grace, mercy, election, vocation, the death of Christ, &c. all which are external causes, working our salvation through faith. But when we say that faith only justifieth us, the meaning thereof is this; that of all internal actions, motions, or operations in man, given to him by God, there is none other that contenteth and pleaseth God, or standeth before his judgment, or can help any thing to the justifying of man before him, but only this one action of faith in Jesus Christ the Son of God.

For although the action of praying, fasting, alms, patience, charity, repentance, the fear and love of God, be high gifts in man; yet be none of all these actions in man imputed of God to salvation, but only this one action of faith in man upon Christ Jesus the Son of God. Not that the action itself of believing, as it is a quality in man, doth so deserve, but because it taketh the dignity of the object. For as I said, the act of justifying faith, as it is an action in man, is not to be considered alone, but must ever go with its object, and taketh its virtue thereof. Like as the looking up of the old Israelites did not of itself procure any health unto them, but the promise made in the object, which was the brazen serpent, whereupon they looked, gave them health by looking up: even after like sort are we saved by faith and spiritual looking up to the body of Christ crucified. Which faith to define in this.

To believe Jesus Christ to be the Son of the living God, sent into the world, by his death to satisfy for our sins, and so to receive the same.

And thus much touching election and faith; with the order and explication of the causes necessary to be considered in our salvation, whereby may appear how far the pretended catholics do swerve from the truth of the scriptures. For where the scriptures in declaring the causes of salvation, do send us only to faith, as the only condition whereby these causes have their working, these catholics do quite leave out faith, and instead thereof, place in other conditions of doings, merits, works, pardons, masses, and especially auricular confessions, with penance, satisfaction for our sins, &c.

Besides these letters of Mr. John Bradford above specified, there were other letters which he wrote to father Traves, minister of Blackley, long before he came into trouble, the substance of which being fully contained in his foregoing letters, and also because we would make room for matter more entertaining, we think proper to omit, as observed before. And now we proceed to the history of the martyrs.

C H A P. XI.

An ACCOUNT of the LIVES, EXAMINATIONS, SUFFERINGS, and DEATHS of various PIOUS PROTESTANTS, most of whom were BURNED, and some DIED in PRISON, during the BLOODY PERSECUTION in the REIGN of QUEEN MARY I. A. D. 1555.

A short ACCOUNT of WILLIAM MINGE, who died in PRISON.

THE next day after Mr. Bradford and John Leaf suffered in Smithfield, William Minge, priest, died in prison at Maidstone, being there in bonds for religion, and would (had he lived a little longer) also have suffered the fury of his adversaries, whose nature was to spare and favour none that favoured Christ's pure gospel. This William Minge, with as great constancy and boldness yielded up his life in prison, as if it had pleased God to have called him to suffer by fire, as other good and godly men had done before at the stake, as himself was ready to do, had it pleased God to have called him thereunto.

An ACCOUNT of JAMES TREVISAM, who was buried in MOORFIELDS.

UPON Sunday the 3d of July, 1555, died one James Trevisam, in the parish of St. Margaret, in Lothbury, who being impotent and lame, kept his bed a long time. This Trevisam had a servant named John Small, who was reading in the bible, when one Berd the promoter came to the house, and would needs go up stairs, where he found four persons besides him and his wife; to wit, the young man that read, and two men and a woman. All whom the said Berd apprehended and carried to the Compter, where they remained about a fortnight, notwithstanding all the friends they could make. Not only so, but the said Berd intended to carry the poor lame bedridden man to New-

in a cart, (and brought a cart to the door for that purpose) had not the neighbour, who had a little more humanity, prevented that barbarous design. Nevertheless, the poor man was obliged to have two sureties for his forth coming, notwithstanding he could not get out of his bed, being not only lame, but very sick at the time. In a few days time he grew so ill, that his life was despaired of; and the parson of the parish, Mr. Farthing, came to visit him, and had communication with him, and they both agreed very well in matters of religion, and so the parson departed. No sooner was he come down into the street, but he was met by one Toller, a founder, who threatened to accuse him, for agreeing with Trevissam; for, said the founder, he denieth the sacrament of the altar. Upon that the parson went to him again, and then they could not agree. And so the parson went to the bishop of London, and told him. The bishop answered, that he should be burnt: and if he were already dead, he should be buried in a ditch. And when he was dead, the parson showed as much spite and ill-nature to his poor sorrowful widow as possibly he could, not suffering her to put him in a coffin, or any thing else, but insisted on carrying him on a table to Moorfields, and there he was buried. The same night the body was taken up again, and the sheet taken from him, and he left naked above ground. The owner of the field seeing this, buried him again; a fortnight after, the sumner came to his grave, and summoned him to appear at St. Paul's before his ordinary, to answer to such things as should be said against him. But what became of this affair afterwards, I cannot certainly say.

HISTORY of Mr. JOHN BLAND, PREACHER and MARTYR.

THE 12th day of July, John Bland, John Frankesh, Nicholas Sheterden, and Humphry Middleton, were all four burnt at Canterbury together for one cause. Of which number, Frankesh and Bland were ministers and preachers of the word of God, the one being parson of Adesham, and the other vicar of Rolleston. Mr. Bland was a man so little born for his advantage, that no part of his life was separated from the common and public utility of all men. For his first doings were there employed to the bringing up of children in learning and virtue. Under whom were trained up several hopeful young men, which afterwards did handsomely flourish. In which number was Dr. Andrews, a man of singular learning and worthiness, as may well become a scholar for such a schoolmaster, whom I gladly here name for his singular gifts of virtue and erudition.

After this, he coming to the ministry in the church of God, or rather being called thereto, was inflamed with incredible desire to profit the congregation, which may appear by this, that whereas he was twice cast into Canterbury prison for preaching of the gospel, and delivered once or twice from thence at the intercession of his friends, yet he would preach the gospel again, as soon as he was delivered. Whereupon he being the third time apprehended, when his friends yet once again would have found means to have delivered him if he would promise to abstain from preaching; he stood in it earnestly, that he would admit no such condition, notably well expressing unto us the manner and example which we read in the apostle St. Paul; "Who shall separate us from the love of Christ? Tribulation, or anguish, or hunger, or nakedness, or persecution, or the sword?" &c. But to express the whole life and actions of this pious martyr, seeing we have his own testimony concerning the same, it is best to refer the reader to his own report, writing to his father the whole discourse of his troubles, from the beginning almost to the latter end, in order and manner as you shall hear.

ACCOUNT of the whole Proceedings against Mr. BLAND, written by himself to his FATHER.

DEARLY beloved father in Christ Jesus, I thank you for your gentle letters. And to satisfy your mind as concerning the troubles whereof you have heard, these shall both declare unto you all my vexations that have happened unto me since you were with me, and also since I received your last letters. God keep you ever.

Your son,

JOHN BLAND.

FIRST, The 3d of September, being Sunday, after service ended, ere I had put off my surplice, John Austen came to the table, (commonly called the Lord's table) and laid both his hands upon it, saying, Who set this here again? Now they say they took the table down the Sunday before, which I knew not, neither do I know who set it up again. The clerk answered that he knew not. Then said Austen, he is a knave, that set it here. I was then going down the church, wondering what he meant, and said, Goodman Austen, the queen's highness hath set forth a proclamation that you move no sedition: and before I could speak any more, he said, Thou art a knave: and I said, Well, goodman Austen, what I have said, I have said. By God's soul, said he, thou art a very knave. Then my clerk spoke to him, but what I am not sure. But he said, You are both heretic knaves, and have deceived us too long already, and if you say any service here again, I will turn your table upside down; and in that rage he, with others, took the table and laid it on a chest in the chancel, and set the tressels by it. Soon after I rode to Mr. Isaac, and declared unto him how seditiously Austen had behaved himself. Mr. Isaac directed a warrant to the constable, which was immediately served, so that he was brought before him the same night, and was bound by recognizance, with sureties, to appear if he were called. But then we agreed so well, that it was never called for: the table was brought down, and was permitted as before.

The 26th of November, being Sunday, Richard Austen and his brother Thomas came to the aforesaid table after the communion was done, and as I was going by them, Richard said unto me, Mr. Parson, we want to speak with you. And I said, What is your will? And he said, You know that you took down the tabernacle wherein the rood did hang, and such other things: we would know what recompence you would make us: for the queen's proceedings are (as you know) that such things must be put up again.

Said I, I know no such proceedings as yet; and as for what I did, I did it by commandment.

No, said Thomas Austen, you will not know the queen's proceedings.

Yes, said I, I refuse not to know them.

Then said Richard, You are against the queen's proceedings; for you say there are abominable uses and devilishness in the mass.

Goodman Austen, said I, if I so said, I will say it again, and God willing, stand to the proof of it.

Masters all, said Richard Austen, bear record of these words, and went his way.

Said Thomas Austen, Thou wilt as soon eat this book as stand to them.

No, said I, not so soon.

Tell us, said he, what devilishness is in the mass?

I have often preached it unto you, said I, and you have not believed it, nor borne it away, neither will you now, though I should tell you.

Thou (said he) hast told us always like an heretic as thou art. Now you lie, goodman Austen, said I, by your leave. Marry, said he, thou liest. And I said, And you lie, for I have taught you Christ and his truth.

Said he, Thou art an heretic, and hast taught us nothing but heresy: for thou canst say nothing that is true.

Yes, goodman Austen, I can say that God is in heaven, and you will say (I hope) that it is true, and so have I taught you truly.

Said he, thou hast taught us like an heretic, and hast said, that there is no devil in hell.

Well, said I, lie on; methinks you can say little truth.

truth. Many other taunts he gave, too long to write. And at last he said, You pulled down the altar, will you build it again? No, said I, except I be commanded; for I was commanded to do that I did.

Well, if you will not, said he, then will I. For I am churchwarden.

I charge you, said I, that you do not, except you have authority. I will not, said he, be hindered by your charge. For we will have a mass here on Sunday, and a preacher that shall prove thee an heretic, if thou dare abide his coming.

Yes, said I, God willing, I will abide and hear him; for sure I am, that he cannot disprove any doctrine that I have preached.

Yes, said he, and that thou shalt hear, if thou run not away ere then.

No, Mr. Austen, I will not run away.

Marry, said he, I cannot tell; thou art as like as not; with many more words we came out of the church, and so departed.

When Sunday came I looked for our preacher, and at the time of morning prayer, I said to the clerk, Why do you not ring? You forget that we shall have a sermon to-day. No, said he, Mr. Miles's servant hath been here this morning, and said, his master hath letters from my lord chancellor, that he must go to London, and cannot come. That day I preached a sermon in his stead. Now have they slandered me, that I prepared a company from divers places to have troubled him; but they agreed not in their lie. For some said, I had them at Adesham, and that Richard Austen had knowledge, and sent for the constable to see the peace kept, which is found a lie. Others said, I had them from Canterbury and Adesham. Others said, I had them in both places, that if the one missed, the other should not. God forgive them all. Now upon these two matters they boast that they sent two bills of complaint to the council. Wherefore by the advice of friends, I made this testimony, and sent it up by Mr. Wiseman.

The BEHAVIOUR of Mr. JOHN BLAND, Parson of ADESHAM, in the COUNTY of KENT, on Sunday the 3d Day of December last, containing the WORDS which he there spake unto the PEOPLE.

WHEREAS upon certain communication had between the said parson and Richard Austen, and Thomas Austen, in the presence of all the parish of Adesham, the Sunday before St. Andrew's day last, the said Austen then declared, That the said parson had taught there in times past great heresies, which to confound, they would prepare a preacher against the next Sunday following, if so be the said parson would abide, and not run away: upon which rumour, divers persons resorted out of the country, unto the said parish church, at the day appointed, there to hear the preacher; and at the time in which the sermon ought to be made, no man appeared there to preach; but it was reported to the parson that the preacher appointed, had urgent business and could not come. So that the multitude being now come together, the same parson perceiving that the people's expectation was defrauded, said, Forasmuch as you are willingly come to hear some good advertisement of the preacher, who cannot be now present, I think it not convenient to let you depart without some exhortation for your edification. And further declaring that he had no licence to preach, said, That he would not meddle with any matter in controversy. And then he began the epistle for the day, desiring the audience to mark three or four places in the said epistle, which touched of quietness and love to one another: and there briefly reading the epistle, he noted the same places, and so making an end thereof, desired all men to depart quietly and in peace, as they did, without any manner of disturbance, or token of evil.

JOHN HILLS,

Another MATTER of TROUBLE wrought against Mr. JOHN BLAND, as appeareth by his own Narration.

UPON Innocents day, being the 28th of December they had procured the priest of Stodmarsh to say mass: he had nigh made an end of mattins ere I came, and when he had ended them, he said to me, Mr. Parson, your neighbours have desired me to say mattins and mass; I hope you will not be against the queen's proceedings. No (said I) I will offend none of her majesty's laws, God willing. What say you? quoth he, and made as though he had not heard. Then I spake the same words to him again with an higher voice; but he would not hear, though all the rest in the chancel heard: I spake so loud the third time, that all the church might hear, That I would not offend the queen's laws, and then he went to mass; and when he was reading the epistle, I called the clerk unto me, with the beckoning of my finger, and said unto him, I pray you desire the priest, when the gospel is done, to tarry a little, I have something to say to the people; and the clerk did so.

And the priest came down into the stall where he sat, and I stood up in the chancel door, and spake to the people of the great goodness of God always shewed unto his people, unto the time of Christ's coming, and in him and his coming, what benefit they past we present, and our successors have; and among other benefits I spake of the great and comfortable sacrament of his body and blood. And after I had briefly declared the institution, the promise of life to the good, and damnation to the wicked, I spake of the bread and wine affirming them to be bread and wine after the consecration, as yonder mass book, saying, Holy bread of eternal life, and the cup of perpetual salvation. So that like as our bodily mouths eat the sacramental bread and wine, so doth the mouth of our souls (which is our faith) eat Christ's flesh and blood. And when I had made an end of that, I spake of the misuse of the sacrament in the mass; so that I judged it in that use no sacrament, and shewed how Christ bade us all eat and drink; and in the mass one only eateth and drinketh, and the rest kneel, knock, and worship: and after these things ended, as briefly as I could, I spake of the benefactors of the mass, and began to declare who made the mass, and recited every man's name, and the patch that he put on the mass; but before I had rehearsed them all, the churchwarden and the constable his son-in-law, violently came upon me, and took my book from me, and pulled me down, and thrust me into the chancel, with an exceeding roar and cry. Some cried, Thou heretic; some, Thou traitor; some, Thou rebel; and when every man had said his pleasure, and the rage was something past, I was quiet, good neighbours, said I, and let me speak to you quietly. If I have offended any law, I will make answer before them that are in authority to correct me. But they would not hear me, and pulled me, one on this side, and another on that, and began again. Then Richard Austen said, Peace masters, no more till mass be done, and they ceased. Then I said to the churchwarden and constable, each holding me by the arm, Masters, let me go into the church-yard till your mass be done. No, said the church-warden, thou shalt tarry here till mass be done. I will not, said I, but against my will. And they said, Thou shalt tarry, for if thou go out thou wilt run away. Then I said to the constable, lay me in the stocks, and then you will be sure of me, and turned my back to the altar. By that time Richard Austen had devised what to do with me, and called to the constable and the church-warden, and bade them put me into a side chapel, and shut the door on me, and there they made me tarry till mass was ended. When the mass was ended, they came into the chapel to me, and searched what I had about me; and found a dagger, and took it from me. Then said Thomas Austen, church-warden, after many brablings that they made with me, Thou keepest a wife here among us, against God's law and the queen's. You lye, good man Austen, said I, it is not against God's law, nor I suppose, against the queen's. Thus they brought me out of the church, and without the door they railed at me.

without pity or mercy: but anon the priest came of the church, and Ramsey, that of late was clerk, and unto him, Sir, where dwell you? And therefore Thomas Austen took him by the arm, and said, Come firrah, you are of his opinion, and took his dagger from him, and said, he should go with him. I am content, said he, and a little mocked them in their previous talk. By this time John Gray of Wingham, a friend to John Smith, came in at the church stile, and seeing them hold Ramsey by the arms, said to him, Now now Ramsey, have you offended the queen's laws? No, said he. Then there is no transgression. Wherewith Thomas Austen took him, and said, You are one of their opinions, you shall go with them for company, and took his dagger from him, and then demanded what he did there? But after (I think) for very shame they let him go again. But they carried Ramsey to Canterbury, guarded by eighteen persons. A sheet of paper would not contain the talk that he had that night with Mr. Hardes, justice, Mr. Oxenden, Mr. Spilman, and Mr. Tutsam.

The next day they made a bill against me, but it served not their purpose, which was, that they would have had me to prison. But James Chapman, and Bartholomew Byes, were bound in twenty pounds each of them for my appearance at the next general sessions, or in the mean time to appear, if I were sent for before the queen's majesty's council, or any other commissioners sent by the queen's authority. And Ramsey was bound to the peace, and to be of good behaviour till the next sessions. His sureties were Thomas Hogeeking, and Simon Barrat.

Now on the 23d or 24th of February Sir Thomas Finch, knight, and Mr. Hardes, sent for me and my sureties to Mr. Finch's place, and took me from my sureties, and sent me to the castle of Canterbury, by Sir Thomas Moyles's order, as they said, where I lay ten weeks, and then was bailed, and bound to appear at the next sessions holden at Canterbury: but after, they changed it to be at Ashford on Thursday in Whitsun-week, being the nineteenth of May: but in the mean time the matter was exhibited to the spiritual court.

The First EXAMINATION of Mr. JOHN BLAND in the Spiritual Court, before Dr. HARPSFIELD, ARCHDEACON of CANTERBURY, and Mr. COLLINS, COMMISSARY.

THE 18th day of May, Mr. Harpsfield, archdeacon of Canterbury, obliged the mayor's serjeant to bring me before him and Mr. Collins, commissary, into Christ's-church, and they took me into a chamber in the suffragan of Dover's house.

Then the archdeacon said, Art thou a priest? And I said, I was one. And he said, Art thou a graduate of any university? and I said, Yea. What degree, said he, hast thou taken? The degree, said I, of Master of Arts. The more pity, replied he, that thou shouldst behave thyself as thou hast done. Thou hast been a common licensed preacher, hast thou not? and I said, I have been so. Marry, said he, so I understand.

Harpsfield. What hast thou preached?

Bland. God's word, to the edifying of his people.

Harpsfield. No, no, to the destruction both of thy soul and their's too, if the mercy of God be not speedily extended towards you. I pray thee tell me what thou hast preached?

Bland. I told you already what I have preached.

Harpsfield. Nay, but tell me what one matter hast thou preached to the edifying of the people, as thou sayest?

Bland. I will tell you no particular matter: for I perceive you would have some matter against me.

Harpsfield. No, by my faith, I only desire to win thee from the heresies thou art bewrapt in, and hast infected others withal. For thou hast preached, as I am informed, that the blessed sacrament of the altar is not the real body and blood of Christ after the consecration. Tell me, hast thou not thus preached? and is not this thy opinion?

Bland. Sir, I perceive, as I said before, that you seek some matter against me. But seeing that I am bound in the sessions to my good behaviour for preaching, which may be broken with words, and well I know not with what words, and also both mine authority to preach, and my living taken from me, I think I am not bound to make you an answer.

Collins. Mr. Bland, do you not remember, that St. Peter biddeth you make answer to every man that asketh you a reason of the faith that is in you?

Bland. I know that, and am content so to answer as that text biddeth: but I know that Mr. Archdeacon doth not ask me after that manner, but rather to bring me into trouble. Then they said, No, you shall not be troubled for any thing that you say here.

Bland. I am content for knowledge sake to commune with you in any matter, but not otherwise. And so they fell to reasoning for the space of an hour, of the sacrament, both against me. At last Mr. Collins said, Mr. Bland, will you come and take in hand to answer such matters on Monday next as shall be laid to you?

Bland. Sir, you said I should not be troubled for any thing that should be said here for learning's sake. And they said, You shall not, but it is for other matters.

Bland. Sir, I am bound to appear, as some tell me, on Thursday next at Ashford, I am in doubt whether I can or no: yet have I purposed to be there, and so to go to London to Mr. Wiseman, for an obligation that he hath, whereby I should receive some money to pay my debts withal. Then said Mr. Archdeacon, I will write to Mr. Wiseman, that you shall sustain no loss.

Bland. That shall not need: for I can sustain no great loss if I go not. But I pray you let me have a longer day. No, said he.

Bland. Sir, I cannot well come on Monday.

Harpsfield. Wilt thou not come when he so gently speaketh to thee, where he may command thee?

Bland. I do not deny to come, but I desire a longer day.

Harpsfield. Thou shalt have no other day: I charge thee to come on Monday.

Bland. Sir, I perceive it shall be for this or like matters: will it please you, or Mr. Collins, for God's sake, to confer scriptures privately with me in this matter, seeing you say you would so gladly win me.

Harpsfield. With all my heart will I take the pains, and I will also borrow my lord of Dover's library, to have what books thou wilt: and thus they departed. Now the 17th of May at Ashford I could not be released, although I was called to the Spiritual Court for that purpose, but was bound to appear at the sessions held at Cranbroke the third of July.

Another APPEARANCE of Mr. BLAND, before the ARCHDEACON and his FELLOWS.

ON the 21st of May I appeared in the chapter-house, where was a great multitude of people, unlooked for by me, and Mr. Archdeacon said thus to me; You are come here according as you were appointed; and the cause is, that it hath pleased the queen's highness here to place me, to see God's holy word set forth, and to reform those that are here fallen into great and heinous errors, to the great displeasure of God, and the decay of Christ's sacraments, and contrary to the faith of the catholic church, whereof thou art notably known to be one that is sore poisoned with the same, and hast infected and deceived many with thy evil preaching; which if thou wilt renounce, and come home again to the catholic church, both I and many others would be very glad: and I for my part shall be right glad to shew you the favour that lieth in me, as I said unto you when you were appointed hither, because you then refused to satisfy again the people that you had deceived. And whereas it is feigned by you, that I should openly dispute the matter with you this day; although I did neither so intend nor appoint, yet I am content to dispute the matter with thee, if thou wilt not without disputation help to heal the souls that are brought hellward by thee. What sayest thou?

Bland. I do protest before God and you all, that neither is my conscience guilty of any error or heresy, neither neither that I ever taught any error or heresy willingly. And where your mastership saith, That I have feigned an open disputation with you, it is not true, as I can thus prove: Upon Saturday I was at Ugden's, and there Mr. Bingham laid it to my charge, that such an open disputation, as you have here offered, should be this day between you and me. Whereat I much marvelled, and said to him, that before that present I never heard any such word; neither would I answer nor dispute: And Mr. Vaughan, Mr. Oxenden, Mr. Seth, of Overland, and Mr. Uxden can witness to this; and further I said to them, that I never spake to you of any disputation, nor you to me. Now if your mastership have any thing to say to me by the law, I will make answer to it.

Harpsfield. Hear ye what he saith? His conscience is clear. I pray thee, whereon groundest thou thy conscience? Let me hear what thy faith is.

Bland. I know not why you should ask me a reason of my faith, more than any other man in this open audience.

Harpsfield. Why, thou heretic, art thou ashamed of thy faith? If it were a christian belief, thou needest not be ashamed of it.

Bland. I am not ashamed of my faith. For I believe in God the Father Almighty, maker of heaven and earth, and in Jesus Christ his only Son our Lord, &c. with all the other articles of the creed; and I do believe all the holy scriptures of God to be most certain and true.

Harpsfield. Wilt thou declare no more than this?

Bland. No.

Harpsfield. Well, I will tell thee whereon I ground my faith: I do believe and ground my faith and conscience upon all the articles of the creed, and upon all the holy scriptures, sacraments, and holy doctors of the church, and upon all the general councils that ever were since the apostles time. Lo, hereupon ground I my faith; with many more words which I do not well remember.

And when he could get no other answer from me, than what I had said before, he called for a scribe to make an act against me. And after much communication, I said, By what law and authority will you proceed against me? Mr. Collins said, By the canon law.

Bland. I doubt whether it be in strength or no. Yet I pray you let me have a counsellor in the law, and I will make answer according to the law.

Harpsfield. Why, thou heretic, thou wilt not confess thy faith to me, that have authority to demand it of thee; and yet I have confessed my faith to thee before all this audience. As concerning the blessed sacrament of the altar, thou hast taught, that after the consecration it is bread and wine, and not the body and blood of our Saviour Jesus Christ. How sayest thou, hast thou not thus taught?

Bland. Sir, as concerning this matter of the sacrament, when I was with you and Mr. Collins, you said then it was for other matters that I should come hither: and further, that you would be content at my desire, to confer scriptures with me, to see if you could win me; and you said, you would borrow my lord of Dover's library, that I should have what book I would; and now you require me thus to answer, contrary to your promise before any conference be had, and seek rather to bring me into trouble, than to win me.

Harpsfield. I will, as God shall help me, do the best to thee that I can, if thou wilt be any thing conformable; and I hope to dissolve all thy doubts, if thou be willing to hear. And I also will desire these two worshipful men, my lord of Dover, and Mr. Collins, to hear us.

Bland. No, you shall pardon me of that: there shall be no such witness. But when we agree, set to our hands. Here the people made a great noise against me, for refusing the witness: and here we had many more words that I can rehearse. But at last I said, Sir, will you give me leave to ask you one question? And he said,

Yea, with all my heart. For in that thou askest a thing, there is some hope that thou mayest be won.

Bland. Sir, when it pleased Almighty God to send his angel unto the virgin Mary to salute her, and say "Hail, full of grace," &c. came any substance from God our Father into the virgin's womb to become man? Whereat Mr. Archdeacon, my lord of Dover, and Mr. Collins were silent. But my lord spake first, and said, The Holy Ghost came to her; and ere he had brought out his sentence, Mr. Syriac Peters said, "The power of the Most High overshadowed her." Truth, said Mr. Archdeacon, it was the power of God sent by the Holy Ghost. They had forgot, that He was begotten of the substance of his Father; or else they perceived whereunto this question tended: and so both I and he left it, by what words I cannot tell. But I said, Shall I ask one other? And he said, Yea. Is there the sacrament, after the consecration, Christ's natural body, with all the qualities of a natural body, or no?

Harpsfield. Hark, said Mr. Archdeacon, hear ye this heretic? He thinks it an absurdity to grant all the qualities of Christ's natural body to be in the sacrament. But it is no absurdity: for even that natural body that was born of the virgin Mary is glorified, and that same body is in the sacrament after the consecration. Beceive you not the arrogancy of this heretic, that he put me to answer him, and he will not answer me? I thought to put me to a pinch with his question; for tell you it is a learned question.

Bland. If you be so much disconcerted with me, will say no more; yet I would all men heard, that you say the glorified body of Christ is in the sacrament after the consecration.

Harpsfield. I may call thee gross ignorant. Thou gross ignorant, is not the same body glorified, that was born of the virgin Mary? Is it then any absurdity to grant that to be in the sacrament? And while he spake many other words, I said to Mr. Petit, That the sacrament was instituted, delivered, and received of the apostles, before Christ's body was crucified; and it was crucified before it was glorified; which saying Mr. Petit partly recited to Mr. Archdeacon.

Harpsfield. Thou hast no learning. Was not Christ's body given to his apostles, as in a glorified act? And yet no inconvenience, although his natural body was not crucified; for when he was born of the virgin Mary without pain, was not that the act of a glorified body; and when he walked on the water, and when he came into the house to his apostles, the doors being shut fast, were not these acts of a glorified body?

Then my lord of Dover helped him to a better place and said, When Christ was in mount Tabor, he was there glorified in the sight of his apostles.

Harpsfield. You say truth, my lord, he was glorified in the sight of three of his apostles.

Bland. This methinks is new doctrine.

Harpsfield. Well, seeing he will by no other way be reformed, let the people come in and prove these matters against him. And thereupon the archdeacon brought forth a copy of the bill of complaint that was put up against me at Christmas, and about that we had a little talk. And then Mr. Archdeacon rose up, and said, See ye, good people that know this matter, that ye come in, and prove it against him. Whereupon answered Thomas Austen, I pray you let us be no more troubled with him, and then spake John Austen, and Heath a one-eyed man, and began to accuse me; but I gave them no other answer, but do to me what ye can by law, and I will answer it. Then said Thomas Austen, Bland, you were once abjured. You say not truly, Goodman Austen, said I, I was never abjured. Either said he, you were abjured, or else you had the king's pardon. Neither of both, said I; you speak this of mere malice, with many other babbling words. Then Mr. Archdeacon departed, and left Mr. Collins to command me to appear the next day. However, for certain other urgent business that I had, I did not appear, but wrote a letter to Mr. Commissary, desiring him to respite the

the matter till my coming home again; and if he would not, I would contentedly submit myself to the law when I came home.

Now about the 28th day of June I came to Mr. Commissary to let him know of my return, and offered myself to satisfy the law, if it were proceeded against me, before Mr. Cocks of Surry, and Marks the apparitor; but Mr. Commissary gently said, that he had done nothing against me; and so appointed me to appear before him the Friday seven-night after. In the mean time a sessions was held at Cranbroke, where I was bound to appear; and carrying surety with me to be bound again, for I expected no other, did appear the third day of July.

Then said Sir John Baker, Bland, we hear that you are a Scot; where was you born and brought up? I said, I was born in England. And he said, Where? I replied, In Sedber, and brought up by one Dr. Lupton, a provost of Eaton college. Well, said he, I know him well. Remain to your bond till afternoon.

Then said Sir Thomas Moyle, Ah Bland, thou art a stiff-necked fellow. Thou wilt not obey the law, nor answer when thou art called. Then said Sir John Baker, Mr. Sheriff take him to your ward: and the bailiff set me in the stocks, with others, and would not hear me speak one word; and so we remained in the goal of Maidstone, till a fortnight before Michaelmas, or thereabouts: and then we were carried to Rochester, to the assize held there, where we were two days among the prisoners: and when we were called, and the judges asked our causes, when my cause was rehearsed, Mr. Barrow, clerk of the peace, said, that I was an excommunicate person.

Then the judges of assize remanded us to Maidstone again, ordering us to be brought to the next sessions that should be held at the town of Malden: however the sheriff never sent for us; so we tarried at Maidstone till the sessions held at Greenwich, the 18th and 19th of February. I and others being within the bar amongst the felons, and irons upon our arms, were called out the next day by the jailor and bailiffs, and eased of our irons, and carried by them into the town to Sir John Baker, Mr. Petit, Mr. Webb, and two others whom I knew not.

Another EXAMINATION of Mr. BLAND.

BAKER. Bland, wherefore were you cast into prison?

Bland. I cannot well tell. Your mastership cast me in.

Baker. Yea, but for what were you in before that time?

Bland. For an unjust complaint against me.

Baker. What was the complaint?

Bland. I told him as truly and as briefly as I could.

Baker. Let me see thy book?—And I gave him a Latin testament.

Baker. Will you go to the church, and obey and follow the queen's proceedings, and do as an honest man should do?

Bland. I trust in God to do no otherwise but as an honest man ought to do.

Baker. Will you do as I said?

Bland. Will it please your mastership to give me leave to ask you a question?

Baker. Yes.

Bland. Sir, may a man do any thing that his conscience is not satisfied in to be good?

Baker. Away, away; and threw down the book, and said, it is no testament. And I said, Yes. And Mr. Webb took it up, and said unto me very gently, Mr. Bland, I knew you when you were not of this opinion; would to God you would reform yourself; with better words than I can write. And I said, If you have known me of another opinion than I am now of, it was for lack of knowledge.

Baker. Yea, sayest thou so? by St. Mary, and hold thee there, I will give six faggots to burn thee, ere thou shouldst be unburned: hence knave, hence. And so were we returned into our place again within the bar. And at night, when judgment of felons and all was done, we were called; and the judge ordered the jailor to deliver us to the ordinary. And if, said the judge, they will not be reformed, let them be delivered to us again, and they shall have judgment and execution. And one of our company said, My lord, if we be killed at your hands for Christ's sake, we shall live with him for ever.

Another APPEARANCE of Mr. BLAND in the SPIRITUAL COURT.

THEN we came to the castle of Canterbury, and there we remained till the second day of March, on which day we were brought into the chapter-house of Cree-church, where were sitting the suffragan of Canterbury, Mr. Collins, Mr. Milles, with others, and then went to them Mr. Oxenden, Mr. Petit, Mr. Webb, and Mr. Harges, justices. And when I was called, Mr. Webb said, Here we present this man unto you, as one vehemently suspected of heresy.

Bland. Mr. Webb, you have no cause to suspect me of heresy. I have been a prisoner this whole year, and no matter proved against me. I pray you, what is the reason that I have been kept so long in prison?

Webb. Leave your arrogant asking of questions, and answer to that that is laid to your charge.

Bland. I do so; for I say you have no cause to suspect me of heresy.

Webb. Yes; you denied to Sir John Baker, to be conformable to the queen's proceedings.

Bland. Is it a just cause to suspect me of heresy, for asking a question with leave? So we had more words there than I well remember.

Then stood up Mr. Petit, and said, You were cast into prison, because you fled away from your ordinary.

Bland. Then have I had wrong: for I never fled nor disobeyed mine ordinary, nor did any thing contrary to the law. If I did, let them now speak; but they said nothing. And when I saw they held their peace, I said, Mr. Commissary, have you been the cause of this my imprisonment? No, says he; you know that when you went from me, you were appointed to appear the Friday after the sessions. Here I was suffered to speak no more, but shut up in a corner till my companions were presented, and then we were sent to Westgate into prison, and were put into several close holds, so that we could not speak to one another, neither was any man permitted to come to us. We appeared four times in this manner: but one they dispatched, by what means I cannot tell, whose name was Cornwall, a tanner.

And thus hitherto passed the talk between Bland and the justices, and certain gentlemen of the shire. Now followeth the order of the reasoning, between him and the clergymen, before whom he was examined. But forasmuch as the chief doer and judge against him was the bishop of Dover, or suffragan of Canterbury, called Dr. Richard Thornton, to the intent it may appear what little truth or constancy is in these catholic persecutors, I thought here to exhibit, by the way, a certain popish letter, written to him by a papist. Wherein is declared what gospeller the said Richard Thornton was in king Edward's time, who now turning with the tide, sheweth himself a most bitter persecutor against God's servants in queen Mary's time. The copy of this letter here followeth.

The COPY of a POPISH LETTER written to the BISHOP of Dover, by one THOMAS GOLDWELL, a Priest, declaring what a Professor he was in KING EDWARD's Time.

RIGHT reverend, and my good lord, after my hearty thanks for your good cheer at my last being with your lordship, this shall be to certify you, that as soon as cardinal Poole arrived, I gave him your letters, but I had much work to obtain any thing of him for you. For there have been very evil informations given of you, and it hath been said, that you have concurred red with all manner of evil proceedings, which have for some years been in England, as well against the holy sacrament of the altar, and against the supreme authority of Christ's vicar upon earth, as with the use of the late abominable communion, and with the marriage of priests, as well religious as secular; and that you have given orders to (I cannot tell how many) base, unlearned, and evil disposed people, by reason of which they have taken upon them to preach, and thereby have done much hurt in Kent. So that men think, that yet if any new mutation (which God forbid) should happen, you would be as ready to change as any other. And indeed it maketh me to fear the same, by reason that notwithstanding it hath pleased Almighty God to provide, that your absolution was sent unto you (when you little thought of it), absolving you from all past offences, yet your lordship (more regarding the vanity of the world than the offence of God, which he only knoweth how much it grieves me for the due love I bear unto you) presumed to sing masses in pontificals, the holidays immediately following, and also to ministrare to children the sacrament of confirmation, because that one (being a member of the devil) did somewhat comfort you so to do.

Oh my lord, what honour should it have been both to God and to yourself, and also edification to all good people, (though all worldly men and heretics would have laughed you to scorn) if you considering your great offences towards God, and his goodness towards you, would, as you have offended in the face of the world, to the damnation of many, likewise have shewed yourself penitent in the face of the world, to the edification of many, and not so soon to have celebrated for vanity pontificially; but for a time to have abstained for reverence altogether from the altar, according to the ancient custom of the church. Which I have also seen observed by some honest men, not being enjoined thereto by any man, but as their own consciences obliged them. But what is past cannot be recalled. And I thought it not my part to leave your lordship, mine own friend and master, in the mire. Wherefore I ceased not to solicit your cause with my lord's grace, till at last I obtained of his grace for your lordship all the faculties of which I send you a copy here enclosed, partly for your own consolation, and partly for the comfort of others, desiring your lordship to use them to the honour of God, that there come to me thereof no rebuke: not publishing them to any person, but to such as you know will gladly receive them. For hitherto there is never a bishop in England, who hath granted him so great authority concerning those which be under his cure. Only Mr. Archdeacon hath the like, and in one thing, more great than be these your lordship's. Wherefore your lordship shall do well to remit unto him all such priests as have cure of souls, whether they be beneficed men or parish priests. For he hath not only authority to absolve them, as you have, but also to give them authority to absolve such as be underneath their cures. And thus I commit your lordship to the protection of Almighty God.

Written at Bruffels the 16th of June, 1554.

Your lordship's beadman,

THOMAS GOLDWELL.

And thus much by way of digression, concerning the bishop of Dover. Now to return again to the examination of Mr. Bland: let us hear his own report of his answers, as followeth.

Here followeth mine answer, as nigh as I can call to remembrance, every word and sentence; yet if any that was present can help to perfect it, I would be glad. But yet this I dare say, that there is never one sentence, but it was openly spoken the 9th of March in the Chapter-house of Cree-church, in the presence of as many as they had chosen, the mayor of the city being called to be an assistant, and all others shut out.

The ANSWER of Mr. BLAND at his Appearance before the COMMISSARY, and others in the Spiritual Court.

MR. Collins said: Mr. Bland, you know that you are presented unto us as one suspected of heresy. How say you, be you contented to reform yourself to the laws of this realm, and of the holy church?

Bland. I deny that I am justly suspected of heresy, and that you heard when I was presented, that I denied the suspicion to be just, but to defend the unjust punishment that I have suffered: neither can you prove that any occasion hath been given by me, whereby any man should suspect me therein. But if you have any law or authority to proceed against me for any thing done for a whole year ago and more, I will answer to it.

Collins. You were convented before Mr. Archdeacon and me, and matter of heresy laid to your charge.

Bland. That matter was done and said a whole year ago, for I have been in prison this year and more. If you have any thing against me by law, I desire that you let me know the law and matter, and I will answer according to the law.

Then said my lord suffragan; But that I am one of the judges I would rise, and stand by thee, and accuse thee to be a sacramentary, and bring witnesses to prove it; yea, and further, that thou hast called the mass an abominable idol.

Bland. You, my lord, never heard me say so: but I heard you once say, That in your conscience you had abhorred the mass three years. Thou liest, says he, never said so.

Bland. My lord, if they might be heard, I can bring witnesses to prove it, with the day, time, and place; and I once did hear Mr. Collins at a visitation in Wingham say, That Christ was a full satisfaction for all sin present and to come, contrary to that he saith now.

And here we had more words of this matter, which I let pass for lack of good remembrance.

Mr. Collins said, This is but a drift. You had better answer now, else you shall go to prison again, and be called on Monday, and have articles laid to you, and if you answer not then directly, you shall be condemned as an heretic, and that will be worse for you.

Bland. Sir, I do not now, nor will then deny to answer any thing that you can lay to my charge by law, wherefore I trust you will let me have the benefit of the law.

Collins. This is the law, that if you be required of the ordinary to render a reason of your faith, then may you not deny it. And that we do now.

Bland. To that then will I answer. For I believe in God the Father Almighty, maker of heaven and earth, and Jesus Christ his only Son our Lord, with all the other articles of the creed: and I believe all the articles contained both in the creed called the mass creed, and in the creed of Athanasius: and I do believe, that all the holy scriptures, and all things therein contained are most true.

Collins. This will not serve you: you must answer to all such articles in all these as shall be laid to you, or asked of you.

Bland. Sir, I have answered you. Have him away, said my lord of Dover, he had better have answered.

Bland. My lord, I am ready to answer, if you have any thing against me by law.

Bp. of Dover. You have preached many heresies in Adesham, where I am parson now; and therefore you must make answer to them.

Bland. Lay them to my charge by the law, and I will answer them, if you can prove I am bound to answer to that which was done a year ago or more: for if you may do that, you may also lay to my charge, and compel me to answer to all things done in all my life.

Collins. It is not a year ago since you were before Mr. Archdeacon and me.

Bland. It is a year and ten weeks since the words were spoken, and I have been a prisoner ever since, and have been at five sessions, and never could have my cause tried. Methinks your charities should think it punishment enough, if I had been guilty.

Collins. All this will not serve you; you must needs answer, and it will be better for you to answer now in another time. Will you reform yourself, and go to the church, worship Christ in the blessed sacrament at the altar, and be obedient unto all the queen's laws?

Bland. I pray you, wherefore am I brought hither?

Collins. To answer to such things as are demanded of you.

Bland. Sir, I thought you had some matters against me by the law.

Collins. Well, on Monday at nine of the clock you shall see the law, and have articles laid unto you.

Then they espied Mr. Cox the lawyer, and called him in, and said, Here is a lawyer can tell you are bound by law to answer: and he said as they had said.

Collins. Do you not believe, that after the consecration of the blessed sacrament of the altar, there remaineth no substance of bread, but the substance of Jesus Christ, both God and man?

Bland. Mr. Commissary, I know not by any law why you should ask me that question more than any other man here. And after a little talk, my lord of Dover asked me this question: Dost thou not believe, after the consecration, that it is the body of Christ? And I said, No, I do not so believe: for the scriptures do not teach me, that there should remain the flesh of Christ, to eat as a man should eat man's flesh.

Then Mr. Glasier said, That was the opinion of the heretics, there is no man here of that opinion: and make long of cutting of Christ's body, as men cut flesh at the shambles.

Then Dr. Faucet said, Mr. Bland, forasmuch as you and I were brought up both in one house, and born both in one parish, I would be as glad as any man alive to do you good; but you may not thus stand against the church. For Christ saith, You must humble yourself, and take up his cross, and follow him: and to humble yourself in this place, is to be content, and not stick to your own judgment, but to humble yourself to the holy church, which hath determined, that after the consecration there remaineth no bread, but the natural body and blood of Christ.

Bland. Mr. Doctor, if you take humbling of ourselves in that place, to admit the determination of the church, then must we know by the scriptures, that the same church determined nothing but according to the scriptures, as this is not: and therefore I do not believe any such transubstantiation, nor ever will, God willing. Then, says he, I have done with you; I will no more pray for you than for a dog.

Then said Mr. Glasier, How think you? Did St. Paul, when he said, Is not the bread that we break a partaking of the body of Christ? did he mean baker's bread?

Bland. Though he did not mean baker's bread, that doth not prove that he brake natural and real flesh.

Glasier. No, by St. Mary, we say not so, but we say it is the natural body glorified, under the form of bread and wine.

Bland. Then the apostles had it not as we have; or else his glorified body was crucified for us.

Glasier. Tush, you do not understand the scriptures. For Christ's body was ever glorified, in that it was so marvellously united to the Godhead: yea, and he shewed his body divers times glorified, as in the mount Tabor; and when he walked on the water, we see he was light, and had no weight in him. Was not that then a glorified body?

Bland. Then belike Peter's body was glorified, if walking on the water was a deed of a glorified body: and the iron that Elisha made to swim upon the water.

Tush, said my lord of Dover, that was done by prayer. But there was such a laughing, that I heard no more what my lord said.

Bland. Masters, I know that it availeth nothing to reason with you, no more than it availed you in the time of the gospel. For then neither the reason of Eckius, Cochlaeus, nor yet of detection of the devil's sophistry of my lord chancellor's doing, could take any place. And it is known to some that be here, that something I can say in them.

Dover. No, you know Oecolampadius, Zuinglius, and such others.

Bland. Indeed, my lord, I have seen part of their doings.

Dover. That is seen by thee to-day.

Glasier. I was glad when I heard you say, you believed the catholic church, and now go you from it.

Bland. No, that I do not.

Glasier. You know that Christ saith, "If thy brother have offended thee, go and reconcile him between thee and him. If he hear thee not, take two or three with thee, that in the mouth of two or three witnesses all things may be established. If he hear not them, tell it unto the church; if he hear not the church, take him as an heathen." I pray you, where could you have found this church of your's, fifty years ago?

Bland. You know that the true church did not at all times flourish, but was wonderfully persecuted.

Then my lord of Dover cried, No more, I command you to hold your peace. Have him away, and bring in another.

Collins. You shall come again on Monday at nine o'clock, and in the mean time you shall have whom you will to confer withal; your friend Dr. Faucet, or Mr. Glasier, if you desire them.

Bland. I will refuse to talk with no man; as for any conference on your part, it is but weak laws, established as they are. But when there was no law, I did desire conference. And for that time I departed.

The Monday after we were brought to the same place again; and then Mr. Collins began to speak to me, but after what manner, it is clean out of my mind; but the end was, that I would reform myself. But as I did before, I demanded what they had to lay to my charge, and to see the law, which they said before I should see.

Dover. What need? We have enough against you: for you denied unto me transubstantiation in the sacrament.

Bland. I did refuse to answer till you promised I should see the law, whereby you might compel me to answer.

Dover. My lord took the scribe's book, and read the answer that I made to Dr. Faucet's reason, which I knew not that they had written.

Bland. My lord, I made you no such answer when you asked me; I take Mr. Collins and Mr. Glasier to witness. Then they brought forth a decretal, a book of the bishop of Rome's law, to bind me to answer, which my heart abhorred to look upon. The effect was, that the ordinary had authority to examine, and that those whom they so examined must needs answer. But I said that it meant such as were justly suspected, as I was not. And here we had much communication; for I charged them with unjust imprisonment, which they could not avoid.

Mr. Oxenden would have helped them, and said, the justices put me in prison for preaching a seditious sermon, and for troubling a priest at mass.

Bland. That is not true; for after I had been ten weeks in prison I was bailed out, till I was cast in again, (as the justice said) for the disobeying mine ordinary, which I never did.

Collins. Are you willing to confer with some? It will be better for you; now we offer it, because you would not desire it.

Bland. As I did not refuse before, no more will I now. But I did not perceive before, but that one thing might have come, without any leave-asking, to confer the scriptures: and therefore I expected Dr. Faucet would have come to me without desiring, if any profit to me had been in conference; for though I was never able to do him good, yet once I was his tutor.

Collins.

Collins. Will you come to his chamber in the afternoon?

Bland. Sir, I am a prisoner, it is meet that I obey, and come whither you will, and so departed. At this time we were three. But they took another to appear before them the Tuesday seven-night after. And when he came, I knew not what was done, but I hear they excommunicated him, and let him go. His name was Miller, a clothier.

Here followeth a certain CONFUTATION of Mr. BLAND, against false and manifest Absurdities granted by Mr. MILLES, Priest of Christ-church in Canterbury.

MILLES. We say that Christ is in or under the sacrament really and corporally, which are the forms of bread and wine, and that there is his body contained invisibly, and the qualities which we do see, as whiteness and roundness, be there without substance by God's power, as quantity and weight be there also by invisible measure.

Bland. This is your own divinity, to make accidents the sacrament, and Christ's real body invisibly contained in them, and so to destroy the sacrament. And yet the doctors say, the matter of the sacrament is bread and wine. And God by his power worketh no miracles with "This is my body," so as to change the substance of bread and wine into his body and blood, in that he maketh accidents to be without their substance by invisible measure. I am ashamed to see you so destroy Christ's sacrament, contrary to your own doctors, and trifle with God's work.

Milles. To Christ is given all power in heaven and in earth; so that by the omnipotent power of his Godhead he may be, and is where he listeth; and is really and corporally, without occupying of place; for a glorified body occupieth no place.

Bland. Mark your own reason. All power is given to Christ both in heaven and earth; by the omnipotent power of his Godhead he may be where he list: Therefore, he is in the sacrament really and corporally without occupying of place.

I deny your argument; for it followeth neither of your major nor minor. And first I would learn of you, how you know that Christ listeth to be present at the will of every priest. For if the priest list not to say your mass, then Christ listeth not to be there.

Again, ye say, all power is given unto Christ both in heaven and in earth; so that is the cause by your reason, that by the omnipotent power of his Godhead he may be where he list: and by that reason he had no power of his Godhead, till he had his human body, and then he was not equal with the Father in divinity: for all power was not given to Christ, before the humanity and the Godhead were knit together, neither was he the Son. Here is more danger than you are aware of, if you would stand to it with just judges.

Milles. We eat Christ's flesh and blood spiritually, when we receive it with faith and charity. And we also do eat it corporally in the sacrament; and the body that we so receive hath life. For the Godhead is annexed thereto: which although it be received with the body of Christ, yet it is not visible after a gross sort, and the flesh of Christ that we receive is lively; for it hath the Spirit of God joined to it. And if a man be drunken, it is not by receiving of the blood of Christ: for it is contrary to the nature of Christ's blood. If he be drunken, it is by the qualities and quantities, without substance of blood.

Bland. I am glad that you are so much against all men, to say that Christ's body is alive in the sacrament; it may chance to bring you to the truth in time to come. Methinks it is evil to keep Christ's body alive in the pix; or else must you grant, that he is alive in receiving, and dead in the pix. And you say truth, that it is not the natural receiving of Christ's blood that maketh a man drunken; for it is the nature of wine that doth that, which you deny not.

And a greater truth you confess than you did think, when you said, If a man be drunken, it is by the qualities and quantities, without the substance of blood; indeed blood hath no such qualities with it: by which is evident that there is no natural blood.

If a man be drunken with wine consecrated, it may be a miracle, as I think you will have it, that the accidents should be without their natural substance, and work all the operations of both substance and accident; and so it followeth that a man may be drunken by miracle. The body that you receive, you say, is alive, because it is annexed to the Godhead; and the flesh that you receive is lively, because it hath the Spirit of God joined to it.

This division is of your new inventions, to divide the body and the flesh, the one alive by the Godhead, the other lively by God's Spirit, and both one sacrament; you make of it a thing so fantastical, that you imagine a body without flesh, and flesh without a body; as you do qualities and quantities without substance, and a living body without qualities and quantities.

Milles. If case so require, and there be a godly intent in the minister to consecrate, after the consecration thereof, there is present the body and blood of Christ, and no other substance, but accidents without substance to a true believer.

Bland. You grant three absurdities, that in a wine consecrated is nothing but accidents: and to increase it withal, you have brought in two inconveniences; first, that it is not the word of God that doth consecrate, but the intent of the priest must help; and if that fail, you seem to grant no consecration, though the priest speak the word; and yet your doctors say, that the wickedness of the priest diminisheth the sacrament.

And to an unbeliever you seem to say, that it is the same, as it is to the true believer; and then must the unbeliever have something to do in the consecration. Endeavouring to avoid Charybdis you fall upon Scylla.

Milles. The substance of Christ's body doth not fill the mouse's belly. For although he doth receive the outward forms of bread and wine, yet he doth not receive the substance inwardly, but without violation. And a mouse doth not eat the body of Christ, to speak properly; for it doth not feed him spiritually or corporally; as it doth man, because he doth not receive to any inducement of immortality to the flesh.

Bland. You make not your doctrine plain to be understood: we must know how a mouse can receive the substance inwardly and outwardly. You say he doth not receive the substance inwardly, but without violation. Therefore, with violation he receiveth the substance inwardly. You say that the mouse cannot violate Christ's body; but he violateth the substance that he eateth. And this your proper speech doth import as much, as that the mouse should eat the sacrament to as great effect, and the same thing, as doth the unworthy receiver. For if that be the cause that the properly eateth not the body of Christ, because she doth not feed upon it spiritually nor corporally, nor receiveth it to any inducement of immortality, as you say; then it followeth, that the unbeliever and the mouse receive both one thing. And yet it cannot be denied, but the mouse will live with consecrated bread, and then you must grant this absurdity, that a substance is nourished and fed only with accidents.

Milles. Men's bodies be fed with Christ's body, and with immortal meat, by reason of the Godhead annexed to eternal life; but men's bodies be corporally nourished with qualities and forms of bread and wine: and we deny that by the sacramental eating any gross humour turned into blood is made miraculously in the body.

Bland. Where it cannot be denied that a man may live, and naturally be nourished in his natural body with the sacramental bread and wine consecrated; you cannot avoid that: but then you turn to the spiritual nourishing of man's body, by Christ's body and Godhead annexed, which is nothing to put away the absurdity, that either a man's natural body should be fed naturally with accidents, or else to have them changed into gross humour. But you say, men's bodies be corporally nourished with qualities and forms of bread and wine; and then must you needs grant, that qualities and quantities must be made de substance in man. For by them our bodies are nourished, or else is all that is the nutriment in man substance and no substance.

Miles. If the forms of bread and wine be burned, worms ingendered, it is no derogation to the body of Christ, because the presence of his body ceaseth to be there, and no substance cometh again.

Bland. Ye grant here, that a substance may be made accidents, as ashes or worms: but I think you will grant it by your miracles, and this I count a greater absurdity than the other, that Christ's body should cease to be there, and no substance to come again; for no word in all the whole bible seems to serve you for the ceasing of his presence, though we granted you, which we do not, that it were there. God Almighty open your heart, if it be his will and pleasure, to see the truth. And if I ought not my death to be at hand, I would answer you all the rest, in these and all other my doings.

I submit myself to our Saviour Jesus Christ, and his word, desiring you in the bowels of Christ to do me the same.
Your orator in the Lord,
JOHN BLAND.

Left APPEARANCE and EXAMINATION of Mr. BLAND.

Hitherto you have heard the troublesome handling of this faithful servant of God, John Bland, tost to and fro, from prison to prison, from session to session.
At last he was brought before the bishop of Dover, the commisary, and the archdeacon, at Canterbury, the 13th day of June. The name of this bishop was Richard Nornton. The commisary was Robert Collins, whom the cardinal by his letters patent had substituted his agent, before his coming over to England. The archdeacon was Nicholas Harpsfield. Under these a great many innocent lambs of Christ were cruelly treated and unlawfully slain at Canterbury, amongst whom the aforesaid Mr. Bland was one of the first; who, as it is said, being brought before the first bishop, and colleagues, which were John Frankesh, Nicholas Sheterden, Thomas Hacker, Humphrey Middleton, and William Cocker, were examined of articles. To whom it was objected by the commisary, Whether he believed that Christ is really in the sacrament, or not, &c. To this he answered and said, that he believed, that Christ is in the sacrament, as he is in all other good bodies; so that he judged not Christ to be really in the sacrament.

Whereupon the day being on Monday, he was bid to appear again on Wednesday next, and from thence he was deferred again to Monday following, being the twentieth of June, in the same chapter-house, then to hear further what should be done, in case he would not consent to their mind. Which day and place he appearing as before, was required to speak his mind plainly and fully to the aforesaid articles, being again repeated to him. These articles, commonly and in course they usually objected to their examinees which were brought before them, which articles, as here now followeth, need not hereafter be repeated, especially for the county of Kent.

ARTICLES ministered by RICHARD, BISHOP of DOVER, to Mr. BLAND, and likewise to the rest following after him.

FIRST, That thou art of the diocese of Canterbury, and so subject to the jurisdiction of the archbishop there.

2. Item, That thou art a christian man, and dost profess the laws of God, and faith of Christ's catholic church, and the determination of the same.

3. Item, That all persons who teach, preach, believe, affirm, hold, maintain, or say within the diocese of Canterbury, otherwise than our holy mother the church doth, are excommunicate persons, and heretics, and as excommunicate and heretics ought to be named, reputed, and taken.

4. Item, That thou, contrary to the catholic faith and determination of our holy mother church, within the diocese of Canterbury, hast openly spoken, maintained, holden, affirmed, and believed, and yet dost

No. 21.

hold, affirm, and believe, that in the blessed sacrament of the altar, under the forms of bread and wine, there is not the very body and blood of our Saviour Jesus Christ in substance, but only a token, sign, and remembrance thereof, and that the very body and blood of Christ is only in heaven, and no where else.

5. Item, That thou, contrary to the catholic faith, and determination of our holy mother church, hast within this diocese of Canterbury openly spoken, said, maintained, holden, affirmed, and believed, and yet dost hold, maintain, affirm, and believe, that it is against God's word, that the sacrament of Christ's church should be ministered in an unknown tongue; and that no man with a safe conscience, or without peril of sin, receiveth any sacrament administered in any tongue that he understandeth not.

6. Item, That thou, contrary to the catholic faith of our holy mother church, hast, and yet dost hold opinion, and say, that it is against God's word, that the sacrament of the altar should be administered in one kind; and that no man may with a safe conscience so receive it.

7. Item, That the premises be true, and that there is common fame upon them within the diocese of Canterbury.

The ANSWERS of Mr. BLAND to the aforesaid ARTICLES.

TO these articles Mr. Bland, answering again in order as they were objected to him, saith to the first, granting the same, that he was a priest, and of the diocese of Canterbury.

To the second also he answereth affirmatively.

To the third he answereth, that the article is true, meaning the catholic church to be Christ's church.

To the fourth article he answered, as touching the first part thereof, he doth confess, that he hath preached and taught it, as it is contained in the same. And as touching the second part of the article, he doth confess, that he doth now also hold and say, as he preached and taught before.

The fifth article he granteth.

To the sixth, he preached, held, and doth hold, as is contained in the article.

To the last article he granteth the same, &c.

This done, and his answers and confession taken, respite was given him yet a few days to deliberate with himself. And on the 25th day of the said month of June he appeared again in the chapter-house, and there boldly and firmly withstood the authority of the pope; whereupon he was condemned and committed to the secular power.

Mr. BLAND's PRAYER before his DEATH.

THE Lord Jesus, for whose love I do willingly leave this life, and desire rather the bitter death of his cross, with the loss of all earthly things, than to abide the blasphemy of thy holy name, or else to obey man in breaking of thy commandments; thou seest, O Lord, that whereas I might live in worldly wealth to worship false gods, and honour thy enemy, I chose rather the torments of this body, and loss of this my life, and have counted all things but vile dust and dung that I might win thee: which death is more dear to me than thousands of gold and silver. Such love, O lord, hast thou laid up in my breast, that I hunger for thee, as the deer that is wounded desireth the foil. Send thy holy comforter, O Lord, to aid, comfort, and strengthen this weak piece of earth, which is void of all strength of itself.
Thou rememberest, O Lord, that I am but dust, and not able to do any thing that is good. Therefore, O Lord, as thou of thy accustomed goodness hast bidden me to this banquet, and counted me worthy to drink of thine own cup amongst thine elect; give me strength against this element, that as it is to my sight most irksome and terrible, so to my mind it may be at thy commandment, as an obedient servant, sweet and pleasant; and through the strength of thy Holy Spirit I may pass through the strength of this fire into thy bosom, according to thy promise, and for this mortality to receive immortality, and for this corruptible to put on incorruption. Accept this burnt offering and sacrifice, O Lord, not for the sacrifice itself, but for thy dear Son's sake my Saviour; for whose testimony I offer this free-will offering with all my heart and with all my soul. O heavenly Father, forgive me my sins as I, forgive the whole world. O sweet Saviour, spread thy wings over me. O God, grant me thy Holy Ghost, through whose merciful inspiration I am come hither. Conduct me unto everlasting life. Lord, into thy hands I commend my spirit; Lord Jesus receive my soul. So be it.

The HISTORY of JOHN FRANKESH, HUMPHREY MIDDLETON, and NICHOLAS SHETERDEN.

HAVING now passed over the examination of Mr. Bland, let us further proceed to the rest of his fellow prisoners, being joined the same time with him in the like cause and like affliction. The names of whom were, John Frankesh, Nicholas Sheterden, Humphrey Middleton, Thacker, and Cocker, of whom Thacker only gave back. The rest constantly standing to the truth, were all together condemned by the suffragan of Canterbury, the 25th day of June, the year above expressed. Whose examinations I need not long dwell upon, forasmuch as the articles ministered against them were all one, so in their answers they little or nothing disagreed, as you shall hear hereafter. In the mean time, because Nicholas Sheterden in his examinations had a little more talk with the archdeacon and the commissary, I will first begin with him.

The First EXAMINATION or REASONING of NICHOLAS SHETERDEN with Mr. Archdeacon HARPSFIELD, and Mr. COLLINS, the COMMISSARY, for which they sent him to Prison.

FIRST the archdeacon and commissary affirmed, that the very words of Christ, when he said, This is my body, did change the substance, without any other interpretation or spiritual meaning of the words.

Sheterden. Then belike when Christ said, "This cup is my blood," the substance of the cup was changed into his blood, without any other meaning, and so the cup was changed, and not the wine.

Harpsfield. Not so; for when Christ said, "This cup is my blood," he meant not the cup, but the wine in the cup.

Sheterden. If Christ spake one thing, and meant another, then the bare words did not change the substance; but there must be a meaning sought as well of the bread, as of the cup.

Harpsfield. There must be a meaning sought of the cup otherwise than the words stand. But of the bread it must be understood only as it standeth without any other meaning.

Sheterden. Then do you make one half of Christ's institution a figure, or borrowed speech, and the other half a plain speech, and so you divide Christ's supper.

Harpsfield. Christ meant the wine, and not the cup, though he said, This cup is my blood.

Sheterden. Then shew me whether the words which the priest speaks over the cup, do change the substance, or whether the mind of the priest doth it?

Harpsfield. The mind of the priest doth it, and not the words.

Sheterden. If the mind of the priest doth it, and not the words, if the priest then do mind his harlot, or any other vain thing, that thing so minded was there made, and so the people do worship the priest's harlot instead of Christ's blood: and again, none of the people can tell when it is Christ's blood, or when it is not, seeing the matter standeth in the mind of the priest. For no man can tell what the priest meaneth but himself; and so are they ever in danger of committing idolatry.

Then was the archdeacon somewhat moved, and sat him down, and said to the commissary, I pray you,

Mr. Commissary, to speak to him for a while; for these are as unreasonable and perverse answers as ever I heard. Then the commissary stood up and said:

Your argument is much against yourself, for you say that the bread is a figure of Christ's body; but the wine can be no figure of his blood, nor yet his very blood, and therefore Christ did not mean the cup, but the wine in the cup.

Sheterden. My argument is not against me at all, for I do not speak it to prove that the cup is his blood, nor the figure of his blood, but to prove that the bare words being spoken by the priest do not change the substance any more of the bread, than they do change the cup into blood.

Commissary. It could not be spoken of the cup, when he said, This cup is my blood; but he meant the wine in the cup.

Sheterden. Then it remaineth for you to answer the question to the archdeacon, that is, whether the mind of the priest, when he speaketh over the cup, doth change it into blood, or the bare words?

Commissary. Both together do it, the words and the mind of the priest together; yea, the intent and the words together do it.

Sheterden. If the words and intent together do change the substance, yet must the cup be his blood, and not the wine, forasmuch as the words are, "This cup is my blood," and the intent, you say, was the wine; or else the words take none effect, but the intent only.

After, the commissary in his chamber said, it was the intent of the priest before he went to mass, without the words; for the priest did intend to do as the church had ordained, then the intent made the sacrament to take effect.

Sheterden. If the sacraments take effect of the intent of the priest, and not of God's word, then many parishes having a priest that intendeth not well, are utterly deceived, both in baptizing, and also worshipping that thing to be God, which is but bread, because for lack of the priest's intent, the words do take none effect in it; so that by this it is ever doubtful, whether they worship Christ or bread, because it is doubtful what the priests do intend.

Then the commissary would prove to me, that Christ's manhood was in two places at one time, by these words of Christ in the third chapter of John, where he saith, "No man ascendeth up into heaven, but he that came down from heaven, even the Son of man which is in heaven." By this he would prove, that Christ was then in heaven, and on earth also, naturally and bodily.

Sheterden. This and other places must needs be understood for the unity of the person, in that Christ was God and man, and yet the matter must be referred to the Godhead, or else you must fall into great error.

Commissary. That is not so: for it was spoken of the manhood of Christ, forasmuch as he saith, "The Son of man which is in heaven."

Sheterden. If you will needs understand it to be spoken of Christ's manhood, then must you fall into the error of the anabaptists, who deny that Christ took flesh of the virgin Mary; for if there be no body ascended up, but that which came down, where is then his incarnation? for then he brought his body down with him.

Commissary. Lo, how you seek an error in me, and yet see not how you err yourself. For it cannot be spoken of the Godhead, except you grant that God is passable; for God cannot come down, because he is not passable.

Sheterden. If that were a good argument, that God could not come down, because he is not passable; then it might be said by the like argument, that God could not sit, and then heaven is not his seat, and then say as some do, that God hath no right hand for Christ to sit at.

Then the commissary affirmed plainly, that it was the true God hath no right hand indeed.

Sheterden. Oh what an injury to Christ's religion will this be, that because we cannot tell how God came down, therefore we shall say, that he came not down at all.

and because we cannot tell what manner of hand th, to say that he hath no hand at all; and then he ot reach the utmost parts of the sea. O misery!
ngth it will come to pass, that God cannot sit, and how can heaven be his seat? and if heaven be not eat, then there is no heaven; and then at length I t you will say there is no God, or else no other but such as the heathen gods are, which cannot or feel.

Why, doth not the scripture say, that is a Spirit? and what hand can a Spirit have?

Truth it is, God is a Spirit, and there-is worshipped in spirit and truth; and as he is a it, so he hath a spiritual power, so he hath a spi-l seat, a spiritual hand, and a spiritual sword, which hall feel, if we go on at this rate. Because we know what God hath, therefore if we say he hath none, it may as well be said, there is no Christ.

*Then the commissary said, he would talk no more me, and so departed; and also the commissary was pelled to grant, that Christ's testament was broken, his institution was changed from that he left it:
he said, they had power so to do.*

First ANSWERING after their LAW was established.

Because I know you will desire to hear from me some certainty of my estate, I was called before the suf-an, and seven or eight of the chief priests, and ex-ned of certain articles, and then I required to see r commission.

*They shewed it to me, and said, there it is, and the g and queen's letters also. Then I desired to have it l: and so in reading I perceived, that on some notasuspicion he might examine upon two articles;
ether Christ's real presence were in the sacrament, whether the church of England be Christ's catholic rch.*

*So that I answered, that I had been a prisoner three rters of a year, and, as I thought, wrongfully:
on would therefore that I should answer to those ngs for which I was imprisoned.*

The suffragan said, his commission was, that I must ver directly, yes or no.

This commission, said I, was not general to examine om he will, but on just suspicion.

He said, I was suspected, and presented to him.

Then I required him to shew the accusation.

He said he was not bound to shew it; but he comnded me in the king and queen's name to answer ectly.

*Sheterden. I, as a subject, do require justice of you:
what I have done I ask no favour.*

Suffragan. You were suspected.

*Sheterden. Prove your suspicion, or shew what cause
I have to suspect.*

Suffragan. Thou wert cast into prison for that cause.

Sheterden. That was a pretty suspicion, because I d suffered imprisonment contrary to God's law and lm, that therefore I must now for amends be ex-ned of suspicion without cause, to hide all the wrong ne to me before. For when I was cast into prison, ere was no law that hindered me from speaking as I d: therefore in that point I could be no more suscted than you, who preached the same yourself not ng before.

Suffragan. That was no matter to thee what I eached.

Sheterden. Well, yet in the king and queen's name must answer directly: and therefore I require as a bject, that you do not extend beyond your commission, it prove me suspected, more than yourself.

Then Mr. Mills told them that I had written to my other, and that he had seen the letter, wherein I per-aded my mother to my opinions.

Sheterden. In that I did but my duty to certify her, at I was not in prison for any evil. And likewise that as before the law, and therefore no more suspicion was me, than was in them that taught the like.

Mills. Well, you are required here to answer di-ectly.

Sheterden. First then I require of you to prove this suspicion; and thus we tossed it to and fro. At last the bishop said, he himself did suspect me. I asked whereby?

Suffragan. Well, I myself did suspect thee, and it is no matter whereby.

Sheterden. But your commission doth not serve you so to do without cause of suspicion.

Suffragan. Well, yet I did suspect you.

*Sheterden. It is not meet for you to be my accuser and my judge also, for that is too much for one man.
And thus many words were multiplied, and they were much grieved.*

Mills. If you were a christian man, you would not be ashamed of your faith being required.

Sheterden. I am not ashamed indeed, I thank God, and if any man did come to me, either to teach or learn, I would declare it; but forasmuch as I perceive you come neither to teach nor to learn, I hold it best not to answer you.

Mills. If you will not, then will we certify the king's council.

Sheterden. I am therewith content that you should certify that I had suffered three quarters of a year wrongfully in prison, and therefore I desire to be justified or condemned, first for that I suffered such imprisonment; and then I will not refuse to answer your articles, though they were a bushel of them. But to say that I would answer, whereby you should heal all your wrong done to me against the law of God and the realm, I will not.

*Here much ado there was to prove that he had no wrong, and again, that it was not they that did it. But said he, the commissary was one of them. He answered No, and said it was the archdeacon. He said, you sat with him, and he asked your counsel in it, and yet if it were he, it was your church, except the archdeacon and you be divided one from another. Well, said they,
Will you now deny what you said then, and promise here to submit yourself, and you shall be delivered?*

*Sheterden. I am not so much beholden to you as to grant you any such promise: and you shall plainly see that I will not promise to go across the street for you:
but if at any time I have offended your law, let me have the punishment: I ask no favour.*

Then they said, it was obstinacy in him that he would not answer, and a token that his faith was naught, seeing he was ashamed to utter it.

Nay, said Sheterden, you shall well know I am not ashamed of my faith: but because you so greedily seek blood, I will answer only to that you have against me.

Suffragan. Nay, you shall answer to the articles, or else be condemned upon suspicion.

Sheterden. I am content with that, yet all men shall know, that as you suspect and can prove no cause, so shall you condemn me without a matter, and then shall all men know you seek my blood, and no justice.

Suffragan. No, we seek not thy blood, but thy conversion.

Sheterden. That we shall see. For then shall you prove my perversion first, before you condemn me on your suspicion without proof of the same: and by that I shall know whether you seek blood or no. Many other words were between them.

*At last stepped up one Lovels, a lawyer, who would prove his imprisonment not to be wrong, but right, by old statutes of Edward the fourth, and Henry, &c.
but at last he was compelled to forsake those statutes from Michaelmas to Christmas, and then he said it was no wrong.*

To this Mr. Sheterden said, if he could prove that men might wrongfully imprison before a law, and in the mean while make laws, and then under that hide the first wrong, then he said true, or else not.

*Thus he kept the band-dogs at staff's end, not as thinking to escape them, but that I would see, said he,
the foxes leap above the ground for my blood if they can reach it, (so it be the will of God) yet we shall see them gape and leap for it. From Westgate in haste.*

By your's, NICHOLAS SHETERDEN.

His EXAMINATION before the BISHOP of WINCHESTER, then LORD CHANCELLOR.

I Was called into a chamber before the lord chancellor, the suffragan, and others, priests I think for the most part. He stood by the table, called me to him, and because I saw the cardinal was not there, I bowed myself and drew near.

Then said he, I have sent for you because I hear you are indicted of heresy; and being called before the commissioners, you will not answer nor submit yourself.

I said, If it please you, I did not refuse to answer; but I did plainly answer that I had been in prison a long time, and reason it was that I should be charged or discharged of that, and not to be examined of articles to hide my wrong imprisonment, neither did I know any indictment against me. If there were any, it could not be just, for I have not been abroad since the law was made.

Then said the bishop of Winchester, Well, yet if such a suspicion be of you, if you be a christian, you will declare that it is not true, and so clear yourself.

Sheterden. I thought it sufficient to answer to mine offences, &c. trusting that they would lay no such burden upon me, whereby the wrong done to me might be covered, but I would be proved to have wrong or right.

Winchester. If thou wilt declare thyself to the church to be a christian, thou shalt go, and then have a writ of wrong imprisonment, &c.

Sheterden. I have no mind to sue now, but require right justice: but to make a promise, I will not; and if I offend the law, then punish me accordingly. For it might be that my conscience was not persuaded, nor would be, in prison; seeing these things which I have learned, were by God's law openly taught and received by the authority of the realm. And he said, it was never received, that I might speak against the sacrament; I said that against some opinion of the sacrament it was openly taught.

Winchester. By no law, and that was not able to consider, that all that while God preserved that, so that no law could pass against it.

Sheterden. I said their law did not only persuade me, but this most; when they preached unto us, they took pains to set out the word of God in our tongue, so that we may read and judge whether they say true or no, but now they take the light from us, and would have us believe it, because they say so, which is to me a great persuasion.

Winchester. It was not a few that could be your guides in understanding, but the doctors and the whole church; now whom wouldst thou believe? either the few or the many?

Sheterden. I did not believe for the few or for the many, but only for him that bringeth the word, and shewed it to me to be so, according to the process thereof.

Winchester. Well, then, if an Arian come to thee with scripture, thou wilt believe him, if he shew this text, "My Father is greater than I."

Sheterden. No, my lord, he must bring me also the contrary place, and prove them both true, where he saith, "My Father and I are one."

Winchester. Yea, that is by charity, as we are one with him.

Sheterden. That gloss will not stand with the rest of the scripture, where he said, "I am the very same that I say to you;" he said the truth, and the truth was God, with more such like. And here he made many words, but very gently, of the sacrament. Likewise Christ said, said he, it was his body; yea, that is to say, a figure of his body; and how men did not consider that the Word was God, and God the Word, and so provoked me with such temptation; but I let him alone, and said nothing. So after many words, he came to the church's faith, and comely order of ceremonies and images. And then I joined to him again with the commandments.

Winchester. That was done that no false things should be made, as the heathen would worship a cat because she killed mice.

Sheterden. It is plain that the law forbids not such, but even to make an image of God to any manner of likenesses.

Winchester. Where find you that?

Sheterden. Forsooth; in the law where God gave them the commandments: for he said, "Ye saw no shape, but heard a voice only:" and added a reason why; "lest they should after make images and men themselves;" so that God would not shew his shape because they should have no image of him who was the true God, &c.

Winchester. You have made a goodly interpretation.

Sheterden. No, it is the text.

Then the bible was called, and when it came he let me find it, and I should presently be confounded with my own words; so that if there were any grace in me I should no longer trust to my own judgment; when I looked, it was Latin.

Winchester. Why, can you read no Latin?

Sheterden. No. Then was the English bible brought. He bade me find it; and so I read it aloud: and then he said, Lo here thou mayest see; this is no more to forbid the image of God, than of any other beast, fowl, or fish, (the place was Deut. iv.) I said it did plainly forbid to make any of these as an image of God, because no man might know what shape he was of. Therefore might no man say of any image, this is an image of God.

Winchester. Well, yet by your leave, so much as was seen we may, that is, of Christ, of the Holy Ghost, and the Father appeared to Daniel like an old man.

Sheterden. That is no proof that we may make images contrary to the commandment; for though the Holy Ghost appeared like a dove, yet was he not like in shape, but in certain qualities; and therefore when I saw the dove, which is God's creature, indeed I might remember the Spirit to be simple and loving, &c. and with that he was somewhat moved, and said, I have learned my lesson, and asked who taught me, with many words; and he said he would prove how good and profitable images were to teach the unlearned, &c.

Sheterden. At last I said, My lord, although I were able to make ever so good a gloss upon the commandments, yet obedience is better than all our good intentions and much ado we had. At last he said, he saw what I was, and that he had sent for me for charity sake to talk with me, but now he would not meddle; and said, my wrong imprisonment could not excuse me, but I must clear myself.

Sheterden. I said that was easy for me to do, for I had not offended.

Winchester. He said I could not escape so, there I was deceived.

Sheterden. Well, then, I am under the law, &c.

The archdeacon was then called in, and he said, that I behaved myself before him with such arrogance and stoutness, as never was heard: whereas he was minded with such mercy towards me, &c. and many other lies he laid to me, that I was sent home till another time, and I would not be contented, but went out of the church with such an out-cry as was notable.

Sheterden. I declare that herein he falsely reported me, and brought in the laws then in the realm, and the queen's proclamation, that none of her subjects should be compelled till the law were to compel; and that I rehearsed the same in the court for me, and I did use him then, said I, as I use your grace now, and no otherwise.

Winchester. He said that I did not use myself very well now.

Sheterden. I said I had so offered myself to be bailed, and to confer with them when and where they would.

Winchester. He said I should not confer, but be obedient. I said, let me go, and I will not desire to confer neither: and when offended, let them punish me, and so departed.

By your brother,

NICHOLAS SHETERDEN.

last EXAMINATION, with the CONDEMNATION of Mr. JOHN BLAND, J. FRANKESH, N. SHETERDEN, and H. MIDDLETON.

AND thus much touching the particular and several examinations of Mr. Sheterden and Mr. Bland. Now to touch something also of the other martyrs, who were examined the same time, and suffered together with them, to wit, Humphry Middleton, of Ashford, and John Frankesh, vicar of Rolvynden, in the diocese of Kent, above-mentioned; here first should be declared the articles, which publicly in their last examinations were jointly and severally ministered unto them by the aforesaid Thornton, bishop of Dover; but forasmuch these articles being ordinary and of course, are already expressed in the story of Mr. Bland, it is not therefore needful to make any new rehearsals thereof. The seven articles being propounded to the persons above-named, to wit, John Frankesh, John Bland, Nicholas Sheterden, Humphry Middleton, and one Thacker; John Frankesh first answered somewhat doubtfully, desiring further respite to be given him of fourteen days to deliberate with himself, which was granted. Mr. Bland answered flatly and roundly, as you heard before. Nicholas Sheterden, and Humphry Middleton answered to the first and second articles affirmatively. To the third concerning the catholic church after a sort they granted. To the fourth, fifth, and sixth, concerning the real presence, and the sacrament to be administered in the Latin tongue, and in the kind, they utterly refused to answer. Sheterden said, he would not answer thereto before the cause were determined why he was imprisoned, and so still remained prisoner, before the laws of parliament received, &c. Middleton added moreover and confessed, that he believed in his own God, saying, My living God, and no dead god, &c. Thacker only relented, and was content to take penance. Thus the aforesaid four upon these answers were condemned by the bishop of Dover the 25th day of June, 1555.

And being delivered to the secular power, they were all four burnt together at Canterbury the 12th of July, in two several stakes, but in one fire, where they in sight of God and of his angels, and before men, like true soldiers of Jesus Christ, gave a constant testimony to the truth of his holy gospel.

Mr. NICHOLAS SHETERDEN's PRAYER before his DEATH.

O LORD my God and Saviour, who art Lord in heaven and earth, maker of all things visible and invisible, I am the creature and work of thy hands; Lord God, look upon me and other thy people, who at this time are oppressed by the worldly-minded for thy law's sake; yea, Lord, thy law itself is now trodden under foot, and men's inventions exalted above it, and for that cause do I, and many thy creatures, refuse the glory, praise, and conveniences of this life, and do chuse to suffer adversity, and to be banished, yea, to be burnt with the rods of thy word, for the hope's sake, that is in store. For, Lord, thou knowest, if we would but seem to please men in things contrary to thy word, we might by their permission enjoy these advantages that others do, as wife, children, goods, and friends, all which I acknowledge to be thy gifts, given to me and that I may serve thee. And now, Lord, that the world will not suffer me to enjoy them, except I offend thy laws, behold I give unto thee my whole spirit, soul, and body; and lo, I leave here all the pleasures of this life, and do now leave the life of them for the hope's sake of eternal life purchased in Christ's blood, and promised to all them that fight on his side, and are content to suffer with him for his truth, whensoever the world and the devil shall persecute the same.

O Father, I do not presume to come unto thee trusting in mine own righteousness, no, but only in the merits of thy dear Son my Saviour. For which excellent gift of salvation I cannot worthily praise thee, neither is my sacrifice worthy, or to be accepted with thee, in comparison of our bodies mortified, and obedient unto thy will: and now, Lord, whatsoever rebellion hath been, or is found in my members against thy will, yet do I give my body to death, rather than I will use any strange worshipping, which I beseech thee accept at my hand for a pure sacrifice: let this torment be to me the last enemy destroyed, then death, the end of misery, and the beginning of all joy, peace, and solace: and when the time of resurrection cometh, then let me enjoy again these members glorified, which now be spoiled and consumed by fire. O Lord Jesus receive my spirit into thy hands, Amen.

LETTER I.

From Mr. SHETERDEN to his MOTHER.

AFTER my humble and bounden duty remembered, well-beloved mother, this shall be to wish you increase of grace and godly wisdom, that you may see and perceive the crafty bewitching of Satan our mortal enemy, who, as I have divers times declared unto you, doth not openly shew himself in his own likenesses, but under a colour of devotion deceiveth them that keep not a diligent eye upon him; but having confidence in men's traditions and customs of the world, leaving the commandments of God and testament of his Son Christ Jesus our Lord, do grow more into superstition and hypocrisy, than into wisdom and true holiness. For this is most true, that Satan, the enemy of souls, doth by his ministers make many believe, that those things which they compel us unto for their bellies' sake, have many godly significations, although they be most contrary to God's will, as doubtless they be, even as the serpent did in Paradise to our first mother Eve. "What, said he, hath God commanded you shall not eat of all the trees in the garden? The woman said, Of the fruits of the trees in the garden we may eat: but of the tree in the midst of the garden, said God, see ye eat not, lest ye die." Even so our ministers now-a-days say, Hath God commanded you shall not make you any image or likeness of any thing? Yea, forsooth. Tush, say they, what harm can they do? May we not remember God the better, when we see his image or picture? For they are good books for the lay-men; but indeed they be better for the priests, because they receive the offerings.

And look how truly the promise of the serpent was kept with Eve, so is the perturbation of our priests found true with us. For as Adam and Eve did become like God in knowing good and evil, so are we in remembering God by his image: For Adam's eyes were so open, that he lost both innocency and righteousness, and was become the most miserable of all creatures: and even we remember Christ so well by images that we forget his commandments, and count his testament, confirmed in his blood, for stark madness or heresy: so miserably have we remembered him, that of all people we are most blind: and this doth follow upon our presumption, when we remember God by breaking his law; and therefore surely except we repent, shortly God will remember us with his plagues, as sure as there is a God it will come to pass.

But (I thank God) I know their craftiness herein, who will say, Where went he to school? Is he wiser than our great doctors that studied all their lives? And lo, they say that it is good hay; although we smell it musty ourselves, yet we must believe it sweet, and then pay them well for their so saying, and all is safe. But I might say again, What, sir, be you wiser than Christ, and God his Father, and the Holy Ghost? What, wiser than the prophets, and the holy apostles, and all the holy martyrs? I pray you, sir, where had you your high learning? Is it higher than God (being in heaven) is able to teach, or have you set it lower in hell, than ever Christ durst to venture? For methinks it is some strange learning, that Christ and his apostles could never attain to the knowledge of it. But vain men are never without some thit: for peradventure they will not be ashamed to say, that Christ coming upon his Father's message, did forget half his errand by the way: for I dare say, that the greater half of their ceremonies were never commanded by Christ: yea, I doubt it would be hard to find one in the church, perfectly as he left it: so Romishly hath Antichrist turned the church upside down for lucre's sake.

Beloved mother, as I have oftentimes said unto you, even so now I beseech you from my very heart in Christ, to consider your own soul's health is here offered to you, do not cast it off: we have not long time here. Why should we deceive ourselves either for the ease of our flesh, or for gaining the treasures of this world: I know that some will say to you, Why should we condemn our fathers who lived thus? God forbid that we should condemn any that did according to their knowledge. But let us take heed that they condemn not us, for if they heard the word as we have, and had been warned as we have been, it is to be thought that they would more thankfully have received it than we do: yea, they were more faithful in what they knew, than many now are. Therefore they shall be our condemnation, if we do not embrace this grace that is now offered to us. And surely look how many of them God will accept and save, those shall we never see, nor have any part among them: for our disobedience is greater than was their ignorance. Wherefore if we will meet our fathers in bliss and joy, let us not refuse his mercy offered to us more largely than to them, even according to Christ's promise, which said, after such great ignorance as to seek him from country to country, and find him not; yet shall the gospel, saith he, be preached in all the world, and then shall the end come.

And now let us know the time of our visitation, and not turn back again, seeing we are once delivered: for surely God will not bear it at our hands to turn backward. O remember Lot's wife. God must needs punish our backsliding, either with induration and hardness of heart, so that they shall persecute cute his church and his true servants, or else reward it with open vengeance and plagues. And therefore, good mother, accept this my simple letter as a fruit of my love and obedience to you. Would God we might be so knit in faith and trust in God's word and promises here in this life, as we might together enjoy the bliss and consolation of eternal life; which I desire and seek above all worldly treasure, as you partly know. If I would seek the good will of men contrary to my conscience, I could make some my friends which now peradventure are jealous over me amiss. But thank God, let them weigh the matter between God and their consciences, and they have no just cause so to do. Nevertheless I wish they would yet refrain, and put their matter and mine into the balance of God's most holy word, there to be weighed by the mind of the Holy Ghost, expressed unto us by the holy patriarchs and prophets, and Jesus Christ our only Saviour and Mediator, and by his holy apostles, and then I doubt not but our matter shall be ended with peace and joyfulness of heart; which God grant us for his mercy's sake, Amen.

LETTER II.

To his BROTHER WALTER SHETERDEN.

I With you health in Christ, true knowledge of his word, and a faithful heart unto the same. It is shewed me, my brother, that you desired me by a letter made to a friend of your's to persuade me to be ruled by my uncle, who faith, he will bestow his goods very largely upon me, if I would not stand too high in mine own conceit. But, my good brother, I hope you do not judge so evil of me, that I should have a faith to sell for money. For though he or you were able to give me the treasure of the whole country, yet I thank my Lord God, I do judge it but an heap of dung, in respect of the treasure hid within; yet I do esteem a buckle of your shoe, if it come in good will. And for to be counselled and ruled by him or you, or any other of my friends, I do not, neither have refused it, if they require no more of me than what is in my power, and that which belongeth to a mortal man. But if they require of me any thing which appertaineth to God duly, there is neither high or low, friend or foe, that shall get it from me, nor yet the angels in heaven.

For though I be not learned, (as the vain men of the world call learning) yet thanks be to God, I have learned out of God's book to know him from his creatures, and Christ from his sacraments, and to make a difference between the merits of Christ's passion and his supper, and a difference between the water of baptism and the Holy Ghost, and not to mix and mingle all things confusedly together: so that if one ask me a question or reason of my faith, I must say thus, I believe as the holy church believeth; if he ask me what is the order of that faith, I should be so ignorant that I could not discern God from his creatures, nor Christ from his sacraments. If I should so monstrously utter my faith, that I were not able to judge between Christ's birth and his burial; nor, which were first, of his mortification, and his glorification, who would believe that my faith were sound?

For some do affirm that Christ did not give to his apostles a mortal and a passible body, but an immortal and glorified body, so that he should have a glorified body before his death, and so his glorification was before his resurrection; and that he was risen before he was crucified, and crucified before his baptism; and then they may as well say he was baptized before his birth, and born before he was conceived, and conceived before he was promised, and that were even right Antichrist to turn all things backward, and then say, O you must believe, for God is almighty, he can do all things, &c. Truth it is, that God is almighty indeed, and yet I may not believe things contrary to his word, that Christ's body was glorified before he died: for God's omnipotency doth not stand in things contrary to his will, but in performing his will at his pleasure in time. Neither doth he require of us to judge or believe of his almighty power, that he hath made the end of the world to come before the beginning, or yet the fruit to come before the blossom, and yet he is nevertheless almighty.

But if peradventure you shall think with yourself, Why, they are learned; it were marvel but they should know what is the truth, as well as others which never kept any such study, &c. To that I answer, that if they had studied God's word, the author of truth, as they have done logic and Duns, with the legend of lies, they should have been as expert in the truth, as they now be in bald reasons. But thus hath God fulfilled his promise, that such should be deluded with lies, who would not believe nor walk in his truth.

And again, this is a good cause to make us think surely, that was the cause that God gave them over at the first to error, after the apostles time by little, as they grew in sin. For seeing we had his truth now among us a few years, because we did not obey it, we see what a sudden change God hath brought upon us, for the sake of our sins. And why should we not think that this and such like disobedience was the cause that God took his word from all Christendom at the first, and cast a darkness upon all them that would not walk in his light? For it is evident enough to see how unlike their doings be to Christ and his apostles: and that seen, either we must judge Christ's doctrine very slender, and their's good, or else that they be indeed very Antichrists, who should come and turn all things out of frame. Thus I have been bold to trouble you, which I know will not be altogether in vain. Pray for me, as I do for you.

Your brother,

LETTER III.

From the Same to the Same.

GOD, who is the giver of all goodness, and that freely his love to us, (not only without our deserts, but contrary to the same) grant you my brother, such increased godly knowledge and love to the virtues thereunto belonging as may give you such a relish of heavenly things, that all treasures of earthly things may favour to you, as indeed they are most vain and uncertain, so shall you never take them to be better than they really are. Yea, whether God take them from us or give them to us, we shall know ourselves neither richer nor poorer before God. But if we lay up in our hearts the treasure of his word, we shall not only enrich ourselves against the time of need, but also arm ourselves against the battle with weapons and harness, which is invincible, and clothe ourselves against the marriage. For behold, the Lord hath called us a long time to the feast, and blown the trumpet to prepare for battle. Let us know the time of our visitation, lest the Lord sitting on his mount bewail our destruction, which he desireth not, but because he is just to punish such as are in sin, even as he is merciful to forgive the repentant that turn in time; for so is God that cannot deny himself.

Let us therefore in this day, while it is called to day, hearken to his voice, and not harden our hearts by resistance of his will, lest he swear in his wrath that we shall not enter into his rest. Let us count it sufficient that we have spent the time past (as St. Peter saith) after the will of the Gentiles, in eating and drinking, chambering, and wantonness, and in abominable idolatries, &c. and now let us assay a new life, and trade our members to virtue another while, lest peradventure we might run pale and return in the contrary. But if we now return and sincerely hold of his word in truth and verity, as we have a long time done in talk and liberty, then will God heap upon us such assurance of conscience, as shall kindle our consolation in him, so that all treasure shall be dung to the excellent knowledge of our Saviour. Dear brother, my heart's desire and prayer to God is, that we may together enjoy the bliss of eternal inheritance by one spiritual regeneration and new birth, as we are joined by nature. But alas, the way and means thereunto hath been much neglected by me. I will not say by you, for I had rather you should accuse yourself: for no doubt the best of us both hath not sought for wisdom in God's word, as some in the world whom we know have sought for money: therefore they shall be our judges, if we do not learn by them: yea, the very ant, as Solomon saith, doth teach us to provide for the time to come: for she provideth in summer against winter.

This is the best token I have for you now, which thought to be simple, yet shall it declare partly my heart's desire towards you, which is even as to mine own soul. Let nothing dismay you for my cause: but be you sure I shall have victory in the truth, which truth is stronger than kings, wine, or women. For as Zerobabel saith, wine is unrighteous, the king is unrighteous, women are unrighteous, yea, all the children of men are unrighteous; but the truth endureth, and is always strong, and conquereth for ever without end: therefore this is to desire you and all my other friends that with me good, to pray that God will always keep me in his truth, as he hath begun, which prayer, if it be of such a mind as laboureth to depart from evil, shall be to me the greatest pleasure under heaven. For I desire nothing in comparison of God's truth, I thank him of his mercy, who hath so wrought: for I take it as a sure seal of the endless joy which shall hereafter follow; which God bring us unto, when his will and pleasure is, Amen.

From Canterbury, by your's,

NICHOLAS SHETERDEN.

LETTER IV.

From Mr. NICHOLAS SHETERDEN to his MOTHER.

O My good mother, whom I love with reverence in the Lord, and according to my duty, I desire your favourable blessing and forgiveness of all my misdeeds towards you. Oh my good mother, in few words, I wish you the same salvation, which I hope myself to feel, and partly taste of before this come to you to read; and in the resurrection, I verily believe to have it more perfectly in body and soul joined together for ever: and in that day God grant you may see my face with joy: but, dear mother, beware of that great idolatry, and blasphemous
